SAME — BURDEN OF PROOF OF.—In a criminal case, if the defendant relies upon insanity as a defense, proof beyond a reasonable doubt is not required, but the burden of proof is cast upon him, and his insanity must be established by such a preponderance of evidence that, if the single issue of the sanity or insanity of the defendant was submitted to the jury in a civil case, they would find that he was insane.

APPEAL from the District Court, Eleventh Judicial District, El Dorado County.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the Court.

In criminal cases especially, the Courts will never affirm a at where any error has occurred on the trial, for every presumed to be injurious to the prisoner, and he is to a reversal if such error exists; he has a constitutional privilege to stand upon his strict legal rights; his trial proceed upon legal principles, and strictly so. This of the law has been affirmed by this Court in the case People v. Williams, 18 Cal. 187. The instruction of the Court below is in derogation of and the converse of the doctrine laid down by this Court in the case of The People v. Myers, 20 Cal. 518. Mr. Justice Norton, delivering the opinion of the Court, somewhat modified the doctrine before announced concerning burden of proof, prima facie case, and in criminal cases, where insanity is the defense. It is true that the presumption of law is in favor of innocence, yet, when that presumption is fully rebutted, the presumption in favor of innocence would acquit; for, in regard to substantive fact, upon the existence of which a case is made, the evidence establishing such fact being exactly equal in quantity and quality to the evidence disproving the same, by law or logic, the fact is disproved. This reasoning may be adverse to the position assumed for defendant, and the Attorney-General may say you assert that the defendant is sane, and unless you can bring more proof to establish that than I can to disprove it, his sanity is established. It might be true did not the defendant occupy a position in which where the preponderance must be against him, and in which all reasonable doubts are in his favor. Therefore the opinion of the Court below that the defendant must make his case appear beyond any reasonable doubt, reverses the rule and compels him to establish his defense and innocence beyond a reasonable doubt. The jury under this charge could believe the defendant insane by preponderating evidence, and have entertained a reasonable doubt of the fact, and been called under the charge to convict. A case can scarcely be conceived where some reasonable doubt might not arise. "It is a tenant in common of the mind with conviction, perhaps reason.

The People v. Francis C. Coffman.

In the case of The State v. Marler, 2 Alabama, 43, the Court say, the humanity of our law requires that the guilt of the accused should be fully proved. The jury must be satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt of his guilt or he must be acquitted.

The guilt or innocence of the defendant depends upon sanity or insanity; if insane, he is innocent, and a reasonable doubt of this in the minds of the jury gives to the defendant the preponderance. Doubts are never intended to favor guilt. The above charge misled the jury, was erroneous, against law, and therefore entitles defendant to a new trial.

J. G. McCullough, Attorney-General, for Respondent.

The law is: if the evidence of the prosecution leaves doubt any one fact necessary to show defendant's guilt, the defendant is entitled to that doubt and an acquittal. But when defendant is shown, beyond a reasonable doubt, to have committed the act charged, and defendant sets up in defense a separate independent fact to exculpate himself, he must prove that fact beyond a reasonable doubt. Each, in such case, is held to the same measure of proof.

Every man is presumed to be sane. If defendant sets up the distinct fact of insanity, he must prove it, and prove it beyond a reasonable doubt. In this case the State proved the fact of homicide beyond doubt; defendant pleaded insanity, and he is bound to prove it beyond reasonable doubt. This is the charge of the Court, and is the better opinion. (1 Whart. Cr. Law, §§ 55, 711; 1 Bennett & Heard's Leading Criminal Cases, 111.) And this is the rule in England and the Circuit Courts of the United States, and, it seems, in all the States that have passed on the question, except New York and Massachusetts. And, though the Massachusetts Editors of the Leading Criminal Cases (Messrs. Bennett & Heard) incline upon theory to an opinion contrary to the rule established by the great preponderance of authority, their suggestions have been disapproved by this Court, and the true rule affirmed (People v. Myers, 20 Cal. 518.)

A man need not possess a "sound mind," in order to render to punishment. There are many cases of unsound mind that do not exempt from punishment—as intoxication, a deprivation of understanding shown to exist in connection with some other act than the one inquired about—in such cases, the defendant might be of unsound mind upon every subject except the one that instigated the murder; the defendant might have been acting under a delusion at the time of the homicide that deceased intended to steal from him, (as far as far, not of “sound mind,”) and still the law holds him guilty of murder — and so of numberless delusions mentioned in the books.

The court has only to refer to the different heads of “mental unsoundness” in the authorities and text books, to notice that the various classes of “unsoundness” do not relieve from punishment. (Whar. & Stille’s Medical Jurisprudence, 6-60.)

Court, RHODES, J.

The defendant was indicted for the murder of one Deady, and was convicted of murder in the first degree, in the District Court of El Dorado County. The defendant moved for a new trial and in arrest of judgment, both of which motions were overruled, and judgment having been rendered upon the appeal, the defendant appeals.

One of the errors assigned by the defendant is the illegality of the manner of impaneling the trial jury; and to show the illegality he relies wholly upon the affidavit of the Clerk of the District Court, which states that after the regularly summoned jury had been exhausted without completing the trial,

The Court ordered ten special jurors to be summoned, and the trial was completed by calling the special jurors from the list without having their names written upon the ballots taken from a box. The affidavit was filed at the time of the motions for a new trial and in arrest of judgment. The statement in the record, however, respecting the impaneling of the jury is as follows: “This cause coming on for trial, the following named citizens were duly accepted, impan-neled, and sworn as the jury to try the cause, to wit." And following this, are the names of twelve jurors.

It does not appear from the record of the proceedings, nor from the statement on appeal, that any irregularity occurred in drawing or impanneling the jury, nor does it appear therefrom, or from said affidavit, that the defendant, at the time pointed out any irregularity, or objected to any of the proceedings in drawing or impanneling the jury.

The defendant is entitled to have all the formalities observed that are prescribed by law for the summoning, drawing, and impanneling of the jury, and if any omission or irregularity in that respect occurs, he is entitled to have the same corrected, and if not so corrected upon its being pointed out by the defendant, it is error; but as most of those proceedings are merely formal, and do not affect the substantial rights of the defendant, if he omits at the proper time to interpose his objections to any irregularity, he is deemed to have waived them. They cannot be raised for the first time on a motion for a new trial. He will not be permitted to take the chance of a trial before a jury that he knows has not been impanneled in strict conformity to law, and, after an adverse verdict to move to set it aside on account of an irregularity that he can fairly be deemed to have assented to. This doctrine has been announced by this Court both in respect to grand and trial jurors. (People v. Roberts, 6 Cal. 215; People v. Chua Lit, 17 Cal. 321; People v. Romero, 18 Cal. 89.)

Second — The defendant also assigned as error the refusal of the Court to give the instructions asked for by him; but he urges the point only in regard to the following instruction: "The possession of a sound mind by the defendant at the time of the homicide, is requisite to constitute murder or any other crime." This proposition is clearly not law. A man's mind may be unsound in many respects—indeed, he may be a monomaniac upon any given subject—and yet his mind may be sound in all other respects. Such a man, though quite capable of judging between right and wrong in regard to an act of the nature of that of which he may be accused, cannot be sa-possessed of a sound mind, yet he would be held responsible for the commission of a criminal act, except in a case where his unsoundness or monomania was involved.

The instruction is too broad and general in its terms, and cannot be satisfied by evidence of slight unsoundness in respect to matters that had not even a remote connection with the subject of the prosecution.

Unsoundness of mind, or insanity, that will constitute a defense in a criminal action is well described by Tindal, C. J., in his answer to questions propounded by the House of Lords to Lord Abinger (cited in Roscoe's Cr. Ev. 953.) He says, "that to establish a defense on the ground of insanity, it must be proved that, at the time of committing the act, the party was laboring under such a defect of reason, from disease of the mind, as not to know the nature or quality of the act, or that he did know it, that he did not know he was doing what was wrong."

It is proper to remark here, that although we have followed the counsel of both parties in treating the above instruction as refused, and have, for the reason that they so treated it, placed it under consideration, there is nothing in the record to show that it was refused, except the marginal notes of the clerk on the transcript. The defendant's instructions are not read and signed by the Judge as refused, and at the end of a list of seventeen unnumbered instructions, which are denominated "defendant's instructions given," are the words, "read and excepted to by the defendant," and those words, which had been signed by the Judge, would be construed as applying only to the last instruction.

The defendant also assigns for error, the giving of the following instruction by the Court: "This defendant is presumed sane until the contrary is shown, and a doubt upon this point alone should not acquit, for insanity is an affirmative defense, and should be made to appear beyond any reasonable doubt."

There can be no question, that in a criminal case, if the defendant relies upon insanity for his defense, the burden of proof is cast upon him, and that the allegation of insanity an affirmative proposition which must be fully and clearly proved in order to rebut the presumption of his sanity; but the only question of difficulty arising upon the instructions respects the amount of proof required to rebut the presumption.

The amount of proof required is neither increased nor diminished, because the evidence for the prosecution first raised the question of the defendant's sanity, and, indeed, a part of the whole proof of the defendant's insanity may result from the evidence offered by the prosecution.

It may be laid down as a general rule that preponderant proof is sufficient to establish a fact in the defendant's favor. This was so held in People v. Milgate, 5 Cal. 129; also in People v. Stonecifer, 6 Cal. 410.

In cases where insanity was set up as a defense, the decisions have not been as uniform as in respect to other matters of defense.

Mansfield, Chief Justice, in Billingham's case, 1 Collins on Lunacy, 636, says: "To support such a defense, (insanity) it ought to be proved by the most distinct and unquestionable evidence that the person was incapable of judging between right and wrong; that it must be proved beyond all doubt that at the time he committed the act he did not consider that murder was a crime against the laws of God and nature, and that there was no other proof of insanity which would excuse murder or any other crime."

In another case it was held "that the defense of insanity must be clearly made out;" and in a still later case it is said that "every man is presumed to be sane, etc., until the contrary is proved to their entire satisfaction."

Mr. Justice Norton, in delivering the opinion of the Court in the case of The People v. Myers, 20 Cal. 518, says: "If the burden of proving the existence of insanity rests upon the accused, it follows that this fact must be satisfactorily established and that is by a preponderance of proof."

In cases where the homicide is clearly established against the defendant, the only object in proving his insanity is to negative the malicious intent of the defendant, presumed by law, from the act of killing; and if it is proved that the defendant was insane at the time of the commission of the act, that presumption is rebutted.

Insanity, then, being a fact to be proved by the defendant, it must be established by evidence in the case with the same firmness and certainty as any other fact alleged by the defendant in his defense; that is to say, the proof must be such in amount, that if the single issue of the sanity or insanity of the defendant should be submitted to the jury in a civil case, they would find that he was insane. OFFICE OF.—A statement of facts in a demurrer is not admissible. The only office of a demurrer is to raise issues of law upon the facts stated in the pleading demurred to.

DEFENSE AGAINST.—It is no defense, in an action to foreclose a mortgage upon real estate, that it was executed by the heirs after the death of their father, from whom they inherited the property, and that the deceased left debts which remain unpaid, and that the estate is being administered upon in the Probate Court.

NEW TRIAL ON GROUND OF SURPRISE.—A new trial will not be granted on a showing, alone, of surprise, which ordinary prudence could not have guarded against, but it must also be made to appear that the moving party has a valid defense to some material part of the plaintiff's cause of action, and that on the new trial the result may be different from that on the first trial.

ESTATE BY HEIRS.—FORECLOSURE OF.—The foreclosure of a mortgage, executed by the heirs of the deceased, upon property inherited from him, does not divest or injuriously affect the rights of the creditors of the deceased;

but the purchaser at the foreclosure sale will hold the property, subject to the proceedings in the Probate Court, for the settlement of the estate of the deceased.

FINDING OF FACTS — EXCEPTION TO.— A judgment, rendered in an action tried by the Court, without a jury, after the first day of July, 1861, will not be reversed for want of a finding of the facts, unless exceptions be made in the Court below to the want of a finding.

APPEAL from the District Court, First Judicial District, Los Angeles County.

José de la Guerra y Noriega, the father of the defendants, the De la Guerras, died in February, 1858, and by his last will and testament devised the mortgaged premises to said defendants, and made the defendants Pablo and Francisco, his sole executors. The will was admitted to probate, and the executors entered on the discharge of their trust.

The devisees, on the 29th day of May, 1861, executed a note and mortgage upon which this action was brought.

The other facts are stated in the opinion of the Court.

Surprise, alone, is no ground for a new trial. It should be such surprise as ordinary prudence could not have guarded against. (Wood's Dig. 192, § 193; Patterson v. Ely, 19 Cal. 28; Haight v. Green, 19 Cal. 113; Mulholland v. Heynema, 19 Cal. 605; Malhom v. Hyde, 3 E. D. Smith, 177; Fowler v. Colyer, 2 E. D. Smith, 125; Babcock v. Brown, 2 Vermont 550.)

By the Court, RHODES, J.

The complaint in this case is in the usual form of complaints for the foreclosure of mortgages of real estate. All of the defendants except Orena demurred to the complaint on the grounds that there is a defect of the parties defendant and that the complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action.

Isaac Cook v. Pablo de la Guerra et al.

mode of pleading is inadmissible under any system, for the office of a demurrer to state facts, but to raise an law upon the facts stated in the pleading demurred to. second ground is not well taken, for the complaint does the facts that are necessary in a complaint to fore- mortgage.

defendant Orena filed a separate answer, and Pablo, co, Miguel, and Antonia Ma. de la Guerra, filed a joint in which they set up substantially the same defense, s that the mortgaged premises belong to the estate of la Guerra y Noriega, deceased, which remains in the Court unsettled, and that the creditors and legatees deceased are unpaid, and that Orena, on the 16th of , 1861, (which was subsequent to the mortgage,) pur- of the other defendants, who are the sons of said l, all their right, title, and interest in and to the estate deceased; but they do not deny the execution or de- f the promissory notes by the De la Guerras to the , nor that the amount alleged in the complaint is due them to plaintiff, nor that they executed and deliv- e mortgage to secure the payment of the notes. Upon ring, the Court rendered a decree of foreclosure and the mortgaged premises, and a personal decree against la Guerras for the deficiency that might remain after ion of the proceeds of sale to the payment of the e, debt, and costs.

ne day following the entry of the decree, all the defend- ept Orena moved for a new trial on the ground of sur- The motion was heard upon the affidavits of the attor- the parties, and was overruled. Pablo de la Guerra states that he was the attorney of all the defendants except Orena; that on the 9th day of November, 1863, he received notice that the case would be brought on to trial on the 1st of the same month; that on the 13th of November he wrote from Santa Barbara to Ygnacio Sepulveda, an attorney at Los Angeles, where the cause was tried, to appear for him and procure a postponement of the trial; that Sepulveda did not receive the letter until seven o'clock p. m. of the 17th of November—the decree having been rendered on that day—before the receipt of the letter.

The defendants fail to state what were the grounds for the continuance of the cause, and do not allege that they had any other or further defense to the action than they have set up in their answers; but if they had stated in their affidavits a good and meritorious defense, this Court would not reverse the action of the court below, in refusing to grant a new trial, unless there was a gross abuse of discretion.

It does not clearly appear that the surprise was such that ordinary prudence on the part of the parties or their attorneys could not have guarded against it. It requires, however, something more than a showing of surprise which ordinary prudence could not have guarded against. The Court will not set aside a decree and grant a new trial, on behalf of a defendant, merely for the purpose of going through the form of a trial in the presence of the defendant or his attorney, but it must be made to appear that on the new trial a result may be different from that on the first trial; in other words, the defendant must disclose a valid defense to some material part of the plaintiff's cause of action.

The defendants have failed to disclose any defense other than that better than that set up in their answers. If the defendants had appeared and proved on the trial all the affirmative allegations contained in their answers, it would not have changed the result of the action. As already stated, the answers do not deny any material allegation in the complaint, but rest upon the fact that the mortgaged property formed a part of the unsettled estate of the deceased father of the defendant.

de la Guerra, which is subject to the payment of certain debts and legacies. Those matters could not be litigated in this action.

The decree expressly saves the rights and liens of the executor of said estate; but even if that reservation had not been made, the foreclosure of a mortgage executed by the testator or devisees of the deceased could not divest or injuriously affect the prior rights of the creditors or legatees of the deceased. The purchaser at the foreclosure sale will acquire no greater or higher right in the mortgaged premises than the mortgagors held, and the property in his hands will be subject to the orders and proceedings of the Probate Court as fully in all respects as if the mortgage had not been foreclosed.

The last error assigned by the defendants is that the Court failed to find a separate finding of the facts and conclusions. It is provided by section two of "An Act to regulate appeals in this State," approved May 20, 1861, that no judgment shall be reversed for the want of a finding unless exceptions be made therefor in the Court below. No exceptions were taken to the want of a finding, therefore the Court will disregard the alleged error, and cannot by reason of it reverse the judgment. The judgment is affirmed.

CONSTRUCTION OF.—The terms "office," and "public trust," as used in section three, Article XI, in the Constitution of this State, have reference only to such duties and responsibilities as are of a public nature.

ATTORNEY AT LAW.—An attorney at law is not an officer, nor does he hold a "public office" or "public trust," in the constitutional sense of those terms.

SUBJECT TO LEGISLATIVE CONTROL.—The manner, terms, and conditions of an attorney's admission to practice, and of his continuing in practice, as well as his powers, duties, and privileges, are subject to legislative control, the same as any other profession or business that is created or regulated by statute.

the taking of the oath prescribed in the Act of April 25th, 1863, entitled "An Act to exclude traitors and alien enemies from the Courts of justice in civil cases." (Cohen v. Wright, 22 Cal. 293, affirmed.)

The facts are stated in the opinion of the Court.

By the Court, RHODES, J.

Gregory Yale, the attorney for the appellants in the case of Lent v. Morrill et al., now pending in this Court, filed a motion in writing to submit the said case to the Court on the briefs on file, which motion is as follows:

"Lent v. Morrill et al.—SUPREME COURT, January Term, 1864.—Gregory Yale, an attorney of this Court, having been admitted as an attorney and counsellor of this Court since its organization under the Constitution of the State, and having taken the oath to support the Constitution of the United States and of the State of California, and otherwise conformed to the rules of this Court as an attorney, now moves the Court to submit the case to the Court on the briefs on file, by consent of the attorney for the respondent.

"GREGORY YALE, for Appellants.

"Sacramento, February 11, 1864."

Whereupon, John F. Swift, one of the attorneys for the respondent, made and filed his objection in writing to the appearance of said Gregory Yale as an attorney at law, which objection is as follows:

"Gregory Yale, not having taken the oath prescribed by the Act of the Legislature, approved April 25, 1863, entitled 'An Act to exclude traitors and alien enemies from the Courts of justice in civil cases,' as an attorney has no right to appear in the above entitled cause, for the purpose of said motion, and I object to his appearance in the capacity of attorney until he takes the said oath.

"JOHN F. SWIFT, for Respondent."

Yale appeared in person, and having admitted he had not taken the oath prescribed by said Act of the Legislature to be taken by attorneys at law, contended that the Act referred to in the objection interposed by Swift was unconstitutional, and, therefore, void.

The questions arising upon this proceeding were fully argued, both orally and in briefs, before the Supreme Court in the case of Cohen v. Wright, 22 Cal. 293, and though a very elaborate opinion was rendered by Mr. Justice Crocker, which was concurred in upon the most material points by Mr. Justice Norton, it was considered proper to permit the questions to be again argued upon the motion and objection in writing, as there was no record in this Court of the motion or proceeding upon which the opinion in the case of Cohen v. Wright was rendered.

No brief has been filed by Gregory Yale, or by the Attorney-General, who appeared in support of the objection of Swift, and it is not deemed necessary to discuss in detail the several propositions urged in argument, but it will be sufficient to announce the conclusions of the Court upon those propositions that are decisive of the question as to the constitutionality of the Act referred to, so far as the same relates to attorneys at law.

The term "office" and "public trust," as used in section 3, Article XI, of the State Constitution, are nearly synonymous—at least the term "public trust" is included in the more comprehensive term "office." Those duties and responsibilities of a public character that are temporarily or specially devolved upon persons, may be more appropriately denominated public trusts than offices; yet the persons discharging such duties or assuming those responsibilities are officers. The form of the oath prescribed by the Constitution, as the only oath to be taken by officers and persons executing public trusts, the last part of which is: "That I will faithfully discharge the duties of the office of — according to the best of my ability," clearly indicates, that the person who executes a public trust, was deemed by the Constitution to be an officer.

The terms "office," "office and public trust," as employed in the Constitution, have relation only to those persons and duties that are of a public nature. This subject was ably considered by the Supreme Court of New York, (in the matter of oaths to be taken by attorneys and counsellors, 20 John. 492,) in which a question arose whether the Act to suppress duelling, passed in 1816, had been repealed by the Constitution adopted in 1821. The oath required by that Constitution was in every essential particular the same as that in ours, and was prescribed for the same class of officers. The Act to suppress duelling required every officer, (with certain exceptions,) and every person who should be admitted as a counsellor, attorney, or solicitor, to take the oath that he had not been engaged in a duel, etc. Mr. Justice Platt, in that case, says: "The point is simply whether an attorney or counsellor holds an office or public trust, in the sense of the Constitution. * * * In my judgment, an attorney or counsellor does not hold an office, but exercises a privilege or franchise. As attorneys or counsellors they perform no duties on behalf of the Government—they execute no public trust."

An officer, as defined by Webster, is "a person commissioned to perform any public duty." An attorney at law is not such an officer; and, in our opinion, he is not an officer in the constitutional sense of the term, and does not hold a public trust. On this point we fully concur with Justices Crocker and Norton, in Cohen v. Wright.

The manner, terms, and conditions of their admission to practice, and of their continuing in practice, as well as their powers, duties and privileges, are proper subjects of legislative control to the same extent and subject to the same limitations as in the case of any other profession or business that is created or regulated by statute.

It is held by this Court in People v. Coleman, 4 Cal. 46, and confirmed in many subsequent cases, that "the Constitution of this State is not to be considered as a grant of power, but rather as a restriction upon the power of the Legislature; and that it is competent for the Legislature to exercise all powers not forbidden by the Constitution of the State, or delegated to the General Government, or prohibited by the Constitution of the United States." There is no provision of the Constitution directly restricting the Legislature from exercising plenary control over the qualifications, admission, oath, or duties of attorneys at law, and in our opinion no such restriction arises by implication; and it therefore follows that the Legislature may lawfully require, as a condition to their admission to practice, or their continuance in practice, the taking of the oath prescribed in the Act under consideration, or, at their pleasure, may dispense with all conditions and oaths.

It is therefore ordered that the said objection of the said Swift be sustained, and that the said Gregory Yale be not permitted to practice in this Court as an attorney at law until he shall have taken and filed in the office of the County Clerk of the county in which he resides, the oath prescribed for attorneys at law in the above mentioned Act.

JOHN DORAN AND WILLIAM WILSON v. THE CENTRAL PACIFIC RAILROAD COMPANY.

CENTRAL PACIFIC RAILROAD — RIGHT OF WAY OF.—The right of way over a strip of land two hundred feet in width on each side of its road, granted to the Central Pacific Railroad Company by the second section of the Act of Congress, passed July 1st, 1862, extends to and covers all public lands, whether mineral or not.

SAME — MINERAL LANDS.—The proviso to section 3 of said Act, excepting mineral lands from its operation, refers to the alternate sections granted to said company, and has no reference to the grant of the right of way in section 2.

PUBLIC LANDS — CONTROL OF.—The General Government is entitled to the possession of and all the beneficial interest in the public lands, and its grantee takes the same subject to no conditions, except such as are expressed in the grant.

MINERAL LANDS — OCCUPANTS OF.—Mere occupants of the mineral lands, who have entered upon the same for mining or other purposes, have no title or right under which they can maintain possession, as against the United States or its grantee.

POWER OF STATE OVER PUBLIC LANDS.—The State of California has no power to interfere with the public lands within its limits, or grant a license or permission to occupy the same.

PUBLIC LANDS — HOW SOLD.—The only manner in which the right, title, or interest of the United States in or to any of the public lands can pass to or vest in any private person is by means of an Act of Congress directly making the grant, or authorizing the grant to be made in their behalf by some person or officer.

John Doran et al. v. Central Pacific Railroad Company.

SAME — PRESCRIPTION — ADVERSE POSSESSION.— No title to the public lands, whether mineral or otherwise, will accrue to any person against the General Government by prescription, adverse possession, or by estoppel in pais.

SAME.— No presumption of a grant will arise as against the United States, but the legislative grants, or the letters patent, or something that is made by law their equivalent, must be produced.

RIGHTS OF POSSESSOR OF PUBLIC LANDS.— A naked possessor of public lands is deemed in law the owner of the same, until the General Government, or a person showing title under it, makes an entry upon the same, and when this is done, the right or claim of the possessor must yield to the paramount authority of the United States, or its grantee.

RIGHT OF WAY OF CENTRAL PACIFIC RAILROAD COMPANY.— The grant by Congress of the right of way over the public lands to the Central Pacific Railroad Company, vests in the company the full and ample right to enter upon the four hundred feet in width and use the same for railroad purposes, and a mere naked possessor cannot prevent such entry, or recover damages for an injury necessarily done to his possession or improvements by such entry.

APPEAL from the District Court, Sixth Judicial District, Sacramento County.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the Court.

George R. Moore and J. K. Alexander, for Appellants.

We admit that the Government is the owner of the fee in this land, but we contend that the policy of the United States and this State has been, and is, to invite and encourage settlements upon the public domain, and that such settlers in good faith ought to be and will be protected in their possession and improvements.

In 1850 the Legislature of this State passed a law for the better regulation of the mines and the government of foreign miners, giving, by necessary implication, whatever rights the State might have in the minerals in the soil, and the right to mine, to all native born or naturalized citizens of the United States who may wish to toil in the gold placers. The 621st section of the Practice Act would seem to imply the same right. (McClintock v. Boyden, 5 Cal. 97.)

In the case Irwin v. Phillips, 5 Cal. 146, in discussing this subject, this Court said: "Courts are bound to take notice of the political and social condition of the country which they judicially rule. In this State, the larger part of the territory consists of mineral lands, nearly the whole of which are the property of the public. No right or intent of disposition of these lands has been shown, either by the United States or the State Government; and, with the exception of certain State regulations, very limited in their character, a system has been permitted to grow up by the voluntary action and assent of the population, whose free and unrestrained occupation of the mineral region has been tacitly assented to by the one Government, and heartily encouraged by the expressed legislative policy of the other."

"When we consider the current and the spirit of the legislation of both Governments, (State and National,) taken in connection with the history and the known circumstances of the country, the conclusion is irresistible that the mines are occupied and worked with the clear assent and encouragement of both Governments. And while the terms of this license, and the relation which the miner sustains to the superior proprietor, may not be expressly laid down, and the duration of the estate not clearly designated by any positive law, and we may not, for these reasons, be able to give any exact definition of the precise nature of the right, yet, one thing is well understood and indisputable, they are there by the clear license of both Governments, and have such a title as will hardly be divested, even by the act of the superior proprietor." (Merced Mining Co. v. Fremont, 7 Cal. 326; Conger v. Weaver, 6 Cal. 555.)

No necessity can arise where the public weal is not involved that will justify a railroad company in taking the property of private individuals for its own use, without paying a just and adequate compensation therefor. The plea of necessity urged by defendant in justification of its acts is inconsistent with a claim of right or title in itself, and necessarily admits the title and interest of the plaintiffs. (10 Conn. 23.)

The defendant also claims the right to take and use this land and improvements, under the Act of Congress approved July 1st, 1862.

By the second section of this Act, it is provided, "that the right of way through the public lands be and the same is hereby granted to said company, for the construction of said railroad and telegraph line," etc.

By section third of said Act, it is provided, "that there be and there is hereby granted to the said company, for the purpose of aiding in the construction of said railroad and telegraph line," etc., "every alternate section of public land, designated by odd numbers, to the amount of five alternate sections per mile on each side of said road; on the line thereof, and within the limits of ten miles on each side of said road, not sold, reserved, or otherwise disposed of by the United States, and to which a pre-emption or homestead claim may not have attached at the time the line of said road is definitely fixed; provided, that all mineral lands shall be excepted from the operations of this Act."

This language seems to be plain and explicit. All the rights and privileges granted by this Act of Congress to the railroad company, so far as mineral lands are concerned, are excepted and reserved.

If the law referred to did not except mineral lands, it would be, in most respects, similar to the Act of Congress of 1852, giving to all railroad companies the right of way over public land for ten years from the date of its passage. This law was directly involved and passed upon by this Court in the case of the Northern Railroad Co. v. Gould, 21 Cal. 259. In this case, Mr. Justice Norton, who delivered the opinion of the Court, said: "But the Act of Congress does not, in terms, grant any other estate or right which pertains to the United States as proprietor of the public lands. It was, doubtless, the purpose of the Act merely to give a right to enter upon the public lands, assuming them to be vacant. The action was brought by the Northern Railroad Company against the parties in possession, to compel them to acknowledge the right of the company to cross their lands for railroad purposes. The Court below decided, 'that the defendant could not be deprived of his right of property, resulting from his possession, without compensation, to be ascertained as provided by the railroad Act of this State.'"

John Dorn et al. v. Central Pacific Railroad Company.

E. B. Crocker, for Respondents.

The proposition is too clear to be disputed that the fee simple title of the mineral lands of this State is vested in the United States. This principle has been fully recognized by this Court in all its adjudications upon the various questions relating to the rights of miners and other occupants of the mineral lands. While such miner and occupant is treated as between himself and all other persons but the United States as the owner of the land and the mine, yet the title of the National Government to the land and the mines, and its right to dispose of the same, has been fully recognized. (Irwin v. Phillips, 5 Cal. 146; Tarter v. Spring Creek Co., 5 Cal. 395; Hoffman v. Stone, 7 Cal. 46; Merced Mining Co. v. Fremont, 7 Cal. 324, 327; McKeon v. Bisbee, 9 Cal. 142; Hughes v. Devlin, 23 Cal. 501.)

The Act of Congress provides that all persons entering or settling upon land of the United States, until duly authorized by law, shall forfeit all right to the land, and may be removed by the United States Marshal, by order of the President. (2 U. S. Stat. at Large, 445.)

Our next proposition is, that the superior proprietor, the Government of the United States, has, for great National purposes, granted the right of way to the defendants over all the public lands, including mineral lands: First—by the Act of Congress of August 4, 1852. (10 U. S. Stat. at Large, 28.) Second—by the Pacific Railroad Act. (12 U. S. Stat. at Large, 491.) By the Act of 1852, the right of way over all public lands is granted to all railroad companies chartered within ten years after its passage. The defendants were incorporated in 1861, prior to the Act of July 1, 1862, and less than ten years after the Act of 1852, and are, therefore, entitled to the benefits of this law.

By section 2 of the Pacific Railroad Act, the right of way through the public lands is granted to the Union Railroad Company four hundred feet wide, including land for all necessary depots, workshops, etc., and the United States agree to extinguish the Indian title thereto.

By section 9, the defendants are authorized to construct a railroad line in the State of California, "upon the same terms and conditions, in all respects," as the Union Railroad Company.

Both of these Acts contain a direct and positive grant from the United States, the owner of the land, of the right-of way over the public lands. Under these Acts the defendants claim the right to enter upon the premises occupied by the plaintiffs, for the purpose of constructing their railroad, and that the possession and occupation of the plaintiffs, and their claim to the mines thereon, were subordinate and subject to these grants made to the defendants.

As has already been shown, the plaintiffs have no title whatever to this tract of mineral land, as against the United States and those claiming under them, and it follows that they can claim no damages for any alleged injury to the mines or improvements, or the trees growing thereon. They form part of the land, and are subject to the same rule which relates to the land itself.

Damages are allowed under the Railroad Act of this State only to those having some title to the lands over which the road runs. Under sections 28 and 30 of the Act of 1861, (Stats. of 1861, p. 607,) the assessment of damages is to those "having or holding any right, title, or interest" in or to the tract sought to be appropriated for railroad purposes. The claimant, therefore, must have some estate in the land to entitle him to compensation. A mere occupancy without title is insufficient to found a claim for compensation. The mineral lands being excepted out of the pre-emption laws, the claim of the plaintiffs is a mere naked possession, without right, title, or interest, as against the United States and those claiming under them, and they are not, therefore, entitled to compensation under the State Railroad Law. No compensation is allowed for anything but the title to the land, or to any person but the owners of some title. In this respect our statute conforms to the established rules of law upon this subject. (Redfield on Railways, 141, 142; Pierce, R. R. Lgw, 212.)

The next question is, were the plaintiffs entitled to an injunction, even if entitled to compensation? The granting of injunctions in cases like this, where great public interests are involved, is not a matter of absolute right, but depends upon a consideration of all the equities of the case.

Thus, an injunction was refused against a canal company, who, in enlarging their canal, which they had a legal right to do, raised the water of a creek by a dam, and thereby injured plaintiffs' mill. It was held that the latter had an ample remedy at law, and that it was not every case, even of a clear violation of the plaintiff's rights, that would entitle him to an injunction. He must first clearly show that the act itself is illegal. (Bruce v. The Delaware and Hudson Canal Co., 19 Barb. 371; see, also, Hentz v. L. I. R. R. Co., 13 Barb. 647; Ely v. City of Rochester, 26 Barb. 133; Creamor v. Nelson, 23 Cal. 464; Harper v. Richardson, 22 Cal. 251.)

By the Court, RHODES, J.

This is an action to recover damages for a trespass upon a tract of land claimed by the plaintiff, and for an injunction to restrain the defendant from injuring the said land, and a quartz lode, mining claim, and growing trees thereon. The defendant justifies under the right of way granted to said railroad company by the Act of Congress, passed July 1, 1862. (12 United States Statutes at Large, p. 489.)

It appears from the statement of facts, as agreed to by the parties, that the plaintiffs are in possession of the tract of land described in the complaint, and have thereon the improvements as stated by them; that the land is mineral land, containing mines of gold; that the title in fee simple to the lands is now in the United States, and has continued so to be since the cession of California to the United States by Mexico by the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo; that the defendant is duly incorporated under the laws of this State and of the United States, under the name and style stated in the answer, and is entitled to all the rights and privileges conferred on said railroad company by the said Act of Congress and the laws of this State; that said company has duly located the line of the road across the said lands; that the company has not taken or used, and does not intend to take or use, any more of the said lands than are necessary for the construction of said road, and have done no other damage than was necessary in the construction of said railroad.

The Court, upon the hearing, refused to grant the injunction, and rendered judgment dismissing the complaint.

The errors assigned by the appellants are resolvable into two questions:

1. Has Congress granted the right of way for the railroad and telegraph line over the mineral lands? And,

2. Have the appellants any right, title, or interest, in the tract of land in controversy of such a nature that they can recover damages against the defendant for the entry upon the lands, in pursuance of the grant of the right of way, or can they enjoin the railroad company from proceeding over the land, notwithstanding the grant of Congress?

By section 1 of the Act of Congress above mentioned, "The Union Pacific Railroad Company" is organized, and by section 2 it is enacted that "the right of way through the public lands be and the same is hereby granted to said company for the construction of said railroad and telegraph line," to the extent of two hundred feet in width on each side of the railroad where it may pass over the public lands, with a right to take the stone, timber, etc., from the adjacent lands for the construction of said railroad. It is also provided, in section 9 of said Act, that "the Central Pacific Railroad Company of California, a corporation existing under the laws of the State of California, are hereby authorized to construct a railroad and telegraph line from the Pacific coast, at or near San Francisco, or the navigable waters of the Sacramento River, to the eastern boundary of California, upon the same terms and conditions, in all respects, as are contained in this Act for the construction of said railroad and telegraph line first mentioned." This section thus grants to the defendants the right of way over the public lands to the same extent as it is granted by section 2 to the Union Pacific Railroad Company.

It is contended by the appellants that the right of way was not granted by Congress to either of said companies over the mineral lands of the United States, but that the grant is confined to other public lands, and in support of that position, they rely upon the words of the proviso of section 3. That section, after making the grant of the alternate sections of the land, with certain reservations therein expressed, contains the proviso "that all mineral lands shall be excepted from the operation of this Act; but when the same shall contain timber, the timber thereon is hereby granted said company." But there is no exception in section 2 reserving the mineral lands from the operation of the grant of the right of way over the public lands.

The grand object of the Act is to procure the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Pacific coast to the Missouri River, not only as a great public enterprise, but for the direct benefit of the General Government, and for that purpose, and to aid in the construction of those works, the General Government has not only granted the right of way and the alternate sections of land, but has loaned its credit in a large amount to the companies engaging in the construction of those works.

It will be observed that it is provided by section 6 that these several grants of land, credit, and the right of way, are made upon the express condition that the company receiving the grants shall perform certain services for the General Government, and shall give the preference in the use of the railroad and telegraph line to the Government. The intention of the Government that the Missouri and the Pacific should be united by a continuous railroad and telegraph line is manifest from the whole tenor and spirit of the Act.

But, if the construction of the proviso of section 3, contended for by the appellants, could be maintained, it would be practically impossible to construct the railroad or telegraph line under said Act while the present policy of Congress prevails of reserving the mineral lands from sale, for it would be manifestly impossible to run the line of the railroad or telegraph across the Sierra Nevada Mountains, by any route, without passing over public mineral lands.

The company cannot procure the right of way from the appellants, for the obvious reason that they have no title that is sufficient to enable them to make any grant.

The result that would ensue if the proposition contended for by the appellants could be maintained, would be that the company would be obliged to delay at the foot of the mountains until Congress shall change its policy, and bring the mineral lands into market, and until the lands shall have been sold by Congress, and the right of way shall have been procured by the railroad company from the purchaser.

Such a result is clearly in conflict with the meaning and intent of the Act as would practically defeat its operation, so far as California and Nevada are concerned.

But, in our opinion, that construction of the proviso is not warranted in view of the obvious meaning of the section and the plain intention of the whole Act. The first portion of the section sets forth the grant of the alternate sections, without any mention of or reference to the right of way, and immediately following that portion of the proviso above quoted, the section states that "all such lands so granted by this section, which shall not be sold or disposed of by said company within three years after the entire road shall have been completed, shall be subject to settlement and pre-emption like other lands, at a price not exceeding one dollar and twenty-five cents per acre, to be paid to said company." This is substantially a condition annexed to the grant of the lands to the company that the company shall grant the right of pre-emption to its unsold lands, after the expiration of a time limited in the Act. Congress does not purport by the Act to grant to the company the lands over which the right of way is granted, and it would be contrary to all reason to presume that Congress intended to direct or authorize the company to extend the right of pre-emption to lands not granted to it.

It was, perhaps, necessary in framing the proviso to employ the term "this Act," instead of the words "this section," inasmuch as by the ninth section, two other companies are authorized to construct railroads and telegraph lines "upon the same terms and conditions in all respects" as are contained in the Act for the construction of the railroad and telegraph line by the Union Pacific Railroad Company. Upon the construction of the whole section, in connection with the plain meaning of the Act, it is apparent that the proviso has relation only to the alternate sections granted, and not to the lands over which the road might pass under the grant of the right of way.

2. Have the appellants such right, title, or interest in the lands in controversy as will entitle them to the relief sought in this case?

It is admitted that the title in fee simple to the lands is in the General Government. That fact being established, the legal presumption arises that the General Government is entitled to the possession, as well as the whole beneficial interest, and that the grantee of the Government takes and holds whatever interest therein the Government purports to grant, subject to no conditions other than those expressed in the grant. The fact as admitted, and the consequent conclusions of law as to the right to the possession, casts upon the appellants the burden of overcoming the presumption and proving that they are entitled to the possession, or hold some other right, title, or interest in the land, derived under or through the United States.

In the complaint, the plaintiffs allege that they are, and have been since 1859, the owners in fee and in the actual possession of the premises, but they set up no other right in the land. The allegation of the ownership of the plaintiffs is denied in the answer. It does not appear from the agreed statement of facts, or the findings of the Court, that the plaintiffs have any right in the land, but simply that they have the present possession.

John Doran et al. v. Central Pacific Railroad Company.

The mere statement of these facts affords a complete answer to the question as to whether the plaintiffs are entitled to the relief they have prayed for in the complaint.

But in order to obviate the apparently inevitable conclusion resulting from these facts, that the appellants do not hold any right in the lands that will enable them to prevent the defendants from entering, in pursuance of the grant of the right of way, or that will entitle them to recover damages for the entry, the appellants say that the Court found that the lands in controversy were public mineral lands of the United States, and they earnestly urge that, by the policy of the United States and this State — by the tacit consent of the United States, and the hearty encouragement of this State, and by the clear license of both Governments, all citizens are encouraged and permitted to enter upon the public lands of the United States, and occupy them for agricultural and mining purposes; and that when they have entered into possession for these purposes, they, by means of such entry, or by some mode not very fully expressed or accurately defined, acquire and “have such a title as will hardly be divested, even by the act of the superior proprietor.”

Does the mere occupant of the public lands hold this undefined title of such a character that he can maintain the possession as against the United States or their grantees? It is scarcely necessary to say that the policy, the encouragement, the license, or even the grant of this State, cannot confer upon any person any right in the lands of the United States. The General Government does not hold its lands as a mere private proprietor, but its control and power of alienation and disposition of its lands are uncontrolled, save by the Constitution of the United States alone. By the Act admitting California into the Union, it is provided that “the people of said State, through their Legislature, or otherwise, shall never interfere with the primary disposal of the public lands within its limits, and shall pass no law and do no act whereby the title of the United States to and right to dispose of the same shall be impaired or questioned.”

John Doran et al. v. Central Pacific Railroad Company.

The claim asserted by the appellants on behalf of the State, of the power to grant or license to occupy the public lands of the United States, is scarcely consistent with the Act of Congress for the admission of California into the Union, if it is meant thereby that the license is valid for any purpose, as against the United States or any one entering or holding under a right, title, or license granted by the General Government. The doctrine laid down in Hicks v. Bell, 3 Cal. 227, and partially affirmed in a few of the earlier cases in the late Supreme Court—that the mines of gold and silver in the public lands are the property of the State—is without foundation.

The occupation of the public lands, under the policy of the United States respecting their settlement, and with their tacit consent, it cannot be contended will give a right of possession as against the United States or their grantee; but there must be some right of a higher order conferred upon the occupant—at least a title to occupancy must be shown.

The only manner in which the right, title, or interest of the United States in or to any of the public lands can pass to or rest in any private person is by means of an Act of Congress directly making the grant, or authorizing the grant in their behalf to be made by some person or officer. No title will accrue to any person against the General Government by prescription, by adverse possession, or by estoppel in pais.

No presumption of a grant will arise as against the United States, but the legislative grants, or the letters patent, or something that is made by law their equivalent, must be produced. This view of the position of the naked possessor of the public lands does not conflict with the current of the decisions of this Court recognizing and affirming his right to be protected in his possession against trespass or intrusion, for he is deemed in law the owner as against all the world, until the General Government, or a person showing legal right or title under it, makes entry upon the lands; but his right or claim must yield to the paramount authority of the United States, or the demands of the grantees.

But it is said by the appellants that the questions discussed in this case have been decided in favor of the occupant in California Northern Railroad Company v. Gould, 21 Cal. 254. In that case the premises did not appear to be mineral lands, and Mr. Justice Norton, in delivering the opinion of the Court, after stating that the Government "may give him (the occupant) a pre-emption privilege," says: "There is scarce a doubt but this defendant will ultimately become the owner of one hundred and sixty acres of land he occupies, with all the improvements, upon paying the Government price of the unimproved land." In the present case the premises are mineral lands, and, under the laws of Congress, (10 U. S. Statutes at Large, p. 246, Sec. 6,) are not subject to pre-emption. In that case it was not found by the Court below that the lands were public lands. If they were public lands, and the occupant had acquired such rights therein that Congress would be bound to respect his possession, the railroad company could not acquire the right of way without making "just compensation" therefor; but if such rights had not accrued to the occupant in that case, and if the Act of Congress referred to in that case, (10 U. S. Stats. at Large, p. 28,) did, in effect, grant the right of way over the public lands to the railroad company, then the decision in that case cannot be sustained without impairing the right of the United States to dispose of their public lands; and in that view the decision is not sustained by the case cited, in the opinion of the Court—(Robbins v. Milwaukee and Horicon R. R. Co., 6 Wis. 636)—for in the case cited the lands were not found to be public lands, nor did the railroad company claim a grant by Congress of the right of way; but the action was an appeal by a person in possession of a tract of land from the award of damages made by Commissioners for the value of his land taken by the company for the use of their railroad. The proceedings were commenced under the statutes of the State providing for railroad companies taking the lands of private persons for the use of the railroad, upon their making compensation and paying damages; the land so taken being deemed to be taken for public use. The Court held that "to enable the plaintiff to recover he must show some title. * * * There can be no presumption of title in a proceeding of this kind; it must be shown, and compensation awarded accordingly." The claimant was in possession, no title being found in the United States, and he was entitled to damages for the injury to his possession.

Proceedings under the statute of this State to procure the right of way over the premises in this case are useless, and would be nugatory if Congress had the power to make the grant of the right of way, for if Congress had the entire title, the grant is complete without the intervention or aid of any person or authority whatsoever. If the theory and arguments of the appellant are correct and sound, the company, in order to acquire the right of way over mineral lands now unoccupied, would be obliged to procure some one to enter into possession of each several parcel, for the simple purpose of buying from them the right of way, and after that had been done, the company would be trespassers against the United States.

A construction of the powers of Congress in making grants, and of the meaning of the Pacific Railroad Act, that will lead to such absurd consequences, should not be adopted unless it is clear and imperative.

In our judgment, the grant by Congress of the right of way over any portion of public land to which the United States have title, and to which private rights have not attached under the laws of Congress, vests in the grantee the full and complete right of entry for the purpose of enjoying the right granted, and no person claiming in his own right any interest in the lands can prevent the grantee from entering, in pursuance of his grant, or can recover damages that may necessarily be occasioned by such entry.

The judgment is affirmed.

FRANCIS SALMON v. ALFRED SYMONDS, S. D. HATHAWAY, A. W. THOMPSON, JOHN J. ELLIS, S. R. DICKEY, WM. D. BLISS, PETER SHELFORD, N. GREY, O. B. MATHEWS, J. F. EATON, GEORGE GANLIE, H. H. RALSTON, J. JAKES, E. MULLEN, G. GILL, AND A. J. MAYFIELD.

POSSESSORY ACTION — PLEADINGS IN.—A complaint in a possessory action to recover land, which avers an ownership and seisure in fee in the plaintiff of the demanded premises, and an ouster by the defendant on a day named, before the commencement of the action, is sufficient, without the further averment that the plaintiff is the owner in fee at the commencement of the action.

APPEAL from the District Court, Seventh Judicial District, Sonoma County.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the Court.

John Currey, for Appellant.

The plaintiff in ejectment must show that he has such an interest in the demanded premises as entitles him to the possession thereof, and that at a time anterior to the commencement of the suit the defendants entered and ousted him therefrom, and have from thence continued to withhold the possession thereof from him.

In the State of New York, the use of fictitious names of plaintiffs and defendants, and the names of any other than the real claimants and real defendants, and the statement of any lease or demise to the plaintiff, and an ejectment by a casual or nominal ejector, was abolished by statute, (2 R. S. 304, § 6,) and in that State, as well as in this, an action of ejectment must be prosecuted in the name of the real party in interest. In New York, before the adoption of the code of that State, as well as since, the forms of complaint in ejectment which stood the test of the judgments of their highest Courts, as to the question involved in this case, are, in substance and effect, the same as the complaint in the case at bar.

In Yates' Pleadings and Practical Precedents, 481, 482. the stating part of the declaration is in the following form:

Salmon v. Symonds et al.

"For that whereas the said plaintiff, on the — day of —, in the year —, was possessed of a certain dwelling house and garden, [describing the premises,] and the said plaintiff being so possessed thereof, the said defendant, afterwards, to wit, on the — day of —, in the year —, entered into said premises and ejected the plaintiff therefrom, and unjustly withholds from the plaintiff the possession thereof, to the damage of the plaintiff of — dollars, and therefore he brings his suit." (See, also, 1 Humphrey's Precedent, 26, 27; also, the declaration in Sigler v. Van Riper, 10 Wend. 415, and what the Court says of it, at pp. 417, 418.)

In 2 Van Sanford's Pleadings and Forms, under the New York Code, the form given for a complaint in ejectment is, after the title of the case, as follows: "The plaintiff complains of the defendant, and states the following facts constituting his cause of action: That on and after the 25th day of October, 1828, he was lawfully possessed of the premises and land hereinafter described, in the Town of Greenbush, County of Rensselaer, claiming to hold the said premises in fee; and being so possessed, the defendant, afterwards, to wit, on or about the first day of January, 1840, entered into such premises, and that he unlawfully withholds from said plaintiff the possession thereof, to the plaintiff's damage of one hundred dollars." Then follows a description of the premises and a prayer for their recovery. (See, also, Abbott's Forms, 357; St. John v. Pierce, 22 Barb. 363; Garrison v. Sampson, 15 Cal. 93; Boles v. Cohen, 15 Cal. 151; Coryell v. Cain, 16 Cal. 569.)

Wm. D. Bliss and W. A. Thompson, for Respondents.

The respondents, in support of the decision of the Court below, rely upon the following very simple propositions:

I. A plaintiff in ejectment must have title to the land sued for at the time of bringing his action. (Burton v. Austin, 4 Vermont, 105; Carroll v. Norwood, 5 Har. & J. 155, cited in Adams on Ejectment, p. 43, note; Payne v. Treadwell, 16 Cal. 243.)

Under the old practice in ejectment, the plaintiff declared on a lease for a term which had not expired when the suit was brought. (Chitty's Pleadings, Vol. 2, p. 879.)

II. The defendants may defeat the action by showing that though plaintiff had title at the time of the ouster, he has conveyed it away before bringing his action. (Alden v. Grove, 18 Penn. 377; Cresap v. Hutson, 9 Gill. 269; Torrance v. Betsey, 20 Miss. 129.)

III. A complaint should state every fact essential to the plaintiff's recovery in the action; and every fact which, if controverted by defendants, the plaintiff would be obliged to prove in order to maintain the action. (Green v. Palmer, 15 Cal. 416; Jerome v. Stebbins, 14 Cal. 458; Gould's Pleadings, 47, 49.)

IV. If the complaint does not state all the essential facts, the defendants are not obliged to answer, but may demur. (Gould's Pleadings, 46; Green v. Palmer, 16 Cal. 416, and the treatise on the New York Code there cited.)

V. Every pleading is taken most strongly against the pleader, and most favorably for his adversary. (Gould's Pleadings, 155; Chitty's Pleadings, Vol. 1, p. 237.)

VI. The statement that the defendants "unlawfully withhold," does not help out the complaint. It is a mere conclusion of law. If the plaintiff was not the owner, the withholding of the defendants, whether lawful or unlawful, gave him no cause of action. (Payne v. Treadwell, 5 Cal. 311.)

The appellant confounds the rules of evidence with the rules of pleading. He alleges that he was seized on the first of January, and asks the Court to presume, from that allegation, the fact that he was seized on the tenth of January.

If he really was seized on the day of bringing his action, this was the ultimate (Green v. Palmer) essential fact in his case, and should have been distinctly alleged. Instead of alleging this ultimate fact, he alleges a probative fact—the seizin on the first of January. If he had, in his pleadings, alleged the ultimate fact, he might, on the trial, have proved it, by showing the probative fact.

Salmon v. Symonds et al.

The presumption would then be in his favor; now it is against him. Presumptive pleading is not allowed in any Court. Presumptive evidence is relied upon in the trial of almost every cause.

Currey, for Appellant, in reply.

The Respondents' counsel say:

1. "A plaintiff in ejectment must have title to the land sued for at the time of bringing his action."

To sustain this truism they cite cases, among which is Burton v. Austin, 4 Vermont, 105. In that case the Court also say the plaintiff must have title when the action is tried. According to respondents' theory, the essential fact of title in the plaintiff, at the time of trial, should be alleged in the complaint.

2. "The defendants may defeat the action by showing that, though plaintiff had title at the time of the ouster, he has conveyed it away before bringing his action."

This is true. But how can they show this? By demurrer—because the plaintiff may not have averred in his complaint that he had not so conveyed the premises before bringing the action? Or, is this defense to be averred and proved by the defendants?

If the plaintiff had title on the first day of January, 1863, and was then ousted by the defendants, as is admitted by the demurrer, then, according to the essential predicate of the respondents' second proposition, above quoted, the burden was on defendants to show that plaintiff had so conveyed away the premises before the bringing of the action.

3. "A complaint should state every fact essential to the plaintiff's recovery in the action; and every fact which, if controverted by defendant, the plaintiff would be obliged to prove in order to maintain the action."

This proposition is not, critically, correct. If it were necessary for plaintiff to produce in evidence a grant by patent from the Government, to establish his right to recover, a statement in the complaint of the existence of the grant or patent would not be essential or proper.

The allegation in the complaint that on the first day of January, 1863, the plaintiff was seized, as owner in fee, of the premises, and that afterwards, to wit, on the same day, the defendants entered and ousted him, and from thence hitherto have unlawfully withheld and still so withhold the premises from him, is a statement of every essential fact entitling the plaintiff to recover; and these facts admitted, or proved, though the action might not be commenced until six months after the day mentioned, would entitle the plaintiff to a judgment for the recovery of the possession of the premises. If the defendants had made default, and judgment had been entered for plaintiff against them, could the judgment be reversed because the complaint did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action? No lawyer, I apprehend, would so pretend; and yet, if the defendants' position were tenable, such a judgment could not be maintained for a moment. The demurrer interposed was a general demurrer, and seems to have been intended for delay — and in this the defendants have succeeded undoubtedly beyond their original expectations.

It is unnecessary to notice respondents' 4th and 5th points.

The respondents' counsel further say:

6. "The statement that the defendants 'unlawfully withhold,' does not help out the complaint. It is a mere conclusion of law. If the plaintiff was not the owner, the withholding of the defendants, whether lawful or unlawful, gave him no cause of action."

If the complaint was infected with the infirmity alleged on the part of the defendants, then the averment that defendants unlawfully withheld the premises from plaintiff would help out the complaint, because such averment is of a fact that could not exist independent of plaintiff's right to the possession of the premises.

Is the statement that "defendants have from thence hitherto unlawfully withheld and still so withhold said premises from plaintiff," a conclusion of law? Is the word unlawfully objectionable as a conclusion of law? If it is, expunge it. But this allegation is not a conclusion of law, but is an averment of a fact.

It is said: "If the plaintiff was not the owner, the withholding of the defendants, whether lawful or unlawful, gave him no cause of action." Do not respondents' counsel overlook the fact that the demurrer admits that plaintiff was the owner in fee simple, and lawfully seized of the premises, and that defendants ousted him, and withheld the premises from him, as alleged in the complaint?

By the Court, RHODES, J.

Salmon sued Symonds and others, in ejectment, to recover the possession of a portion of the Rancho Roblar de la Miseria, situated in the County of Sonoma. In his complaint, he alleges that on the first day of January, 1863, he was "the owner in fee simple and lawfully seized of" the tract of land described in the complaint, and says "that while he was so the owner and seized of said piece and parcel of land above described, to wit: on the day and year first aforesaid, the defendants unlawfully entered into and upon the same land and ousted the plaintiff therefrom," and that the defendants still withhold the same, to his damage, etc., and he concludes with the usual prayer. The complaint was filed January 10th, 1863. The defendants demurred to the complaint on the ground that it did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. In two of the demurrers other grounds were assigned, but they are not well taken, and are not urged in this Court. The demurrers were sustained, with leave to the plaintiff to amend his complaint, "upon the payment of twenty dollars for each demurrer, within two days, under the rule;" and the plaintiff refusing to amend, final judgments were entered for the defendants for costs.

The plaintiff appeals, and relies for error upon the order sustaining the demurrer.

The defendants, in support of their demurrer, urge that the complaint does not allege that the plaintiff was the owner of the land at the time of bringing the action, or was seized after the 1st day of January, 1863.

It is usual to allege, in addition to the statement of seizin or ownership in fee at the time of the ouster, that the plaintiff was seized or the owner in fee at the commencement of the action; but this is not necessary. In Payne & Dewey v. Treadwell, 16 Cal. 242, the allegations that are necessary in a complaint in ejectment were fully considered by Mr. Chief Justice Field, who, in that case, rendered an elaborate opinion upon a review of the cases in this State and in New York; and after stating that it is the ultimate fact, not the prior or probative fact—or, in other words, the evidence—that must be alleged, he says: "It is sufficient, therefore, in a complaint in ejectment for the plaintiff to aver, in respect to his title, that he is seized of the premises, or of some estate therein, in fee, or for life, or for years, according to the fact." A fee simple is an estate of perpetuity, a pure inheritance, clear of any qualification or condition.

The demurrer admits the seizure in fee at the time of the ouster, and being once admitted, it is presumed to continue until a disseizin is proved; and it being unnecessary to allege a presumption of law arising from that fact, the plaintiff is not required to aver that he still continues seized as the owner in fee.

It is therefore ordered that the judgments be reversed and the case remanded, with directions to the Court below to overrule the demurrers, with leave to the defendants to answer the complaint upon the terms prescribed by the rules of said Court.

Mr. Justice CURREY, having been of counsel for Appellant, did not sit upon the trial of this case.

Buckman v. Whitney et al.

AMOS BUCKMAN v. GEORGE O. WHITNEY AND J. HENRY WOOD.

RECORDS OF COURTS — WHO CONTROL.— The Supreme Court has no control over the records of the Courts of an inferior jurisdiction from which an appeal lies, and cannot make an order supplying their records when lost.

APPEAL — EFFECT OF.— The taking of an appeal does not suspend or impair the power of the Court below over its own records, or its capacity to supply their place when lost.

SAME — LOST RECORD, HOW SUPPLIED.— Where an appeal has been taken to the Supreme Court, and the transcript cannot be made out by reason of the loss of a portion of the records of the case from the files of the Court, it is the duty of the appellant to move the Court below, at the earliest time possible to supply the lost papers by copies, or by some other means under its control.

APPEAL from the District Court, Seventh Judicial District, Solano County.

On the 24th day of May, 1862, Buckman, the plaintiff, recovered judgment against Whitney and Wood, the defendants, in the District Court of the Seventh Judicial District, Solano County, for the sum of two thousand five hundred dollars damages and costs of suit. On the 20th day of August, 1862, an application for a new trial was denied, and on the 9th day of September thereafter, an appeal was taken to the Supreme Court.

On the 2d day of February, 1864, the respondent moved that the appeal be dismissed.

The other facts are stated in the opinion of the Court.

Howell & Hopkins, and Shafter & Heydenfeldt, for Respondent.

B. C. Whitman and Wm. O. Wallace, for Appellants.

By the Court, RHODES, J.

The respondent moves to dismiss the appeal in this case on the ground that the transcript has not been filed in this Court. Affidavits are presented upon both sides, from which it appears that the transcript has not been made out by the Clerk of the Court below, because of the loss from the files of said Court of the judgment roll in said cause; but it does not clearly appear which party, if either of them, is accountable for the loss. This Court has no control over the records of the Court below, and cannot properly make any order to supply a lost record; but that duty is within the province of the District Court, and the taking of the appeal does not suspend or impair the power of that Court over its own records, or its capacity to supply their place when lost.

Upon proper application being made, it will be the duty of the Court below to supply the lost judgment roll by the aid of the copies, or by some other means under its control.

It is therefore ordered that the appellants have thirty days from and after the next term of the District Court of the Seventh Judicial District, for the County of Solano, in which to prepare and file in this Court the transcript on appeal in this cause, and that in the meantime all proceedings on the said motion in this Court be stayed.

Mr. Justice SHAFTEE, having been of counsel, did not sit on the trial of this case.

HORACE W. CARPENTIER v. JOSEPH THIRSTON,
GEORGE ENGLEMEYER, A. W. WALL, A. W. HAM-MITT, ORRIS FALES, AND DAVID P. SMITH.

CONFIRMED MEXICAN GRANT — POSSESSION OF TILL SURVEY.—Where, by the decree of a Court of the United States, a specific quantity of land is confirmed to a grantee, from the Mexican Nation, or to his assignees, to be selected and surveyed within the exterior boundaries of a larger tract, the confirmee, by virtue of the grant and the confirmation, is entitled, until a final survey, to recover possession of any portion of the land embraced within the exterior boundaries of the larger tract, except as against a person holding title from or the right of possession under the Government.

PARTITION — PARTIES TO MUST HAVE TITLE.—An agreement to establish a partition line between the occupants of adjoining tracts of land is of no validity and cannot be enforced unless the title to the adjoining tracts has passed from the Government and become vested in the parties by whom the agreement is made. In order to render such agreement for a partition line effectual, each party must have the title to and right to dispose of the tract claimed by him, or in other words, they must be co-terminous proprietors.

Carpentier v. Thirston et als.

ESTOPPEL — WHAT NECESSARY TO CREATE.— A disclaimer of title to land made to one who has no claim or right to the land to which the disclaimer applies, cannot operate as an estoppel, unless the person to whom it is made is directly influenced to act upon it, and does so act upon it that it would be a fraud upon him to permit the disclaimer to be retracted.

WHAT JURY MAY PASS ON.— It is error for the Court to submit to a jury the question of the legal effect of written documents offered in evidence during the trial.

APPEAL from the District Court, Fourth Judicial District, Contra Costa County.

The decree of final confirmation of the Rancho San Ramon, made in the District Court of the United States, June 4th, 1862, contains the following description:

The land, of which confirmation is hereby made, is the equal undivided one half part of all that certain tract of land situated in the County of Contra Costa, and in the Northern District of California, and known by the name of San Ramon, and extending from [here follows the boundaries]; provided, that there be contained within the exterior boundaries of the tract hereinabove described no more than the quantity of two square leagues of land; but if there be more than two square leagues in quantity within said boundaries, then there is hereby confirmed to the said claimant, Horace W. Carpentier, the equal undivided one half part of a tract of land of the extent and quantity of two square leagues, and no more, to be selected and located at the choice and election of the said confirmer, his heirs, and assigns, anywhere within the exterior boundaries hereinbefore mentioned; provided, only, that the lands so selected and located be in one tract, and not in separate and distinct parcels.

On the 18th of January, 1844, the Romeros petitioned the Governor for a grant of the sobrante, and obtained an order to measure the land and report the result, in order that the sobrante might be conceded to the petitioners. The measurement was never made, however, nor was any grant made to the Romeros.

The Romeros, in expectation of a concession of the sobrante, took possession of the demanded premises in 1845, and they and their assignees held possession up to the time of the commencement of this action.

The Romeros petitioned the Land Commission for the confirmation of their grant to the sobrante, but it was rejected, and on appeal to the District Court of the United States, was also rejected.

The jury found that the demanded premises were within the exterior boundaries described in the decree of confirmation to Carpentier, of June 4th, 1862.

The jury also found that there was an agreement made in 1844 between the Romeros on one part, and Lorenzo Pacheco on the other part, establishing a boundary line between their respective ranches, and that Mariano Castro assented to and acquiesced in the agreement.

At the time of the trial of this action no final selection and survey had been made of the two leagues confirmed.

The other facts are stated in the opinion of the Court.

Patterson, Wallace & Stow, for Appellants.

"The law is settled that where there is a specific tract of land confirmed according to ascertained boundaries, the confirmee takes a title upon which he may sue in ejectment." (Stanford v. Taylor, 18 Howard, 412.)

And in this Court such a confirmation is held to be equivalent to a patent for the land. (Natoma Water Co. v. Clarkin, 14 Cal. 548.)

Where the United States have consented to the decree and dismissed the appeal, the validity of the grant "can never be questioned again." (Mott v. Smith, 16 Cal. 533; See, also, Clark v. Lockwood, 21 Cal. 223; Cornwall v. Culver, 16 Cal. 428-9; Teschmacher v. Thompson, 18 Cal. 29; Pioche v. Paul, 22 Cal. 105.)

And, until survey and segregation, plaintiff can maintain ejectment to the exterior boundaries. (Vanderslice v. Hanks, 3 Cal. 45; Ferris v. Coover, 10 Cal. 621; Cornwall v. Culver, 16 Cal. 429; Clark v. Lockwood, 21 Cal. 223.)

facts found as to the agreement of Mariano Castro with the Romeros can have no effect. If neither Castro on the one hand, nor the Romeros on the other hand, had any title to the lands of which they were in occupation, it would be clear that they could not, by fixing lines, etc., interfere with the effect or boundaries of a valid grant made by the former Government, nor a decree of final confirmation made by the present Government. So, if, as in this case, Castro on the one part had a title and the Romeros had none, a mere fixing of a boundary of their respective possessions would not give the Romeros a title from the Government, and certainly would not convey any of the title of Castro to the Romeros.

As was said in the case of Waterman v. Smith, 13 Cal. 418, (where two contiguous owners of land, each of whom had title, had by award fixed a dividing line,) "the award could not bind the Government or control the effect of its patent;" neither could such an agreement, we submit, control the effect of the final decree of that Government confirming title to the land to one of the co-terminous occupants, and decreeing that the other had no claim whatever to any portion of the land.

It is an ascertained fact in this case, that neither at the time of making the supposed agreement fixing the dividing line, nor at any time before or since, did the Romeros have any title to the land in suit, or any adjoining land; that no one was or could be interested in the question as to where the line would run except Pacheco and Castro on the one side, and the Mexican Government then, and now the United States Government, on the other side.

As neither Government was a party to this agreement, there can be no estoppel, of course, against either Government.

The true theory upon which these parol agreements as to boundary lines is upheld, is stated in Hagey v. Detweiler, 35 Penn. 409: "But adjoining owners, who adjust their division line by parol, do not create or convey any estate whatever between themselves; no such thought or intention influences their conduct; after their boundary is fixed by consent, they hold up to it by virtue of the title deeds, and not by virtue of a parol transfer."

It will be observed that the Court speaks of "owners," "adjoining owners," as being the only ones who may make this parol division—otherwise, and except as between owners, no such agreement could be made.

Hence, if one has title and the other has not, there is no mutuality in the agreement, and neither is bound by it. (Perkins v. Gay, 3 Sergt. & Rawle, 331.)

This exact question was so decided in the case of Terry v. Chandler, 16 N. Y. (2d Smith) 355.

In all cases where the "consentable line" has been upheld, it is upon the idea that the parties are contiguous owners. (Henry Thacker v. John Guardianier, 7 Metc. 484; Gray v. Berry, 9 N. Hamp. 473; Dibble v. Rogers, 13 Wend. 537; Adams v. Rockwell, 16 Wend. 285; Wilson v. Hudson, 8 Yerger, 407; Heirs of Houston v. Matthews, 1 Yerger 46; Pierson v. Mosher, 30 Barbour, 81; Dudley v. Elkins, 39 N. Hamp. 78.)

And in no case has such an agreement ever been upheld where one of the parties was ascertained not to be the owner. The reason is obvious. The agreement is only maintained on the principle of "estoppel." The subject matter of estoppel is the boundary of land—such an estoppel can only be created by the acts of one who is in fact owner of the land. If so created, it operates against the land itself, into whose hands soever it may come, deriving title from the party making the agreement; the estoppel is affixed to the title thereafter; but none can so affix it unless he have the title at the time.

Suppose A., a party in possession, agrees with B., a co-terminous possessor, upon a dividing line, and afterwards the true owner of the premises claimed by A. recovers them from him in an action at law; can it be pretended that the owner who ~~so~~ recovered is bound or estopped by such an agreement? Surely not; and if he is not so bound, B. is not bound, because estoppels must be mutual.

Here the Government has, in the assertion of its just rights, declared itself to be the owner of all the land claimed by the Romeros in this transaction. Is the Government estopped by the unauthorized act of Romero? Certainly not; and if not, there can be no estoppel on the other side either.

If the argument were worth pursuing upon this point, we might suggest that the final decree in favor of the appellant, entered by the consent of the Government, fixing the boundaries of this land, so lately as the 4th day of June, 1862, and confirming his title thereto, is conclusive, so far as the principle of an "estoppel" is concerned.

Again, the appellant derives his title from the United States Government, by decree of 4th June, 1862. That Government was never a party to any transaction with Romero or his successors, except in rejecting their claim. And appellant derives title also through the Mexican Government, which Government was never a party to any transaction with the Romeros about the land, except in refusing to make them a grant for it.

The United States Government being, then, free to act, could it not give the land to Carpentier by its action? — by its final decree, entered in its own Courts, by its own express consent?

Though Fremont had done enough to estop himself in the Mariposa Estate, yet, said this Court, in Biddle Boggs v. Merced Mining Co., 14 Cal. 373: "The Government could not be estopped from asserting its title and disposing of it to whomsoever and whenever it thought proper."

The reasoning of this Court in the Biddle Boggs case, (vide pp. 372, 373,) is peculiarly applicable to this case. Suppose that it was true that Pacheco and Castro did consider that the land in controversy was ungranted public land, belonging to the Government, "no prohibition existed against a subsequent acquisition of the title from the superior proprietor. The defendant could not acquire by mere occupation any rights which could control the action of the Government. The defendant could only hold so long as the superior proprietor permitted, and if that proprietor saw proper to give the land to Carpentier, or to any other person, the defendant could interpose no valid objection. The Government could not be estop-ped from asserting its title and disposing of it to whomsoever and whenever it thought proper."

S. Heydenfeldt, also for Appellants.

The defense set up in the answer relies upon an agreement for a dividing line made between the Romeros and Domingo Peralta, so that both the evidence and the finding were departures from the pleadings. The plaintiff was not called upon to meet any proof of an agreement with any other than with Peralta.

The agreement was void for want of consideration, because the Romeros had no title to any land whatever. It must be too clear for argument that one having no title to land cannot make a valid and binding agreement as to boundary with one who has the title. The effect attempted here to be given to this supposed agreement is to make it confer title to land on one who had no title. This, of course, cannot be done, unless the Court can construe such an agreement into an absolute sale by the one who has title to him who has none. This cannot be, because no such thing is pretended or relied on. The Romeros do not set up a claim of title under Pacheco or Castro, or either of them, but under the Mexican Government, and it has been determined that their claim, as they set it up, is invalid. Nor can it be done, because the agreement as proved does not partake of the nature nor contain any of the incidents of a sale, even supposing that a sale of land could be made without writing.

The agreement cannot operate by way of estoppel. The Romeros, in order to set up estoppel, must show that the conduct, or word, or agreement, misled them, and induced them to alter their condition, and that they were ignorant of the facts. (See Hastler v. Hays, 3 Cal. 306; Goodale v. Scannell, 8 Cal. 29; McCracken v. San Francisco, 16 Cal. 626; Burritt v. Dickson, 8 Cal. 113.)

The doctrine of estoppel is construed with great strictness, because loose statements or recitals, so far from expressing the truth, may exclude a party from alleging the truth. (Osborne v. Endicott, 6 Cal. 153.)

So in Greene v. Bates, 6 Cal. 272, in a case where a party owning land stands by and in silence permits another to occupy and improve, Judge Murray said: "Estoppel in such cases proceed on the ground of fraud or culpable silence," and therefore held in that case there was no estoppel.

In Moore v. Wilkinson, 13 Cal. 488, the plaintiffs had published a notice stating that they had become owners of the grant, and specifying its boundaries, and warning trespassers not to come within such boundaries; upon which Mr. Justice Field said: "Such notice could not operate as an estoppel upon the plaintiff. It was only evidence of the opinion the parties entertained of the boundaries of their claim."

J. B. Crockett, for Respondents.

If the facts found by the jury are true, (as they must be assumed to be on this appeal,) the important question is presented, whether or not, under such facts, the claimants can maintain ejectment for all the lands within the exterior boundaries. This Court has so often decided that, under ordinary circumstances, a Mexican grantee is entitled to the possession of all the lands within the exterior limits of the grant, until his claim has been located by a final survey, that I do not propose again to moot the question. But whilst the general proposition is conceded, it is equally plain that it does not hold good in all cases. The last case in which this question was considered by the Court is Mahoney v. Van Winkle, 21 Cal. 552, in which the prior decisions are fully reviewed and the whole question definitely settled. The Court in that case distinctly decides that if the grantee, in advance of a survey, selects his quantity and location, uses it, leases it, and sells it, and by his acts or in words disclaims title to the remainder, he is estopped to assert title or right of possession to any lands outside of his selection, prior to a final survey. That is precisely this case. The jury finds and the proof establishes that Pacheco and Castro not only consented to the occupation of Romero, and that the lands might be granted to him, but agreed upon a dividing line, and restricted their possession and claim of title to that line. Romero went there with their consent, and occupied his lands, not only without remonstrance, but at their desire. Under the principle established in Mahoney v. Van Winkle, the plaintiff cannot disturb that possession in advance of a final survey, whether Romero had title or not. To defeat this action, it is enough to show that Pacheco and Castro consented to the occupation of Romero, agreed with him on a dividing line, confined their occupation and claim to that line, and disclaimed title to the remainder. It is not material whether Romero acquired any title from the Mexican Government. Under the facts found by the jury, and on the principles settled in Mahoney v. Van Winkle, the plaintiff is estopped to deny the right of possession of the defendants in advance of a final survey. I deem it useless to elaborate this point, for the reason that it is fully covered in the case referred to.

The appellant's counsel seeks to break the force of this position by invoking the dry, technical, common law rule, that no agreement for a partition line is valid, unless each of the parties to it has title to the co-terminous lands, and he says Romero had no title, and the agreement was therefore void. This principle has no application to the case. The partition line is not relied upon as a technical partition, and as a final settlement of a disputed boundary, but as evidence that Pacheco and Castro selected their location, and limited their occupation and claim by that line. Any other act establishing the selection and location would have been as effectual. If they had caused a private survey to be made of their two leagues, had marked the boundaries, and confined their occupation to these limits, and disclaimed title to the remainder, this would have been sufficient. This was precisely what was relied upon as a selection in Mahoney v. Van Winkle, and the Court held it bad only because the claimants were infants and married women, and, therefore, incapable of binding themselves by such acts. Except for this, the Court would have decided the selection to be obligatory in that case.

"But," the Court adds, "to restrict the possessory right of the grantee to the selection made, the selection must be made with such disclaimers as to the residue of the general tract as to operate as an estoppel upon him." The only question, therefore, is, did the grantee make his selection, accompanied by such disclaimers as to the residue as to operate as an estoppel upon him? We say Pacheco and Castro did make their selection; and as evidence of it, we prove that they agreed with Romero upon their northern line, and thenceforth limited their occupation and claim by it, and recognized this line as their northern boundary. And we say that they disclaimed title as to the residue, not only in terms, but that they expressly agreed that the residue might be granted to Romero, and they expressly assented to his occupation. We therefore say they are estopped by their own acts as against Romero and his vendees. In Biddle Boggs v. Merced Mining Co., the Court held there was no valid estoppel against Fremont's patent; but if the suit had been brought in advance of the survey and patent, it is manifest from the whole opinion, the Court would have held the estoppel in that case to be valid.

The partition line, therefore, in this case, is relied upon only as conclusive evidence of the selection and location, and as evidence of a disclaimer as to the residue; and, therefore, the common law doctrine invoked by the appellant, as to the title of the co-terminous owners in settling disputed boundaries, has no application. The question is not whether a valid partition line has been finally and conclusively established between these parties for all time; but whether, in consenting to this line, limiting themselves by it, disclaiming title as to the residue, consenting to the grant to Romero, and to his occupation, Pacheco and Castro did not select their location, with such a disclaimer as to the remainder as to estop them prior to a final survey. I admit the estoppel may not bind them, if the Government finally locates the land so as to include the possession of Romero. But, until this is done, the estoppel operates. It would be most unjust if it were otherwise. The grantee is entitled to but two leagues out of six.

Another person applies for the surplus. The grantee consents it may be granted. Whilst the proceedings are pending, the applicant goes into possession with the consent of the Government and of the first grantee, and they agree upon a partition line, which is respected by both for a series of years. Whilst matters remain in this condition, and before a final survey, the first grantee brings his action to oust the other from a possession originally acquired with his consent, and with the consent of the Government.

By the Court, RHODES, J.

This is an action of ejectment to recover the possession of a portion of the Rancho San Ramon, situated in the County of Contra Costa.

The plaintiff claims title under a grant issued by the Governor of California to Bartolo Pacheco and Mariano Castro, in 1833, and approved by the Territorial Deputation in 1834. Mariano Castro, by deed dated August 6th, 1852, recited that in 1843 he had conveyed, and he thereby again conveyed, all his right, title, and interest in and to the said rancho to Domingo Peralta, who, in 1857, conveyed the same to John B. Watson, and Watson, in 1858, conveyed the same to the plaintiff.

Domingo Peralta having filed his petition for confirmation before the Board of United States Land Commissioners, praying for the confirmation of the title to the one undivided half of said rancho, such proceedings were had before said Board and before the District Court of the United States that a final decree was filed in said Court on the 4th day of June, 1862, finally confirming to said plaintiff (who had been substituted for said Peralta) the undivided half of said rancho, the tract confirmed being restricted to two square leagues of land, the whole rancho containing six square leagues.

The complaint alleges that the plaintiff is the owner in fee and entitled to the possession of a certain portion of the rancho, described by metes and bounds, and contains the usual allegations of ouster and possession by the defendants.

The defendants, by their answer, deny that the plaintiff is the owner or is entitled to the possession of the premises; and allege that they are the owners in fee and entitled to the possession of the premises under title derived from Inocencio, José, and Mariano Romero, who were formerly the owners thereof. And they allege, for a further defense, that before the commencement of the suit the Romeros were in possession of the premises, claiming title under a grant from the Mexican Government, and that said Peralta was in possession claiming title to an adjoining rancho; that a dispute arose between the Romeros and Peralta in respect to the dividing line of the two ranchos; that thereupon, to terminate said dispute, the parties agreed upon and established a dividing line, and that thereby the premises in dispute were included in the rancho of the Romeros; that by mesne conveyances the defendants have succeeded to the rights of the Romeros. The pleadings are verified.

The case was tried by a jury, who returned a general verdict for the defendant, and special findings, in answer to the several interrogatories submitted to them on motion of the respective parties.

The plaintiff excepted to the general verdict, and to several of the findings on the special issues, and moved for judgment in his favor upon the special findings; and the motion having been overruled, and judgment having been entered for the defendants, the plaintiff moved for a new trial, which was denied.

The plaintiff appeals from the order denying the motion for a new trial and from the final judgment, and assigns many errors, which, however, may be reduced to a few general heads.

There is no question that the plaintiff is the owner in fee of the undivided half of the Rancho San Ramon, as confirmed by the final decree of the District Court of the United States, to the extent of two square leagues, and that by virtue of the grant under which he claims and said confirmation, he is entitled, until a final survey, to recover the possession of any portion of the whole rancho from any one, except a person claiming title or the right of possession under or through Pacheco or Castro, the grantees, or the Government.

This principle has been so fully settled by this Court by repeated decisions, and particularly in the case of Mahoney v. Van Winkle, 21 Cal. 552, that it is unnecessary to give any reason therefor; and the learned counsel of the defendants admits the correctness of the general proposition. He insists, however, that this case falls within the exceptions to the general rule, as stated in the case last cited, viz: if the grantee, in advance of a survey, elects his quantity and location, uses it, leases it, and sells it, and by his acts or words disclaims title to the remainder, he is estopped to assert title or right of possession to any land outside of his possession prior to a survey; and he says that as Pacheco and Castro not only consented to the occupation of the sobrante by the Romeros, but agreed upon a dividing line between the rancho and the sobrante, and as both parties occupied in accordance with said dividing line, the grantees are estopped from claiming beyond the division line prior to a final survey. This brings us to the consideration of the principal question involved in the case.

The document introduced in evidence by the defendants against the objections of the plaintiff, consisting of the two petitions of the Romeros to the Governor, the first dated January, 1844, for the grant of the sobrante of the Ranchos of Moraja, Lorenzo Pacheco and Julian Wil, the other dated March, 1844, for a grant, provisionally, that they might commence sowing before the proper season should pass, with the orders for the informe and for the measurement of the land, and the two petitions to the Alcalde of San José, together with his orders respecting the same, fail to establish (as was decided by the District Court of the United States) any title in the Romeros, either perfect or inchoate, to any portion of the Rancho San Ramon as against the Government, and those documents, therefore, did not confer upon them any right of possession. No other evidence was offered by the defendants tending to show title or right of possession in them derived from the Government. The Romeros, therefore, were not in a position to establish a partition line as between adjoining owners of the land.

But it is insisted by the defendants that the establishment of the division line, as testified to by the witnesses, though not sufficient as a technical partition line between co-terminous proprietors, was evidence of the selection of the location of the two square leagues by Pacheco and Castro, and that such selection of the location, accompanied by evidence of a disclaimer of the residue of the land not included within the location, amounted to an estoppel against the said grantees, and would effectually prevent a recovery of any of the lands outside of said location prior to a final survey. The estoppel claimed is of the class of equitable estoppels, which has grown up under the influence of equity in modern times, and not of the technical estoppels recognized by the old rules of the common law. An equitable estoppel is well defined by Mr. Chief Justice Field in Biddle Boggs v. Merced Mining Company, 14 Cal. 367. He says: "It must appear, first, the party making the admission, by his declarations or conduct, was apprised of the true state of his own title; second, that he made the admission with the express intention to deceive, or with such careless and culpable negligence as to amount to constructive fraud; third, that the other party was not only destitute of all knowledge of the true state of the title, but of the means of acquiring such knowledge; and, fourth, that he relied directly upon such admission, and will be injured by allowing its truth to be disproved." The estoppel relied upon by the defendants is not claimed to have affected the title, but only that it attached itself to the possession, and continued effective until the person holding the title could proceed, upon a final survey, to take possession by virtue of his title and the survey; and, in order to create one of the requisites of such estoppel, they allege that the Romeros took and held possession of the sobrante with the consent of the grantees as well as the Government.

The consent of the grantees must be proved to have been one of the causes moving the Romeros to take possession, otherwise it could not operate so as to constitute one of the facts creating the estoppel. Innocencio Romero testified, against the objection of the plaintiff, that he took possession under the order of the Governor — he evidently referring to the two petitions of the Romeros to the Governor, and the orders thereon — and the jury found as a fact, upon an interrogatory submitted to them, that the Romeros did take possession, in 1844 or 1845, by virtue of those two petitions and the orders thereon. His testimony concerning his conversation with Pacheco shows that the conversation related to the question as to whether Pacheco was willing that the Romeros should procure a grant of the sobrante, and he states that Pacheco was willing that it should be done; but there is no evidence showing that the Romeros expected to or did take possession by reason of such consent, nor that at that time there was any understanding or expectation that the Romeros would take possession before the land was granted to them by the Government.

It is contended by the defendants that the designation by Pacheco and Castro of the creek mentioned by the witnesses as their northern boundary, amounted to a location by them of their two square leagues, and a disclaimer as to the residue of the rancho — the land north of said creek — and that the disclaimer would continue operative against them and their grantees, by way of an estoppel, until a final survey of the rancho, (not considering the boundary line as a technical partition, and not regarding the disclaimer as a consent to the defendants' occupation of the residue so disclaimed,) and in support of this position they rely particularly upon the doctrine enunciated in the case of Mahoney v. Van Winkle, 21 Cal. 580.

The Court in that case holds that the grantee may make a selection and location of his specific quantity, "under such circumstances and accompanied with such disclaimers as to estop him from the assertion of any title or right to the possession of the remainder existing within the exterior boundaries of the general tract, until, by the action of the Government, it is determined that his claim under the grant shall be satisfied by land elsewhere selected." Mr. Chief Justice Field, in delivering the opinion of the Court, then proceeds to discuss the nature and effect of the disclaimer; and in declaring its effect upon the question of the recovery of possession, he evidently regards it as one of the facts which, taken in connection with other circumstances may operate as an estoppel as to the residue not included within the location; for it could not be contended that a mere verbal disclaimer, be it as complete as it may, if made to one having no right or title to the lands to which the disclaimer applied, could, by its own proper force, operate as an estoppel, unless the person to whom it was made was directly influenced to rely upon it, and did act thereon in such a manner that it would be a fraud to him to permit the disclaimer to be retracted.

The decision in that case fully harmonizes, on this point, with that of Biddle Boggs v. Merced Mining Co. But, even assuming that the Court was considering the consequences of a disclaimer, taken by itself and disconnected from any other facts (except the possession of the defendants) which might, united with it, amount to an estoppel, the Court held, in that case, that the proof offered in the Court below was properly excluded, as it showed that a part only of the tenants in common of the rancho participated in the alleged disclaimer.

In the case at bar, Inocencio Romero testified that his conversation about the dividing line was with Pacheco, and not with Castro, his tenant in common; and he does not mention any conversation between him and Peralta, who succeeded Castro, and he does not pretend that any agreement was made concerning the division line, except the one mentioned as having been made in 1844, between him and Pacheco.

The testimony of Pico shows that several attempts were made by him to have the survey of the northern line of the Rancho San Ramon made, but in this he failed, when he told Romero to put himself in possession until a survey should be made; and Romero having put himself in possession, "it so remained until 1849, when a dispute arose between Romero and Peralta about the boundaries, and then a surveyor went to measure the land." This does not indicate that a location of the rancho was made and the line dividing the rancho agreed upon, but rather the contrary; and it would seem that the true solution of the matter is found in Pico's testimony, when he states that the rodeo line of the ranch was near a creek which divides it. The defendant's witnesses — Victor Castro, Ignacio Sibrian, and José Maria Amador — all mention the creek as the rodeo line.

If we admit that there was some evidence that Pacheco agreed to a line as a dividing line between the rancho and the sobranste sufficient for the jury to find that he had so agreed, still there is no evidence that Castro or Peralta regarded such a line as anything more than a rodeo line, a line that might or might not coincide with the true line of the rancho. Their agreement or assent to that line as the rodeo line could not operate as a disclaimer on their part as to the residue of the rancho north of the line.

The evidence in the case fails to show the existence of other facts necessary to create the estoppel, as defined in the case above cited. (Biddle Boggs v. Merced Mining Company.) Neither Pacheco, Castro, nor Peralta, could at that time point out the limits of the two square leagues that would be surveyed for the Rancho San Ramon; the Romeros had the means of acquiring the knowledge of the true state of the title to the rancho, and they evidently did know it, and there is not sufficient, if any, evidence to prove that the Romeros relied directly upon the acts of admission of Pacheco or Castro for any purpose except to procure a grant of the sobranste; and the petitions of two of the Romeros, in 1847, to Burton, as Alcalde of San José, state that they had not then procured the possession of the lands they had petitioned for in 1844.

The view that we have thus taken of the case, renders it unnecessary to consider in detail the several errors assigned.

The Court should have given to the jury the fourth, seventh, and eighth instructions asked for by the plaintiff.

The following instructions given by the Court were erroneous, for the reasons already stated, viz: "That from all the evidence and circumstances, the jury might find an agreement between Inocencio Romero and Mariano Castro, relating to a division line between them, notwithstanding the jury might find that said Romero had positively testified in this case that he did not make any agreement with said Castro, or have any conversation with him in relation thereto;" also, "that if Bartolo Pacheco or Lorenzo Pacheco agreed with the Romeros, or either of them, upon a dividing line prior to the occupation of the Romeros, and with a view to their occupation in expectation of a grant, and if Mariano Castro, while he was a part owner of the Rancho San Ramon, was informed of and acquiesced in said agreement, such an agreement was as obligatory upon him as if it had been made by him in person."

The Court also erred in submitting to the jury the fourth interrogatory requested by the defendants, for the additional reason that it leaves the jury the determination of the legal effect of the papers referred to in the interrogatory. The seventh, eighth, ninth, and seventeenth interrogatories of the defendants were improperly submitted to the jury.

The judgment is reversed and the cause remanded for a new trial.

By SAWYER, J., concurring specially:

I concur in the opinion that the judgment should be reversed and the cause remanded.

APRIL TERM, 1864.

THE UNIVERSITY OF CHICAGO

REPORTS OF CASES
DETERMINED IN
THE SUPREME COURT
APRIL TERM 1864.

M. M. RICHARDSON v. DANIEL WILLIAMSON AND ISAIAH HANSCOM.

STATUTE OF LIMITATIONS—MEXICAN GRANT.—In an action to recover lands where the plaintiff claims title to the demanded premises derived from a Spanish or Mexican grant, and the defendant has been in five years adverse possession under a claim of title, he may rest with proof of his five years adverse possession, and the burden is cast upon the plaintiff of proving that less than five years have expired since the final confirmation of the grant, in order to defeat the defense of the Statute of Limitations.

SAME.—Where the plaintiff proves title derived from a Spanish or Mexican grant, and rests, and the defendant proves five years adverse possession under a claim of title, as a defense, and rests, the defendant is entitled to judgment unless the plaintiff shows in rebuttal that less than five years have expired since a final confirmation.

STATUTE OF LIMITATIONS—CONSTRUCTION OF.—Section 6 of the Act defining the time for commencing civil actions is the only section in the Act applicable to actions for the recovery of lands, and covers every case for the recovery of the possession of land; and the proviso to section 6 covers every case of title derived from the Spanish or Mexican Government.

SAME.—Section 7 of said Act, and the proviso thereto attached, refer to personal actions founded upon the title to real property, and not to actions for the recovery of such property.

Richardson v. Williamson et al.

SAME.—The proviso to sections 6 and 7 of said Act are not limited in their application to cases where the plaintiff claims under a Mexican or Spanish grant, and the defendant contests the validity of such grant, but apply to all cases where the original source of title is from such grant, even if both parties claim to derive title from the same grant.

APPEAL from the District Court, Seventh Judicial District, Solano County.

When the pleadings in the case at bar were completed, the statute regulating proceedings and pleadings required a replication to affirmative matter amounting to a defense to the action of the plaintiff.

The other facts are stated in the opinion of the Court.

Whitman & Wells, for Appellants.

The following question was submitted by the Court to the jury, and by them answered in the affirmative: "Has Williamson, the defendant, had possession of the premises in controversy for five years continuously, prior to the commencement of this suit, holding the same adversely to the plaintiff and his grantors?" It would seem that this finding of the jury was conclusive of the question. There is no dispute as to the actual and undisturbed possession of defendants, and the only question made in the Court below was that the statute could not run against the plaintiff in the case, as the holdings of himself and defendants were all, as stipulated, under the grantee of a Mexican grant. This position is untenable. The Act of 1855 simply gives to those claiming under a Mexican grant the indulgence of four years from the final confirmation thereof in which to bring suit. In other words, the assumption of the statute is that the non-confirmation of a grant is a disability, and during the continuance of that disability the statute shall not run against the party laboring thereunder. But non constat, in the case at bar, but the grant of Vallejo had been confirmed more than five years before the commencement of the suit. The onus, in all cases, lies upon the party seeking the benefit of the disability; and if the plaintiff wishes to avail himself of the fact that the grant never has been confirmed, or that five years have not elapsed since its final confirmation, it is upon him to show it. There is no evidence in the case upon the question; all that appears touching the original title, under which all parties claim, is contained in the stipulation previously cited. To the point of the burden of proof, we cite Wheeler v. Webster, 1 E. D. Smith, 1. Admitting this position to be incorrect, however, still we contend that the plaintiff cannot avail himself of the indulgences of the statute of 1855. They were not intended to apply to any such case. There is no question here of any adverse holding as against the original title, but the question is, which of the two adverse claimants has that original title as against the other? As has been said, the theory of the statute of 1855 is, that the non-confirmation of a Mexican title is a disability, and the statute shall not run against any person laboring under such disability, and shall only commence when such disability is removed by final confirmation. To persons, however, claiming under the same Mexican grant, no such presumption accrues. By their acknowledgment of the title, the disability as to them is removed and ceases. The title as to them, as between each other and their grantor, is finally confirmed. The reason of the rule, then, fails, and the rule should and does cease to exist. Neither party in this case, then, can claim the benefit of this indulgence as against the other, and the plea of the statute, without the proviso, holds good. (The Trustees v. Payne, 3 Monr. 161.)

John Currey, for Respondents.

Our Statute of Limitations, like those of other States, and the statute 21 James I, exempts from its operations persons laboring under specific disabilities (Wood's Dig., 47, 48, §§16, 22, 23); and it may be conceded, as it is undoubtedly the rule, that he who would avail himself of any particular disability must, in the first instance, establish its existence; but, when its existence appears, it will be presumed to have continued, unless the disability be of a nature that by the lapse of time must have become removed; for instance, where the disability of infancy or imprisonment for a definite time may be pleaded, and the period of infancy or imprisonment appears to have expired; but if the disability may be without a limitation, as insanity or residence beyond the jurisdiction, then, in order to deprive the party pleading the disability of exemption from the operation of the statute, his adversary must affirmatively show that such disability was removed, so that the period of limitation had completely run before action brought. (Adm'r of Anderson v. Smith, 2 McCord, 269; Pothier on Obligations, App. 573; Matthews on Presumptive Ev. 18; Hall v. Warren, 9 Vesey, 611; 1 Fonb. Eq. 71.)

The 27th section of the Statute of Limitations of New York (2 N. Y. Rev. Stat. 297) is in substance the same as the 22d section of our statute above referred to, which provides that if, when the cause of action shall accrue against a person, he is out of the State, the action may be commenced within the term limited therein after his return to the State; and if, after the cause of action shall have accrued, he depart the State, the time of his absence shall not be part of the time limited for the commencement of the action. There has existed in Massachusetts a statute of like import with the first part of this 22d section of our Act, and the 27th section of the New York Act, which is in substance a transcript of the 4 and 5 Anne, c. 15, sec. 19. By the authorities involving the consideration of these statutes the questions of pleading and evidence are disposed of, as also the point arising in this case, as upon whom was the burden of proof after it appeared that the plaintiff's title to the demanded premises was derived from the Mexican Nation.

By the authorities it is plain that after it is established that a disability of a nature that might extend through all time existed, the burden of proof rests on the party who would avoid the disability to show it removed at a period from which the statute could have completely run. (Fowler v. Hunt, 10 John. 464; White v. Bailey, 3 Mass. 270; Cole v. Jessup, 2 Barb. 310; Little v. Blunt, 16 Pick. 359; Faw v. Roberdeau,

3 Cranch, 174; Ford v. Babcock, 2 Sand. 519; Didier v. Davison, 2 Barb. Ch. R. 478.)

Upon the theory that a disability existed because the plaintiff's title was derived from the Mexican Government, which would avoid the running of the Statute of Limitations until the final confirmation of such title, then, when it appeared that the title was so derived, the disability which obstructed the running of the statute was established, and afforded an effectual answer to the defendant's plea. If it might have been desired on the part of the defendants to avoid the effect of the fact of the disability so established, the burden of proof was upon them to do so, because the removal of such disability was essential to the maintenance of the plea of the Statute of Limitations.

If section six of the Limitation Act, as amended in 1855, was the only provision of the statute affording protection to the owner of land under title derived from the Spanish or Mexican Governments, there would be much greater strength in the appellant's position; because, by that section, it seems to me, there is no saving of the rights of such an owner, after five years possession by an adverse claimant, until a final confirmation of the title. It is quite evident that by this section the Legislature had in contemplation a party claiming real estate under a title derived from the Spanish or Mexican Governments, who had been, and was, and would continue to be, disabled from maintaining his action before a final confirmation of such title, and hence by said section provision was made for the protection of persons holding imperfect titles derived from a former Government, on which they could not maintain an action until after final confirmation. Provision having been made by section six for the protection of the class of titles above mentioned, there remained another and superior class of titles, derived from the Spanish and Mexican Governments, on which an action might be maintained, though, as experience had proved, the obstacles in the way might be of extreme difficulty. It was, therefore, provided by section seven, that, "No cause of action, or defense to an action, founded upon the title to real property, or to rents, or to services out of the same, shall be effectual, unless it appear that the person prosecuting the action, or making the defense, or under whose title the action is prosecuted or the defense is made, or the ancestor, predecessor, or grantor of such person, was seized or possessed of the premises in question within five years before the commencement of the act in respect to which such action is prosecuted or defense made, or unless it appear that the title to such premises was derived from the Spanish or Mexican Governments, or that the same was confirmed by the Government of the United States or its authorities within five years of the commencement of such action."

This section contains in itself an authentic interpretation of its meaning. Understanding it as its words plainly import, it embraces titles to real property of the following classes:

1st. Those evidenced by the seizin of the party, his ancestor, predecessor, or grantor.

2d. Those evidenced by the possession of the party, his ancestor, predecessor, or grantor.

3d. Titles derived from the Spanish or Mexican Governments.

4th. Titles confirmed by the Government of the United States, or its authorities.

In respect to the first, second, and fourth class of titles here mentioned, there is a fixed limit within which an action must be brought after the existence of a specified contingency; but, in respect to the third class, viz., titles derived from the Spanish or Mexican Governments, there is provided no limitation, for the section in its provision respecting Spanish and Mexican titles is, that no cause of action, or defense to an action, founded upon title to real property, etc., shall be effectual, unless it appear that the title to such premises was derived from the Spanish or Mexican Governments. Then, if it so appears that the title was derived from the Spanish or Mexican Governments, of what avail would it be to the disseisor that he had held the premises adversely to the true owner for twice five years?

If I be in error on the point that titles derived from the Spanish or Mexican Governments are excepted from the operation of the Statute of Limitations, I submit that it is sufficient to avoid the plea of limitation that it appears in evidence that plaintiff's cause of action was founded upon title to the demanded premises derived from the Mexican Government; for, by reference to said section seven, it will be seen that a confirmation, within five years or otherwise, is not at all necessary to be alleged or proved in order to meet the plea of the Statute of Limitations; and, therefore, upon the defendants was the burden of proof to show that a confirmation of the title to the demanded lot (which was admitted to have been in General Vallejo on the 29th of December, 1851, as the grantee of the Mexican Nation) was confirmed more than five years before this action was commenced.

It is said on the part of appellants that, as both parties claim from the same source, the title as to them and their grantor is finally confirmed; that, by their acknowledgment of the title, the disability as to them is removed and ceases; and that, as to persons claiming under the same Mexican grant, no presumption of disability can arise; and, it is concluded, that neither party can claim the benefit of the presumed disability, and that, therefore, the plea of the statute, without the proviso, holds good.

These positions may be answered in few words:

1st. Parties claiming title at the trial of a cause from the same source cannot confirm a title derived from the Spanish or Mexican Governments, either within the meaning of the Act of Congress of 1851 or the Statute of Limitations of 1855.

2d. There can be no objection to the plaintiff's claiming the benefit of the status, which appellant's counsel denominate a disability, because the defendant's position or relation to the property may not be in antagonism to the title at the source; and this is so because the statute has declared that no lapse of time shall bar the right of action until five years after the happening of a specified event, and no exception is prothe adverse possession of the premises for a period of five years before the commencement of the action. This, under the general provisions of the section, defeats the plaintiff's prima facie case. It then devolves upon the plaintiff to affirmatively show a state of facts which brings him within the exception mentioned in the proviso. It is not enough to show that he claims under the title derived from the Mexican Government—that fact alone does not bring him within the proviso; it is also necessary that the suit should be brought within five years after the final confirmation of the title. Both facts must co-exist to bring the case within the terms of the exception. That it rests upon the plaintiff to allege and prove a claim of title under a Mexican grant, in order to defeat the defense of five years adverse possession, is not controverted. If it is necessary for the plaintiff to allege one of the constituent facts of the exception, viz: that he holds under a Mexican grant, it is also necessary to allege the other fact, which is essential to constitute a case within its provisions; and if it is necessary for him to allege it, the burden of proving the allegation is on him. The fact of confirmation, if it exists, and its date, are affirmative matters, easily susceptible of proof; while to require proof that there was no confirmation would be to require the defendant to prove a negative.

The plaintiff, in his replication, alleged his Mexican grant, and that five years had not elapsed since its final confirmation. He evidently supposed it necessary to do so to avoid the Statute of limitations set up by Hanscom. In this supposition he was clearly right. If it was necessary for him to allege those matters, it was, of course, necessary to prove them. We think it clear that the burden of proof on this point rested on the plaintiff.

The next question is, as to whether the five years adverse possession of the defendants is a bar to the plaintiff's action?

It is admitted by respondent's counsel that the grounds relied on by appellants would have great force if section six, above quoted, contained the only provision of the statute bearing upon the rights of parties holding lands under titles derived from the Mexican Government. But it is very ingeniously argued, that, in adopting this section, the Legislature had in contemplation only one class of Spanish or Mexican titles—those imperfect titles upon which the holders could not maintain an action at all until after final confirmation—that there is another, superior class of Spanish or Mexican titles, upon which actions might be maintained (though experience had shown with extreme difficulty) without confirmation; and that section seven was intended to provide for this class of cases, and the provision is—according to the argument—that this class of cases is not subject to the Statute of Limitations at all; that they are entirely excepted out of and withdrawn from the operation of its provisions. The argument is mainly based upon the use of the word “or,” in the clause “unless it appear that the title to such premises was derived from the Spanish or Mexican Governments, or that the same was confirmed by the Government of the United States, or its authorities, within five years before the commencement of such action.” We are unable to subscribe to this view. Had the Legislature intended such a result, it would have been easy to make the exception in clear and unambiguous terms. It is impossible to reconcile such a construction with the obvious policy and object of the law, as derived from the other provisions of the Act. The word “and” would doubtless have better expressed the idea intended; but the word “or” is often used conjunctively, as well as disjunctively, and we have no doubt it was so intended to be used in this instance. The construction contended for would render this section repugnant to the other provisions of the Act, and especially to section six, which is the controlling section in respect to actions for the recovery of real estate.

But, in our opinion, section six is the only section applicable to this action. Before the amendment in 1855 it read as follows:

“No action for the recovery of real property or for the recovery of the possession thereof shall be maintained, unless it appear that the plaintiff, his ancestor, predecessor, or grantor was seized or possessed of the premises in question within five years before the commencement of such action."

This is broad in its terms, and covers every case for the recovery of the possession of land. There is no room for misconstruction. It was found in practice that it was expensive and difficult to prove up a Spanish or Mexican title in such a manner as to maintain an action upon it against intruders.

Under the laws of the United States, most of the claims under Spanish and Mexican grants had been presented to the Board of Land Commissioners for confirmation prior to 1855, and the statute of the National Government contemplated that all should be presented to that tribunal for adjudication within a prescribed time, or that, in default thereof, the lands should be deemed to be public lands. When the five years under the Statute of Limitations was about to expire—the time limited by the law of Congress for presenting claims for confirmation having already elapsed—it was found that great hardship would result to claimants under Mexican titles unless some change should be made in this provision of the Act under consideration. It was accordingly amended in 1855 by adding to section six these words:

"Provided, however, that an action may be maintained by a party claiming such real estate or the possession thereof under title derived from the Spanish or Mexican Governments, or the authorities thereof, if such action be commenced within five years from the time of the final confirmation of such title by the Government of the United States or its legally constituted authorities."

There was no change made in the language of the section as it originally stood; it was as broad as ever in its terms; but the foregoing clause was added, and this proviso pointed out the exceptions—and the only exceptions—intended to be engrafted upon this provision of the Act. The language of the proviso clearly covers every case of a title derived from the Spanish or Mexican Governments then existing in contemplation of law. There is no room for supposing that any class of cases was omitted to be provided for in some other section.

It is undoubtedly true that the profession have been not a little puzzled to give a proper construction to section seven — especially since the amendment in 1855. Its provisions have been frequently discussed in the District Courts in actions to recover lands, but we are not aware that this section has been construed by the Supreme Court. To whatever cases it may be supposed to apply, we are clear that its provisions were never intended to be applicable to an action for the recovery of real estate. There was no necessity for the provision of this section as applicable to an action to recover the possession of land. Section six provides fully for such cases. It is not to be supposed that the law-making power intended to repeat the provisions of the preceding section. Some other action depending upon the title to realty must have been contemplated.

To understand this section, it will not only be necessary to consider the terms of the section as it stood before the amendment of 1855, but also to trace it back to the statute from which it was borrowed, and consider the condition of things under which it was originally enacted.

Our Statute of Limitations is based upon the statute of New York; in fact, most of the sections are copied verbatim, with the exception of shortening the time. Section six, before the amendment of 1855, was a literal copy of section five of the statute of New York, except the New York statute has "lands, tenements, or hereditaments," in the place of the words "real property," in our Act. Section seven of the Statute of California corresponds to section six of the New York Act. The following is the section. When the two Acts differ, the language of the Act of New York is inclosed in parentheses, for which the words in brackets are substituted in the California Act:

"[No cause of action or defense to an action founded upon the title to real property] (No avowry or cognizance of title to real estate) or to (any rents or services) [rents or to services out of the same] shall be [effectual] (valid) unless it appear that the person [prosecuting the action or making the defense] (making the avowry,) [or under whose title the action is prosecuted or the defense is made] (or the person in whose right the cognizance is made,) or the ancestor, predecessor, or grantor of such person, was seized or possessed of the premises in question within [five] (twenty) years before the [commencement of] (committing) the act, in [respect to which such action is prosecuted or defense] (of which such avowry or cognizance is) made." (2 Rev. St. N. Y. 293; Stats. Cal. 1850, p. 344, Sec. 7.)

It will be seen that the only change in the language is in substituting for the words "No avowry or cognizance of title to real estate," the words "No cause of action, or defense to an action, founded upon the title to real property," and such other changes as were necessary to make the remainder of the section correspond to this change in the phraseology. The terms "avowry" and "cognizance" had a well known signification, which had reference to proceedings growing out of taking property by distress. At the time this Statute of Limitations was enacted in New York, a landlord was authorized to distrain for rent; and there, also, as in England, the owner of land was authorized to distrain, when the cattle of another were found in his grounds, damage feasant. (2 Rev. Stat. N. Y. 517; 3 Black. Com. 7.)

When property was distrained, the remedy by the owner of the property taken was an action of replevin. "Upon this action being brought, the distrainer, who is now the defendant, makes avowry; that is, he avows taking the distress in his own right, or the right of his wife, and sets forth the reason of it, as for rent arrears, damage done, or other cause; or else, if he justifies in another's right, as his bailiff, or servant, he is said to make cognizance; that is, he acknowledges the taking, but insists that such taking was legal, as he acted by the command of one who had a right to distrain; and on the truth and legal merits of this avowry, or cognizance, the case is determined." (2 Black. Com. 149.)

In this way, it will be seen there would arise an "avowry, or cognizance of title to real estate;" and such cases are precisely the cases provided for in this section of the statutes of New York.

The first Legislature of this State—as some other States had done before—finding a well digested Statute of Limitations, with its meaning already settled by construction, adopted it almost bodily, as will be seen by comparing the different sections of the two Acts. But the Legislature did not see fit to adopt the practice of distraining for rent, damage done by cattle, etc., and when they came to consider section seven, they found the terms used in the New York statute inapplicable to the condition of things in California. But the action for rent, damage done by cattle, and perhaps other personal actions, dependent upon title to real estate, remained; and it doubtless occurred to them that the terms “avowry and cognizance” might be dropped and other words substituted, and the provisions of this section be thus adapted to such cases and made applicable to the prosecution made necessary by the non-adoption of the law relating to distress, as well as to the defense, and hence the retention of the section thus modified. Such may reasonably be supposed to have been the case. Whether or not these are the precise cases or the only cases intended to be provided for, or whether or not the section is of any practical utility under the condition of the law in California relating to such cases, it is not necessary now to determine. But this brief review of the origin and history of this section will serve to throw some light upon its construction, and whatever other cases may or may not be embraced within the scope of its provisions, we think it clearly shows that the section, as it stood in the Act of 1850, was not designed to cover the same cases provided for in the preceding section. It must have been intended for some other purpose. Granting this view to be correct, it follows that the amendment of 1855 (which was only an addition, in the nature of an exception, to the section as it before stood) must have referred to the classes of cases already provided for in that section—that is to say, personal actions founded upon the title to real property, and not to actions for the recovery of such property.

It may be well to remark, in passing, that the substitution in our Act of the word "effectual" for the word "valid" does not appear to be very happy, as "effectual" does not seem to be the precise word to use in connection with the phrase "cause of action;" and the substitution of the words "commencement of" for the word "committing" is still more infelicitous.

The object of the change is not very apparent, and the tendency of the use of the words "commencement of the Act" in the place of the words "committing the Act" is to obscure the sense rather than to make it clear. Possibly the change may have originated in a clerical error.

The judgment must be reversed on the points already discussed. But there is another question made in the case and argued by counsel—one that has also been frequently raised in the District Courts. The question will doubtless arise again on the new trial in the Court below, and for that reason it is better that it should be decided now.

It was stipulated by the parties, and found as a fact by the jury, that both parties claim title under the same Mexican grant, through Vallejo. It is insisted that, because both parties claim under Vallejo, and the Mexican title was not in question—the action was necessarily founded on the conveyance from Vallejo only, and not upon a Spanish title, and that the proviso contained in section six is, therefore, inapplicable to the case.

But the plaintiff does, nevertheless, claim under a title derived from the Mexican Government. It is so stipulated and found. He comes clearly within the language of the law: "Provided, however, that an action may be maintained by a party claiming such real estate or the possession thereof under title derived from the Spanish or Mexican Governments, or the authorities thereof, if such action be commenced within five years from the time of the final confirmation of such title," etc., etc. This language is clear and unmistakable. There is no exception in favor of cases in which the defendant claims under the same grant, and does not contest the validity of the Spanish or Mexican title. The exemption from the bar stated in the first clause of the section is made to depend upon the fact of "claiming such real estate" under a Spanish or Mexican title, and not upon the question as to whether the defendant upon the trial shall put him to the trouble of tracing his title back to its source. It is doubtless true that the policy of the law was founded upon the extreme difficulty and great expense of proving up a Spanish title before final confirmation. And it may be that, in a particular instance arising in practice, the reason upon which the law was founded may not operate with full force; but the law deals in generalities, and cannot provide for every case that may arise. In this instance it has provided for a whole class of cases, and the distinguishing characteristics of the class is that the land is claimed under a certain kind of title. In this case the complaint alleges a title in fee simple in the ordinary general terms. The answer denies every allegation. It also sets up the Statute of Limitations in avoidance. The plaintiff replies, that he claims under a Mexican grant, and that five years have not elapsed since the final confirmation, and these are the issues presented by the pleadings. They certainly present a case within the proviso. The pleadings put the plaintiff upon proving his Spanish title. The defendant is in possession, and the plaintiff must show a title of some kind to enable him to recover. The defendant has denied generally the allegations of the complaint. He may fold his arms, and quietly rest until the plaintiff shows his title. Would any lawyer say that the plaintiff could safely rest by showing a title from Vallejo without going beyond him? He might possibly be able to show a possession in Vallejo, and thus make out a prima facie case; but then, again, he might not. But admitting that he could, would it be prudent for a plaintiff holding under a Mexican grant to risk a nonsuit by resting without connecting himself with his ultimate source of title? But it is said in this case there was a stipulation that both parties claimed under a Mexican grant. True, upon the trial this stipulation was made, and it obviated the necessity of proving what otherwise would have been necessary under the pleadings. But how can the plaintiff know in advance what stipulation the defendant may be willing to make, or upon what title he may base his defense? In every instance the defendant may, by denying the allegation of the complaint, put the plaintiff to the trouble of tracing his title to its source, and if he fails in this, subject him to the risk of a non-suit before disclosing at all the title upon which he rests his defense.

A party holding lands under a Spanish grant, knowing that a defendant could, and reasonably presuming that he would, put him to the proof of his Spanish title, might well be deterred by the well-known obstacles of litigating an unconfirmed title, from bringing suit until the title under which he claimed should be finally confirmed, and in such case the construction sought to be put upon this provision of the Act might be the means of defeating the acknowledged policy of the law. Under such a construction, a party, while waiting for the final confirmation of the title under which he claims, relying upon the proviso of section six, might defer bringing suit against the occupants of his land for a period of five years, and then, when his action is barred, learn, for the first time, that the occupants set up some shadowy claim under the same title, but sufficient to give them color, and set the statute in motion and cut off his right of action. The Legislature did not contemplate that claimants under Spanish grants should be subjected to such risks. Such a law would prove a snare rather than a protection.

If we follow the obvious import of the language of the statute, and give it the construction that the great mass of men would naturally put upon it, we shall have a simple, plain, and unchangeable rule of action, easily understood, and not liable to mislead.

But if, upon an argument, however ingenious and able, drawn from the supposed policy of the law, we attempt to engraft upon this provision an exception not clearly imported by the language of the Act itself, we shall have a rule difficult of application, and one that is liable in practice to lead to injustice and inextricable confusion.

In our opinion, then, the exemption specified in the proviso under consideration does not relate to cases merely in which the validity of the Spanish or Mexican title is the question to be litigated and determined, but that it extends to all cases in which the plaintiff claims land under such a title; that it applies to all cases in which the plaintiff is liable to be called upon to connect himself with the Spanish or Mexican Government as the source of his title, and does not depend upon the contingency as to whether or not the defendant does in fact call upon him to establish by proof a Spanish or Mexican title.

The plaintiff's right, under the statute, to maintain his action, depends upon the condition and character of his ultimate title, and not upon the volition of the defendant.

This case presents important questions not before decided by this Court. There are some technical difficulties on the face of the record in the way of rendering judgment for the defendants, if it were otherwise proper. But, independent of these considerations, we think the ends of justice, under the circumstances of this case, require that a new trial should be had. As the case goes back for a new trial, we will add the suggestion, that there is no finding of the fact that Williamson was the tenant of Hanscom—an important fact, as the pleadings stand, for the reason that Williamson did not set up the Statute of Limitations—and the findings of the jury only state that Williamson had been in adverse possession for five years. It is averred in the statement, however, that “defendants introduced evidence tending to show that defendant, Williamson, was, and that he had been for more than five years, a tenant of Hanscom.” And no testimony to the contrary appears in the statement. It is also stated that “it was admitted by the parties hereto that defendants have been in possession for five years prior to the commencement of this suit.” The jury, then, would necessarily have found these facts in the special verdict had the question been submitted to them. It is not found, however, and the general verdict is for plaintiff. The general verdict is, therefore, contrary to the evidence and stipulated facts on this point, and the special verdict fails to find one of the facts essential to control the general verdict. The argument of the case seems to have been on the hypothesis that Williamson was Hanscom's tenant.

The fact of a final confirmation of the grant is not distinctly alleged in the replication. It can only be inferred from the allegation that "five years had not elapsed since the final confirmation," etc. It would be better in such cases to allege directly either that the claim has been presented for confirmation, and the proceeding is still pending, or that the claim has been finally confirmed, stating the date of the confirmation.

We allude to these points so that the parties may, upon the next trial, avoid any occasion for taking an appeal upon technical grounds.

The judgment is reversed and a new trial ordered, with leave to either party to amend his pleading as he may be advised.

Mr. Justice CURREY, having been of counsel, did not sit in this case.

HIRAM RUSH AND E. P. HILBORN v. ANDREW P. JACKSON AND E. C. McCOMB.

LEGISLATIVE GRANT — CONSTRUCTION OF.—An Act of the Legislature granting to the parties therein named the right "to build a wharf as long as twelve hundred feet near the island in the tule in Suisun Valley, County of Solano, on the land of the State," is not void for uncertainty, but is good as a grant from the State of such rights and privileges as can be held to have passed by a fair and reasonable construction of its terms.

SAME — APPLIED TO A WHARF.—Under the terms of such a grant, the grantees therein named have a right to select any point on the slough which was near the island in the tule, in Suisun Valley, for the erection of their wharf, and to build it of any length they may elect, not exceeding twelve hundred feet.

SAME.—No obligation is imposed on the grantees, but it is left to their choice and election whether they accept the grant or build a wharf, and of what length the wharf shall be, so that it does not exceed twelve hundred feet.

SAME.—Under such a grant the grantees must, within a reasonable time, select the site of their wharf and prosecute its erection with ordinary diligence, and the extent of the grant will be determined by the length of wharf built, or amount of appropriation made within a reasonable time.

Rush et al. v. Jackson et al.

SAME.—Where the Act making such grant was passed in 1852, and in the same year the grantees selected the site for their wharf, and built it two hundred feet in length, and from that time up to 1858 made no further erection or appropriation; Held, that the grantees thereby determined their acceptance of the grant, and the extent of their acceptance, and the grant became inoperative beyond the two hundred feet appropriated.

APPEAL from the District Court, Seventh Judicial District, Solano County.

This action was commenced in March, 1861. The other facts are stated in the opinion of the Court.

Shafters & Heydenfeldt, for Appellants.

The grant was exclusive, and such rights are always protected. (Newburgh T. Co. v. Miller, 5 Johna. Oh. R. 111; Groton T. v. Ryder, 1 Johna. Oh. R. 611; Benson v. City of N. Y. 10 Barb. 228; Norris v. F. & T. Co. 6 Cal. 590.)

The grant to plaintiff became definite and complete as soon as the land was segregated by the survey. (Smith v. Waterman, 13 Cal. 373.)

The right to locate and survey was vested in the grantees, and their action in that regard must be held as effectual to confer a definitive right of property as if it was the action of the Government. (Riley v. Heisch, 18 Cal. 198.)

Crockett and Crittenden, for Respondents.

The Act of 1852, by which Moody & Hart were authorized to build the wharf, is void for uncertainty. It defines no place at which the wharf is to be built, nor prescribes any time within which it is to be commenced or finished, nor the character of the structure, nor the time for which it is to continue.

The privilege granted by the Act is not a grant of property, but a licence, and is not assignable. The plaintiffs, therefore, can claim nothing as the successors to Moody & Hart, or Wing. The permission to erect a wharf for commercial purposes was a personal license, and as such was not assignable. (Munsell v. Temple, 3 Gillman, 98; 1 Morris, 199; Cowles v. Kidder, 4

Rush et al. v. Jackson et al.

Foster N. H. 364; Monroe v. Thomas, 5 Cal. 471; Thomas v. Armstrong, 7 Cal. 287.)

The survey under which the plaintiffs claim, and which they allege was an appropriation of the twelve hundred feet, as set out in the complaint, can have no effect as an appropriation of that particular land. They might have made a new survey at any time, varying the location, or a dozen surveys, each different from the others, and each survey would have been as operative as the present one to appropriate land. The survey was a superfluous and void act, not binding on Wing or his assigns—was not required by the Act of the Legislature, and had no effect whatever on the question of appropriation.

The privilege granted to Moody & Hart, and subsequently, by the Act of 1857, to Wing, attached to no particular land until it was actually used and appropriated, and there could be no appropriation except by the erection of a wharf. (Lombard v. Cheever, 3 Gillman, 469.)

The license to Moody & Hart, or Wing, is not such a contract as binds the State not to grant a similar privilege to another in the same vicinity; and by the Act of 26th April, 1858, the right was granted to Jackson to erect a wharf on the precise ground occupied by defendants' wharf. Neither the plaintiffs nor their predecessors, at the passage of this Act, had, in any valid manner, appropriated the land covered by defendants' wharf, the survey being ineffectual for that purpose. The grant to Jackson must, therefore, prevail over that under which the plaintiffs claim. (Story on the Constitution, §1395, et seq.; Charles River Bridge v. Warren Bridge, 11 Pet. 420.)

By the Court, SANDERSON, C. J.

This is an action brought to abate a wharf erected and maintained by respondents in the tule, in Suisun Valley, near Suisun City, Solano County, upon the ground that the same is a nuisance, and an obstruction to the free use and enjoyment by appellants of certain wharf rights and privileges claimed by them.

When the case was called for trial in the Court below, the defendants moved for judgment of nonsuit upon the pleadings, consisting of the complaint, answer, and replication. The motion was granted by the Court, and judgment rendered accordingly, from which plaintiffs appeal. The question to be determined is whether upon all the facts stated in the complaint, and those stated in the answer and not denied in the replication, the plaintiffs have any cause of action against the defendants. It appears from the pleadings that in 1852 an Act was passed by the Legislature purporting to grant to William Moody and Morgan Hart certain "wharf privileges near the island in the tule, in Suisun Valley, County of Solano, on the land of the State." The Act in question is worded as follows, to wit:

"SECTION 1. It shall be and is hereby made lawful for William Moody and Morgan Hart to build a wharf, as long as twelve hundred feet, near the island in the tule, in Suisun Valley, County of Solano, on the land of the State.

"SEC. 2. The State hereby grants to the said William Moody and Morgan Hart the use of the overflowed and tule land on both sides of said wharf for the distance of one hundred feet from each side of it, for twenty-five years from the passage of this Act; provided, that the navigation of the slough upon which it is built is not obstructed by said wharf."

This Act was passed on the 3d day of May, 1852. On the 1st day of July, 1852, one Josiah Wing, claiming to be interested with Moody & Hart in the franchise granted by said Act, erected a wharf between the west bank of the slough and island mentioned in said Act, but this wharf was less than two hundred feet in length. On the 15th day of September, 1852, Moody & Hart conveyed by deed, to Wing, an undivided third interest in said franchise; and on the same day Hart in like manner conveyed his remaining interest to Wing, who thereby, as is claimed by plaintiffs, became vested with an undivided two thirds interest in said franchise. On the 24th of February,

Rush et al. v. Jackson et al.

1853, the Legislature amended the first section of the Act above quoted by striking out "twelve" and inserting "two," making it read "as long as two hundred feet," instead of twelve hundred. (Statutes of 1853, p. 30.) In February, 1855, Wing caused a survey to be made of twelve hundred feet in length, running along the bank of the slough, and embracing at its northern end the wharf erected by him in 1852. This survey was recorded in the Recorder's office of Solano County, and a copy is annexed to and made a part of the complaint. The land embraced in the survey was swamp and overflowed land, belonging to the State, and in December of the same year was patented to the defendant Jackson. On the 25th of April, 1857, the Legislature passed an Act extending and confirming to Wing the rights and privileges granted to Moody & Hart by the Act of the 3d of May, 1852, "with the same force and taking effect from the same time as if they had been granted to the said Josiah Wing instead of the said Moody & Hart, on the 3d day of May, 1852." (Statutes 1857, p. 249.) This Act makes no mention of the amendatory Act of 1852, reducing the length of the wharf from twelve hundred to two hundred feet; but in 1858 another Act amendatory thereof was passed, reviving the limitation of the Act of 1853 respecting the length of the wharf. (Statutes of 1858, p. 74.) In 1858 an Act was passed by the Legislature authorizing and empowering the defendant Jackson to erect a wharf on the slough, at a certain point commencing at the southern extremity of the twelve hundred feet embraced in Wing's survey. Pursuant to the provisions of said Act, a wharf two hundred feet in length was built by Jackson at the point designated. The plaintiffs' and defendants' wharves are separated by a space of eight hundred feet. The plaintiffs claim to have succeeded to all the rights of Wing to the franchise and wharf by a series of mesne conveyances, but do not aver that it is now or ever was their intention to extend the wharf over the whole twelve hundred feet embraced in Wing's survey, nor that the defendants have in any manner prevented them from doing so. They simply aver that the defendants have erected, without their license or consent, a wharf two hundred feet long on the southern extremity of Wing's survey, and that it seriously impairs the value of their franchise.

Under the view which we have taken of this case, it becomes unnecessary to decide many of the points which have been made and ably argued by counsel. For the purposes of our decision, we shall assume that the Act of 1852, by which Moody & Hart were authorized to build a wharf "near the island in the tule, in Suisun Valley," is not void for uncertainty, (of which we have serious doubts, however,) but, on the contrary, is good as a grant by the State to them of such rights and privileges as can be held to have passed by a fair and reasonable construction of its terms. We shall also assume that Wing, although not named in the Act, was interested with Moody & Hart in the easement thereby created, and built the wharf now claimed by the plaintiffs in this action, in acceptance of the grant, and for the purpose of securing to himself and his co-grantees the benefits thereof. We shall also assume that the plaintiffs have acquired and become vested with all the rights and privileges of Moody & Hart, granted to them by the Act in question, and are entitled to the same protection which would be accorded to Moody & Hart, were they still the owners of the franchise, and invoking the aid of the Court. We shall also disregard the Act of 1853, reducing the length of the wharf from twelve to two hundred feet; the Act of 1857, extending the right of Moody & Hart, acquired under the former Act, to Wing; and the Act of 1858, revising, as to Wing, the limitations imposed upon the Act of 1852 by that of 1853, as having no material relation to the grounds upon which our conclusion is based. The case is thus placed upon grounds most favorable to the plaintiffs, and made to depend for its solution upon the construction to be given to the Act of 1852, in ascertaining the nature and extent of the rights and privileges thereby conferred upon Moody & Hart, and by them secured through their acts of acceptance.

Hart to erect a wharf "near the island in the tule, in Suisun Valley," but designates no particular locality further than the term wharf itself imports. The second section, however, contains a proviso to the effect that the navigation of the slough upon which it is built shall not be obstructed by the wharf. This proviso, together with the meaning and import of the word "wharf," limits the more general description of locality contained in the first section, and restricts the location of the wharf to some point on the slough which is near the island. From the terms of the grant no more definite locality for the erection of the wharf can be fixed. The wharf which Moody & Hart are thus granted the right to erect, is described in no manner or respect except that it shall not exceed twelve hundred feet in length; but in what direction or upon what line that length is to be extended; whether along the bank and parallel with the slough, or obliquely, or at right angles, is not stated in terms. But the second section "grants the use of the tule and overflowed land on both sides of the wharf, for the distance of one hundred feet from each side of it." This language seems to indicate that, in the understanding of the granting power, the length of the wharf was to be extended at right angles, or nearly so, to the slough, and not along its bank. If the length of the wharf was not to be extended along the bank, we are unable to ascertain from the record or the briefs of counsel how there can be any tule or overflowed land on the side next the slough to grant, or if so, how there could be any occasion or necessity for a grant of its use in specific terms, since the grant of the right to erect the wharf carried with it the unobstructed use of its frontage. "A wharf is a perpendicular bank or mound of timber or stone and earth, raised on the shore of a harbor, river, canal, etc., or extending some distance into the water, for the convenience of lading or unlading ships and other vessels." Necessarily, therefore, the wharf was to be built upon the bank, at the water's edge, or extending into the water far enough to be accessible to vessels navigating the slough. Hence, the grant of the tule or overflowed land, for one hundred feet in front of the wharf, or upon the side next the slough, is absurd and meaningless. Nor, for like reasons, was there any necessity for a grant of the use of the land upon the opposite side, (assuming the length of the wharf to be along the bank,) for the grant of the right to erect the wharf would carry with it the use of land in its rear sufficient for its convenient enjoyment and use for commercial purposes. There is no utility apparent in the grant of the land upon both sides of the wharf upon any other theory than that it was to be built at right angles to the slough, or nearly so. Upon the latter theory, the utility of the grant is manifest. It affords ready and unobstructed access to the wharf for vessels navigating the slough, and confers an exclusive right to the extent of one hundred feet upon each side of it.

If this construction of the Act of 1852 be correct—and we are inclined to the opinion that it is—it follows that the defendants' wharf, being about eight hundred feet distant from that of the plaintiffs, is not within the limits granted to Moody & Hart, and by them segregated through the appropriation of Wing in 1852, and that the rights and privileges of the plaintiffs have not been intruded upon.

But it is not necessary to rest the decision of the case solely upon the foregoing construction of the Act of 1852. Assuming that the theory of the plaintiffs is correct, and that under the terms of the grant Moody & Hart had the election of the line upon which the length of the wharf was to be extended, and could lawfully extend it along the bank of the slough, or at right angles, or obliquely thereto, we still think the judgment of the Court below was correct.

Under the terms of the grant, Moody & Hart were allowed to select any point on the slough which was near the island in the tule, in Suisun Valley, for the erection of their wharf, and were allowed to build it of any length they might elect, not exceeding twelve hundred feet. No obligation is imposed upon them to build a wharf twelve hundred feet long, nor of any other determinate length, nor any wharf whatever. Except as to the limitation of twelve hundred feet, the extent of the grant, with regard to the length of the wharf, is indeterminate, and designedly left to the choice and election of the grantees. They had the right, therefore, when they determined to accept the grant, to determine also its extent, and say whether the wharf should be twelve hundred feet in length or any number less than that. The Act provides no mode or manner by which the grantees are to signify their acceptance of the franchise, or the extent of that acceptance, and in the absence of such a provision we know of no way in which they could do so, except by selecting within a reasonable time the site of their wharf, and prosecuting its erection with ordinary diligence, and determining the extent of the grant as accepted by them by the extent of their appropriation. On the first day of July, 1852, within a reasonable time after the passage of the Act, the grantees selected a site for a wharf, and built one not exceeding two hundred feet in length, and from that time to the present no further appropriation has been made, nor is there even an averment in the complaint that they now desire or intend to extend their wharf, or that the same is demanded by the wants of commerce. In this manner they signified their acceptance of the grant and the extent of that acceptance. Thereby they determined, as they had the right to do within the limitations imposed by the Act, the site and length of the wharf. By these acts all the conditions of the grant which were left for them to determine became fixed, and the Act was made operative as a grant to the extent of their appropriation, and no further. By the erection of the wharf, the land covered by it and within one hundred feet on each side became segregated from the other land of the State, and to it the grant attached, and passed the estate therein specified. All the land outside of the boundaries thus established remained the property of the State as absolutely as before the passage of the Act, and the subsequent grant to the defendant, Jackson, and his wharf, erected in acceptance thereof, in no way infringes upon the rights and privileges acquired by Moody & Hart.

Judgment affirmed.

Fogarty v. Kelly et al.

Mr. Justice CURREY and Mr. Justice SHAFER, having respectively been of counsel, did not sit upon the trial of this case.

PATRICK FOGARTY v. RICHARD KELLY, AMOS McDONALD, JOHN WISE, AND WILLIAM McCLENNAN.

FORCIBLE DETAINER — WHAT CONSTITUTES.— A naked avowal of an intention to keep possession, and actually keeping possession, do not necessarily constitute such force, or threat of force, as to render a detainer forcible, where there has been an unlawful entry, unless such an avowal is made in answer to a demand for possession by the party claiming to have been ousted, and is accompanied by some act or word of the party making the unlawful entry showing an intent on his part to maintain the possession by force.

SAME — INSTRUCTIONS TO JURY.— F. brought an action against K. for an unlawful entry and forcible detainer. F. did not reside on the premises, and his only possession consisted in an inclosure and cultivation. K. went within the inclosure in the night time, erected a cabin, and, at some subsequent period of time, declared he would keep possession by force. The Court instructed the jury that if they found "that the defendant entered upon the premises in the night time, during the hours of sleep, while plaintiff was in the actual and peaceable possession of the same, and that he took possession and avowed the intention to keep possession, and actually did keep possession, it was sufficient evidence of force to maintain the action of forcible entry and detainer, and the jury should find for the plaintiff." Held, that the instruction was erroneous, as applied to the testimony of this case, because that portion of it relating to K.'s intention to keep possession made no reference to any demand on the part of F. for possession, and because the instruction was framed as though it related to a question of forcible entry, and not forcible detainer.

The case of Scarlett v. Lamorque, 5 Cal. 63, commented on and explained.

APPEAL from the County Court of Napa County.

Plaintiff recovered judgment in the County Court, and defendants appealed.

The other facts are stated in the opinion of the Court.

Moore & Laine, for Appellants.

The instruction of the Court does not apply to the case at bar, as plaintiff sues for an unlawful entry and forcible detainer, and not a forcible entry and detainer, as this instruction contemplates.

Fogarty v. Kelly et al.

Said instruction is against law, for if forcible entry is relied on, it must be proved. (Preston v. Kehoe, 15 Cal. 318.)

A. A. Cohen and Wallace & Rayle, for Respondents.

By the Court, SAWYER, J.

This is an action under the "Act concerning Forcible Entries and Unlawful Detainers."

The premises in controversy are three hundred and odd acres of agricultural lands in Napa County—the north half of a larger tract of upwards of six hundred acres. The whole tract has a fence on three sides, and Napa Creek on the fourth side, forming an inclosure of the entire tract. The plaintiff, Fogarty, claims the north half, being the premises in dispute, and James Glassford the south half. Part of the way between Fogarty and Glassford there is a division fence, and part of the way a furrow. Fogarty appears, from the testimony, to have cultivated the premises for three years. At the time of the alleged entry there was a volunteer crop growing on the premises. It does not appear that Fogarty resided or had any building on the land in dispute. Glassford testified that on the morning of the 5th of June, between four and five o'clock, he saw two cabins of the defendants on the half belonging to Fogarty; that he heard the sound of hammers, and went up to the stable loft and saw the cabins; that he afterwards informed Fogarty that the cabins were there. This is the only testimony as to the original entry. There was testimony tending to show that defendants, at some subsequent time, avowed an intention to keep possession, and that they actually did remain in possession. There was also evidence tending to show that they intended to maintain their possession by force if necessary.

On this state of the evidence, the Court, at the request of the plaintiff, and under exception on the part of the defendants, gave the following instruction, viz: "If the jury find that the defendants entered upon the premises in the night time, during the hours of sleep, while plaintiff was in the actual and peaceable possession of the same, and that they took possession and avowed the intention to keep possession, and actually do keep possession, it is sufficient evidence of force to maintain the action of forcible entry and detainer, and the jury should find for the plaintiff." The giving of this instruction is assigned as error.

The instruction, in the form given, is liable to mislead a jury. It is altogether too loose in its terms, when considered in connection with the testimony in the case. A naked avowal of intention to keep possession, and actually keeping possession, do not, necessarily, amount to force, or a threat of force. Such avowal should have some relation to a demand of the possession by the party claiming to have been ousted, and it should, at least, be accompanied by some act or word tending to show an intent to maintain the possession by force, and these qualifications should be embraced in the instructions. The plaintiff relies upon the case of Scarlett v. Lamarque, 5 Cal. 63, to support this instruction. The language of the Court in that case is very similar to that in this instruction; but it is applied to an entirely different state of facts, as shown by the record, although it does not appear in the published report of the case. Scarlett was in possession of a quartz mill, under a lease; the mill had been run until one or two o'clock in the morning, when the employés of the plaintiff closed up and retired to rest in the mill. Before daylight, and while the hands were actually sleeping in the mill, and the products of the last day's work were still in the amalgamating tubs, the defendants — some five or six in number — entered the mill, took possession, commenced tearing down the stamps under pretense of making repairs, and retained possession against the repeated demands and protest of the plaintiff and his employés. On this state of proofs, the Court, at the close of plaintiff's testimony, on defendant's motion, granted a nonsuit, and plaintiff appealed. The question was whether there was sufficient testimony to entitle the plaintiff to have his case submitted to the jury. The late Supreme Court held that there was, reversed the judgment, and remanded the cause. In deciding the case, the Court said:

“ When a party of four or five men enter a building occupied by another, in the night time, during the hours of sleep, and take possession, and avow the intention to keep possession, and actually do keep possession, it is sufficient evidence of force to maintain the action of forcible entry and detainer.”

This may have been proper, when applied to that particular case, with reference to the question then before the Court as to the propriety of granting the nonsuit. But when used in an instruction given to a jury, in a case where the entry is upon a tract of three hundred acres of land having only a volunteer crop growing on it, and the only evidence of present possession, in addition to the inclosure, is the fact that it had before been cultivated by the plaintiff, we think the language requires, at least, the qualifications before suggested. Besides, in the case cited the question was as to whether or not the original entry was forcible, and the language used was not in an instruction to a jury, but a general expression in relation to the point then under discussion.

The present action is brought on the theory that the action may be maintained where there is an unlawful entry without force, and a subsequent forcible detainer. There is no pretense that the entry was forcible; the complaint does not charge a forcible entry; it charges only an unlawful entry and a forcible detainer. The instructions should have been pointed at the unlawful entry and the subsequent forcible detainer, and the two ideas should have been kept separate and distinct. But the instruction is framed as though it related to the question of force at the time of the entry, when, in fact, the transactions referred to in the commencement of the instruction, and those referred to in the latter part of it, were totally distinct, and occurred at different times. An entry by a number of men in the night time might have a tendency to prove it to be in bad faith and unlawful, but it would have little tendency to prove a detainer at some subsequent period of time to be forcible. Admitting, then, that such an entry is proved to be unlawful, we come to the other element in the action, as alleged: Was there a forcible detainer? The only part of the instruction directly applicable to this point, under the testimony, is the naked statement that "if the defendants avow an intention to keep possession, and actually do keep possession, it is sufficient evidence of force to maintain the action." This cannot be true as a legal proposition. This instruction, taken in connection with the testimony in the case, combines principles applicable to the different elements of the cause of action—the unlawful entry, and a subsequent forcible detainer—as though they applied to a single and different ground of action, viz: a forcible entry, and thereby it leads to uncertainty and confusion. The instruction, therefore, lacks that precision necessary to keep these different elements separate and distinct, and to present the law clearly to the minds of the jury.

This action is highly penal in its character, and Courts, in such cases, should be careful in giving instructions to see that the proposition is expressed in such terms and with such qualifications as not to be liable to mislead the jury. In this case the Court was undoubtedly misled by not having before it the facts upon which the opinion of the Court in the case cited was based.

We are not prepared to say that there was not, in this case, sufficient evidence of an unlawful entry, within the meaning of the Forcible Entry and Detainer Act, as uniformly construed by our predecessors, and a sufficient manifestation of an intent to detain the premises by force, to entitle the plaintiff to recover, had there been no error in the instructions. But this would have been a question for the jury under a proper charge from the Court, and we cannot tell how far they may have been misled by the objectionable instruction under consideration.

The judgment is reversed and a new trial ordered.

Mr. Justice CURREY, having been of counsel, did not sit on the hearing of this case.

Ashley v. Vischer.

DELOS R. ASHLEY, ADMINISTRATOR OF THE ESTATE OF JOHN MORRISON, DECEASED, v. EDWARD VISCHER.

RECEIPT FOR MONEY.— A mere naked receipt in writing, acknowledging the delivery of money, is not a contract, and does not import a promise, obligation, or liability, and an action upon it is therefore barred by the Statute of Limitations in two years.

RECEIPT WHEN A CONTRACT.— A receipt or acknowledgment in writing for money, which also contains a clause stating that the money received is to be applied to the account of the person from whom received, partakes of the double nature of a receipt and contract, and shows upon its face a liability to account, and an action upon it is not barred by the Statute of Limitations until four years have expired.

APPEAL from the District Court, Twelfth Judicial District, City and County of San Francisco.

This action was commenced on the 23d day of February, 1859.

The other facts are stated in the opinion of the Court.

Henry H. Haight, for Plaintiff and Appellant.

"Received of John Morrison, Esq., the sum of two thousand seven hundred and fifty dollars.

"San Francisco, February 24th, 1855.

EDWARD VISCHER."

Is this receipt an instrument in writing within the meaning of this section? It is granted that it is not a contract perfect in every term; but perfect contracts are not the only ones comprehended within the letter of the statute. Were it so, many of the most sacredly and formally executed documents would be excluded from the statute, because parol evidence is admitted in Courts daily for the purpose of explaining defective and ambiguous provisions.

What, then, is a sufficient instrument of writing within the Statute of Limitations? Any document which affords the evidence in writing of the essentials of the contract; any written evidence which "instructs" the mind as to the limit of the liability and the party liable. That this is a correct definition is proved by the meaning given to it in the Statute of Frauds.

Ashley v. Fletcher.

"A contract, or some note or memorandum thereof in writing, expressing the consideration, and subscribed by the party to be charged," is declared to be an instrument of writing. (Compare the 8th and 9th sections, Arts. 396 and 397 Wood's Dig.; also the 12th, 13th and 19th sections, Arts. 400, 401, and 407.)

This instrument is, in its terms, defective in but one particular. No express promise is apparent on its face. In everything else—in date, amount, party from whom the money was received, and the signature of the party receiving—the contract is complete. But in this one particular, nothing on the face of the contract expresses the liability. That liability, I contend, is not essentially necessary to appear in terms, but may be implied by law. Is the paper less an instrument because defective in this particular? Where a man receives another's money, the law implies an agreement to repay it. That which is implied by law is unnecessary to appear expressly, and the instrument, linked with the implication of law, completes the contract.

It cannot be objected that this paper negatives the idea of liability on its face, by manifesting that the money might have been received in payment of a pre-existing debt. It is not such a receipt. It has not the universal characteristics of such a receipt—the evidence of the debt to which the payment is to be applied, or the degree of liquidation of that debt. It neither expresses that the money was received "on account" nor "in full," which is always incorporated with every business receipt. It stands before the Court as a naked acknowledgment of a receipt of money, and the law will imply a liability to repay that money.

Sidney L. Johnson, for Defendant and Appellant.

There is nothing in the receipts themselves which can be said to be a foundation for an action in these terms, or in any form of assumpsit. There is neither promise to pay, nor acknowledgment of indebtedness.

The money given might have been in discharge, total or partial, of a debt of Morrison to defendant; the money that might be collected from the checks, and was to be carried to Morrison's account, might be more than overbalanced by other items of the other side.

The receipt of money by the defendant in a check drawn by the plaintiff on his banker, prima facie imports a payment, and not a loan. (Cary v. Gerriah, 4 Esp. N. P. O. 9; 1 Stevens' Nisi Prius, 316.

The written proof of the receipt of money can raise no other presumption than the parol proof. By itself it is no evidence to establish a debt. No action can be said to be founded on that which does not by itself, prima facie, establish a right of action.

The counsel for plaintiff speaks of the receipt as a contract. On this point we refer to 1 Greenl., Sec. 305; Hawley et al. v. Bader et als., 15 Cal. 44, 46; 2 Pars. on Cont. 68; Brannan v. Mesick, 10 Cal. 108. The first receipt is a bare statement of a fact, that so much money was received by one person from another. The second writing differs in form, but amounts to the same thing so far as this action is concerned. Certain checks are to be converted into cash and applied to the account of John Morrison. It is merely saying that John Morrison is the one whose account is to be credited with the proceeds of the depreciated paper. No light whatever is thrown by this upon the state of the account upon the question of indebtedness. The presumption would be against John Morrison. Why give depreciated paper to be converted into cash at the best possible rate and applied to another's account, unless for the sake of covering or diminishing an unfavorable balance?

It is argued that because no expressions are used, such as "on account," or "in full," by which these receipts would have been conclusive in our favor, they are therefore conclusive against us. But the plaintiff has to make out an action against us founded on an instrument in writing, not we to make out a defense in writing; and the question is, whether either of these writings is in itself such an instrument, not whether it proves the original absence of any cause of action against us.

By the Court, SAWYER, J.

The question in this case is, whether, under the Statute of Limitations, the two causes of action set out in the complaint are barred in two or four years. The following are the instruments to be construed:

"Received of John Morrison, Esq., the sum of two thousand seven hundred and fifty dollars. San Francisco, February 24, 1855.

"($2,750.)

EDWARD VISCHER."

"This is to state that I am holder of three checks on Page, Bacon & Co., (viz: $380.70, $514.40, $227.44,) amounting to eleven hundred and twenty-two dollars and sixty-three cents, to be converted into cash as best possible, and to be applied to the account of John Morrison. San Francisco, February 24, 1855.

"($1,122.63.)

EDWARD VISCHER."

The Court below held that an action to recover the money referred to in the first instrument was barred in two years; in the last, not till four years; and, accordingly, entered judgment in favor of defendant on the first, and against him on the second. Both parties have appealed.

A party may commence "within four years, an action upon any contract, obligation, or liability, founded upon an instrument in writing." * * * "Within two years, an action upon a contract, obligation, or liability, not founded upon an instrument in writing, except an action on an open account for goods, wares, and merchandise, and an action for any article charged in a store account." (Wood's Dig. p. 47, Sec. 17.)

The first instrument is a receipt for a specified sum of money—a mere naked acknowledgment that so much money had been received. There is no contract connected with it—no promise or undertaking in regard to it. It is a mere naked acknowledgment, without any intimation as to the character in which the money was received, or of any intention or purpose with respect to its future disposition. It does not appear to whom the money belonged. As an instrument of evidence, a mere receipt is governed by rules different from those applicable to other writings expressing contracts or obligations; and this fact serves to illustrate the character of the instrument under consideration. As an acknowledgment of payment or delivery, it would be merely prima facie evidence of the fact, and not conclusive. The fact it recites might, therefore, be contradicted by other evidence. A receipt may have connected with it—embodied in the same instrument—a contract to do something else; and in that case it would possess a double character. As a receipt it might be contradicted; while as a contract it would stand on the footing of all other contracts in writing, and could not be contradicted or varied by oral testimony. (1 Greenl. Ev., Sec. 305.) And the reason why a different rule of evidence is applied to a mere receipt seems to be because it is not in any sense a contract, as it does not express or import a promise, obligation, or liability. It is an admission, only, upon which other parties do not ordinarily act, and are not liable to act to their prejudice. (Id., Sec. 212; 1 Phil. Ev. 474, Note 131.)

Professor Parsons says: "A receipt for money is peculiarly open to evidence. It is only prima facie evidence either that the sum stated has been paid, or that any sum whatever was paid. It is, in fact, not regarded as a contract, and hardly as an instrument at all, and has but little more force than the oral admissions of the party receiving. But this is true only of a simple receipt. It often happens that a paper which contains a receipt, or recites the receiving of money or of goods, contains also terms, conditions, agreements, or assignments. Such an instrument, as to everything but the receipt, is no more to be affected by extrinsic evidence than if it did not contain the receipt; but, as to the receipt itself, it may be varied or contradicted by extrinsic testimony, in the same manner as if it contained nothing else." (2 Para. Cont. 68.)

Ashley v. Vischer.

In the instrument under consideration no promise or obligation is expressed. Unless a promise or obligation is implied by law from the mere acknowledgment of the receipt of the money, no liability is imported on the face of the instrument.

Mr. Phillips, in his work on Evidence, Vol. 3, p. 426, edition of 1859, says: "In order to recover under a count for money lent, it will not be sufficient merely to prove the receipt of money from the plaintiff by the defendant, since the presumption of law is that money, when paid, is in liquidation of an antecedent debt." And several authorities are cited where money had been paid on checks. (See also Headley v. Reed, 2 Cal. 325; 1 Greenl. Ev., Sec. 38, and cases cited.) The principle applicable to checks is the same as in this case, for it matters not whether the evidence is a check or a written acknowledgment of the receipt of the money, so long as the evidence only extends to the fact of the receipt of money from one party by another.

All this instrument shows is the receipt of money from Morrison by the defendant—precisely what is stated in the rule as laid down by the authorities cited. Under this rule, (and we think it is correct,) no promise or obligation is imported by the instrument. No liability can fairly be implied from its terms. If there was any contract, or promise, or liability, it arises from facts entirely outside of this receipt. By itself it is not evidence of a debt. It does not acknowledge or state a fact from which the law implies an obligation, and we do not think that a liability can be said to be "founded upon an instrument of writing," from the terms of which the law does not, prima facie, imply any liability whatever. The first cause of action is, therefore, subject to the two years' limitation, and is barred.

Second—The second instrument contains these words: "To be converted into cash as best possible, and to be applied to the account of John Morrison." This, in our opinion, goes beyond the mere acknowledgment of the receipt of money. It indicates to whom the money belongs, and contains a promise to apply it to the account of John Morrison. It is true, the instrument does not state the condition of that account—whether Morrison is already indebted to defendant or not, or, if so, to what amount. But whatever the state of the account between them may be, the fair construction of the instrument is that it was Morrison's money, and that Vischer was to account to him for it. The instrument shows upon its face a liability to account, and this action seeks to enforce that liability.

In the case of Sannickson v. Brown, 5 Cal. 57, a number of accounts for labor and services, and for goods and materials furnished for the use of defendants, under the name of the "Laura Virginia Association," had been presented to the Board of Trustees, and allowed. The Board had written thereon the words "audited and approved," and "we certify the above to be correct." The Court held that these accounts, thus indorsed, constituted instruments of writing within the meaning of the statute.

So in Neighbors v. Simmons, 2 Blackf. 75, an account had been presented against the defendant, upon which he had indorsed these words: "I acknowledge this account to be just," and appended his signature. This was held to be an instrument in writing within the meaning of the Statute of Limitations of Indiana.

In Raymond v. Simonson, 4 Black. 85, the Court say: "This suit is bottomed on written receipts. These receipts are very special; they clearly show the trust and acknowledge the claim; they distinctly state that he, John H. Rackafellow, the guardian, received the several sums of money of the said administrator, Kizer, for the use of Joseph Russell, as guardian for said Joseph, etc. These receipts are, without controversy, instruments of writing within the saving clause of the statute." The receipts were signed by the defendant.

In these cases there was no express promise to pay—no obligation in express terms assumed; but in each there was a state of facts acknowledged in writing to exist, which imported an obligation to pay—from which the law itself implied a liability, and they were held to be instruments in writing within the meaning of the respective Statutes of Limitations under which they arose.

In our judgment, the instrument under consideration presents quite as strong a case as those just cited. It partakes of the double character of a receipt and contract. The defendant expressly undertakes to apply the proceeds to the account of John Morrison; and although the state of the account between the parties is not shown, yet the instrument does show that the money belonged to Morrison, and that defendant was liable to account to him for it.

The state of the accounts would have to be adjusted on the trial; but a liability to account is shown — and, in our judgment, the liability is founded upon an instrument in writing within the meaning of the Act, and the action was not barred till four years had expired. The record shows that the whole amount was, in fact, due from the defendant to the estate of Morrison.

The judgment is therefore affirmed — each party to pay one half the costs.

Z. W. KEYES v. D. FENSTERMAKER AND COREL HOWK.

NOTE — WHEN PAYABLE. — When no day or time of payment is specified in a promissory note, it is to be considered as payable on demand.

INDORSER — LIABILITY OF. — In order to charge an indorser of a note payable on demand, presentment must be made within a reasonable time, and what is a reasonable time depends upon the facts of each particular case.

INDORSER — CONTRACT OF. — The contract of the indorser of such note is, that the maker will pay the note upon a demand made within a reasonable time, and that in the event of his failure to do so the indorser will pay it.

INDORSER — PROOF NECESSARY TO CHARGE. — In order to charge the indorser of such note, the burden is cast upon the holder of proving that the demand of payment was made within a reasonable time, and if any delay has occurred in making the demand, the holder must prove the circumstances excusing the delay.

INDORSER — NOTICE TO. — When demand of the payment of such note is made upon the maker, and the note is dishonored, notice of demand and non-payment must be given to the indorser within the same time which is required in the case of a note or bill made payable at a particular day.

SAME. — At common law, notice of dishonor must be given the indorser on the day following the demand, unless some good reason exists for not doing so.

Kaye v. Fenstermaker et al.

PROMISE BY INDORSER TO PAY.—A promise to pay a note, made by an indorser after its maturity, where no demand has been made or notice given, and made with full knowledge of the holder's laches, is binding upon the indorser, but this promise must be established by clear and distinct evidence.

APPEAL from the District Court, Seventeenth Judicial District, Sierra County.

The following is a copy of the note sued on:

“SIERRA VALLEY, June 3d, 1862.

“For value received, I promise to pay Corel Howk or order, the sum of ($487) four hundred and eighty-seven dollars, with two per cent interest per month till paid.

“D. FENSTERMAKER.

“(Indorsed:) COREL HOWK.”

The other facts are stated in the opinion of the Court.

Williams & Johnson, for Appellant.

It has been holden that the indorser of a note, after maturity, stands in the position of a new maker, or as the drawer of a bill on a man without funds; in neither case is a demand or notice necessary. (Gray v. Bell, 3 Rich. 71; Bank of North America v. Barriese, 1 Yates, 360.)

The great weight of authorities declare that the same strictness as to notice which apply to indorsers of notes before maturity, do not apply to indorsers of notes after maturity. (McKinney v. Crawford, 8 S. & R. 351; Hill v. Smith, 1 Bay, 330; Brock v. Thompson, 1 Bailey, 322.)

It is now well settled that no precise time can be laid down by the Courts in which due diligence may be exercised; it is also settled that as cases vary, so must the rules vary as to diligence in giving notice.

If Howk understood his liability, or want of liability, and still promised to pay plaintiff in August, he cannot claim that no demand and notice had been given; he cannot claim that as a defense. (See Parsons on Notes and Bills, Vol. 1, p. 595, et seq., and the numerous cases there cited.)

Keyes v. Fenstermaker et al.

There is no lack of authorities upon the point that no legal demand and notice had been given, and Howk, knowing these facts, still promised to pay — that he is liable on the note, and cannot hold us to the proof of demand and notice, as they are immaterial questions, not bearing on our right to recover.

Then we will assume that if the promise was made, plaintiff made out his case, and should not have been nonsuited.

That Howk did promise to pay, is settled by Parsons on Notes and Bills, 596, and cases cited. The rule laid down by the author just cited, and the cases he cites, are conclusive that the promise was made, and that no demand and notice need be proven.

Vanclief & Bowers, for Respondent.

By the Court, SANDERSON, C. J.

This is an action upon a promissory note against the defendant Fenstermaker, as maker, and the defendant Howk, as indorser. The note is dated on the 3d day of January, 1862, and specifies no day or time of payment. It was indorsed in blank by Howk, on the 24th or 25th of April, 1862, and delivered by him to one Bartholemew, who, on the same day, transferred it by delivery to the plaintiff. Some time during the first week in May, 1862, the plaintiff demanded payment of Fenstermaker, who failed "to make payment," and, some time in the forepart of August, 1862, gave Howk notice of the demand and non-payment. At the time this notice was given, Howk told the plaintiff "that he did not want him to sue, and if he felt like doing so he would rather pay it, as he did not want to pay costs." Upon this state of facts the Court below rendered a judgment of nonsuit as to defendant Howk, from which the plaintiff appeals to this Court.

Two questions are presented:

First — As to the sufficiency of the demand and notice; and,
Second — As to the waiver of demand and notice.

No day or time of payment being specified in the note, it is to be considered as payable on demand, and so far as the liability of the indorser is concerned, is governed by the same rules as a note in terms so payable. In order to charge an indorser of a note payable on demand, presentment must be made within a reasonable time. What is a reasonable time, must, of necessity, depend in a great measure upon the facts of each particular case, and cannot be determined by any fixed rules of law. In the present case the demand was made in about two weeks after the note came into the hands of the plaintiff. The precise time cannot be determined from the record. No reason is shown why the demand was not made sooner, and, in the absence of any reason justifying it, we are inclined to think that a delay of two weeks is unreasonable. If the holder and maker reside in the same city or neighborhood, the demand, in the absence of sickness or other accident, should be made in less time; but, if they reside at a distance, or the holder is prevented by sickness or other accident from making presentment, two weeks, and even a much longer time, might not be unreasonable. The most that can be said upon the subject is, that the contract of the indorser is to the effect that the maker will pay the note on demand made within a reasonable time, and that in the event of his failure so to do, he will pay it himself; and, in order to charge the indorser, the holder must show reasonable diligence, under the circumstances of the case, in making demand of payment. The burden of proving such diligence rests upon the holder, and circumstances excusing a delay, which is prima facie unreasonable, must be established by him. But whether the demand, in the present case, was made with sufficient diligence or not, it is not material to decide; for, supposing it to have been so, it is clear that no notice of the dishonor, sufficient to charge Hawk as indorser, was given. The note, as we have already seen, is to be considered as payable at sight, or on demand, and although a reasonable time is allowed the holder in such cases within which to make demand of payment, yet, when the demand is made, and the note dishonored, the same notice of non-payment must be given which is required in the case of a note or bill made payable at a particular day. The contract and liability of the indorser is no greater in the former than in the latter case. Upon principle, his liability rests upon the same conditions in the one case as in the other. The importance to the indorser of immediate notice of non-payment, that he may take measures for his own protection, is equal in both cases. It is a settled principle of commercial law that notice of dishonor must be forwarded on the following day, where no sufficient reason exists for the omission to do so. In the present case the notice was not given until at least three months after the demand, and no reason for this delay is attempted to be shown, other than that of distance, which was only thirty miles, and could certainly have been travelled in much less time by the holder, or a messenger, admitting there were no other means of communication. The notice being insufficient to charge Howk as an indorser, it only remains to determine whether the laches of the plaintiff in that respect were waived by Howk.

Keyes v. Fenstermaker et al.

It is well settled in England and in the United States that a promise to pay by an indorser, made after maturity, and where no demand has been made, or notice given, and made with full knowledge of the holder's laches, is binding upon him, and entirely cures any negligence on the part of the holder in making demand or in giving notice of dishonor. (1 Parsons on Notes and Bills, 596.) But the promise to pay must be established by clear and distinct evidence. The testimony in this case falls short, in our judgment, of establishing such a promise on the part of Howk. All he said, in substance, was that he had rather pay the note than be sued.

This was the expression of a wholesome dread of a lawsuit, rather than a promise to pay the note, notwithstanding the laches of the plaintiff.

The judgment is affirmed.

Sacramento, Placer, and Nevada Railroad Co. v. Harlan.

SACRAMENTO, PLACER, AND NEVADA RAILROAD COMPANY v. C. T. HARLAN.

ERROR—WRIT OF.—A writ of error does not lie in any case where an appeal is given to the Supreme Court by statute.

SAME—WHEN LIES.—In a proceeding to condemn land for railroad purposes, the decision of the Court by which the merits of the matter are finally determined is a final judgment rendered in a special proceeding, from which an appeal may be taken, and cannot, therefore, be reviewed by a writ of error.

WRIT OF ERROR to the District Court, Eleventh Judicial District, Placer County.

On the 27th of August, 1862, the Sacramento, Placer, and Nevada Railroad Company petitioned the District Court, setting forth the necessity of a right of way over the defendant's land for its railroad, and asking for the appointment of commissioners to appraise the damages, etc. The usual proceedings were had, and commissioners were appointed, who reported to the Court that the value of the land required by the railroad was one hundred and fifty dollars, and that it would cost Harlan one thousand and twenty-five dollars to build a fence each side of the railroad—for which sum they also assessed damages. The plaintiff moved to strike out so much of the report as assessed damages for the fence, which motion the Court overruled. The Court then made an order confirming the report.

It was to review this order confirming the report that the writ of error was asked.

The other facts are stated in the opinion of the Court.

James Anderson, for Plaintiff.

If the matter in dispute exceeds two hundred dollars, the 4th Section, Article VI, of the Constitution of California, expressly declares that this Court "shall have jurisdiction."

Now, if respondent does not insist that the award of the commissioners in this cause was for more than one hundred and fifty dollars, then he agrees with appellant, and appellant concedes that this Court has no jurisdiction of the case. But this concession of respondent should appear in the judgment of the Court.

Sacramento, Placer, and Nevada Railroad Co. v. Harlan.

The section of the Constitution above referred to declares that the Judges of this Court shall have power to issue all writs and process necessary to the exercise of their appellate jurisdiction.

Sections 336 and 347 of the Practice Act specifies in what cases one may, in the technical sense, appeal. The case at bar does not come within the rules there laid down.

The Judge or Court confirms and certifies the report of commissioners. (See Stats. of 1861, p. 621, Sec. 32.) This is not an order; it does not direct anything to be done, or forbid the doing of anything; it simply indorses the appraisalment of the commissioners. It is not a judgment; plaintiff need not take the lands unless he please; but if he please to take them, he must do so as per appraisalment.

A party may move for a new trial, (Sec. 31,) and the granting or refusing that would bring an appellant within the technical rules of an appeal. But suppose, (as is the case at bar,) you do not desire a new trial? You simply wish corrected that which is plainly of record and palpably wrong, and is not within the rules of appeals.

Hereford & Williams, for Respondent.

It is sought to review the action of the District Court by writ of error. Yet this Court cannot acquire jurisdiction by that process. This is only an appellate Court. It cannot acquire jurisdiction except by appeal, and has power only to issue writs necessary to the exercise of its appellate powers after having obtained jurisdiction.

Writ of error is not an appellate process, but a new suit, in which there may be other or different parties than those in the lower Court. (Bouvier's Institutes, Vol. 3, pp. 537-48; Fermo v. Dickinson, 4 Denio, 84; Bullard v. Leach, 1 Verm. 491.)

By the Court, SAWYER, J.

This is a proceeding under the Railroad Act of 1861, to acquire lands for the use of the Sacramento, Placer, and Nevada Railroad Company. The cause was brought into this Court by writ of error to the District Court of the Eleventh Judicial District, for the County of Placer.

The respondent raises an objection that this Court has no jurisdiction to review the proceeding on a writ of error, and insists that jurisdiction can only be acquired by an appeal in the ordinary mode prescribed by the Practice Act.

"The Constitution only empowers this Court to issue such writs and process as may be necessary to the exercise of its appellate jurisdiction; if this appellate jurisdiction can be exercised without this process, then it cannot be necessary, and should not be issued." (Haight v. Gay, 8 Cal. 300.)

The old Constitution, Article VI, section four, and the Judiciary Act of 1855, section five, in force at the time when this writ was sued out, provide that "the Supreme Court shall have appellate jurisdiction in all cases where the matter in dispute exceeds two hundred dollars;" and section six of the Act of 1855 provides that "the Supreme Court shall have jurisdiction to review upon appeal * * * a judgment in an action or proceeding commenced in * * * the District Court * * * when the matter in dispute exceeds two hundred dollars" — language as broad as the Constitution. The amended Constitution and the Judiciary Act of 1863 contain equivalent provisions.

To give effect to these provisions, Title Nine of the Practice Act prescribes the mode in which the appellate power of this Court shall be exercised in all cases embraced within the purview of the Act. Section three hundred and thirty-three provides that "a judgment or order in a civil action, except when expressly made final by this Act, may be reviewed as prescribed by this title, and not otherwise."

In Haight v. Gay, the late Supreme Court, in giving a construction to this section, say: "This provision is plain and positive, that a judgment or order may be reviewed as prescribed by that title, and not otherwise. If, therefore, an appeal be given by that title in a particular case, the judgment or order can only be reviewed in the manner therein prescribed. In reference to cases where no appeal is given, this negative provision, 'not otherwise,' could not apply. Our conclusion is that in all cases where an appeal is given by the statute the remedy is exclusive, and must be pursued, and that a writ of error will only lie in cases where no appeal is given by the Act."

Is an appeal given by the statute in the case now before the Court? If the decision is subject to review by this Court in any form, we think the remedy is by appeal in the usual form. Section six of the Judiciary Act of 1855 has already been cited. Section three hundred and forty-seven of the Practice Act provides that "an appeal may be taken to the Supreme Court from the District Courts in the following cases: First, from a final judgment rendered in an action, or special proceeding commenced in those Courts," etc.

This is unquestionably a special proceeding, commenced in a District Court, and the determination of the Court in the proceeding, we think, is a final judgment rendered in a special proceeding, within the meaning of the Act. The Court acts judicially: a petition is filed, setting up the grounds upon which the railroad company claim to acquire the right to the land; the parties interested are summoned to appear and contest the claim. In this case they did appear and answer the petition. It was adjudged that the petitioners had brought themselves within the provisions of the Act; commissioners were appointed in pursuance of the Act to assess the value of the land; testimony was taken and a report made to the Court; and this report was confirmed by the judgment of the Court. This was a judicial investigation, and the rights of the parties, and the conditions upon which the petitioners could acquire the land, were litigated and finally adjudged. The action of the Court confirming the report of the commissioners was the definitive sentence or decision of the Court, by which the merits of the matter in dispute in the special proceeding were determined; and this determination appears to us to possess all the essential attributes of a final judgment, within the definition given in Belt v. Davis, 1 Cal. 137.

It follows from the view that we have taken that a writ of error does not lie in this case, and that it must be quashed.

It is so ordered.

NEW TRIAL.—Where a cause is tried by the Court, without a jury, and an appeal is taken from an order denying a new trial, and the error assigned is that the finding and judgment are contrary to the evidence, the Supreme Court will not disturb the judgment if the testimony is conflicting.

APPEAL from the District Court, Eleventh Judicial District, Placer County.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the Court.

Plaintiff recovered judgment in the Court below, and defendant appealed.

George R. Moore, for Appellant.

Tuttle & Fellows, for Respondent.

By the Court, SANDERSON, C. J.

This case comes before us on appeal from an order overruling a motion for a new trial upon the sole ground that the finding and judgment are contrary to the evidence. The case was tried by the Court, without the intervention of a jury.

The testimony upon the question of fraud involved in the case is somewhat conflicting, and in such cases the result mainly depends upon the credibility of the witnesses, of which we have no opportunity to judge. In such cases we cannot disturb the judgment of the Court below.

Judgment affirmed.

MINING CLAIM — ABANDONMENT.—In an action to recover possession of a mining claim, where the defense is an abandonment of the claim by the plaintiff, the judgment roll in an action brought by the plaintiff against third parties to recover possession of the same ground, and in which plaintiff recovered judgment, is admissible in evidence to rebut the presumption of abandonment.

SAME — INSTRUCTION.—In such case the Court should guard the jury, by proper instructions, from giving the judgment any weight as evidence, except upon the question of abandonment.

MINERAL LANDS — OCCUPANTS OF.—The public mineral lands of this State are open to the appropriation of any one, and the one first occupying any portion of the same makes it his by the act of occupancy, and once his, it continues his until he manifests his intention to part with it in some manner known to the law.

SAME.—The occupant may part with his interest by selling it, or giving it to another, or by any other mode authorized by law, or he may abandon it.

ABANDONMENT — WHAT CONSTITUTES.—An abandonment can only place where the occupant leaves the land free to the appropriation of the next comer, whoever he may be; without any intention to repossess or reclaim it for himself, and regardless and indifferent as to what may become of it in future.

SAME.—When an abandonment takes place, a vacancy in the possession is created, and without such vacancy no abandonment can take place.

SAME.—If the possession of the occupant be continued in another, by the expression of a wish or desire of the occupant to another that he succeed to the possession, and he thereupon takes possession, a gift is the result—there is no vacancy in the possession, and, consequently, no abandonment.

SAME.—A mere wish or desire of the occupant, when he leaves the possession, that another may next occupy, without being communicated to that other person, and assented to by him, and accompanied by a transfer of possession, does not amount to a gift.

ERRONEOUS INSTRUCTION.—If an erroneous instruction is given to the jury, the judgment will be reversed, unless it appear from the record that the appellant was not prejudiced thereby.

MINING CLAIMS.—In actions to recover possession of mining claims located on the public lands, the doctrine that the plaintiff, if he recover at all, must recover on the strength of his own title, has no application, for neither party has any legal title.

SAME.—In such actions, where prior possession is relied on by the plaintiff, the defendant cannot justify his entry by showing the true title outstanding.

APPEAL from the District Court, Seventeenth Judicial District, Sierra County.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the Court.

Vanclief & Bowers, and Niles Searls, for Appellants.

To rebut the evidence proving abandonment, plaintiff offered to show that he had sued some third persons (Donahue and Westfield) for his claim. Will' he be allowed to do it? Would it not be equally proper to allow him to show that he had privately informed Donahue and Westfield—"or any other men"—that he intended to hold his claim. The second point made by us is, that the Court erred in instructing the jury that an abandonment must be made without any desire that any particular person should acquire the property; and that if such desire exists, the transaction might be considered a gift. This instruction is supposed to be in accordance with the opinion of the Court in Stephens v. Mansfield, 11 Cal. 365; but we contend that it is not. In that case, Stephens transferred the possession of a lot in Placerville to defendant's grantor, for a consideration of six hundred dollars. Here was a delivery of possession for a consideration, with the plain intention of conveying the title. The Court held that this transaction did not and could not constitute an abandonment. This is all that was decided by the Court, and all that could be considered authoritative. True, the Court quoted a loose definition from Bouvier's Law Dictionary, for which we can find no authority which contains the words of the instruction to which we object. Portions of this definition seem to us to be not only without authority, but squarely opposed to some of the elementary rules of the law. To constitute a gift, there must be a delivery and acceptance of the possession. (Noble v. Smith, 2 John. 52; Grangiac v. Arden, 10 John. 293.)

But this instruction says that the mere desire of the party leaving a mining claim that some particular person should acquire it, might constitute a gift without delivery or acceptance of possession, or even any communication of such desire.

But the most objectionable feature of the instruction is that it precludes any abandonment in all cases where this desire exists. Now, we understand that if a party lease a mining claim, voluntarily, with the intention of never returning to it, or repossessing it, he abandons it, even though he may désire that some particular person may acquire it.

If the rule contained in the instruction is to prevail, no abandonment can be made out in any case where the party alleged to have abandoned will swear that he even secretly desired that some particular person should acquire the property.

The third and last assignment is, that the Court erred in instructing the jury that "if plaintiff has shown a right in himself to the property in dispute, then, however weak his title appears, he must recover, if it be better than defendant's title."

We think this instruction opposed to the rule of law which requires the plaintiff in ejectment to recover, if at all, on the strength of his own title. (Roe v. Harvey, 4 Bur. 2,484; Parker v. Baldwin, 11 East. 494; Covert v. Irwin, 3 S. & R. 287; Williams v. Ingell, 21 Pick. 289.)

In the last case above cited Mr. Chief Justice Shaw says: "It is difficult to perceive from the documents and other evidence furnished by the case that either party has given any very satisfactory evidence of good title. It becomes necessary to see who has the burden of proof, and to apply the familiar maxim of the law applicable to such a case. In a controverted question of title, the plaintiff is bound to make out his case by satisfactory proof, and he must recover by the strength of his own title — not by the weakness of his adversary's; potior est conditio defendentis. The question, then, is whether the plaintiff has established a good title."

In McGarrity v. Byington, 12 Cal. 431, a similar instruction was assigned as error. The Court admitted the instruction was bad, but undertook to show that it did no harm, as both parties relied on prior possession alone, no outstanding title appearing, and as all the instructions did not appear on the record.

Johnson & Williams, and Creed Haymond, for Respondent.

The judgment roll in the case of J. W. Richardson v. Donahue & Westfield was admissible for two reasons.

Richardson v. McNulty et al.

Because the fact that Richardson, the plaintiff in this action, died on the 8th day of November, 1860, commenced and carried on, down to the day before the commencement of this action, a suit for the recovery of the very piece of property in dispute, was the very best evidence that he had not abandoned during that time his interest therein.

It was both an act and declaration of the highest character, showing that no intention existed of abandoning or giving up the property.

Defendants occupied the position of intruders, giving no evidence of title in themselves.

Professor Walker, in his work on American Law, pages 306 and 307, says: "One of the elementary principles in the action of ejectment is, that the plaintiff must rely solely upon the strength of his own title, and not upon the weakness of the defendant's title. The reason is, that actual possession is prima facie evidence of title, and gives the occupant a right against every person who cannot show, not simply a better, but a good title. If, however, the person in possession be a mere intruder, he is not permitted to question the validity of plaintiff's title unless the latter was also a mere intruder; for any shadow of right in the plaintiff will be sufficient against mere possession without right. The first step, then, is for the plaintiff to exhibit sufficient title; and until he does this, the defendant may rely simply upon his possession without further proof. But when this is done, the defendant must meet it by showing a better title, either in himself or a third person."

By the Court, SANDERSON, C. J.

This is an action of ejectment to recover an undivided sixteenth interest in a certain mining claim, situated in the County of Sierra. The defense mainly relied upon is abandonment. On the trial, the plaintiff offered in evidence the judgment roll in a certain action brought by him against one Donahue & Westfield to recover the same interest sued for in this action, to which the defendants were not parties or privies. The judgment roll was admitted by the Court under the exception of the defendants. Touching the effect of the judgment roll as evidence, the Court instructed the jury as follows:

"None of the defendants in this action were parties to the action in which Richardson was plaintiff and Donahue & Westfield were defendants; and the papers in the last named action which have been introduced in evidence in this case do not tend to show that the plaintiff herein has title to the ground in dispute as against the defendants in this action; and the defendants in this action are not bound by any order, judgment, or decree rendered in said action of Richardson v. Donahue & Westfield. The jury, however, in considering the other question of abandonment, may take into consideration the fact that such suit was brought by Richardson in determining the intent of the party."

For the purpose for which it was received by the Court, the judgment roll was clearly admissible. The fact that Richardson had, long prior to the commencement of the present action, brought another suit to recover the same ground against other parties who were then in possession and claiming it adversely to him, and had prosecuted it successfully to final judgment, was strong evidence, if not conclusive, upon the question of abandonment. The fact could not be proved more satisfactorily than by a production of the record itself. The fact that, unexplained, it might mislead the jury upon some other question involved in the case, does not affect its admissibility. In such a case it is the duty of the Court to guard against any unlawful effect, as was done in the present instance, by proper instructions to the jury; and if the Court fails to do so, it is the duty of counsel to ask instructions to that end.

The next error assigned is as to an instruction given by the Court, in the following words, viz: "The abandonment must also be made without any desire that any particular person should acquire the property, for if such desire exist, the transaction might be construed a gift."

This is but part of a long instruction upon the question of abandonment, given by the learned Judge of the Court below, remarkable for its clearness of diction and soundness in principle, and to which no other objection is made. The sentence above quoted appears to be based upon the authority of Stephens v. Mansfield, 11 Cal. 365, and it is claimed by counsel for appellants that the opinion in that case, so far as it gives sanction to this definition of abandonment, is mere obiter dictum. In that case the plaintiff, Stephens, was in possession of a town lot in the City of Placerville, part of the public domain, under a deed from another, who was in possession at the time the deed and possession of the lot was given. After remaining in possession under his deed for some months, Stephens made a verbal sale of the lot, for six hundred dollars, to one Hunter, who occupied for about two years, and sold to the defendant, Mansfield. It was claimed by the defendant that the transaction between Stephens and Hunter amounted to an abandonment of the lot in favor of the latter; but the Court held otherwise, and that "admitting the interest of the plaintiff in the premises such as could be divested by abandonment, there can be no such thing as abandonment in favor of a particular individual or for a consideration. Such act would be a gift or sale."

It is true, as contended by counsel for the appellants, that so far as the case of a gift is concerned, this decision goes outside of the facts; but, upon principle, there is no difference between the act of selling and the act of giving, so far as their effect as evidence upon a question of abandonment is concerned. If the gift be complete—that is to say, if the thing given be delivered, and accepted by the donee, a transfer is the result, which transfer as much precludes the idea of abandonment as a transfer resulting from a sale. No question of abandonment can arise where a transfer has been had by the act of two parties. To an abandonment of the character involved in this and all similar cases, there can be but one party. The mining ground in controversy, before it was occupied by the plaintiff, so far as the right to mine the same by parties without title is concerned, (and this is true of all the public mineral land of the State,) was publici juris, and open to the appropriation of any one desiring it. By the act of occupancy, the plaintiff made it his, and manifested his intention to do so. Once his, it continues his until he manifests his intention to part with it in some manner known to the law. He may sell it, or give it to another, or transfer it in any other mode authorized by law, (thereby preserving the continuity of possession,) or he may abandon it. In doing the latter he must leave it free to the occupation of the next comer, whoever he may be, without any intention to repossess or reclaim it for himself in any event, and regardless and indifferent as to what may become of it in the future. When this is done, a vacancy in the possession is created, and the land reverts to its former condition, and becomes once more publici juris, and then, and not until then, an abandonment has taken place. There can be no abandonment except where the right abates, and ceases to exist. If it be continued in another, by any of the modes known to the law for the transfer of property, there has been no abandonment, for the right, first acquired by the occupancy still exists, although vested in another, and the continuity of possession remains unbroken. But the occupant cannot continue his right in another by the mere act of volition; nor is his right kept alive by a mere desire that it may become vested in a particular person. Such a volition or desire does not amount to a gift, for there can be no gift without an acceptance. If the wish or desire is expressed to the person in whose behalf it is entertained, and thereupon he occupies the land, a gift is the result, and the transfer is made complete — and not otherwise. The mere wishes and desires of the occupant are only effectual to preserve the right in himself, and not to transmit it to another; and the case of Stephens v. Mansfield, so far as it can be fairly construed to go beyond the views here expressed, is not law.

From what has been said, it follows that the charge in question, so far as it instructs the jury that there can be no abandonment where the transaction amounts to a gift, is correct, but that it is erroneous so far as it instructs them that leaving the claim, with a desire that a particular person may acquire it, might be construed to be a gift. The error is in the definition of a gift, rather than in that of an abandonment.

It only remains to be seen whether the error, such as it is, could have affected the verdict of the jury to the prejudice of the defendant. The general rule is, that where an erroneous instruction has been given, the judgment must be reversed, unless it appear from the record that the appellant has not been prejudiced thereby. The testimony upon which, as the appellants claim and admit, this instruction was founded, is to the effect that while the plaintiff was absent at Frazer River, he had a correspondence with one Cody about the claim, in which Cody asked him to send him (Cody) a bill of sale of the claim, and he would "keep up the claim for him;" that thereupon, after consulting a lawyer as to whether Cody, under such circumstances, could hold the claim as against him, he sent Cody a bill of sale, but that the same was never received by Cody. It also appears from another part of the testimony, that Cody had offered to pay the assessment levied by the company upon the plaintiff's interest, but the Secretary refused to receive the money from Cody, upon the ground that he had no authority to receive it from any one but the plaintiff. This was evidently done with a view to work a forfeiture and sale of the plaintiff's interest under the by-laws of the company, and doubtless induced Cody's application for the bill of sale.

How it can be claimed that this evidence tends to establish an abandonment, we are unable to perceive. In our judgment, its tendency is directly the reverse, and the Court would have been justified in refusing to give any instructions founded upon such a theory, as calculated to mislead a jury. And, had the verdict been different, we are inclined to think that the plaintiff, on appeal, would have been entitled to a reversal on that ground. Giving the instruction greater purpose than is claimed for it by appellants, and assuming that the charge, in effect, instructs the jury that they cannot find an abandonment from the facts disclosed in the evidence, no error, in our judgment, has been committed. It follows that the instruction, in view of the evidence upon which it was founded, and as to the legal effect of which it was given, could not have operated to the prejudice of the appellants, and that, therefore, they are not entitled to a reversal upon that ground.

The next and last error assigned is found in the following instruction: "If the plaintiff, however, has shown a right in himself to the property in dispute, then, however weak his title appear, he must recover if it be better than the defendant's title." This is but one clause in the instruction upon the question as to what title or right the plaintiff must prove in order to recover; and in determining its force and effect it must be considered in connection with that portion immediately preceding, which is as follows: "The defendants being in actual possession of the ground in dispute, then, although they have no right there whatever, yet the plaintiff cannot, from that circumstance alone, recover in this action, for the rule of law is that he must recover, if at all, upon the strength of his own title. In other words, the plaintiff must show a right in himself, although there be none in the defendants."

In McGarritty v. Byington, 12 Cal. 426, which was an action like the present, to recover a mining claim, an instruction, in substance the same as that to which the appellants except, was given, and came before the late Supreme Court for review, and Mr. Justice Baldwin said: "It is true, in ejectment the plaintiff must recover on the strength of his own title; but here, the charge must be taken in connection with the case. There was no outstanding title, and only a question of prior possession. The charge did not amount to much, but what there was of it was very harmless. It amounted to telling the jury to find for the plaintiff if they thought they ought to."

It is insisted that the present case differs from that of McGarritty v. Byington, because, as is claimed, it involves an outstanding title. There may be an attempt to raise a question of that kind, but under numerous decisions of the late Supreme Court no such question can be made in an action of ejectment in which the plaintiff, as in the present case, relies solely upon prior possession, and the defendant fails to connect himself in any manner with the outstanding title. (Bequette v. Caulfield, 4 Cal. 278; Bird v. Lisbros, 9 Cal. 1; Hubbard et al. v. Barry, 21 Cal. 321.) In this case only a question of possession is involved. The naked prior possession of the plaintiff is pitted against the naked present possession of the defendants. Strict title is not involved. The doctrine that the plaintiff must recover upon the strength of his own title is applied to cases where the strict legal title in contradistinction from a mere possession, is involved. In such a case the defendant may defeat the legal title, relied upon by the plaintiff, by showing the true legal title to be outstanding. Ejectments for mining claims where neither party has, strictly speaking, any legal title, but both, in strict law, are intruders upon what belongs to another, are mere contests for possession, and their solution is only embarrassed by an attempt to adhere to language only adapted to cases where the strict legal title to land is involved. Such ejectments might be more properly called actions to determine the right to mine in a certain locality. Practically, the real question involved in all such cases is, which, as against the other, has the better right to mine the land in question. Generally, the solution of this question depends in a great measure upon the rules and regulations of the mining district in which the ground is located, established by the miners themselves, and not unfrequently its just solution is prevented, rather than aided, by an adherence on the part of counsel and Courts to a phraseology hardly applicable, when the character of the right involved is considered. That portion of the charge under consideration which is objected to by the appellants, taken in connection with what immediately precedes it, states the general propositions governing this class of cases correctly. More apt words might have been employed, but we cannot for that reason reverse the judgment. If it is deficient in any respect, it is because it does not state what, in such cases, constitutes the better right, or "title," as the Court terms it. If the Court had said, in connection, that the prior possession of the plaintiff, if proved to their satisfaction, was better than the subsequent possession of the defendant, there would have been no room for criticism.

All the testimony which was given upon both sides is embraced in the statement, and we are satisfied therefrom that no injustice has been committed, and that, upon the whole case, the verdict of the jury was right, and the judgment ought to stand.

BRIEFS IN SUPREME COURT.—When a cause is submitted in the Supreme Court, with leave to file briefs within a time fixed, and no briefs or points are filed within the time, the Court will not examine the record, but the judgment will be affirmed.

APPEAL from the District Court, Third Judicial District, Alameda County.

Defendant recovered judgment in the Court below, and plaintiff appealed. The other facts are stated in the opinion of the Court.

N. Hamilton, for Appellant.

W. W. Crane, Jr., for Respondent.

By the Court, SAWYER, J.

This cause was submitted, without oral argument, on the 4th of February. Each party had ten days in which to file briefs. No briefs or points are on file, and there is no assignment of errors in the record. This Court will not perform the duties of counsel; it will not examine a record to see if it can find any errors upon which to reverse a judgment. If the appellant's counsel does not choose, in some form, to call the attention of the Court to the points, provisions of the statute, and the authorities upon which he relies, the judgment will be affirmed.

Judgment affirmed.

EX PARTE BURRILL et al.

COSTS WHEN NEW TRIAL AWARDED.—When a judgment is reversed by the Supreme Court, and the case remanded for further proceedings, and costs are awarded in general terms, the costs awarded include only the costs made on the appeal to the Supreme Court. The costs of the former trial abide the event of the suit.

WHEN BILL OF COSTS SHOULD BE FILED IN COURT BELOW.—A memorandum of the costs of filing notice and undertaking on appeal, and preparing the transcript for the Supreme Court, should be filed in the office of the Clerk of the Court below at the time of filing the remittitur there, or within the time thereafter prescribed by the statute in other cases.

EXECUTION FOR COSTS OF PREVAILING PARTY.—The Clerk of the Court below can issue an execution, if required by the prevailing party, for the costs included in the memorandum, and the costs of the Clerk of the Supreme Court as certified by him on the remittitur.

WHEN THE JUDGE MAY ORDER STAY OF EXECUTION.—When a judgment is reversed by the Supreme Court, and the case remanded for further proceedings, and the Clerk of the Court below issues an execution for all the costs, as well those of appeal as those accruing before notice of appeal was filed, the Judge of the court below has power to make an order staying the execution in the hands of the Sheriff until an application can be made to the Court to re-tax and adjust the costs.

APPLICATION for mandamus to the Judge of the Fifth Judicial District, San Joaquin County.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the Court.

M. G. Cobb, for Petitioners.

A. M. Heslep, for Respondent.

By the Court, CURREY, J.

This is an application for a writ of mandamus to compel the District Judge of the Fifth Judicial District to vacate certain orders by him made in an action wherein L. Cohn was plaintiff and one Goldstein was defendant, and Knapp, Burrill & Co. were intervenors, occupying an antagonistic position to the plaintiff. The action was tried in San Joaquin County, in said district, and judgment was obtained there by the plaintiff against the intervenors. From this judgment the intervenors appealed to the Supreme Court. The Supreme Court, in December, 1863, reversed the judgment and remanded the cause for a new trial. Within ten days after this reversal, the appellants filed a verified bill of costs in the Clerk's office of the Supreme Court, amounting, in the aggregate, to the sum of three hundred and eighty-five dollars and forty-five cents. This amount consisted of seventy dollars and sixty cents, costs that accrued in the Supreme Court, and three hundred and fourteen dollars and eighty-five cents, costs that accrued in the District Court. In due time a remittitur, with which was a copy of the bill of costs, duly certified, was issued and filed in the Clerk's office of the District Court, in San Joaquin County. Upon the remittitur was indorsed by the Clerk of the Supreme Court the costs in the case, as consisting of seventy dollars and sixty cents, paid by appellants to the Clerk of the Supreme Court, and three hundred and fourteen dollars and sixty-five cents, costs in the Court below. After the remittitur, with the certified copy of the bill of costs, was so filed, an execution was issued in the case by the Clerk of the District Court, to enforce payment of the whole sum of three hundred and eighty-five dollars and forty-five cents, and placed in the hands of the Sheriff of San Joaquin County, who, by virtue thereof, collected the entire amount. Before the money was paid over to the appellants, and before the return of the execution, the respondent, Cohn, applied to the Judge of the District Court to stay the execution, and also the money in the Sheriff's hands, until he could move the District Court for a re-taxation of the costs; upon which the Judge made an order granting the application. At the term of the Court subsequently held in the County of San Joaquin, the order previously made was modified. By the modified order, the Sheriff was directed to return the execution as unsatisfied, and the Clerk of the Court was directed to issue, upon the request of the appellants, an execution in their favor against said Cohn for the sum of seventy dollars and sixty cents, as the whole amount of costs to which the appellants were entitled on appeal. From the petition it appears that the Sheriff has not returned the execution, as directed by the Court below, and he still has in his hands the money collected thereon.

Ex parte Burrill et al.

The petitioners allege that the orders made by the Judge of the District Court are an illegal and unwarrantable interference with the judgment of the Supreme Court, and they therefore ask that a writ may be issued commanding the Judge of the Court below to vacate and annul the orders made by him, and that the Sheriff may be required to complete the performance of his duty under said execution.

The statute provides that there shall be allowed to the prevailing party in an action in the Supreme Court, District Courts, and County Courts, his costs and necessary disbursements in the action, (Practice Act, Sec. 494,) and that the party who claims his costs shall deliver to the Clerk of the Court, within two days after the verdict or decision may be rendered, a memorandum, duly verified, of the items of his costs and necessary disbursements in the action or proceeding. (Ibid, Sec. 510.)

From these provisions of the statute, we should be inclined to hold, if the question was res integra, that the memorandum of costs, duly verified, should be filed in the office of the Clerk of the Supreme Court, in cases decided therein. The practice for a few years after the Courts of this State were organized was, to some extent, to file a bill or memorandum of costs in the Supreme Court; but this practice fell into disuse, probably because of its great inconvenience. Then, for some time, it was the practice for the party prevailing in the Supreme Court to file his memorandum of costs in the Clerk's office of the District Court upon the filing of the remittitur, or within the time specified by the statute thereafter. This practice has been very generally adopted by the bar, and may be said to have been approved by the late Supreme Court in Eaton v. Palmer, 11 Cal. 341. In the case here cited it was objected that no bill of costs had been filed in the Supreme Court, as required by section five hundred and ten of the Practice Act, to which the Court said: "We think that section does not apply to costs upon appeal. The costs upon appeal are properly the costs of this Court, and the costs of making up the appeal in the Court below, including the costs of making out the transcript." And, after remarking upon the oppressiveness of requiring the party to file his bill of costs in the Clerk's office of the Supreme Court, the Court said: "When a case is remanded for further proceedings and costs awarded in this Court, in general terms, we mean only to include the costs upon appeal, leaving the costs of the former trial to abide the event of the suit."

It may be observed in this connection that it has become the custom to a very great extent to regard the memorandum of the costs, indorsed on the remittitur, and certified by the Clerk of the Supreme Court, as a sufficient bill of the costs which have accrued in the Supreme Court on the appeal, and this seems to be warranted by the decision in Eaton against Palmer. But the Clerk of the Supreme Court cannot certify as to the costs of making out the transcript of the record to be filed in the office of the Clerk of the Court of appeal, and it may be proper to suggest, that if the prevailing party intends to collect the fees for filing the notice of appeal and the expenses of preparing the transcript of the record, the same should be embodied in a memorandum of costs and filed in the Clerk's office of the Court below at the time of filing the remittitur there, or within the time thereafter prescribed by the statute in other cases.

In the case under consideration, the appellants were not entitled to the costs that accrued in the Court below prior to filing the notice of appeal, and when the attention of the Judge of that Court was called to the fact that execution had been issued for the collection of the costs taxed as accruing in the District Court previous to the filing of the notice of appeal, as well as for the costs of appeal, and that the whole amount had been collected by the Sheriff, and was in his hands, and when his authority over the subject was invoked, we think it was justly exercised in staying the execution and the money in the hands of the Sheriff until an application could be made to the Court to re-tax and adjust the costs which the respondents should pay to the appellants. If the Sheriff continues to refuse compliance with the order of the Court made at the term, to return the execution as directed, or if the Clerk refuses to issue an execution upon the application of the appellants for the costs which accrued by reason of the appeal, the same District Court possesses the power to enforce obedience to its orders.

The application for a mandamus must be denied.

THE BEAR RIVER AND AUBURN WATER AND MINING COMPANY v. JOHN BOLES, WILLIAM STRAP, AND JOHN TYLER. No. 1.

NEW TRIAL—NOTICE.—Notice of intention to move for a new trial must be given to the opposite party or his attorney within the time required by the one hundred and ninety-fifth section of the Practice Act, or the right to move for a new trial is waived.

SAME—STATEMENT.—Where no notice of an intention to move for a new trial is given by the opposite party, or waived by him, the making and filing of a statement does not give the Court jurisdiction over the subject matter of a new trial, and an order granting a new trial will be reversed.

SAME—ORDER EXTENDING TIME.—An order made by the Court, after the time fixed by the one hundred and ninety-fifth section of the Practice Act for filing a statement on motion for a new trial has expired, extending the time to file a statement, is void. The Court made the following order the day after the rendition of judgment: "It is ordered that all proceedings under the judgment recovered by plaintiff against defendants be and they are hereby stayed and superseded until the 5th day of May next, in order that counsel may present and prepare his statement on motion for new trial." Held, that this order did not extend the statutory time within which to file a statement. A notice of motion for a new trial should be in writing.

APPEAL from the District Court, Eleventh Judicial District, Placer County.

The plaintiff recovered judgment in the District Court, and the Judge made an order granting a new trial, from which order plaintiff appealed.

The other facts are stated in the opinion of the Court.

Tuttle & Fellows, for Appellant.

Jo Hamilton, for Respondents.

By the Court, SAWYER, J.

This is an appeal from an order granting a new trial. The verdict was returned and judgment thereon entered on the 21st of April, 1862. On the next day, April 22d, an order was entered in the minutes of the Court in these words:

“Now come the defendants herein, by Hamilton & Williams, their attorneys, in open Court, and give notice of a motion for a new trial upon statement to be hereinafter filed, and on motion of counsel aforesaid it is ordered that all proceedings under the judgment recovered by plaintiff against defendants be and they are hereby stayed and superseded until the 5th day of May next, in order that counsel may present and prepare his statement on motion for new trial.”

On the 4th day of May, defendant's counsel asked the Court for three days further time to prepare and file their statement, and it was “ordered that said motion be and the same is hereby granted; and that defendants' attorneys be and they are hereby allowed three days from the date hereof in which to file said statement.”

The appellant assigns as error the granting of a new trial, on the grounds, among others, that a new trial was waived, because:

Firstly—No notice of a motion for new trial was given to appellants.

Secondly—No statement was filed within the time required by law.

Section one hundred and ninety-five of the Practice Act expressly provides that “the party intending to move for a new trial shall give notice of the same as follows: When the action has been tried with a jury, within five days after the rendition of the verdict." It then provides for filing affidavits or statement within five days after giving such notice, etc., and "if no affidavit or statement be filed within five days after notice, or within such further time as the parties may agree upon, or the Court or Judge thereof may by order grant, the right to move for a new trial shall be deemed waived."

The only notice of the motion for a new trial given, is that which appears in the minutes of the Court, just quoted. We do not think this sufficient. The entry was made on the next day after the verdict was rendered and judgment thereon entered. It does not appear that the party to be affected by it, or his attorney, was in Court, or had any knowledge of this proceeding. The case had been disposed of and judgment entered in plaintiff's favor on the preceding day, and that was the end of the matter as to him till some other proceedings should be taken of which he was entitled to notice. After the entry of his judgment, the plaintiff was not bound to watch the Court to see whether or not any other proceedings would be taken. The law provides that notice of a motion for a new trial shall be given, and the notice intended is a written notice. Perhaps a notice given him in open Court, and entered in the minutes, in his presence, would be sufficient; but, in such case, the record should at least affirmatively show, with reasonable certainty, that the party was present, and actually had notice. As the record notice in this case is fatally defective in this particular, it is unnecessary to determine the question whether any notice thus given would be sufficient. At best it is a doubtful question. The only safe mode to pursue, especially since the amendment to section one hundred and ninety-five, in 1863, requiring the grounds of the motion to be stated in the notice, is to give a formal notice in writing. A written notice, even where another form is admissible, is less liable to lead to mistakes, and is always preferable.

If the notice in the minutes of the Court was sufficient, the statement should have been filed on or before the 27th, unless the time had been extended by the Court or agreement of the parties. The order of the 22d of April does not, in terms, purport to extend the time to prepare and file a statement. It merely stays proceedings on the part of the plaintiff to enforce the judgment till the 5th of May, "in order that the counsel may present and prepare his statement on motion for new trial." This language does not necessarily import that he shall have an extension of the time allowed by the statute to prepare and file his statement. The other party might not agree to the statement when filed; and, in that event, it would be necessary to have it settled before the Judge, upon notice — all of which would require time; and it may reasonably be supposed that the stay was designed to cover this period of time, as well as the time occupied by the moving party in preparing his statement. The object was to prevent the execution of the judgment, not only till a statement should be filed, but till settled, and the question of a new trial should be in a condition to be determined by the Court. If it was intended, in this instance, to procure an extension of the statutory time for preparing and filing a statement, that intention should have been expressed in apt words, and not left to be implied from ambiguous terms. We have already been compelled to waste much time in the investigation and determination of similar questions, not affecting the merits of cases, growing out of the loose manner in which proceedings have been conducted and records made up. We are anxious to decide all cases brought before us upon their merits rather than upon mere technical grounds. Often less time would be required to dispose of the case upon the real questions at issue than upon such preliminary objections as are presented in this case; and such a disposition would certainly be more satisfactory to the Court as well as the appellant.

While we are willing to construe pleadings and proceedings liberally for the purposes of advancing the ends of justice, we are not disposed, by indulging in latitudinarian presumptions and implications in the construction of proceedings, to encourage a loose practice, and thereby unnecessarily increase the labors of this Court and the burdens of litigation.

There is no difficulty in understanding the requirements of the section of the statute under consideration. Its language is precise and unmistakable, and the appellants seem to understand what was necessary, as the order of May 4th is clear enough, for it "allowed three days from date in which to file said statement." There is no misunderstanding this language. But it was too late, unless the order of April 22d also extended the time. Without such extension the right to a new trial had already been waived, and the Court had no power to revive it. But whatever intention may be extorted, by implication or otherwise, from the language of the order of April 22d, and without deciding that point, we are satisfied that no such notice of a motion for a new trial as is contemplated by the statute appears. We have carefully examined the record to see if any act of the appellant is disclosed from which we can infer that notice has been waived, or, perhaps, more properly speaking, from which it can be inferred that the appellant, in fact, had notice, but we find nothing to justify such an inference. It is not shown that he appeared in the case at the hearing of the motion for a new trial, or, indeed, that any hearing was had. We have commented at some length upon the points of practice presented by this case, for the purpose of calling attention to the subject, in hopes that attorneys will be more careful to studiously follow the provisions of the Practice Act, and that, in procuring orders from the Court, they will see that the order entered expresses, in apt language, the object intended.

From the views expressed, it follows that the appellants failed to take the proper steps to entitle them to a new trial.

The order granting a new trial is reversed.

Bear River and Auburn Water and Mining Co. v. Boles et al., No. 2.

THE BEAR RIVER AND AUBURN WATER AND MINING COMPANY v. JOHN BOLES, WM. STRAP, AND JOHN G. PRAGUE. No. 2.

NUISANCE — WHEN MAY BE ABATED.— While a ditch by which the waters of a stream have been appropriated is out of repair, and not in condition to carry any water, an action will not lie to abate, as a nuisance, a reservoir constructed across the bed of the stream, above the head of the ditch, by which the water of the stream is collected and detained, and caused to flow unequally.

SAME.—The reservoir does not become a nuisance until the ditch has been repaired, and placed in a condition to carry the water.

WITNESS — OBJECTION TO.—An objection to the competency of a witness, on the ground of interest, should be made at the time his interest is first shown, or it will be deemed waived.

APPEAL from the District Court, Eleventh Judicial District, Placer County.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the Court.

Tuttle & Fellows, for Appellant.

The instruction given by the Court was calculated to mislead the jury, under the facts of the case. If plaintiff owned the ditch and water right, the fact that the ditch was out of repair would not justify defendants in stopping the flow of water. But defendants, themselves, had washed away the head of the ditch, and refused to allow plaintiff to repair it.

We contend that plaintiff's instruction, asked and refused, correctly states the law. It is not for defendants to say what use plaintiff should make of its own property, or when it shall use it.

Under the law, as laid down by the Court, if A. erects an oil mill close by B.'s house, where he resides with his family, and B. is thereby compelled temporarily to move, an action to abate the nuisance would not lie, or, in other words, B. and his family must continue to inhale the offensive odor until the jury deliver their verdict. (See Practice Act, Sec. 249; Eberhard v. Tuolumne Water Co., 4 Cal. 308; Hudson v. Doyle, 6 Cal. 102; Parke v. Kilham, 8 Cal. 77.)

Jo Hamilton, for Respondents.

If the ditch of plaintiff and appellant was not in condition to carry water, then, as a matter of course, plaintiff could maintain neither of these suits.

The damage, or injury, or right of action, must be present, existing, and not prospective or problematical. As well might the creditor sue on his debt a year in anticipation of its maturity, as could the plaintiff in this suit maintain an order abating what may, perchance, some time in future, prove itself to be a nuisance. Hence, in no view of the case, could appellant recover in this action.

By the Court, SAWYER, J.

The complaint alleges that the plaintiff is the owner of a ditch cut for the purpose of conveying the waters of Rock Creek to certain mining localities, for sale; that defendants, before the commencement of the suit, constructed two reservoirs in the bed of Rock Creek, above the head of plaintiff's said ditch, by means of which the waters of Rock Creek are collected and detained from one day to a week at a time, and then let down in large quantities by opening the gates of said reservoirs; that, by these means, the waters of said streams are not allowed to flow regularly, or with a uniform current, to said ditch; that if said waters flow down said ditch with an uniform and uninterrupted current, said plaintiff has now, and has had for more than six months last past, a market for the same, by which it now can and could heretofore have realized about one hundred dollars per week for the same, by sale to quartz and placer miners—and that he would have said market for a great length of time hereafter; that by the interruption of the regular flow of the waters, as before stated, the plaintiff's customers are unable to use the same; that the market and sale of the said waters depend entirely on the uniform and natural flow of said waters; that if the interruption continues, the plaintiff will lose from fifty to one hundred dollars per week; that defendants are insolvent, and will be unable to respond in damages; that said reservoirs are a nuisance; and that the damages already accrued amount to five hundred dollars. Plaintiff prays judgment for the damages alleged, that the nuisance be abated, and the defendants be enjoined from obstructing in future the regular and uniform flow of said water.

The defendants, in their answer — after denying most of the material allegations of the complaint, and claiming a right to the waters in themselves — allege, among other things, that for a long term of years said ditch has ceased to convey any water, and has been mined away at its head, and at various other places, and since 1856 has been disused, and has neither carried nor been in a condition to carry any water; that said plaintiff, in and since 1856, sold water to various miners from another ditch owned by plaintiff, and that said miners, with the waters so purchased of plaintiff, with the knowledge, approbation, and consent of the plaintiff, washed away and destroyed the ditch described in the complaint to such an extent that it was wholly destroyed and unfit for conveying any water, and that since 1856 to the present time, the said ditch, by reason of said washing away and destruction, has been and still is wholly unfit to carry any water. They deny that said waters have flowed in said ditch since 1856, or that said reservoirs have in any manner affected the flow of said waters into said ditch. They aver that if plaintiff had a ditch to convey the waters collected in said reservoirs, they would be as useful to plaintiff as they otherwise would be; that for the want of any ditch sufficient or fit to carry the said waters, the same flow down Rock Creek, after being used by defendants, past the head of the ditch described in the complaint; that plaintiffs are not in a condition to use said waters until they rebuild the ditch which has been washed away as before stated.

The verdict of the jury and the judgment thereon were for the defendants, and plaintiff appealed.

On the trial, defendants introduced testimony, under objection and exception on the part of the plaintiff, tending to prove the destruction and condition of the ditch as alleged in the answer, and the Court instructed the jury as follows: "In determining the proposition whether defendants' reservoirs are a nuisance, you will look at all the evidence as to plaintiff's ditch and dam being out of order, and unable to carry the water, and take all the testimony that has been given into consideration." To the giving of which plaintiff excepted, and these rulings are relied on as error.

We think there was no error in admitting the testimony, or giving the instruction based upon it. The question was, whether the reservoirs were a nuisance in the then present condition of things—not whether they might become a nuisance at some future time, when the plaintiff might see fit to put its ditch in a condition to enjoy its right to the water. The plaintiff only had a right, by virtue of prior appropriation, to the use of the water in its natural flow. Other parties above were equally entitled to its use, so long as it was used in such a manner as not to injure the plaintiff. If plaintiff's ditch and dam had, for seven years, or any less period of time, as defendants claim, been in such a condition that it was impossible to turn the water into the ditch, or for the ditch to carry it, the plaintiff could not be injured, or the reservoirs become a nuisance, until the ditch should be repaired and placed in a condition to be available for the purpose designed. An action could not be maintained to abate the reservoirs, as a nuisance, till they actually became such. There is no claim that plaintiff was entitled to or desired the water for any other purpose than to convey in their ditch for sale.

But the plaintiff says there was also evidence tending to show that in 1860, a year or more before the reservoirs were built, the defendants themselves washed away plaintiff's ditch and dam, and that plaintiff at that time endeavored to repair it, and was prevented from doing so by the defendants, and for this reason the instruction was erroneous and liable to mislead the jury. There are two answers to this: Firstly—the plaintiff is suing to abate a present nuisance, erected long since the transactions referred to, and not to recover damages for destroying plaintiff's dam and ditch in 1860, and a recovery must be had, if at all, upon the case stated in the complaint. Secondly — it is a question for the jury to determine what facts are established by the evidence, and they might have found against the plaintiff on that point. They were, therefore, entitled to "look at the evidence" referred to, as directed by the Court, in connection with the other evidence in the case. For the same reasons, the instruction asked by plaintiff (which was precisely the reverse of the one given and just considered) was properly refused.

The defendants called one John Tyler as a witness. His first testimony was: "I am a member of the Boles claim; bought in when he did, and purchased from the same parties." He then went on, without any objection, and testified at considerable length upon the merits of the case. After which the "plaintiff, by his attorney, moved to strike out the testimony of said witness, Tyler, because he was interested. Defendant objected, and the Court sustained the objection, and plaintiff excepted to the ruling of the Court." This ruling is assigned as error. Admitting, for the purpose of the decision, the notice given under section four hundred and twenty-two of the Practice Act to be insufficient to authorize the witness to testify, we think the plaintiff waived the objection on the ground of interest by not taking it in time. The witness distinctly informed them at the threshold of his testimony that he was interested. Then was the time to make the objection. Parties will not be permitted to experiment upon a witness by admitting his testimony without objection, and, if it turns out to be favorable, accept it; but, if unfavorable, move to strike it out. Had the plaintiff been ignorant of the interest of the witness till it was developed by his testimony at this point of the trial, and the plaintiff, as soon as the interest was discovered, had moved to strike out his previous testimony, the Court would, doubtless, have granted the motion, if there was no other legal reason for denying it. But all the testimony sought to be struck out was taken without objection, after the witness had informed plaintiff and the Court of his interest; and the motion was properly denied on the ground that the objection came too late.

The last error relied on in appellant's brief is that the verdict is not warranted by the evidence, and is against law. It is hardly necessary to say that the record does not present a case which, under the uniform decisions of this Court, would justify us in reversing the judgment on this ground.

No error having been brought to our notice, the judgment is affirmed.

L. FLATEAU v. D. W. LUBECK.

NEW TRIAL.—If no notice is given of an intention to move for a new trial, a statement made and filed, and agreed to by the parties, or settled by the Judge, cannot be made the foundation of a motion, nor annexed to the record of the judgment or order from which the party may appeal. A notice of motion for a new trial should be in writing.

MISTAKE IN NOTICE OF APPEAL.—If there is enough in the notice of appeal to show that the judgment or order contained in the transcript are the same intended to be appealed from, the appeal will not be dismissed, although the notice may contain mistakes as to the date of the order or judgment.

APPEAL from the District Court, Eleventh Judicial District, Placer County.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the Court.

George R. Moore, for Appellant.

Tuttle & Fellows, for Respondent.

By the Court, CURREY, J.

The respondent in this case makes certain preliminary objections to the transcript on appeal, on the grounds:

1st. That no notice appears to have been given by the plaintiff to the defendant of his intention to move for a new trial, and that, therefore, the statement purporting to be a statement on motion for a new trial cannot be considered on appeal.

2d. That the notice of appeal is radically defective, and insufficient for the purpose intended by the appellant.

From the transcript in the case it appears that the verdict was rendered on the tenth day of November, 1863, in favor of the defendant, against the plaintiff, and that on the day following, on motion of plaintiff's counsel, the Court, by order, granted to the plaintiff ten days from that time in which to prepare and file a statement to be used on motion for a new trial; that on the 17th day of the same month, a statement, which the parties agreed to as correct, was filed; and that between the time the order was made and the day when the statement was filed, namely, on the 13th day of said month, the counsel for plaintiff moved for a new trial, which was then denied by the Court. There is nothing in the transcript from which it can be inferred that the defendant or his counsel had any notice of the motion for a new trial, or that he or they appeared or participated in the argument of the motion.

As to the first objection, the statute provides that the party intending to move for a new trial shall give notice of the same, when the action has been tried by a jury, within five days after the rendition of the verdict, and that the notice shall designate, generally, the grounds upon which the motion will be made. (Laws of 1863, p. 643.) In Borland v. Thornton, 12 Cal. 448, the Court say: "When the statute speaks of notice, it means written notice, or notice in open Court, of which a minute is made by the Clerk." That a notice in legal proceedings should be in writing, we deem essential to the protection of the rights of the party to be affected by it. Any other practice would, in many instances, be attended with mischievous results, and hence should be discountenanced. (Gilbert v. Columbia Turnpike Company, 3 Johns. Cas. 107.) The statute does not provide for any other than a written notice, and we are not satisfied that a notice in open Court, entered in the minutes of the Clerk, in such cases, can properly serve as a substitute for the notice contemplated by the statute. If it can, then it should contain all the substantive elements of the statutory notice, and should be brought to the attention of the party entitled to notice; and all this should appear, by proper entry, in the minutes of the Court.

If there was no legal notice of a motion for a new trial, it necessarily follows that the statement, the use of which is dependent on a valid and effectual notice, cannot be made the foundation of a motion for a new trial, nor annexed to the record of the judgment or order from which the party may appeal.

As to the second objection: The notice of appeal was filed on the 19th day of December, 1863, and purports to be an appeal from a judgment rendered in the cause on the 10th day of September, 1860, and from an order overruling the motion for a new trial on the 14th day of December, 1863. The judgment in the cause was rendered on the 10th of November, 1863, and the order overruling the motion for a new trial was made on the 13th of that month.

The Act of the Legislature of 1861, entitled "An Act to regulate appeals in this State," provides that no appeal shall be dismissed for insufficiency of the notice of appeal. There is enough upon the face of this notice to show that the judgment and order mentioned in the transcript of the record were the same referred to in the notice, and we think the Act of 1861 was designed to relieve parties in such cases from injurious consequences because of such mistakes.

The first objection of the respondent which we have here noticed we are compelled to regard as precluding any examination of the evidence and the proceedings in the case embodied in the statement; and, inasmuch as no error is manifest in that portion of the record which we are permitted to consider, the judgment must be affirmed.

Judgment affirmed.

Wixon v. Bear River and Auburn Water and Mining Co.

JOHN WIXON v. THE BEAR RIVER AND AUBURN WATER AND MINING COMPANY.

APPEAL—ASSIGNMENT OF ERRORS.—A statement on appeal, or on motion for a new trial, should set forth distinctly the grounds upon which the party appealing intends to rely for a reversal of the judgment. The Supreme Court will not look into or regard any alleged error which is not clearly assigned in the transcript.

WATER DITCHES—GARDENS—PRIOR RIGHTS.—If a tract of land in the mineral region, bordering on a natural stream, is inclosed and appropriated for garden or orchard purposes, and the waters of the stream are afterwards appropriated for mining purposes at a point above the inclosed land, the water thus appropriated must be so used as not to materially injure the fruit trees or garden.

SAME.—One who appropriates for mining purposes the waters of a ravine or stream, upon the public lands in the mineral region, must take and use the same in such manner as not to injure or destroy orchards or gardens bordering on the stream, which have been inclosed and planted before the water was appropriated.

ORCHARDS—MINERAL REGION.—One who incloses a tract of public land in the mineral region, and plants the same with fruit trees, acquires a vested right which will be protected as against one subsequently entering upon the same for mining purposes.

APPEAL from the District Court, Eleventh Judicial District, Placer County.

This action was commenced May 26th, 1861. Plaintiff averred in his complaint that in 1854 he inclosed with a substantial fence a tract of land containing about two acres, across the road from his residence, and planted the same with peach and apple trees; and that since said year he had annually cultivated the same with vegetables and strawberries, for the use of his family. That defendant was the owner of a ditch conveying water from Bear River for mining purposes, and passing a short distance above plaintiff's field; that in 1856 defendant constructed a reservoir, about one half mile above plaintiff's orchard, across the same ravine on which the orchard bordered, into which defendant turned and accumulated the water flowing from the ditch; that the water flowing in defendant's ditch contained large quantities of mud and sediment, which settled in the reservoir; that since the summer of 1860, defendant had been in the habit once in each week of opening the gate of the reservoir, and allowing the water accumulated therein to rush out and carry with it the said mud and sediment, which water, mud, and sediment flowed over and upon the garden, and injured and destroyed the fruit and destroyed the vegetables; that a part of the fruit trees had already been destroyed, and if defendant was suffered to continue its said acts, the trees would be all destroyed, and the garden rendered unfit for cultivation.

Wixon v. Bear River and Auburn Water and Mining Co.

The complaint prayed for judgment for damages and for a perpetual injunction.

The answer averred, that the land of plaintiff was public land, in the mineral region, and contained valuable mines of gold; and that it was situated along and across a ravine, a natural water course, and that for a long time defendant had been in the habit of using the ravine for the purpose of conveying the water of its ditch to mines below, to be used for mining; that the injury to plaintiff's garden, if any, had been caused by miners digging up the bed of the ravine above plaintiff's garden, and by obstructions placed in the ravine below the garden; that defendant was engaged in selling water to miners for mining purposes, and had a right to the use of the ravine as a channel for the conveyance of its water, etc.

The answer also denied all the material allegations of the complaint, except the fact that plaintiff had inclosed his garden and planted his fruit trees in 1854, and that defendant's reservoir was constructed in 1860.

The jury found a verdict for plaintiff for damages, and the Court decreed a perpetual injunction restraining defendant from allowing the water or mud or sediment from its reservoir to flow down upon plaintiff's garden so as to injure the same.

The following are the instructions given by the Court to the jury, to which defendant excepted:

"If the plaintiff was in the possession of his premises before the construction of the defendant's reservoir, then the defendant has no right to run out the water accumulating therein, carrying with it sand and sediment, on to the plaintiff's premises, and to his injury, and if defendant has done this, you will find for plaintiff.

"If the plaintiff possessed his premises prior to the appropriation of the water of the ravine by defendant, than the defendant's appropriation was subject to the prior rights of the plaintiff, and if this is so, then the defendant is liable for injuries resulting to the plaintiff's premises from its use of such water subsequently appropriated."

The following are the instructions asked by defendant and refused, to which refusal defendant excepted:

"If the jury find that defendant is a company for the purpose of supplying water to miners for mining purposes, and that the premises and ravine mentioned in this case are within the mining district of this State, then the defendant has the right to appropriate, by means of a reservoir or otherwise, the natural waters of Miners' Ravine, and also the right to the necessary means for such enjoyment.

"The plaintiff cannot by appropriation of land or otherwise prevent the free flow of water and tailings in a natural ravine situated in a mineral district; and any improvements created or erected in the channel of a ravine, must be subject to the right of miners upon the ravine, and also the right of defendant to a free enjoyment of its right, and a free and unmolested flow of water.

"All miners, and defendant as a company organized for mining purposes, have the right to the free use and benefit of natural water courses and reservoirs, and plaintiff has no right to interfere in any manner with such right, and if by reason of plaintiff's interference with the free use of the reservoir he has suffered injury, defendant is not responsible.

"The right to use and enjoy the ravine and its privileges carries with it the right to such privileges as are necessary to the enjoyment of the right."

The following are the only grounds of appeal set forth in the statement:

"Defendant's grounds of appeal are as follows:

"The Court erred in giving the instructions to the jury which were excepted to by defendant, and also erred in refusing to give the instructions requested by defendant, by reason of which the jury were induced to render a verdict contrary to law and contrary to the evidence."

Wilson v. Bear River and Auburn Water and Mining Co.

A. S. Higgins, for Appellant.

The two instructions with respect to the rights of the parties by reason of the times of their location, are clearly erroneous.

Such a doctrine, if sustained, would result in the greatest injury to the mining interests of the State, and one person may, simply by prior location in a ravine, so fill up and obstruct the same as to prevent any mining operations above, even in the richest mineral districts; because it might, and probably would, result in flowing water, tailings, and sediments, around and upon his premises.

In granting to the people of the State the right to mine, the Legislature and laws of the State grant the right to the enjoyment of such privileges as are necessary to the enjoyment of the right; and the seventh instruction and other instructions asked by defendant and refused, relating to the subject matter of the seventh, should have been given to the jury, and the Court erred in refusing them. (Clark v. Duval, 15 Cal. 88; Tartar v. Spring Creek W. & M. Company, 5 Cal. 398.)

A license to work the mines implies a permission to extract and remove the mineral. (Boggs v. Merced Mining Company, 14 Cal. 374.)

It is not necessary to multiply authorities upon the question so often settled by this Court, that miners, and this appellant and company organized for mining purposes, have the right to enter upon mineral lands for the purpose of extracting gold therefrom, and also to appropriate and use the water of ravines and natural water courses for mining purposes; and such a right would be barren and of no avail, if any person may so obstruct and destroy the means of enjoying the right as to render its enjoyment absolutely impossible.

If, therefore, one desires to appropriate the bed of a ravine, and divert or obstruct the channel, he must leave or construct such channel or outlet as will be sufficient for the purpose of the rain, and such as to allow the water to flow off. And the Court erred in refusing to give to the jury the instructions asked upon this point. (The Bear River and Auburn W. & M. Co. v. York Mining Co., 8 Cal. 333.)

S. Heydenfeldt, also for Appellant.

The first instruction at request of defendant, which was refused by the Court, ought to have been given.

The simple right of appropriation has been recognized in many previous decisions. (Stoakes v. Barrett, 5 Cal. 39; Irwin v. Phillips, 5 Cal. 143; Conger v. Weaver, 6 Cal. 556.)

So with the second instruction refused.

A ravine is one of the natural drains of the earth's land surface, and should no more be obstructed from the purposes of its natural creation than the bed of a river.

Tuttle & Hillyer, for Respondent.

It is defendant, and not plaintiff, who has impeded the channel of the ravine.

Had the water been allowed its natural flow every day in the week, plaintiff would have sustained no injury, and this action would not have been brought.

If we use defendant's own argument, it would abate his reservoir as a nuisance, and compel him to construct it in some place where he would not entirely stop the flow of water down the ravine.

He has constructed a high wall entirely across a natural channel.

Besides, the argument, if good for anything, proves too much. The argument, as here made by defendant, would allow this corporation to build its reservoir anywhere.

They might go immediately above the residence of a family, and in a short time cover up or destroy the house; yet, defendant would say, as do its counsel here, that the house was but of little value, and miners had a right to mine on public lands; that the right to mine carried with it all the incidents necessary; that defendant was the sole judge of what these incidents were—and, therefore, family residences, gardens, orchards, etc., were all held and occupied at defendant's mercy.

Wixon v. Bear River and Auburn Water and Mining Co.

Defendant's instructions, which were asked and refused, in the first place had no application to the case in point; and second, as abstract propositions of law are incorrect.

The instructions given are fully favorable to defendant as the circumstances warrant. (See Smith v. Doe, 15 Cal. 100; Gillan v. Hutchinson, 16 Cal. 153; Burdge v. Underwood, 6 Cal. 45; Clark v. Duval, 15 Cal. 185; Esmond v. Chew, 15 Cal. 142.)

By the Court, SANDERSON, C. J.

We cannot notice the argument of counsel for appellant as to the sufficiency of the evidence to sustain the verdict, nor as to the question of costs, nor the correctness of the decree for an injunction, because they are not embraced in the grounds of appeal set forth in the statement. (Barrett et al. v. Tewksbury and Wife, 15 Cal. 354; Reynolds v. Lawrence, 15 Cal. 359.) Under the rule laid down in those cases, we can only consider the points made upon the instructions given and refused by the Court.

Nor do we deem it necessary to notice in detail the instructions of which the appellant complains. It is sufficient to say, that after a careful examination we are satisfied they correctly present the law applicable to the facts, and to the legal effect of which they are addressed.

As to the instructions asked for by the defendants: The first was properly refused, because it is so broad and unqualified in its terms that it might have misled the jury. As an abstract proposition, even, it is too general, because it ignores entirely the idea of prior vested rights in others, to which the right claimed by defendant might be subordinate; and, as applicable to the particular facts of this case, it ignores entirely the prior rights of the plaintiff, and by necessary implication negatives the idea that he had any such rights; thus striking from under it the very foundation upon which his cause of action rested, although such rights were conclusively established by the testimony.

The second instruction is undoubtedly law, but it had already been twice given in substance, and that was doubtless the reason why it was refused.

The four remaining instructions refused by the Court are founded upon the theory that, in the mineral districts of this State, the rights of miners and persons owning ditches constructed for mining purposes are paramount to all other rights and interests of a different character, regardless of the time or mode of their acquisition; thus annihilating the doctrine of priority in all cases where the contest is between a miner or ditch owner and one who claims the exercise of any other kind of right or the ownership of any other kind of interest. To such a doctrine we are unable to subscribe, nor do we think it clothed with a plausibility sufficient to justify us in combating it.

The judgment is affirmed.

JOHN W. OWEN v. THOMAS H. MORTON, JOHN PIERCE, H. HUBBERD, A. CHRYSLER, P. ANDERSON, C. JOHNSON, R. M. CLARK, ANTONIO DE SANTOS, AND JOHN FERRILL.

POSSESSION OF ONE TENANT IN COMMON.—Where one tenant in common is in the exclusive possession of land, the presumption of law is that he holds for himself and his co-tenant, and, to rebut such presumption, there must be proof of acts or declarations on his part indicating his intention to exclude his co-tenant.

WHAT AMOUNTS TO OUSTER OF CO-TENANT.—To enable the tenant out of possession to maintain ejectment against the co-tenant in the exclusive possession of the land, it is not necessary to prove an actual ouster; but proof that the tenant in possession appropriates the entire use or profits of the land, under a claim of exclusive right, or with a manifest intent to possess the whole exclusively, is sufficient.

SAME.—Any act of the co-tenant in the exclusive possession which manifests an intention on his part to hold exclusively for himself, is equivalent, in law, to an actual ouster.

WHAT DOES AMOUNT TO OUSTER OF CO-TENANT.—Proof that the co-tenant is in the exclusive possession, and that he does not claim by deed or lease from his co-tenant out of possession, is not sufficient to show an ouster or adverse possession.

FINDINGS OF FACT—WHEN PRESUMED CORRECT.—When the record shows that all the evidence introduced on the trial is not embodied in the statement, the presumption is that the findings and judgment of the Court below are warranted by the evidence, although the statement contains no evidence upon which to base such findings and judgment.

SAME.—Every intendment is in favor of the verdict or decision of the Court below, and it will be presumed that the omitted evidence warranted the judgment.

PROOF NECESSARY TO RECOVER IN EJECTMENT.—In order to entitle a plaintiff in ejectment to recover, he must show a right of possession in himself and a possession in the defendant of the demanded premises at the time the action is brought.

APPEAL from the District Court, Seventh Judicial District, Solano County.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the Court.

M. A. Wheaton, for Appellants, cited Pico v. Columbet, 12 Cal. 420, and as to De Santos' case, Garner v. Marshall, 9 Cal. 268; Clink v. Cohen, 13 Cal. 623.

Whitman & Wells, for Respondent.

The title being deraigned under patent from the State, and the possession of defendants admitted, the ouster is fully admitted by the stipulation. Defendants having occupied exclusively, is an ouster of their co-tenants, and there is no error in the judgment. (Adams on Ejectment, 137; 1 Greenleaf's Cruise, Secs. 20, 13; Jackson v. Tibbetts, 9 Cow. 241; Reay v. Goodwin, 16 Mass. 1.)

By the Court, CURREY, J.

This is an action of ejectment, commenced by the plaintiff, on the 11th of April, 1860, against Thomas H. Morton and others for the recovery of the possession of a tract of land in Solano County, whereon is situated the City of Suisun. The complaint is in the usual form in such cases, counting on title in the plaintiff on the 24th day of November, 1855, and entry and ouster of the plaintiff on that day by the defendants, and an unlawful withholding of the premises by them from thence to and at the commencement of the action, to the great damage of the plaintiff, etc. To this complaint nine of the defendants appeared and answered, to which answers the plaintiff filed replications. Subsequently the same defendants, by leave of the Court, made and filed amended answers, by which they pleaded — first, the general issue; and in the second place, that they were each in the possession of a small piece of the land described in the complaint, which they respectively held in severalty under deeds of conveyance of the one undivided third interest in the respective portions by each of them held in possession, derived from the plaintiff or his grantees, and that when they obtained such deeds each of them was already in the peaceable possession of the parcels of land respectively described in such deeds of conveyance; and the defendant Chrysler further averred that as to one parcel of the premises, he had a conveyance of the whole of the plaintiff's interests therein, derived from the plaintiff or from his grantees.

To the amended answers the plaintiff replied, denying each and every allegation of new matter therein contained.

At the trial the plaintiff gave in evidence a patent from the State, bearing date the 24th day of November, 1855, granting to him the land described in his complaint. By a stipulation entered into for the purposes of the trial, it appears that each of the nine defendants limited his defense in the action to parcels of the premises described therein; and the parties agreed by this stipulation that each defendant had a deed of conveyance of the undivided third part of the parcel of land in respect to which he defended, by which he acquired the plaintiff's title to such undivided one third of the parcel of the premises by him occupied.

At a term of the District Court, held in Solano County in April, 1863, a judgment was rendered in favor of plaintiff against each of the defendants for the recovery of the undivided two third parts of the parcels of land which the defendants respectively had in possession and for costs of the action. At a subsequent day a motion for a new trial was made, and the same was denied. From these judgments, and from the order denying a new trial, the defendants duly appealed.

The counsel for appellants assigns as a ground requiring the reversal of the judgments, that the evidence did not show or tend to show that defendants, or any or either of them, held the possession of the premises, or any part or parts thereof, adversely to the plaintiff; nor that the plaintiff had even demanded the possession; nor that he had even been kept out of the possession of the same by the defendants.

By the answers of these defendants, as also by the stipulation of the parties, it appears that the defendants were severally tenants in common with the plaintiff of the distinct portions of the land of which they were in possession, and with him had the right to its enjoyment. The rule seems to be settled that where one having title as a tenant in common is in the exclusive possession of premises, he is presumed to hold for himself and his co-tenant, and to rebut such presumption there must be proof of acts or declarations on his part indicating his intention to exclude his co-tenant. (Humbert v. Trinity Church, 24 Wend. 587; 2 Washburn on Real Property, 491.) Proof of an actual ouster—that is, as was said by Lord Mansfield in Fishar v. Prosser, 1 Cowper, 217, “a turning out by the shoulders” by one tenant in common of another—is not indispensable to the maintenance of an action of ejectment by the tenant out of possession against his co-tenant in the exclusive occupancy of the estate owned in common; but an appropriation by him who is in possession of the entire use or profits of the land, under a claim of exclusive right, or with a manifest intent to possess the whole exclusively, is equivalent, in law, to an actual ouster of his co-tenant. (Parker v. Proprietors, etc., 3 Metcalf, 102; Manchester v. Doddridge, 3 Indiana, 360.) In Ricard v. Williams, 7 Wheat. 121, the Court say: “An ouster or disseisin is not, indeed, to be presumed from the mere act of sole possession; but it may be proved by such possession, accompanied with a notorious claim of an exclusive right.” Mr. Preston, in reference to this subject, says: “It is a rule of law that the seisin of one joint tenant is the seisin of his companions as well as himself. The same rule is applied to co-parceners and tenants in common. The possession of one of them is constructively the possession of all; and hence it seems to follow that possession or seisin of one will be the seisin of others as against all strangers, and the possession of one will constructively be held for the benefit of himself and his companion. To disseise his companions, there must be such acts as are constructively equivalent to an ouster—as the denial of right to the rent, or any part, or the possession of any part of the land, or an exclusive possession for a long time, so as to afford the presumption of a disseisin.” (2 Preston on Abstracts, 291; See, also, Barr v. Gratz, 4 Wheat. 223; Bradstreet v. Huntington, 5 Peters, 402; Clapp v. Bromagham, 9 Cow. 530; Prescott v. Nevers, 4 Mason, 330; Fishar v. Prosser, 1 Cowper, 217; Peaceable v. Read, 1 East. 573.)

It was proved on the trial, by one witness, that these defendants were, at the time the action was commenced, in the possession of the portions of the demanded premises by them severally occupied adversely to the plaintiff. This the witness stated in general terms, without undertaking to specify acts or declarations of the defendants from which he deduced his conclusion that their possession was adverse; but on being more particularly examined on the point, he said that when he spoke of the parties claiming adversely, he meant they did not claim by deed or lease from plaintiff. This testimony, taken together, falls short of establishing an adverse possession, and furnishes no evidence of an ouster of the plaintiff by defendants; and, were it not that the record fails to negative the fact that there was other proof on the subject, it would be necessary to reverse the judgments for want of evidence to maintain the essential averment of ouster contained in the complaint. But the record shows that the evidence embodied in the statement used on the motion for a new trial, and which is now before this Court on appeal, was not all the evidence produced on the trial, and hence we are bound to presume the finding of the Court below of an ouster of the plaintiff by the defendants was warranted by evidence which is not embodied in the statement. It appears from the record that the testimony in the case was taken before a referee, and that at least thirty-six pages of the referee's report of the evidence is omitted from the statement; besides which, the cross-examination of two witnesses sworn in the case is all of their testimony to be found in the statement. The rule of law in such cases is that every intendment must be in favor of the verdict or decision of the Court below, and in support of the judgment it will be presumed that the omitted evidence authorized the decision and judgment, unless there be something in the record to overcome such presumption. (Belt v. Davis, 1 Cal. 139; Ringgold v. Haven, 1 Cal. 115, 116; Ford v. Holton, 5 Cal. 321; Dickinson v. Van Horn, 9 Cal. 210, 211.) This disposes of the questions on appeal as to all the appellants, except Antonio de Santos.

The counsel for the appellant Antonio de Santos alleges that the judgment against him is erroneous, for the reason that it appears from the record that he was not, at the time the action was commenced, in the possession of the parcel of land for the recovery of which judgment was rendered against him. The complaint was filed and summons issued in the action in April, 1860. The summons was placed in the hands of the Sheriff early in the year 1861, and was served on the said Santos, as appears by the Sheriff's return, "before or on the 15th day of February, 1861." When the action was commenced, Santos was residing on a part of the land described in the complaint, from which he removed, before he filed his answer in the cause, to the portion of the premises of which he was in possession at the time of the trial, and for the recovery of which alone judgment passed against him. To this portion of the demanded premises the said Santos had acquired an interest of one undivided third part by a conveyance of the same from the plaintiff, or from a grantee of the plaintiff, so that, for aught that appears, he was in the possession not otherwise than according to his right. As already stated, if a person enter into lands, having a title and right of entry, his entry and possession is deemed to be in conformity to his title. In this case, though Santos' possession may have been exclusive, or of the entire parcel of land, it does not follow, from this circumstance alone, that it was adverse to the plaintiff. In McClung v. Ross, 5 Wheat. 124, Mr. Chief Justice Marshall said: "That one tenant in common may oust his co-tenant and hold in severalty, is not to be questioned. But a silent possession, accompanied with no act which can amount to an ouster or give notice to his co-tenant that his possession is adverse, ought not, we think, to be construed into an adverse possession."

The intendment in support of the judgments against the other defendants, founded on the presumption that there was in the testimony omitted from the statement evidence of an ouster, cannot be indulged in support of the judgment against Santos, because it appears by stipulation, as well as by the evidence in the cause, that he entered upon the parcel of land for which judgment was obtained against him after the suit was commenced; hence the finding of the Court that he entered and ousted the plaintiff, as alleged in the complaint, was not warranted. In Owen against Fowler, 24 Cal. 192, it is held that in order to entitle a plaintiff in ejectment to recover, he must show a right of possession in himself, and a possession in the defendant, at the time the action is brought, and if he fails to establish either of these facts, he cannot recover.

The judgment against the defendant Antonio de Santos must be reversed, and the action against him dismissed, and the judgments against the other defendants, who are appellants in this case, must be affirmed, and it is accordingly so ordered and adjudged.

CYRUS A. EASTMAN v. B. C. TURMAN AND ALEXANDER ELY.

ACTION ON NOTE—PARTIES TO.—Where a promissory note and a mortgage to secure the same are executed and delivered to the same person, and the payee of the note and mortgagee indorses the note and assigns the mortgage to a third person, who brings an action on the note and to foreclose the mortgage, it is not a misjoinder of parties defendant to join as defendants the indorser and maker of the note.

SAME — NOTE — MORTGAGE.—In such case, under the provisions of the Practice Act, it is not an improper joinder of two causes of action to sue the indorser of the note on his liability as such, and to ask a decree against the mortgagor foreclosing the mortgage.

NOTICE TO INDORSER.—A notice given to the indorser of a promissory note, made payable at a banking house, which states "that the note, on the day it matured, was presented for payment at the banking house of (naming the banking house where the same was payable,) and payment thereof demanded, and thereupon the same was duly protested for non-payment," is a sufficient notice of demand, refusal, and non-payment, to charge the indorser.

INDORSER OF NOTE — PAYABLE IN INSTALMENTS.—Where such note is payable in instalments due at different times, and the demand on the maker is not made until the last instalment falls due, and the demand is made for the whole amount due on the note, including the prior instalments, the demand is good for the purpose of charging the indorser for the last instalment.

APPEAL from the District Court, Seventh Judicial District, Sonoma County.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the Court.

Pratt & Clarke, and E. R. Carpentier, for Appellant.

James Rice, for Respondent.

Two causes of action are here improperly united, to wit: A suit in equity to foreclose the mortgage in which the respondent Ely has no interest, and a suit at law against him, Ely, as the indorser of the note which the mortgage was given to secure. (Practice Act, Sec. 64; Bigelow v. Gove, 7 Cal. 133; Gates v. Kieff, 7 Cal. 124; 1 Van Santvoord's Pld'g, pp. 184-200, and notes.)

The complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action against the respondent Ely.

The note sued on is a note payable by instalments, each of which instalments is, in itself, an independent note, and the indorser entitled to due notice of demand, refusal, and non-payment of each instalment when the same becomes due, as well as of the interest thereon, when made payable at specified times, as in the present case.

There is no allegation in the complaint that when the second and last note or instalment became due there was any demand made for the payment of the same, or any notice given to the indorser Ely of any refusal to pay the same, or of any demand, refusal, and non-payment of the interest specified therein, at the several times when the same became due and payable.

On the contrary, it appears on the face of the complaint that at the time the said second note or instalment became due, payment of the whole sum of fifteen hundred dollars (being the amount of both of the said notes or instalments) was then demanded; thus treating the two notes or instalments as one entire sum due at that date; and it is not alleged in said complaint, that upon such demand for the entire sum of both the said notes or instalments, payment was refused, or that there were no funds at the place where the said notes or instalments were made payable to meet the same. It is simply alleged that payment was demanded of the whole entire amount of both of the said notes or instalments, and that thereupon the same was protested without alleging the material fact of the refusal to pay, which refusal was essential to authorize the protest.

Where a note is payable by instalments, each instalment is regarded by all the authorities as a separate note, upon the becoming due of which, the holder is entitled to sue; and, if he fail to take the proper steps for holding the indorser, the latter is by analogy and reason discharged, and this equally whether it regard the principal note or the interest which is a part of it, when provided in the note itself to be paid at specified times; the indorser's liability being contingent on due notice of the default of the maker as to every part of the contract. (Baily on Bills, 346; 11 M. & W. 374; Cooley v. Rose, 3 Mass. 221; Greenleaf v. Kellogg, 2 Ibid, 568; Eastabrook v. Moulton, 9 Ibid, 228; Bander v. Bander, 7 Barbour, 560; Heywod v. Perrin, 10 Pickering, 258; Green v. Palmer, 15 Cal. 415; 2d Chitty's Pleadings, 121, 125.)

By the Court, SAWYER, J.

The defendant, Turman, executed in favor of defendant Ely a note for fifteen hundred dollars, payable in equal instalments on the first day of December, 1860, and the first day of December, 1861, with interest payable quarterly. The note was secured by a mortgage. Defendant Ely indorsed the note and assigned the mortgage to plaintiff. This action is brought to recover the amount due, and to foreclose the mortgage. The defendant, Ely, demurred to the complaint. The demurrer having been sustained, and the plaintiff declining to amend, judgment was rendered in favor of Ely. The appeal is from the order sustaining the demurrer, and from the judgment entered thereon.

The first ground of demurrer is, that there is a misjoinder of parties defendant, it not appearing that Ely has any interest in the foreclosure of the mortgage adverse to plaintiff. But he is sued as an indorser, and sought to be held personally liable in that character. He is properly made a party, under section fifteen of the Practice Act. The second ground is that two causes of action are improperly joined—a cause of action on the note against Ely, as indorser, and a cause of action in equity to foreclose the mortgage. There is no misjoinder in this respect. On the contrary, section two hundred and forty-six of the Practice Act provides that there shall be but one action for the recovery of the debt and the enforcement of the right secured by the mortgage. As to defendant Turman, at least, it would be necessary to demand all the relief to which he was entitled in this action.

The remaining ground of the demurrer is, that the complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. The first point under this head is, that the defendant, Ely, does not appear to be liable for the whole amount of the note and interest, for the reason that it does not appear that any demand was made at the time the several instalments of interest, or the first instalment of seven hundred and fifty dollars principal, fell due, or that he had any notice of the dishonor as to these payments. Admitting this to be true, and that he is discharged from liability as to these sums, (and he probably is, if no demand was made, or notice given, as they actually fell due,) still, if the complaint shows a good cause of action as to the last instalment, it is not obnoxious to the demurrer on this ground.

This brings us to the question as to whether the complaint states facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action against the defendant, Ely, for the last instalment of seven hundred and fifty dollars due on the note. This was payable, by the terms of the note, on the first day of December, 1861. The last day of grace, therefore, fell on the 4th.

The plaintiff alleges "that said note is now past due; that as its maturity, to wit: on the fourth day of December, 1861, it was presented for payment at the banking house of Tallant & Wilde, at San Francisco, where the same was payable, and payment thereof demanded, and thereupon the same was duly protested for non-payment, of which defendants had due notice."

It is insisted that this averment does not state a refusal to pay, and that a refusal was essential to authorize a protest; that one of the facts necessary to charge the indorser is therefore wanting. In discussing the form of the notice necessary to be given to the indorser in order to charge him, Mr. Parsons, in his work on Bills, page 471, says: "The word 'protested,' used in a notice, clearly implies that the note or bill has been dishonored in all cases where a protest is necessary, and by the weight of authority this word sufficiently designates that the necessary steps have been taken, even in the case of inland bills and promissory notes, where the law does not require a protest."

Upon the same point, in the case of Cayuga County Bank v. Warden, 1 Comstock, 419, the Court say: "Another objection to the notice is, that it does not state that payment of this note was ever demanded, or that it was refused. The notice * * * states that S. Warden's note * * * 'was this evening protested for non-payment.' * * * The case of Mills v. Bank of United States, 11 Wheat. 431, shows that it need not be stated in the notice that a demand of payment was made; that it is sufficient to state the fact of non-payment of the note, which the notice in this case alleges, as it states that the note was protested for non-payment. * * * I am of opinion that the notice under the circumstances of this case was sufficient." The allegation in this cause is that payment was "demanded, and thereupon the same was duly protested for non-payment." If these words clearly import a refusal, as held in the authorities cited, we do not see why the averment of the complaint is not a sufficient allegation of demand, refusal, and notice of non-payment. The complaint also contains an averment that no part of the sum due on the note, except the first instalment of interest, had been paid. We think the complaint sufficient in this respect. But it is insisted that the averments under consideration show that the demand on the fourth of December, 1861, was for the whole amount due on the note, including the prior instalments and the several instalments of unpaid interest before due, and for this reason it was not a good demand for the purpose of charging the indorser for the last instalment which fell due on that day.

The maker of the note was certainly liable for the whole amount. The demand of the greater sum included the less. The indorser had notice of the demand and dishonor of the note, and he was, therefore, in a condition to take any measures he might deem necessary to protect his interest. He could pay the amount for which he was liable, and place himself in a position to pursue the maker. We cannot see that he is in any manner placed in a worse position by reason of a demand of the whole amount due from the maker. Suppose there had been separate notes for the different instalments, instead of one note, and the demand had not been made till the last fell due—that both were demanded together, and notice given to the indorser that on that day the two notes, describing them, had been presented, demand made, and the notes protested for non-payment, would it be pretended that the indorser would not be charged upon the one that fell due on that day, on the ground that the payment of the other had been demanded at the same time? We think not. We have not been referred to any authority showing that such a demand as is alleged would not be effectual to charge the indorser to the extent of the instalment which fell due on that day. We think it good to that extent, at least, and that the complaint shows a good cause of action against Ely for the sum of seven hundred and fifty dollars and any interest that had not become payable prior to the time the last instalment of principal fell due.

The judgment is reversed and cause remanded for further proceedings.

J. D. LODGE v. B. C. TURMAN, ZADOCK JACKSON,
AND WM. M. WAGGLE.

DEED ABSOLUTE ON ITS FACE—WHEN A MORTGAGE.—If a deed of land, absolute on its face, is executed and delivered in consideration of a precedent debt due from the grantor to the grantee, and there is at the time a verbal understanding between the parties that the grantor shall be entitled to a reconveyance upon the payment of the debt, then the conveyance is a mortgage.

SAME—PAROL EVIDENCE.—Parol evidence is admissible to show that a deed, absolute on its face, was intended as a mortgage.

SUIT AT LAW ON A NOTE—DEFENSE, PAYMENT BY DEED OF LAND.—Where an action is brought in a court of law upon a promissory note, and a defense is interposed that the note has been paid by the execution and delivery of a deed of land by the maker to the payee, and the defendant, in proving the allegations of the answer, shows that the conveyance was in fact intended as a mortgage to secure the note, plaintiff is entitled to judgment.

APPEAL from the District Court, Seventh Judicial District, Sonoma County.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the Court.

J. Temple, for Appellant.

This action is brought upon a promissory note against three defendants, each of whom is a principal upon the note.

The only defence set up is payment. The fact of payment is denied in the replication, and this is the only issue in the case.

There is no evidence in the case which tends to prove payment. On the contrary, the evidence of Turman, one of the defendants, proves conclusively that the note has not been paid, but tends to prove that he had given a mortgage to secure it.

There being no evidence to establish the only defense set up, the verdict and judgment are evidently contrary to the evidence and against law.

The judgment is that the note had been paid, and would prevent the plaintiff from foreclosing his mortgage, (if it be a mortgage,) when, by their own testimony, they ought to have that right.

The first and second instructions asked by the plaintiff, both contain correct propositions of law, were directly in point, and should have been given.

That these instructions are law, is clearly established in Pierce v. Robinson, 13 Cal. 125, and other decisions of this Court.

That they are in point, is evident from the fact that they relate to the question as to whether a certain transaction, concerning which testimony had been given, amounted to payment, the only issue in the case.

They take nothing from the province of the jury; for they simply say that if the jury find from the evidence that certain facts exists, then the law gives a certain effect to those facts.

James W. Coffroth, and Francis McConnell, for Respondent.

The instructions asked for by plaintiff were very properly refused by the Court below: First—because the instructions themselves are not law; Second—because the instructions, if law, are neither relevant to the case, nor warranted by the pleadings.

The question of payment, in any view, is one of fact, to be determined by the jury. (Griffith v. Grogan, 12 Cal. 324; 2 Am. Lead. Cases, 180.)

The instrument in question is claimed, acknowledged, and admitted, by both the plaintiff and the defendants in the pleadings, to be a deed; and the consideration of this deed being an antecedent debt, consisting of the note and other indebtedness, the legal inference is that the debt was discharged upon the execution of the deed. (Ford v. Irwin, 18 Cal. 117.)

The instruction, if relevant, is incorrect in this respect: that it takes away from the jury the right to pass upon the intention of the parties as to whether the deed was intended as a mortgage. The question is one of intentions, to be gathered from the whole transaction. (Ford v. Irwin, 18 Cal. 117.)

It is not incumbent on the Court to instruct the jury upon mere abstract questions of law irrelevant to the case, as serving only to bewilder and mislead them from the true issue to be determined. (Fowler v. Smith, 2 Cal. 45; Benham v. Rowe, 2 Cal. 387.)

Instructions to the jury are properly refused when not warranted by the pleadings. (Thompson v. Lee, 8 Cal. 280.)

That the instructions were neither warranted by the pleadings, nor relevant to the case, is evident from the issues made by the pleadings.

The plaintiff brings an action against three defendants upon a promissory note. Two of the defendants answer, and admit the making of the note, and that they signed the same to accommodate Turman, the other defendant; that Turman, on the 6th of August, 1860, (some two weeks after the note was given,) executed a deed to plaintiff of certain premises, in satisfaction and discharge of the note. Plaintiff replies, and admits the making of the deed on the 25th day of July, 1860, and that the note formed no part of the consideration of the deed, without stating what the consideration of the deed was; but says nothing about the deed being intended as a mortgage. The pleadings are verified. The evidence fully sustains all the material allegations in defendants' answer, and establishes that the deed, though bearing date July 25th, 1860, was not signed and acknowledged until the 6th of August, 1860.

Now, under the pleadings, there is no doubt but the instrument in question is a deed, and the plaintiff having stated in his replication that the note sued upon formed no part of the consideration of the deed, the instructions certainly could not be material for plaintiff, but entirely unwarranted by the pleadings, and irrelevant to the case.

The only material point in issue is simply a question of fact as to the payment of the note. The jury find against the plaintiff, and in favor of the defendants, and their finding is conclusive. (Griffith v. Grogan, 12 Cal. 324.)

By the Court, CURREY, J.

This is an action of assumpsit, brought by the plaintiff against the defendants on a promissory note by them made and delivered to the plaintiff, bearing date the 25th day of July, 1860, by which they jointly and severally promise to pay to the plaintiff or order, five hundred dollars, three months after the date of the note, with interest thereon at the rate of three per cent per month. Each of the defendants was duly served with process, and two of them, viz.: Jackson and Waggle, appeared and answered, but the defendant Turman, having failed to appear or answer, was duly defaulted. The defendants Jackson and Waggle answered jointly, admitting the making and delivery of the note, a copy of which was contained in the complaint, and then, as a defense, pleaded that the note was paid and satisfied by Turman on the sixth day of August, 1860; and they further answered that they signed the note, without consideration to themselves, as an accommodation to said Turman, who shortly afterwards, in order to relieve them from liability and to pay and discharge the note, conveyed to plaintiff certain real estate in the Town of Petaluma, in Sonoma County, for the consideration of one thousand dollars, and that the plaintiff paid to Turman five hundred dollars as a part of such consideration, and that it was agreed between them that the remaining five hundred dollars should be applied in satisfaction and discharge of the note. The plaintiff replied, controverting the material averments of the answer.

The issue joined was tried by a jury, who rendered a verdict in favor of the defendants, on which judgment was entered in favor of the three defendants by name, against the plaintiff. A motion for a new trial was afterwards made and denied, and the appeal in the case is from the order denying the motion for a new trial and from the judgment.

On the trial the defendants gave in evidence the deed of conveyance referred to in the answer of Jackson and Waggle. This deed bears even date with the note, and the consideration expressed therein is one thousand dollars; but Turman testified that it was executed in fact on the sixth day of August, and was in payment of the note in question and another sum of five hundred dollars which he owed plaintiff. He also testified that by agreement with the plaintiff he had the privilege of redeeming the premises described in the deed upon paying to the plaintiff one thousand dollars, the consideration expressed in the deed, within twelve months after its execution. He further testified that he leased of the plaintiff the same premises for the term of one year, at the rate of thirty dollars a month; and in connection with this testimony a lease executed by the plaintiff and said Turman was introduced in evidence, which corresponded in date with the note and deed. Among other things, the lease contained this clause: "And the said lessee promises to pay the rent as follows, to wit: thirty dollars per month, payable at the end of each month; but if five hundred dollars, the amount of a note of Turman to Lodge, should be paid at the end of any month, then thereafter but fifteen dollars per month is to be paid, until the entire sum of money as above is fully paid."

A witness testified that at the time the deed was executed, the defendant Turman promised the plaintiff that he would pay the whole punctually at its maturity. The testimony being closed, the plaintiff requested the Court to instruct the jury, among other things, that if, at the time the deed was executed, there was an understanding between Lodge and Turman that there should be a re-conveyance of the land upon the payment of the note, then the document which purports to be a deed was a mortgage, and not a deed, although absolute on its face.

This instruction the Court refused to give to the jury, and to such refusal the plaintiff duly excepted, and on the motion for a new trial assigned this decision of the Court as error; and on appeal he again assigns this ruling of the Court as erroneous, and as demanding a reversal of the judgment.

From the evidence in the case, it is apparent that the question was directly presented as to the real character of the deed produced in evidence on the part of the defendants, and whether or not the parties intended it as an absolute conveyance, or as a mortgage to secure the payment of the note on which the action was brought. Turman, himself, testified that this note, and another sum of five hundred dollars, which he owed the plaintiff, was the consideration for the conveyance, and that he had the privilege of redeeming the premises by paying plaintiff one thousand dollars—the consideration expressed in the deed. From what was Turman to redeem the premises, if not from the incumbrance of the debts, to secure which he conveyed the same to the plaintiff? The language employed would seem to indicate the real character of the transaction, and that the conveyance was intended as a mortgage rather than as an absolute conveyance; and this intent is still more manifest from the clause in the lease to which reference has been made. Be this as it may, there was evidence before the Court from which to determine whether the deed given in evidence was executed and delivered in satisfaction and payment of the note, or whether the same was intended as a security for its payment. If this deed was intended by the parties as a mortgage, its character as such could not be defeated, because the deed is absolute on its face. The right of a mortgagor in such a case to redeem the property, by due performance of the condition on his part to be performed for the purpose, is an incident, as between the parties to the transaction, inseparably connected with the mortgage.

In Pierce v. Robinson, 18 Cal. 125, Mr. Justice Field says: "I consider parol evidence admissible in equity to show that a deed absolute on its face was intended as a mortgage, and that the restriction of the evidence to cases of fraud, accident, or mistake, in the creation of the instrument, is unsound in principle and unsupported by authority." And again he says: "As the equity upon which the Courts act arises from the real character of the transaction, it is of no consequence in what manner this character is established, whether by deed or other writing, or by parol. Whether the instrument—it not being apparent on its face—is to be regarded as a mortgage, depends upon the circumstances under which it was made and the relations subsisting between the parties. Evidence of these circumstances and relations is submitted, not for the purpose of contradicting or varying the deed, but to establish an equity superior to its terms."

Judge Willard, in his Treatise on Equity Jurisprudence, 429, says: "It is well settled that parol evidence is admissible in a Court of equity to show that a conveyance absolute in its terms was intended as a security for a debt." And he refers to many cases to sustain this doctrine. The same learned author also says: "As between the parties themselves, or purchasers with notice, or without consideration, the true character of the transaction may be shown, notwithstanding the Statute of Frauds."

If it be objected that the plaintiff's action was in a Court of law, and that therefore parol evidence was not admissible to show that the deed produced was intended as a mortgage, the answer to the objection is that the defense set up by the defendants who answered was that by the conveyance the note was paid and satisfied, and in their attempt to make good their averment they proved enough to determine the true character of the conveyance, and that it was intended as a mortgage. The deed being a mortgage in fact, it could not operate as a payment of the amount of the note and the interest thereon, and hence the defendants' liability to pay the debt remained subsisting at the commencement of the action and at the trial.

The instruction requested should have been given, and the refusal of the Court to so instruct was erroneous.

Camden v. Vail et al.

The judgment is therefore reversed and the cause remanded for a new trial.

CHARLES CAMDEN v. G. C. S. VAIL, AND FRANCIS CROSBY.

MORTGAGE—MARRIED WOMAN.—Where a mortgage is executed by a married woman upon real estate for the purchase money of the same, and such mortgage is void and cannot be enforced by reason of defective execution, the assignee of the mortgage by virtue of the assignment does not acquire any such interest in the mortgaged property as to entitle him to a decree rescinding the contract and setting aside the deed of conveyance, and restoring the parties to their original condition.

MORTGAGE—ASSIGNEE OF.—The assignee of such mortgage does not succeed to all the rights held by the mortgagee by virtue of his having been the owner of the premises, and of his having conveyed them without obtaining the stipulated consideration, but he only acquires such rights as the mortgage carries with it.

Quere? Would the mortgagee, himself, be entitled to such relief?

APPEAL from the District Court, Ninth Judicial District, Shasta County.

The facts of this case will be found reported in the 23d Cal. 633.

Robinson & McConnell, for Appellants.

This case has been ordered for re-hearing upon this one point: "Can the transaction set forth in this complaint be treated as a conditional sale" so as to do equity between the parties in this suit?

To this question I answer, "No!" for the following reasons:

1st. Neither of the original parties to the contract are before the Court in this suit, and it is impossible to bring them in so as to do justice between them. What are the simple facts? J. H. Robinson sold to E. M. C. Vail a certain piece of property for the sum of ten thousand dollars, and received four thousand dollars down, and took a note and mortgage for six thousand dollars. So far the case is plain and easily understood. After this, J. H. Robinson, the vendor, sells, by indorsement, the note and mortgage to the plaintiff, Camden, and Camden brings suit on the note, and to foreclose the mortgage against G. C. S. Vail and Crosby. The Court holds, properly, that the suit cannot be maintained against the defendants, because they did not make the note or mortgage. What other right has Camden, the plaintiff? He bought a note and mortgage. So far as the defendants, or E. M. C. Vail, the maker, are concerned, the doctrine of caveat emptor applies to Camden, the plaintiff. If he has any remedy, it is against his assignor, J. H. Robinson, for selling him a note and mortgage which were worthless; but, as against the defendants, or the property, he can only act on his note and mortgage, and if they fail, his remedy is gone as to the defendants or the property.

Suppose the Court to be inclined to think there had been a fraud in the purchase which should require a Court to set aside the sale. The Court would not do so at the instance of a third party who had no interest in it; nor would the Court set aside the sale as to one party and deprive her of the property without the applicant putting that party in the same position in which she was at the outset. In this case, four thousand dollars of E. M. C. Vail was paid to J. H. Robinson. Before this sale can be set aside or annulled, this must be paid back. Does the plaintiff offer to pay back? No. Could the Court compel him to pay back that amount? No. Who is that money to be paid to? E. M. C. Vail, who is not a party in this suit, and so not within the jurisdiction of the Court. The Court cannot affect her right. Who is the four thousand dollars to be paid by? J. H. Robinson, who received it; and he is not before the Court. Thus, the parties are not before the Court, except to pass upon the note and mortgage as to the defendants.

George Cadwalader, for Respondent.

It so happens that the mortgage is void, and, consequently, incapable of enforcement, and, therefore, (equity refusing to interfere,) the deed being good, and the mortgage bad, the vendee gets the property without consideration, as fully so as if she had given therefor forged securities or counterfeit bank notes.

Circumstances like these, however, call into play one great head of equity jurisdiction called "Rescission and Cancellation," under which relief is given in various forms.

Thus, Adams, in his work on Equity, page 418, says: "In accordance with such a doctrine, a contract may be set aside, if made for a consideration which was really 'non existent.'" (Hitchcock v. Giddings, 4 Price, 55.) Again, page 416: "The decree in such a case will be that the conveyance shall be set aside as an absolute sale, but shall stand as security for the principal and interest of the money advanced." (1 Atkins, 801.)

In Hilliard on Vendors, page 16, it is said: "That a decree was proper ordering a partition among the heirs of C., and directing that B. should account for the rents and profits, be paid for the lasting improvements made by him, and refunded the purchase money paid by him since the death of C., with interest, and that A. should convey to the heirs according to their respective interests." (Lynn v. Lynn, 5 Gilman, 602.)

Hilliard on Vendors, page 802: "With regard to the respective rights of the parties after a sale has been rescinded, if the vendee has had the possession, he must account for the profits exceeding the improvements; he has a lien on the land for his purchase money and interest, and the value of the improvements, and is liable for rents, etc." (1 A. K. Marshall, 434.)

Thus it will be seen that the authorities support and commend equitable decrees which protect all outstanding equities.

The deed and the mortgage back are considered simultaneous acts, or parts of the same transaction. (Lassen v. Vance, 8 Cal. 271; Hilliard on Vendors, p. 27; Stow v. Tift, 15 Johnson, 462; Holbrook v. Finney, 4 Mass. 569.)

In Van Horne v. Crain, 1 Paige, 454, it was said: "Separate instruments, executed at the same time, and relating to the same subject matter, may be construed together, and taken as one instrument."

In Lynde v. Budd, 2 Paige, 192, Chancellor Walworth observed: "In this case the deed and mortgage, being given at the same time, are to be construed together as forming only one instrument or contract; the infant cannot avoid one part and affirm the other."

It is not an objection to this relief that Mrs. Vail is not a party to the suit, for upon the conveyance to her (which was during coverture) by force of the statute concerning "Husband and Wife," it became common property, and as such came under the sole control of the husband. (See sections 2 and 9 of Act; Wood's Digest, 487-8.)

And the husband alone was the necessary party to the suit concerning this property. (Pixley v. Huggins, 15 Cal. 127.)

Camden is subrogated to all the rights of Robinson.

In Johnson v. Dopkins et al., 3 Cal. 391, it is said, that the purchaser of a mortgage is subrogated to the rights of the mortgagee.

And in Swift v. Kraemer, 13 Cal. 526, Mr. Justice Baldwin said: "These last mortgagees would be in equity assignees of the debts they paid, and be subrogated to the rights of their assignors, for in equity the substance of the transaction would be an assignment of the old mortgages in consideration of the money advanced." (Burrell v. Schie, 9 Cal. 106; Robinson v. Leavitt, 7 New H. 73; 4 Johnson's Chancery, 370.)

In Himmelman v. Schmidt, 23 Cal. 117, this Court says: "A Court of equity, under such circumstances, even if it came within the provisions of the Act, would treat it, to the extent of the old mortgage included in it, as a substitute for the former mortgage, and, to that extent, a valid incumbrance upon the property." (Dillon v. Byrne, 5 Cal. 455.)

1st Hilliard on Mortgages, p. 493: "Thus, it is held in general, that when a mortgagee makes a deed of assignment upon the back of the mortgage deed, or by a separate instrument referring to it, the assignee is put in the place of the mortgagee to all intents and purposes, unless a different intention is apparent from the contract."

In Pierce v. Robinson, 18 Cal. 116; Mr. Justice Field applied the doctrine of "Equitable Assignments," which seems to be usually applied from the circumstances of a case, rather than from the express agreements of the parties. A notable instance of the kind is the case of Dana v. San Francisco, 19 Cal. 486.

In this case, it is evident that when Robinson parted with his mortgage to plaintiff he wholly divested himself of all interest in the property, and that whatever the sort of the security he held against the property became vested in the plaintiff, upon the transfer of the note and mortgage, while the possession of the same by plaintiff put him, quoad the property in dispute, in Robinson's shoes. Robinson, by the sale, could no longer receive money from the mortgagee. Neither could the mortgagor make valid payments to him, nor could Robinson sustain any suit in regard to the property. He could not sue on the mortgage, for it no longer was his property. Neither could he sue for a rescission of the contract, after disposing of the notes and mortgage.

By the Court, SAWYER, J.

This case was decided at the April term, 1863—(23 Cal. 633.) It was then held—all the Justices concurring—that the mortgage sought to be foreclosed was inoperative and could not be enforced. Subsequently the same Justices ordered a re-argument, not, as we understand it, on account of any doubt as to the soundness of the previous decision, but with a view, owing to the hardship of the case, of ascertaining if any modification of the judgment could be made by which the plaintiff might have a remedy in this action. We infer this to be the case from the fact that the counsel were directed by the Court to confine their attention upon the re-argument to the single point as to "whether the principles of equity would not warrant this Court in declaring that (the mortgage being invalid) the consideration of the deed of October, 1st, 1860, failed, and in consequence thereof plaintiff is entitled to a rescission of the contract in the form of a conditional decree restoring the parties to their original condition." And the arguments of counsel have been mainly directed to that question.

Upon a review of the case, we are satisfied with the former decision upon the point that the mortgage in question is inoperative and void; and the only question left for our consideration is the one discussed on the re-argument with reference to the judgment to be entered in the case. Possibly a Court of equity, in a proceeding in the nature of that suggested, or some other, would have been competent to afford a remedy to Robinson, or a party succeeding to his rights in the premises. But, however that may be, this is not the proper proceeding. The present action is the ordinary one for the foreclosure of a mortgage. It proceeds entirely upon the theory that there is a debt due secured by a valid mortgage; that the plaintiff is entitled to have the mortgaged premises sold under a decree of foreclosure to satisfy the debt, and to a judgment against the maker of the notes for any balance that may remain unsatisfied. Such is the cause of action alleged, and such the judgment prayed for. But a complaint would have to be framed upon an entirely different theory to reach the case disclosed by this record. Neither of the parties to the original transaction is before the Court. The plaintiff is here simply as the assignee of the notes and mortgage in question. His mortgage proves to be void; and being void, he has acquired no interest whatever in the land. He acquired such rights only as the notes and mortgage, as such, carry with them by the ordinary assignments of such instruments. He has not, either in law or equity, succeeded to all the rights held by Robinson by virtue of his having been the owner of the premises in question, and of his having conveyed them without obtaining the stipulated consideration.

Admitting that Robinson, either on the ground of fraud, or want of consideration, or otherwise, might have obtained a conditional decree of the Court for a payment of the balance of the price, or in default thereof, for a rescission of the contract of sale and a reconveyance of the premises upon such terms as the Court might adjudge to be just, still such right of action was not expressly assigned to plaintiff, and it did not pass by the mere indorsement of the notes and assignment of the mortgage in question.

Upon the case disclosed by the record, we cannot perceive that the plaintiff has any remedy at all against these defendants. His remedy—if he has any—is against Robinson. He asked in his prayer the only relief that was competent for the Court to grant on the case stated in his complaint. He could not amend without substituting an entirely new and different cause of action, and one which, it is quite evident, he is not in a position to maintain.

In any proceedings to set aside the conveyance, it would, of course, be necessary that all persons interested should be made parties to the suit, as a decree granting such relief could only be made upon the condition of a repayment of such portion of the purchase money as has already been paid.

This is apparently a case of great hardship, and we regret exceedingly that no mode could be suggested by which a remedy might be afforded in this action. Under the view we have taken, a new trial would evidently be useless.

The judgment is therefore reversed and the Court below directed to dismiss the complaint.

NOTICE TO TESTIFY.—Where notice was given of a party's intention to testify in his own behalf, and the notice specified with sufficient particularity some points pertinent to the issues upon which he would give evidence, and also stated generally that he would testify to other facts relative to the issues, and on the trial a general objection was interposed to his giving any testimony under the notice—which objection was overruled, and the record does not set out the testimony; held, that it will not be presumed that the party gave testimony on any matters except those particularly specified in the notice, and that the objection was properly overruled.

Leet v. Wilson et al.

OBJECTION TO WITNESS.—Under such notice a party has a right to testify on such matters as are specified in the notice, and a general objection to his giving testimony as a witness is not well taken.

ACTION FOR WORK AND LABOR.—In an action to recover the value of services, and work and labor performed under a contract, the plaintiff has the right to prove the value of the services of an assistant employed by him, and who performed the same work plaintiff contracted to do, unless it appears by the nature or terms of the employment that the services of a particular person were contracted for, and that no other person could, under the contract, fill the place of the employé.

OBJECTION TO EVIDENCE.—A general objection that evidence is inadmissible should be disregarded, as it amounts to no more than that the evidence is illegal. The grounds of an objection should be specified and fully pointed out.

APPEAL from the District Court, Sixth Judicial District, Sacramento County.

The complaint averred that defendants were indebted to plaintiff in the sum of seven thousand six hundred and twelve dollars and sixty-five cents, for work, labor, care, and services done, performed, and rendered by plaintiff, in and about the business of defendants, from the 1st day of October, 1859, until the commencement of the suit, at the special instance and request of defendants.

The answer denied the allegations of the complaint.

The suit was commenced April 30th, 1861.

The principal items of labor and services which plaintiff proved on the trial, were for laying the railroad track of the California Central Railroad.

On the trial, plaintiff offered Montague as a witness to prove that he was employed by plaintiff as an assistant engineer, from January 1st, 1860, to May 16th, 1860, at one hundred dollars per month, and his expenses.

The referee allowed this demand, not as so much money paid to Montague, but as so much labor rendered by plaintiff, through his agent, Montague.

Plaintiff recovered judgment in the Court below, and defendants appealed.

The other facts are stated in the opinion of the Court.

George Cadwalader, for Appellants.

The notice was defective. (Bradley v. Kent, 22 Cal. 169.)

Leet v. Wilson et al.

John G. Hyer, for Respondent.

By the Court, RHODES, J.

On the trial of this cause before the referee, the plaintiff was examined as a witness in his own behalf. The defendant objected to his testifying on the ground that the notice was "vague and uncertain," that it did not "inform the defendants what facts or charges, claims, or indebtedness, the said witness is called to support," and was not in conformity to the statute of 1861. The objection was not taken to his testifying to any particular point, but was directed generally to his being permitted to give any testimony under the notice.

The record does not purport to set out any of his testimony, but states that the "referee overruled the said objections, and permitted the plaintiff to give material testimony in his own behalf." The complaint is simply the common count for work and labor, but on the demand of the defendants the plaintiff furnished a bill of particulars, setting forth the work performed by him on the railroad of the defendants, in laying the track, building and repairing the bridges, culverts, and cattle guards; in acting as the engineer, and repairing the grade; also the value of such labor. Portions of the services mentioned in the notice, in respect to which the plaintiff's testimony was to be taken, are evidently the same as those set forth in his bill of particulars, although set forth in a different form.

The notice is not as precise in all respects as it might be, but it describes the services as having been performed for the defendants in the construction of the railroad mentioned in the bill of particulars. It is not necessary to state in the notice that the party offering himself as a witness will give all the testimony that may be required to entitle him to recover upon the whole case, or upon any given point in the case, or that he will state all the facts in relation to any certain point. He may offer to prove by his testimony either the time, the place, the character, or the value of the performance of any work, and rely upon other testimony to prove the other facts necessary to be proven in order to charge the opposite party.

The plaintiff offered his own testimony to prove the laying of the first six miles of the track, the manner of doing the work, the time employed therein, and the value of his services in performing the work; also his personal services in locating the line of the railroad, and the character, extent, and value of the services; also other facts connected with items stated in his bill of particulars. It was proper for him to give his testimony in relation to the facts above mentioned, and as the statement neither sets forth the testimony of the plaintiff nor the points about which he testified, it will not be presumed that he testified as to any facts not properly stated in the notice.

The objection to the testimony of Montague was not well taken. It was competent evidence for the plaintiff, under his item for services as engineer, for under that charge he was entitled to prove and recover for services, whether performed by himself, or an assistant, or both. Unless it appears by the nature or terms of the employment that the services of a particular person were contracted for, and no other person could under the agreement fill the place of the employé, he may, under the allegation of services performed by him, prove that they were performed by another person under him.

The referee has not allowed the plaintiff for his services and those of his assistant at the same time, but has allowed him for the services of only one person during the time that either he or his assistant was employed as an engineer.

The plaintiff's bill of particulars contains the following item: "I was compelled, in prosecuting said work, to employ from time to time a blacksmith; his time cannot be given, as his services were rendered as demanded; he was paid by me $75.37." This item, though not expressed with technical accuracy, is for the value of the services of the blacksmith while employed under the plaintiff, during the progress of his work for the defendants, and is not an item for money paid by the plaintiff for the use of the defendants, for the blacksmith is not alleged to have been in the employment of the defendants, nor is it stated that the defendants were indebted to him, but he is directly alleged to have been employed by the plaintiff.

The evidence offered in support of the item is not set out in the statement, and the only reference thereto is as follows, "On the trial of the cause the plaintiff offered and proved by a witness that he paid and disbursed for defendants the sum of $75.37 to a blacksmith." The defendants objected to this evidence, on the grounds "that the complaint of the plaintiff set forth no such charge, and that the evidence was inadmissible;" but the referee overruled the objection, and allowed the sum to the plaintiff, and in his report says:

"In addition to this, Leet claims a blacksmith's bill for seventy-five dollars and thirty-seven cents, paid for defendants. No doubt he paid for some blacksmithing, but from the loose manner of keeping the accounts, and the unsatisfactory character of the proof, I am in doubt about the amount. With some hesitancy I allow the charge, and add it to the amount of extra work."

Although the language of the report and the statement in respect to this item is very loose, there can be no doubt that the testimony of the witness was offered to prove the services of the blacksmith, and their value, as mentioned in the item of the bill under consideration, and not to prove that the plaintiff had paid money for the use of the defendants. The objection, therefore, to the evidence, on the ground "that the complaint of plaintiff set forth no such charge," was not well taken.

The further objection of the defendants, "that the evidence was inadmissible," was properly disregarded by the referee and the Court below. It amounted to no more than the assertion that the evidence was illegal. If admitted without objection, it would tend to prove the value of the services of the blacksmith; but if the defendants wished to exclude such evidence, and force the plaintiff to prove the value of the services by calling witnesses who could testify to the real value of the services from their knowledge of their nature and extent, the grounds of the objection should have been specified and fully pointed out. (Dreux v. Domec, 18 Cal. 89; Martin v. Travers, 12 Cal. 243, and cases therein cited.)

Judgment affirmed.

P. CUNNINGHAM v. T. H. HAWKINS.

LIMITATION OF LIEN OF MORTGAGE.—The right to enforce the lien of a mortgage given to secure a debt is barred by the Statute of Limitations at the end of four years from the time the right of action accrues on the debt.

POSSESSION OF MORTGAGEE DOES NOT EXTEND LIEN.—The entry of the mortgagee into the possession of the mortgaged premises cannot, as between him and the mortgagor, extend the time allowed by the statute for the enforcement of the mortgage.

LIMITATION OF ACTION TO REDEEM MORTGAGE.—The right of the mortgagor to maintain an action to redeem the property from the lien of the mortgage is barred by the Statute of Limitations at the end of four years from the time the right of action accrues on the debt.

STATUTE OF LIMITATIONS—MORTGAGOR—MORTGAGEE.—The right of the mortgagee to maintain an action on the debt, and enforce the lien of a mortgage given to secure it, and the right of the mortgagor to maintain an action for the redemption of the property from the lien of the mortgage, are reciprocal, and when one is barred by the Statute of Limitations, the other is also.

ACTION TO REDEEM—REVIVAL OF WHEN BARRED.—When the right to maintain an action for the redemption of the mortgaged property from the lien of the mortgage is barred by the Statute of Limitations, it cannot be revived by an offer of the mortgagor to pay the debt.

APPEAL from the District Court, Seventeenth Judicial District, Sierra County.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the Court.

Williams & Johnson, for Appellant.

If Hawkins took possession as mortgagee under Bartlett, he could never, by lapse of time, acquire such title as would defeat the plaintiff's right to recover in this action. By adverse possession he might; but there can be no adverse possession whilst he holds as mortgagee.

If, from mutual confidence of the parties, no written defeasance is given, any attempt on the part of the grantee or mortgagee to defeat a redemption by the mortgagor, will be a fraud. (Brown v. Dewey, 1 Sandf. 56; Coke on Lit. 265.)

Hawkins is yet our mortgagee, and if there is any want of mutuality of interest between the parties that will not affect our side of the case, we may not now be liable in personam; but that circumstance could not defeat our title. (1 Washb. on Real Property, 479-482; and cases cited.)

If the note and mortgage are discharged by the statute, from the day of discharge, unless notice of a contrary intention was given, the mortgagee would hold in trust for Bartlett, the mortgagor. (2 Bouv. 190, and cases there cited.)

We maintain that a mortgage, simply as such, could not defeat an action of this kind by even fifty years possession. In some of the States of the Union, where the mortgagee is held to have an interest in the realty mortgaged, a different rule undoubtedly would prevail. But in England, in New York, in this State, and some others, mortgages simply give a right of action, as well against the property mortgaged as the person, and are a security for the debt only.

The modern decisions in England and New York are uniform on the point that a mortgagee in possession is simply a trustee for the mortgagor; and having no right in himself, being a trustee only, any attempt by him to acquire a right, as against the mortgagor, should be held a fraud. (Edwards v. Farmers' Fire Insurance and Loan Co., 21 Wend. 488-9.)

If this had been an action in ejectment, there can be no question but that the judgment of nonsuit would be error; for we would be saved by the ninth section of the Statute of Limitations, and it would devolve, as before seen, upon the defendant to prove adverse possession. We contend that the case at bar is governed by the same rule. (Tiffany & Bullard's Trusts and Trustees, page 718, and cases cited.)

We admit that the Statute of Limitations runs against a note on demand from its date in a case of this kind, and that the mortgage expires with the note. But it never was our duty in making out our case to show that we were yet liable in any sum on the note and mortgage; that is defendant's part of the case, we agreeing, if anything is found due, to pay it.

That Hawkins entered as trustee for Bartlett, we cite 2 Johns. Ch. R. 33, and cases there cited. Also, Slee v. Manhattan Co. 1st Paige, 53.

Whether we have a right to claim that the mortgage is a lien on the claim can have nothing to do with the question: Did the Court err in granting the nonsuit? Had we brought ejectment, and not offered equity, it is not contended that, under the proofs, the nonsuit would have been proper.

Lord v. Morris, 18 Cal. 486, clearly establishes the doctrine: That after four years, any interest the mortgagee had by virtue of his mortgage is extinguished. If the mortgagee refuses to receive equity, that is no reason why it should be refused to the mortgagor.

Vanchief & Haymond, for Respondents.

The statutes of this State and the statutes of New York apply equally to equitable as well as to legal causes of action.

In Lord v. Morris, 18 Cal. 486, it is held that the Statute of Limitations of this State applies equally to actions at law and to suits in equity; that it is directed to the subject matter, and not to the form of action or the form in which it is prosecuted, and covers all cases where equitable relief may be sought.

In McCarthy v. White, 21 Cal. 496, and in Grattan v. Wiggins, 23 Cal. 16, the doctrine of Lord v. Morris on this point is affirmed, and these authorities are conclusive as to the applicability of the statute.

Our position is, that plaintiff's cause of action accrued on the 13th day of May, 1856, the day of the conveyance from Bartlett to Raskt & Co.

This suit is brought to enforce what? Clearly, the plaintiff's right to redeem; and that right was full, perfect, and complete on the day the mortgage debt became due, viz.: May 13th, 1856, and not, as contended for by appellants, on the Cunningham v. Hawkins.

1st day of September, 1861, the day on which the plaintiff tendered to defendants the redemption money.

Plaintiff could have maintained his action to redeem without alleging in his bill or proving on the trial a tender of the redemption money. This is decided in the case of Daubenspeck et al. v. Platt, 22 Cal. 330.

In the case of Grattan v. Wiggins et al., it is said: That the right to foreclose and the right to redeem are reciprocal and commensurable, and if one cannot be enforced, that is regarded as sufficient to preclude a claim for the other; thus, if the right to foreclose is barred by the lapse of time, the right to redeem is equally barred. We therefore hold that the right to redeem asserted by the plaintiff in this cause was barred by the Statute of Limitations.

In the case at bar, the debt secured by the mortgage was due upon demand, and was given on the day the conveyance from Bartlett to Raskt & Co. was made—May 13, 1856. The statute ran against it from the time it was given. (Howland et al. v. Edmunds et al., 24 N. Y. 307; Weinman v. N. Y. Ins. Co. 13 Wendell, 267.)

By the Court, CURREY, J.

The complaint in this case is in equity, to redeem certain property in Sierra County from the lien of a mortgage executed on the 13th day of May, 1856, by one James H. Bartlett, to the firm of Raskt & Co., of which the defendant was a member, to secure the payment of a debt then due said firm from said Bartlett, and also for an account of the issues and profits of the premises received by the defendant during the time he had the possession of the premises, which was from the date of the mortgage.

The instrument denominated a mortgage purports to be a conveyance from Bartlett to Raskt & Co. of one fourth of certain mining ground described therein. Nothing appears upon the face of this instrument to indicate its character as a mortgage, except that the consideration expressed is a certain sum of money, "with interest from date till paid." But the plaintiff alleges in his complaint that it was intended and understood by the parties thereto as a mortgage to secure the payment of the sum mentioned in it as the consideration, with interest, and that the mortgagees entered into the possession of the property under the mortgage to hold the same in trust for the mortgagor.

It is alleged by the complaint that at the time of commencing the suit, and for some time before then, the defendant claimed to be the owner and holder of the mortgage and the debt thereby secured, and during all that time had possession of the premises by virtue of the mortgage; and that on the 1st day of August, 1861, Bartlett conveyed all his right, title, and interest in said property to the plaintiff, who afterward, in the same month, exhibited his deed of conveyance to the defendant, and offered, for the purpose of redeeming the property from the lien of the mortgage, to pay the amount due thereon — but that defendant refused to accept payment, and that the same offer had since then been often repeated, and had been met by a like refusal by the defendant. That at the commencement of the action the defendant was in possession of and holding the premises adversely to the plaintiff, and was taking gold therefrom. The complaint concludes with a prayer for an accounting and redemption of the premises and for general relief.

The defendant, by his answer, alleges that he had been in the possession of the premises ever since the date of said instrument, as the owner thereof, and that for more than five years he had been working and improving said mining ground, and had expended in such work and improvements, during that time, the sum of seven thousand dollars, and that he had never as yet received anything whatever of value from said premises. The material allegations of the complaint, except the possession and adverse holding of the premises by the defendant, are denied by the answer. And, as an affirmative defense, the defendant pleads that neither the plaintiff nor his grantor was seized or possessed of the premises within five years next before the commencement of the action, and also that the plaintiff's alleged cause and causes of action did not accrue within four years next before the commencement of the suit; and he therefore averred that all the causes of action alleged in the complaint were barred by the statute limiting and defining the time of commencing civil actions.

There was evidence produced on the trial before the Court tending to prove the principal averments of the complaint.

When the plaintiff had closed his case, the defendant moved the Court to nonsuit the plaintiff and to order the action dismissed, on the ground that the complaint and proofs showed that plaintiff's right of action was barred by the nineteenth section of the statute before mentioned. The Court sustained the motion, dismissed the complaint, and gave judgment in defendant's favor for his costs. The plaintiff, by his appeal, seeks a reversal of this judgment.

The questions to be determined in this case arise upon the Statute of Limitations; and in their consideration we shall assume, without comment, that the instrument described in the complaint and denominated a mortgage, was intended as such by the parties thereto at the time of its execution. The counsel for the respective parties have so treated it in argument, and to have done otherwise would have been a departure from the record in the case.

The debt, to secure which the mortgage was executed and delivered, was due at the date of the mortgage, and a cause of action for its recovery, and for the foreclosure of the mortgage, accrued at that time to the mortgagees, and a corresponding right to pay the debt and redeem the property from the lien created upon it accrued at the same time to the mortgagor; and each of the parties to said instrument had the period of four years from its date in which to commence an action for the enforcement of the accrued right. The entry of the mortgagees into the possession of the premises could not, as between them and the mortgagor, invest them with any other or greater right than they would have had without such entry. The mortgage upon the land was a mere security for the debt due, and the interest of the mortgagees was a mere chattel interest. (Johnson v. Sherman, 15 Cal. 293; Calkins v. Calkins, 3 Barb. 312.)

When this action was commenced, the mortgagees' cause of action was barred by the lapse of nearly seven years after the debt became due. The fact that the debt was secured by mortgage could not affect the right of the debtor to avail himself of the Statute of Limitations as effectually as in a case where the debt might not be thus secured. (Lord v. Morris, 18 Cal. 486; McCarthy v. White, 21 Cal. 495.) Nor is it claimed on behalf of appellant that the statute is not a bar in the one case equally as in the other; but it is suggested that the debtor could waive the protection of the statute, and that in the case under consideration the plaintiff, by a tender of payment to the defendant of the amount due upon the mortgage, gained the right to compel the defendant to account for the issues and profits derived by him from the property, and to deliver possession of the property to the plaintiff when the mortgage debt should be satisfied.

Upon first impressions it would seem but just to accord to a debtor, or one having assumed the debt of another, the privilege of discharging his obligation, notwithstanding the immunity afforded him by the Statute of Limitations; and the instances of the refusal of a creditor to accept payment of a debt barred by the statute must be exceedingly rare, and perhaps experience scarcely furnishes an instance where a debtor offers to pay a demand against which the statute has run that the creditor has refused to receive the payment in absence of a motive of greater potency than the value of the amount tendered on the one hand and refused on the other.

It does not necessarily follow, that because a debt has remained unpaid until the Statute of Limitations has run its course, an action could not be maintained for its recovery. Whether it could or not, depends upon the election of the debtor, who may insist upon the immunity afforded him, by pleading it, or by proving it under a proper plea, where necessary. But the debtor has the right to avail himself of this defense, and the mortgage creditor must have, on the principle that remedies, as between mortgagor and mortgagee, are mutual, the reciprocal right of resisting a redemption when under circumstances he may deem it to his advantage to do so.

Mr. Hilliard, in his work on the Law of Mortgages, says: "In general, the respective rights of mortgagee and mortgagor, with regard to the foreclosure on the one hand, and a redemption on the other, are treated as mutual; that is, the existence of the former is held to involve that of the latter, and vice versa; and the fact that the one cannot legally be enforced under the circumstances, is regarded as sufficient to preclude the claim for the other." (2 Hilliard on Mort. 1.) In Caufman v. Sayre, 2 B. Mon. 206, the Court say: "The right to foreclose and the right to redeem are reciprocal and commensurable." And in Koch v. Briggs, 14 Cal. 262, the Court hold the same doctrine.

As already appears, the mortgagor's right to redeem the premises from the lien of the mortgage existed immediately after that instrument was executed and delivered, and his right to an action to enforce a discharge of the incumbrance was complete at that time, and so continued for four years thereafter, after which it became barred by the nineteenth section of the Statute of Limitations. This section is much like the fourth section of the New York Statute of Limitations of suits in equity, which is as follows: "Bills for relief, in case of the existence of a trust not cognizable by the Courts of common law, and in all other cases not herein provided for, shall be filed within ten years after the cause thereof shall accrue, and not after."

In speaking of this statute, Mr. Justice Mason, in Calkins v. Calkins, 3 Barb. 310, said: "This is a very sweeping statute, and embraces, to say the least, all suits in equity where the cause of action has accrued since the passage of the statute. In short, it extends over the whole field of equitable jurisdiction." And in reference to this statute, it is said by Cowen & Hill, in their Notes, (1 Cow. & Hill's Notes to Phillipps' Ev. 541, ed. 1850,) that the time of the complainant can be enlarged by no considerations, except those specifically enumerated; "that neither promises, acknowledgments, nor the most solemn acts, can keep the subject matter of the bill alive."

From the case presented by the record, the defendant could not be regarded as in possession of the premises mortgaged adversely to the mortgagor, Bartlett, nor of his grantee, the plaintiff, before the time when the plaintiff exhibited his deed to the defendant and proposed paying the mortgage debt, because, as the complaint states, and as the mortgagor testified, the defendant entered into and held the possession in subordination to the title of the mortgagor. (Zeller's Lessee v. Eckert, 4 How. 296.) What may be the real truth of the case in this respect, or what may be the real nature of the tenure by which defendant has held the possession, we do not undertake to determine, except so far as may be necessary to decide the case upon the record before us.

We think the judgment of the Court below was correct, and should be affirmed.

Judgment affirmed.

JOHN DONAHUE v. THOMAS McNULTY, JAMES BRADY, JOHN FURLONG, MOSES FURLONG, JOHN DOOLY, PATRICK CODY, LAWRENCE NOLAN, JOHN SHARP, JOHN KIRK, MAT. SAFFON, MARTIN SAFFON, AND H. T. NICHOLS.

SHERIFF'S DEED — PAROL EVIDENCE NOT ADMISSIBLE.—Parol testimony of the officer who makes a sale of property under an execution, and executes a deed to the purchaser therefor, is not admissible for the purpose of adding to, contradicting, or altering the terms of the deed.

SAME — HOW MEANING OF ASCERTAINED.—Where the language of a deed executed by an officer for property sold under execution is plain and unambiguous, the Court should limit its inquiry to what the words of the deed express, without regard to any intention independent of the words.

RECITALS IN SHERIFF'S DEED.—The officer who makes a sale of land by virtue of an execution, and executes to the purchaser a deed therefor, must, in his deed, make recitals of the recovery of the judgment, the names of the judgment creditor or creditors, and of the judgment debtor or debtors, and of the issuing of an execution on the judgment, and of the levy and sale thereunder. The recital of such facts is essential to show the officer's authority and the transmission of the debtor's title in the property to the purchaser.

WHO ESTOPPED BY RECITALS IN SHERIFF'S DEED.—The officer executing a deed for property sold under execution, and those who claim under the deed, are estopped from denying the truth of the matters recited therein, but the same are not evidence as against strangers, or those claiming adversely to the deed.

AGAINST WHOM OFFICER'S DEED IS EVIDENCE.—A deed of a constable, made of land sold under execution, is not evidence of the purchaser's title as against any person except those whom the deed shows upon its face to have been the judgment debtors, and named as such in the execution issued on the judgment, and whose interest in the property was sold by the officer.

PAROL EVIDENCE AS TO RECITALS IN OFFICER'S DEED.—Parol evidence is inadmissible to show that a constable's sale was made by virtue of any other judgment or execution than that recited in the deed; and it is also inadmissible to show that the constable sold the interest of a person in the land described in the deed, whose interest the deed itself does not recite upon its face to have been sold.

AGAINST WHOM OFFICER'S DEED NOT EVIDENCE.—Where a Judgment was rendered against several persons, and an execution issued upon it against all the judgment debtors, and the constable levied upon and sold the land of one of the judgment debtors, but in making a deed to the purchaser, did not insert the name of the one whose land had been sold as a judgment debtor, or recite that his land had been sold; held, that the deed was not evidence of title in the purchaser as against the owner of the land.

APPEAL from the District Court, Seventeenth Judicial District, Sierra County.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the Court.

Creed Haymond, and Johnson & Williams, for Appellants.

The objection taken to the admission of the deed from Dixon, the constable, to Nolan, presents a question as simple as this:

Can a deed, purporting to convey the property of A., only be construed by law (or varied by parol testimony) to be a conveyance of the property of A. and B.? And, in this connection, we call the attention of the Court to the case of Bartlett v. Judd, 23 Barb. 286, and to Mason v. White, 11 Barb. 184.

Vancilf & Bowers, for Respondents.

There is no question but the deed describes the property correctly. In reciting the execution, the deed leaves out the name of John Donahue, though it gives the true name of the company, which was composed of these names, viz: Richardson and Buffalo Co. It will be seen that in the executions from J. P., as well as previous proceedings, that the defendants are described as composing the Richardson and Buffalo Co., and further, that the name of John Donahue is contained in each of the executions; and it is still important to notice that in the granting part of the conveyance the officer describes the property as all the estate, right, title, and interest of the said persons against whom the said writ of execution has been issued as aforesaid.

A Sheriff or constable is not bound to recite the execution in his deed of conveyance, nor will a mistake in its recital vitiate. Had he the authority to sell, and did he sell? are the only material questions. (Jackson v. Pratt, 10 Johns. 386; Jackson v. Jones, 9 Cowen, 191.)

By the Court, CURREY, J.

This is an action of ejectment to recover possession of the one undivided seventeenth part of certain mining ground, situate in the County of Sierra, of which the plaintiff alleges he was the owner and in the possession in June, 1863, and of which he was then ousted by the defendants. The defendants, by their answer, deny that they wrongfully ousted the plaintiff, and further answering, aver that on the 16th of October, 1861, three judgments were obtained in a Justice's Court in said county against the plaintiff and others as defendants, described as the Buffalo and Richardson Mining Company, and that under executions issued on such judgments, the right, title, and interest of the plaintiff was sold, and afterwards conveyed by a constable to Lawrence Nolan, one of the defendants in this action; and they further aver that each of the defendants owned, at the time this action was commenced, and was entitled to the possession of an undivided portion and interest in the premises, which portions, in the aggregate, comprehended the entire property.

As to the title and interest of the plaintiff to the undivided seventeenth part of the premises at the time the sale under the executions transpired, there seems to have been no issue made by the answer of defendants, or by the evidence adduced at the trial.

The decision of the case, it will appear, rests entirely upon the effect and competency, as evidence in the case, of the judgments obtained in the Justice's Court, and the executions issued thereon, and the alleged sale of the plaintiffs' right, title, and interest in the premises, and the deed executed by the constable and produced in evidence.

In each of the cases in the Justice's Court, John Donahue was one of the defendants, and was served with summons, and Lawrence Nolan, who became the purchaser at the sale, and is the grantee named in the deed, was also a defendant, and was served with summons. The defendants served made default, and there was no appearance in any of the cases on the part of the defendants who were not served with process. In two of the suits, judgments were entered against all the defendants who were named in the summons, and in the other, judgment was entered against all the defendants named in the summons, and, also against three other persons not mentioned therein. The recitals in the deed are that a writ of execution issued out of the Justice's Court of a Justice of the Peace therein mentioned, directed and delivered to James F. Dixon, constable, commanding him that of the goods and chattels of P. Donahue, M. Donahue, L. Nolan, B. Kenrief, P. Cody, H. F. Nichols, P. Daley, J. Wiseman, R. Anderson, J. Doe, H. Hoe, and R. Roe, composing the Richardson and Buffalo Company, he should cause to be made the moneys in said writ specified; and if sufficient goods of said persons could not be found, that then he should cause the same to be made of the lands of which the last named persons were seized; and then it is further recited in the deed: "And, whereas, because sufficient goods and chattels of the last named persons in the said writ could not be found, whereof the said constable could cause to be made the money specified in said writ, he, the said constable, did, in obedience to the said command, levy on, take, and seize all the estate, right, title, and interest of the last named persons in and to the lands," etc., described, and "did, on the 9th day of November, A. D. 1861, sell all the right, title, and interest of the last named persons in and to the said premises," etc., "at which sale the right, title, and interest of the last named persons in and to said premises, were struck off and sold to L. Nolan for the sum of five hundred and sixty-two dollars." And after these recitals follows the granting portion of the deed, whereby the constable, "By virtue of the said writ, and in pursuance of the statute in such cases made and provided, for and in consideration of the sum of money hereinbefore mentioned," grants, bargains, sells, and conveys, "unto the said Nolan, his heirs and assigns, all the estate, right, title, and interest of the said persons against whom the said writ of execution has been issued as aforesaid, of, in, and to all the following described property;" and then follows a description of the property, with the usual habendum clause. Several of the defendants against whom judgment passed in all of the suits in the Justice's Court, and who were named in the executions issued on such judgments, were not named as judgment debtors in the execution recited in the deed, and two of those who were therein named were not defendants or parties in any of the judgments and executions given in evidence. It does not appear from the deed who was the judgment creditor in the execution recited, nor what was the amount due by the judgment on which such execution was issued.

In connection with the introduction in evidence of the judgments, executions, and deed, the defendants examined the constable, who testified that he received from the Justice of the Peace the three executions so offered in evidence, and that he duly levied such executions on the property and mining claim described in plaintiff's complaint, including the whole of plaintiff's right, title, and interest in the same, before he sold said claims, or any part thereof, and that he sold said claims and plaintiff's interest therein and conveyed the same to the defendant, L. Nolan, by the deed in question, "and that such sale and conveyance was under and by authority of said executions."

The plaintiff's counsel interposed objections to the judgments, executions, and deed offered and given in evidence. The objection to the deed was that it was irrelevant and inadmissible in evidence, because it was not connected with any of the judgments or executions offered in evidence; that it did not refer to any of them; and, also, because it did not purport to convey the property of the plaintiff, John Donahue; and, further, that it did not purport to be the deed of any officer authorized by law to make such deed, and that the same was void. The Court overruled this objection, and the counsel for plaintiff excepted.

When the testimony was closed, the plaintiff's counsel requested the Court to charge the jury that the deed in question was not even prima facie evidence against plaintiff's claim of title and right of possession, unless they believed from the evidence before them that plaintiff's interest was actually sold and conveyed by the deed in evidence.

The Court refused so to charge, and the plaintiff excepted.

The jury rendered a verdict for defendants against the plaintiff, on which judgment was entered.

A motion was made for a new trial, and denied, and the appeal is from the order denying a new trial, and from the judgment.

It is not necessary in order to dispose of this case to determine as to the validity of the judgments obtained in the Justice's Court. In respect to these judgments, and the executions issued thereon, the only question necessary to be considered is, whether the deed offered and given in evidence bears any dependent relation thereto.

The deed, as we have seen, professes to have been executed by the constable, as a conveyance of the right, title, and interests of certain persons therein named in and to the premises in controversy, which were, before the date thereof, sold by the constable upon a writ of execution issued out of a Justice's Court, commanding the constable that, of the property of certain persons therein mentioned, composing the Richardson and Buffalo Company, he should cause to be made the moneys in said writ specified. The appellant was not one of the persons named in the writ recited in the deed; nor is there anything apparent on the face of the deed to warrant the intendment that the writ of execution therein mentioned was issued on any one of the judgments produced in evidence. To show that the truth was otherwise than as recited in the deed, the constable who made the sale and conveyance was examined as a witness, and testified in respect to the matter as already appears.

The testimony of the constable was not competent to establish any facts having the effect to contradict, alter, or add to the terms of this deed. In the consideration of a deed, the terms of which are plain and unambiguous, the Court should limit its inquiry as to what the words of the deed express, without regard to any intention independent of the words. (2 Cow. & Hill's Notes, 571, Third Edition, and cases there cited.)

Where a deed of gift imported an absolute estate in fee in the donee, and was capable of being satisfied as such, parol evidence was held inadmissible to show that the donor intended to give a life estate only, with a limitation to the defendant. (Pooser v. Tyler, 1 McCord Ch. 18.) Nor can it be shown by parol that by mistake one tract was inserted in a deed instead of another, unless it be in a suit to reform a deed and correct the mistake, (Bell v. Morse, 6 N. Hamp. 205,) or that part of the premises described were intended to have been excepted (Jackson v. Crory, 12 John. 427; Hovey v. Newton, 7 Pick. 29; Jackson v. Roberts, 11 Wend. 426; Locke v. Whiting, 10 Pick. 279); or that a deed professing to convey all was intended to convey a part only. (Barkley v. Barkley, 3 McCord, 269; Paine v. McIntier, 1 Mass. 69; Child v. Wells, 13 Pick. 121; Gittings v. Hall, 1 Harr. & John. 14; Beeson v. Hutchinson, 4 Watts, 442.) So, parol evidence was held inadmissible to show that an execution, on which a levy and a sale had been made, had been withdrawn, and the levy abandoned by the plaintiff, in contradiction to the Sheriff's deed, (per Spencer, Ch. J., in Jackson v. Vanderheyden, 17 John. 168,) or to contradict the recital or show that the land was sold under a different judgment and execution than those recited in the deed, though such evidence may be admitted to show a fraud in the sale. (Jackson v. Sternberg, 20 John. 50.)

The rule laid down in the last two cases cited, in regard to the conclusiveness of a recital in a deed, should be limited in its operation to the party making the recital and those who claim some right and interest under the deed which contains it. The officer who makes a sale and executes a conveyance of land under and by virtue of a judgment and execution, must necessarily make some reference in his deed to the authority under which he acted and to the character of such authority. This is essential for the purpose of showing a transmission of the debtor's title in the property to the purchaser and grantee thereof. This is done by a recital of certain facts, constitutive of the officer's authority to sell and convey. And when this is done, he and those who claim under the deed are estopped from denying the truth of the facts recited. But such a deed is not evidence of the matters recited as against strangers, and least of all, as against those who claim adversely to it. (Jackson v. Roberts, 11 Wend. 436; Penrose v. Griffith, 4 Binney, 231; Carver v. Jackson, 4 Peters, 88.)

There is nothing in the deed in question which is evidence of title in the defendants or any of them of the right, title, and interest of the appellant in the demanded premises, at the time it is alleged, on the part of defendants, the property of the appellant was sold; but, on the contrary, the deed shows upon its face that the execution under which the property is claimed to have been sold and conveyed was not issued against the appellant as a defendant therein, and it also shows upon its face that the interest of the appellant in the demanded premises was not attempted to be sold or conveyed.

The objection to the deed was well taken, and should have been sustained; and the instruction which the plaintiff requested the Court to give to the jury was proper, inasmuch as the deed and testimony of the constable was received in evidence.

Peterie v. Bugbey et al.

Upon the facts of the case as they appear in the record, the appellant was entitled to a verdict and judgment, as demanded in his complaint.

The judgment is therefore reversed and the cause remanded for a new trial.

G. C. PETERIE v. B. N. BUGBEY AND ROBERT BECK.

CONFLICTING EVIDENCE.—If the testimony is conflicting, the Supreme Court will not attempt to weigh the evidence and decide between conflicting statements.

WITNESS—ASSIGNOR OF THING IN ACTION.—B. commenced an action against S. on a promissory note indorsed by A. to B., and procured an attachment, by virtue of which the Sheriff levied on goods and chattels as the property of S. P., who claimed that the property levied on belonged to him, brought suit against B. and the Sheriff to recover possession of the same. On the trial, B. offered A. as a witness on behalf of himself and the Sheriff. Held, that A. was a competent witness, and that he was not the assignor of a thing in action, within the meaning of the four hundred and twenty-second section of the Practice Act, as amended in 1861. Held, further, that A. had not such a "present, certain, and vested interest" in the result of the suit as disqualified him under the three hundred and ninety-first section of the Practice Act.

SAME.—The statute to which the four hundred and twenty-second section of the Practice Act applies only exists where the thing in action or contract assigned is the subject matter, or a part thereof, of the suit pending, and in which the assignor is offered as a witness.

EXECUTION ON JUDGMENT FOR POSSESSION OF PERSONAL PROPERTY.—Where A. commences a suit against B. to recover possession of personal property, and, before the suit is commenced, B. has sold the property to C., if A. recovers judgment, the property cannot be taken from C. under an execution issued on the judgment for its delivery.

This action was tried on the 6th day of March, 1863. Notice had not been given by defendants of an intention to examine Ackley, the witness hereinafter referred to, as a witness on their behalf.

S. Stackhouse was indebted to Robert Beck, one of the defendants, and Beck commenced an action against him in the District Court of Sacramento County, on the 14th day of October, 1862, on demand, and procured the issuance of an attachment, and placed the same in the hands of defendant, Bugbey, who, as Sheriff, levied upon a quantity of personal property, as belonging to Stackhouse, the defendant in the writ.

Peterie, the plaintiff, claimed the property levied on, and brought this action to recover possession of the same. Peterie claimed to have purchased the property from Stackhouse before the levy of the Sheriff.

The defense was, that the purchase of Peterie was fraudulent as against the creditors of Stackhouse.

On the trial, defendants offered as a witness on their behalf W. Ackley. Witness stated in his voir dire that he was a partner of Beck when the debt against Stackhouse accrued, and that Stackhouse gave Beck and Ackley his note therefor, and that he, Ackley, before the commencement of the attachment suit, sold his interest in the note to Beck, and indorsed the same. Witness also stated that Beck recovered judgment in the attachment suit, and the Sheriff sold the property levied on, and Beck became the purchaser. Beck sold a portion of this property to witness before the commencement of the possessory action by Peterie.

The plaintiff objected to Ackley testifying, because he had bought of Beck a portion of the property sued for, and it was the interest of the witness that the property should be applied on Beck's debt, as, if Peterie recovered judgment for a return of the property, the writ would run against the property in Ackley's possession; and because Ackley was the assignor to Beck of the note on which the suit was brought against Stackhouse.

The Court sustained the objection, on the ground that Ackley was the assignor of the note, and defendant excepted.

Plaintiff recovered judgment, and defendants appealed from the judgment, and from an order denying a new trial.

John G. Hyer, for Appellants.

An indorser of a negotiable promissory note is not an assignor, under the statute requiring notice. In Hicks v.

Wirth, 10 Howard, 555, at general term of New York Common Pleas, the question, and all the cases then reported, were very fully and ably considered, and it was held that an indorser of a negotiable promissory note was not an assignor of a thing in action, within the meaning of section 399 of the code; that the indorsement of a note, strictly speaking, is the order or appointment, by the payee to the maker, of a person to whom, according to the maker's contract, he has agreed to pay the amount as promised; and although it virtually carries with it a right of action against the maker, yet such right is rather for a breach of the original contract, viz.: a promise to pay to the order of the payee—than from any actual assignment of a claim against the maker. This case was approved, in the opinion of Mr. Justice Welles, in Calkins v. Packer, 21 Barb. 275, decided at general term. In the case of Tuloss v. Rapelyee, 3 Abb. 93, in the same Court, at general term, and the same Judge delivering the opinion, the same doctrine was approved, as applied to negotiable paper. In Anderson v. Busteed, 5 Duer, 485, it was held by the Superior Court (Duer, Bosworth, and Slosson, Justices) that an indorser of negotiable paper is not an assignor within the meaning of the code, and that his examination as a witness does not render the party against whom he is examined a competent witness under section 399 of the code. And in the case of Watson v. Bailey, 2 Duer, 509, the Superior Court doubt whether section 399 (of the New York Code, in relation to examination of assignors, parties, etc.) applies to cases of negotiable paper at all, though the question did not directly arise in that case. (Hicks v. Wirth, 10 Howard, 555. Approved: Calkins v. Packer, 21 Barb. 275; Anderson v. Busteed, 5 Duer, 485; Watson v. Bailey, 2 Duer, 509; Tuloss v. Rapelyee, 3 Abb. P. R. 93.) These cases are all decided in New York, under a statute which was, when the decisions were made or rendered, identical in its terms with that of our own State as it stood prior to the amendment of 1863.

Robinson & McConnell, for Respondent.

Peterie v. Bugbey et al.

We contend that under the facts, Warren Ackley was directly interested in establishing in Beck the title and ownership of the property in question. The ownership was the very point at issue in this suit. If Peterie was the owner, then Ackley had no title, for he purchased with a full knowledge of Peterie's rights; but if Beck's title was good, then Ackley's would be, for he purchased of Beck. Hence it follows that Ackley would gain or lose by the direct legal operation and effect of the judgment, and the record of the judgment would be legal evidence for or against him in any action where the title of the property might come in question.

The authorities are far from uniform upon the point as to whether an indorser of a promissory note is an assignor under the statute requiring notice. The weight of authority is in favor of the affirmative of the proposition. (Clement v. Adams, 12 How. 163; Bump v. Van Andele, 11 Barb. 634; Potter v. Bushnell, 10 How. 94; Collins v. Knapp, 18 Barb. 532; Jagoe v. Alley, 16 Barb. 580.)

By the Court, SANDERSON, C. J.

This is an appeal from an order denying a motion for a new trial. Two points are made by appellants: First—That the verdict is against the weight of evidence. Second—That the Court erred in holding that one Ackley, offered as a witness by the defendants, was incompetent on the ground of interest.

First—Upon the first ground the judgment cannot be disturbed. As to the bona fides of the sale of the property in controversy by Stackhouse to the plaintiff, the testimony is conflicting; and under the rule which has long been established in this State, we are not at liberty to disturb the verdict of the jury. Where the testimony is conflicting, the result mainly depends upon the credibility of the witnesses. Of that the jury and the Court below have an opportunity to judge, but this Court has not. Should we attempt to weigh the evidence as it is presented to us and decide between conflicting statements, the chances for the intervention of error would be increased rather than diminished.

Second—The witness, Ackley, was not an assignor of a “thing in action or contract” within the meaning of the four hundred and twenty-second section of the Practice Act, as amended in 1861. There is no “thing in action or contract” involved in this case of which Ackley is the assignor, nor of which the defendants or either of them are the assignees. The note which was in part assigned by Ackley to Beck constitutes no part of this suit. It was part of the consideration upon which the suit of Beck against Stackhouse was founded, and had Beck offered Ackley as a witness in that case the question could have been there presented, and there only, which is attempted to be presented here. The status to which the four hundred and twenty-second section applies, only exists where the “thing in action or contract” assigned is the subject matter or part thereof of the suit pending, and in which the assignor is offered as a witness.

Nor has Ackley such a “present, certain, and vested interest” in the result of the suit as disqualifies him under the three hundred and ninety-first section of the Practice Act. The test of the interest which renders a person incompetent as a witness is “that he will gain or lose by the direct legal operation of the judgment; or that the record of the judgment will be legal evidence for or against him in some other action.” Under this test it is clear that Ackley has no interest in the result of this suit. The title of Beck to that portion of the property in question which was sold by him to Ackley had vested in Ackley before this suit was brought. Suppose the judgment to be in favor of the plaintiff, it could not directly operate against Ackley, for not being a party to the suit, the execution, either for a delivery of the property, or for its value in money, could not run against him. The property in his possession could not be taken under the execution, nor could its value be made by a levy and sale of his property. Nor can there be any other action to which Ackley could be a party and in which the record of the judgment in this case could be used as evidence for or against him. Counsel for respondent seem to have confounded the relative positions of Beck and Ackley. Reverse their relative positions, and the result would be a status to which the theory of the plaintiff would apply. Make Ackley the party, and Beck the witness, and the pretended disabilities of Ackley become realities in Beck. We think the Court below erred in excluding Ackley from the witness stand, and for that reason the judgment must be reversed and a new trial awarded.

Ordered accordingly.

H. S. WILLIAMS v. A. S. BENTON.

REFERENCE.—In an equity case, where the trial of an issue of fact is involved, requiring the examination of a long account on either side, the Court may order a reference, with directions to the referee to report upon the account, or any issue of fact involved in the account.

REFEREE — POWER TO APPOINT.—The Court has no power, without the consent of the parties, to order a reference for the trial of any other issue of fact than that involved in the examination of an account in an equity case.

SAME.—The Court has no power, where either of the parties object, to order a reference with directions to the referee to report a judgment.

SAME.—In an action to dissolve a partnership and obtain a settlement of the partnership accounts, the Court has power to order a reference for the trial of all the issues of fact relating to the condition of the partnership accounts, but it has no power, if objection is made, to order a reference of the trial of any other issue or issues in the case, nor to direct the referee to report a judgment.

APPEAL from the District Court, Eleventh Judicial District, Placer County.

The referee reported a judgment in favor of plaintiff. The Court ordered a judgment in accordance with the report, and defendant appealed. The other facts are stated in the opinion of the Court.

Chas. A. Tuttle, for Appellant.

J. E. Hale, for Respondent.

By the Court, SANDERSON, C. J.

This is an action brought to dissolve a copartnership, and to obtain a settlement of the partnership account. The plaintiff claims to be an equal partner. This is denied by the defendant, who avers that the interest of the plaintiff in the concern is only one third. Whether the plaintiff's interest is one half or one third is the principal issue involved in this case. When the case was called for trial the plaintiff moved for the appointment of a referee to try all the issues, and report a finding and judgment thereon. This motion was resisted by the defendant, but was allowed by the Court, and the case was accordingly referred. The order of reference was excepted to by defendant, who now assigns the same as error.

It is not denied by the appellant that the Court had the power to direct a reference, so far as the issue as to the balance of the partnership account is concerned; but it is claimed that the Court had no power to refer the other issues involved in the case, except upon the agreement or consent of the parties.

The power of the Court to compel a reference is derived from the one hundred and eighty-third section of the Practice Act, and can be exercised only as therein provided. The first subdivision of that section is the one relied on by the respondent as authorizing the order in question, and is in the following language, viz.: "when the trial of an issue of fact requires the examination of a long account on either side — in which case the referees may be directed to hear and decide the whole issue, or report upon any specific question of fact involved therein" — a reference may be ordered. The word "issue" is used twice, and each time in the singular number, and no other issue is mentioned than such as requires the examination of a long account, and no power is given the Court to direct the referee to report a judgment. If there be but one issue in the action, and that issue involves the examination of a long account, the whole case may be sent to a referee; but, even in such a case, he cannot be invested with power to report a judgment. If, however, there are other issues in the case, not involving the examination of a long account, the Court has no compulsory power to send them to a referee for trial.

larly described, and, by necessary implication, all issues not answering to that description are excluded from the operation of the section. The language is not that the Court may refer all the issues involved in the action, nor that the referee may be directed to try all the issues, but merely that he may try the whole issue—that is to say, the issue already spoken of, and the reference of which has been already authorized.

That it was not the intention to authorize the Court to refer all the issues involved in the action, against the consent of the parties, merely because one of them might involve the examination of a long account, is made more manifest by contrasting the terms of the one hundred and eighty-third section with those of the one hundred and eighty-second.

The latter section provides for the reference of cases upon the agreement or consent of the parties. And the language used is, that the reference may be made “to try any or all of the issues in the action or proceeding, whether of law or fact, and to report a judgment thereon.” The language of the one hundred and eighty-third section, on the contrary, is studiously confined to a single issue of the character therein described, and the power of the referee is limited to a decision of that particular issue, or the decision of a specific question involved therein, without any power to report a judgment.

Taking the two sections together, it is clear that it was not the intention of the Legislature to confer compulsory power upon the Court over the question of reference beyond such issues as involve the examination of a long account. Under the Constitution, this section cannot be construed to include issues of that character even in cases in which the parties have a constitutional right to a trial by jury. The present, however, is not one of those cases, and the Court had the power to order a reference of all the issues (if there was more than one) relating to the condition of the partnership accounts; but it had no power to refer the other issues involved in the case, nor to direct the referee to report a judgment.

The conclusion to which we have come upon the order of reference disposes of the appeal, and makes the consideration of the other assignments of error unnecessary.

The judgment is reversed and a new trial ordered.

BERNARD CURRAN v. FRANCIS K. SHATTUCK.

ROADS—CONDEMNATION OF LANDS FOR.—A statute for the condemnation of the land owned by individuals for road purposes, which fails to provide a method of ascertaining the compensation to be paid to the owner, and the way and means of paying the same before the road is opened, is unconstitutional.

SAME—STATUTORY CONSTRUCTION.—The provisions of a statute which provides for taking the lands of private persons for road purposes must be strictly followed, and the Act must be strictly construed.

CONDEMNING LANDS—NOTICE TO OWNER.—The proceedings for the condemnation of land for road purposes fall within the class denominated "special cases" in the Constitution, and in such proceedings the person whose land is to be taken against his will must have notice or the proceedings will be void.

SAME.—Notice to the owner when the proceedings are commenced is not notice to his vendee who purchases pending the proceedings.

SAME—COMPENSATION—WHO PAID TO.—When the compensation to be paid to the owner of the land has been ascertained, the amount thereof must be paid to the one who is the owner at the time, or his authorized agent.

OPENING ROAD—INJUNCTION.—Where the statute under which proceedings for the condemnation of land for road purposes is taken is unconstitutional, or its provisions are not strictly pursued, or notice is not given to the owner of the land, or the compensation is not tendered to him, a perpetual injunction against opening the road will be granted.

EFFECT OF INJUNCTION.—A perpetual injunction against opening a road under proceedings which have been taken does not prevent laying out a road at any future time over the same land whenever the proper steps are taken to acquire the right of way and the right has been secured.

LIT PENDENS.—The common law doctrine of lit pendens does not apply to the proceedings before a Board of Supervisors for condemnation of land for road purposes.

APPEAL from the District Court, Third Judicial District, Alameda County.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the Court.

Wm. Crane, for Appellant.

The most material question is, whether the respondent was properly notified of the day designated for the assessment of damages. It will be remembered that Higgins remained in possession, occupying the lands for farming purposes, and was there by permission of the respondent.

The statute provides (Laws of 1862, p. 81, Sec. 13): "At the designated meeting, the applicant for said location or alteration, or one or more of them, shall file affidavits with the Clerk of the Board that he has notified all owners, occupants, or agents of land over which said proposed road is to pass, of the aforesaid designated time for assessing damages, with a copy of said notice, which shall give the parties affected at least five days notice to appear; provided, further, that should the land over which said proposed road is to pass be vacant, or the owners thereof unknown, or reside out of the county, then the affidavit shall state that the said notice was posted in some conspicuous place at least five days previous to the designated time for assessing such damages."

The plain meaning of this clause is that the notice shall be served upon either the owner, or upon the occupant, or upon the agent of the land. The grammatical construction of the language is not that the owners and occupants and agents shall receive notice.

The proviso, taken in conjunction with the preceding part of the clause, only enjoins that if the land be vacant, and there be no occupant or agent of the owner in the county, or the owner resides out of the county, then the notice shall be given by posting.

It cannot mean that if there be an occupant and agent, you shall serve both, and shall also post notices if the owner reside out of the county.

By construing the whole Act together, it will be seen that the Legislature did not intend that so vain a thing should be done. Section seven, Laws of 1862, p. 79, provides for the giving of notice upon the inception of the proceedings. It requires that notice shall be served on all parties occupying and owning land, or their agents, and if the owners do not live in the county, or are unknown, then notice shall be served on the parties occupying the land, or if it is vacant, then shall be posted. It was probably not intended to require greater strictness in notifying parties of the day designated for fixing the damages, than of the application to open the road.

If in the case at bar the respondent had owned the land when these proceedings were commenced, and Higgins had then been in possession under the same terms as afterwards, a notice of the application to open the road served upon Higgins would clearly have been sufficient under section seven; and I submit that a reasonable construction of section thirteen authorizes also a service of the second notice upon Higgins, the occupant, and agent of the owner also.

W. H. Glascock, for Respondent.

After the 29th of January, 1862, Higgins was the tenant of Curran, who was the owner of the premises, and resided out of the county. The District Attorney claims that the notice to Higgins was sufficient, and refers to Stat. 1862, p. 80, § 13, in which are the following words: "Provided, further, that should land over which said proposed road is to pass be vacant, or the owners thereof unknown, or reside out of the county, then the affidavit shall state that said notice was posted in some conspicuous place at least five days previous to the designated time for assessing the damages." It is conceded that there was no such notice posted nor affidavit made.

The best rule to arrive at the meaning and intention of the law is to abide by the words which the law-maker has used. (9 Bacon Abr. 238.) If a proviso in a statute be directly contrary to the purview of the statute, the proviso is good and not the purview, because it speaks the later intention of the legislators. (Ib. 243.)

The owner, Bernard Curran, did not reside in the county, and did not have actual notice, and the provisions of the statute to constitute constructive notice were not complied with. It is a fundamental principle of law that a party must have notice and an opportunity to be heard before his property can be taken; and if the statute provides that certain acts done shall be deemed to impart notice then the statute must be strictly followed.

Curran v. Shattuck.

Again: if it should be held that giving notice to Higgins was notice to Curran, yet there is no pretence that there was an assessment of damages in favor of Curran, or that there was even any tender of damages in any amount to Curran. Thus we have an attempt to take the land of Curran without notice to him, or the assessment of any damages to him, or the tender of any sum whatever as damages to him. If Higgins should be made by statute a party to receive notice for Curran, he is not made by statute a party to whom a tender can be made for Curran.

By the Court, RHODES, J.

This action was brought to enjoin the defendant from proceeding as an overseer of roads to open a highway over the land of plaintiff.

A petition was filed before the Board of Supervisors on the 15th of September, 1861, pursuant to previous notice, for the location of the road, and on that day the Board appointed viewers, and they having failed to act, other viewers were appointed on the 5th of November, 1861, and directed to proceed to view the road on the 15th, and they, having been sworn on the 20th, adjourned to the 23d, and on that day proceeded to view the road, and subsequently they reported in favor of the road as petitioned for, and on the 7th of April, 1862, the Board confirmed the report, except as to the damages, and on the 5th of May proceeded to assess the damages, and ordered that the damages to the lands of Higgins, the plaintiff's grantor, be assessed at three hundred dollars. That sum was tendered to him, but he refused to accept it. The Board, on the 15th of September, made an order establishing the road at the width of sixty feet, and a copy of the order was delivered to the defendant, who was about to open the road according to the said order.

From the commencement of the proceedings to the 29th of January, 1862, Higgins was the owner in fee of a tract of land over which it was proposed to lay out the road; and on that day he conveyed a portion of his premises to the plaintiff, and the deed was recorded on the 31st of January; but Higgins remained in possession of the premises as a tenant during all the proceedings of the Board. The plaintiff was a non-resident of the County of Alameda during the pendency of the proceedings, and had no actual notice thereof until after the order of the 15th of September, 1862. Damages were not assessed for his benefit, nor were they tendered to him, nor to any one as his agent. Upon the hearing, the Court decreed a perpetual injunction, restraining the defendant from laying out the road over plaintiff's land. The defendant appeals from the decree, and from the order overruling his motion for a new trial.

The proceedings were commenced under the general road law of 1861; but on the 24th of March, 1862, the road law for the County of Alameda took effect; and the question is raised by counsel whether the proceedings before the Board, after that date, were had or should have been conducted under the general or the special Act; but the decision of this case does not turn upon that question, for if the public have not acquired the right of way by means of the proceedings of the Board of Commissioners under either Act, then the injunction must be sustained. The object of the proceedings of the Board of Commissioners is to ascertain if the proposed road will be beneficial to the public, and if so, to determine upon the route, and then to acquire the right of way over the lands necessary for the road. When parties have not granted the right of way, the proceedings of the Board of Supervisors amount in effect to a condemnation of the land for public uses. It is provided in the Constitution of this State, that private property shall not be taken for public use without just compensation. No right in the land vests in the public until such compensation is made or tendered to the owner. If the authority to ascertain the compensation, or to assess the damages, as is usually denominated in the Road Acts, and, upon paying or tendering the same, to divest the owner of some interest in his land, is conferred upon a Board like that of the Supervisors, possessing but a limited and inferior jurisdiction, it is the inflexible rule that the Board must strictly pursue the statute or the proceedings will be void.

It is held in Bensley v. Mountain Lake Water Company, 13 Cal. 306, that "all statutory modes of divesting titles are strictly construed, and to be strictly followed: He who relies for a title upon an extraordinary mode of acquisition given him, not by the will of the owner, expressed or implied, but against his will and by the mandate of the law, must show for his warrant a strict compliance with those statutory rules from which his title accrues." The power conferred must be executed precisely as it is given, and any departure will vitiate the whole proceeding. (Sedgwick on Stat. and Const. Law, 319; Dwarria, 611; 1 East. 64.)

The Board or officer must find the power to ascertain the compensation within the statute. A resort cannot be had for that purpose to implication. (Sharp v. Spire, 4 Hill, 76; Sharp v. Johnson, Ibid, 92.) If the statute has failed to provide, directly, the means or mode, it simply results that the compensation cannot be ascertained, and, therefore, the land cannot be taken for public use without the consent of the owner. The Board cannot insert into the statute provisions conferring further powers, however necessary they may be to carry into effect the supposed intention of the Legislature.

If the proceedings of the Board in this case were had under the general road law of 1861, and if every act required by that law to be performed by the petitioners, Board of Supervisors, viewers, and other officers, has been done according to the statute, still those proceedings were not effectual to vest in the public the right of way over the plaintiff's lands, for the obvious reason that the Act fails to provide for the assessment of damages—the ascertaining of the compensation—for the right of way, in any manner, at any time or place, or by any person or officer. But if it can be held that the Act confers this principal power upon the viewers or the Board of Supervisors, then, without regard to the question as to which Act the Board acted under, the further point is presented that the plaintiff did not have notice of the proceedings to assess the damages. The Court below finds that he did not have notice of any of the proceedings. The counsel for the appellant contends that, under the statute of 1861, notice to the owner of the assessment of damages was not necessary, but in our opinion it is beyond controversy that notice, actual or constructive, was absolutely necessary, unless waived by his appearance, or something that is deemed in law its equivalent, whether the statute makes provisions for it or not. The proceedings, though not amounting to a civil action, fall within the class denominated "special cases" in the Constitution, and "special proceedings" in the code of New York. (Visscher v. Hudson River Railroad Company, 15 Barb. 37; Ex parte Ransom, 3 Code R. 148; New York Central Railroad Company v. Marvin, 11 N. Y. 276.) And in such proceeding the person whose rights are to be affected against his will must have notice. (Cruger v. Hudson River Railroad Company, 12 N. Y. 190.)

He also insists that, regarding the proceedings subsequent to March 24, 1861, as having been had under the special Act, the owner of the land was duly notified of all the subsequent proceedings, because Higgins was still the owner of the land, (the sale being a mere sham); that if the plaintiff was the owner after January, 1862, Higgins was the occupant, and was the agent of the plaintiff, and that, through notice to him, the plaintiff received constructive notice, as provided in the special road Act for Alameda County.

It is unnecessary to determine whether the Board retained jurisdiction of the proceedings after the passage of the special Act under that Act or under the general Act of 1861, but it is a sufficient answer to say, that the seizin of the plaintiff was directly an issue in this case, and the Court below found the fact in favor of the plaintiff; and it might be suggested that when the claimants show before the Board a prima facie case of ownership, although the real and beneficial interest is in another, yet neither the Board nor the viewers are competent to pass upon the question of title, but must act at their peril in notifying parties and tendering damages.

The plaintiff denies that he had notice of the proceedings, and this denial will include constructive as well as actual notice, and the Court finds that he had no notice of the proceedings until the defendant was about to proceed to open the road, pursuant to the order of the Board of the 15th of September. On examination of the record, it does not appear that any attempt was made to notify the plaintiff in any manner; indeed, his name is not mentioned in the proceeding, although the record of his deed imparted notice of his ownership. The special Act, section thirteen, provides that if the owner of the land is a non-resident of the county, the affidavit of service shall state that the notice was posted in a conspicuous place five days before the time for the assessment of damages. The plaintiff was a non-resident, and there is no evidence that a notice was posted. Notice to Higgins was not, in any sense, a notice to the plaintiff. A statute authorizing constructive service must be strictly pursued. (People v. Huber, 20 Cal. 81; Hallett v. Righter, 13 How. Pr. R. 43; Sedgwick on Stat. and Const. Law, 319.)

The appellant urges that Higgins, while the owner of the land, was notified of all the proceedings, and that his vendee is deemed to have purchased with notice; and that if such is not the rule, it would be in the power of an owner to constantly baffle the Board, and prevent the location of a road over his land. If the owner has the power, (and it may be that he does possess it as the law now stands,) it simply makes apparent another insufficiency of the road laws to meet the just demands of the public; but the statute not having provided against that contingency, the Courts are powerless to afford an adequate remedy. The statute has not declared that a notice to the owner shall impart a notice to his vendee. The common law doctrine of lis pendens does not apply to the proceedings before a Board of Supervisors, and the statute has not extended it to them.

We agree with the counsel for the respondent, that without regard to the regularity of the proceedings before the Board, up to and including the assessment of the damages, the right of way could not be acquired unless the damages, as compensation for the land, have been tendered to the owner or his authorized agent. (McCauley v. Weller, 12 Cal. 500, and cases there cited; Bensley v. Mountain Lake Water Company, 13 Cal. 306.) The tender was not made to the plaintiff, nor to any one for him.

It cannot with propriety be urged that the injunction in this case will prevent the laying out of a road at any future time over the lands of the plaintiff; for, notwithstanding the proceedings that have been had before the Board, whenever the proper steps are taken to acquire the right of way, and that right has been secured, the road may be opened, and the present injunction will not be operative against the exercise of the rights thus acquired.

Nor can the appellant invoke the rule that the proceedings of the Board cannot be attacked collaterally, for it must be made clearly to appear that the Board had jurisdiction of the matter in controversy, and of the person of the party, where private rights are involved, otherwise its orders are void. The Board of Supervisors is not, in any sense, a Court; but, though exercising certain quasi judicial functions, it possesses only an inferior and limited jurisdiction, and the facts conferring jurisdiction in any given matter must affirmatively appear.

It is unnecessary to pass upon the other points, because, if the plaintiff was not notified of the time or place of the assessment of damages, or if the amount, after being assessed, was not tendered to him, the injunction must stand.

Judgment affirmed.

ROBERT H. VANCE v. E. ELIZA FORE, WM. A. SUBLETT, FRANK WILLIAMS, WM. BUTCHER, J. W. HILL, D. V. THOMPSON, R. O. MARSHALL, AND JOHN FORE.

DEED — DESCRIPTION IN.—Where one deed refers to another for a description of the granted premises, the deed referred to becomes a part of the other; and the description contained in it is regarded as of the same effect as if copied into the deed itself.

DEED—REFERENCE IN TO MAP.—Where a map or plan of a tract of land, with lines drawn upon it marking its boundaries, and with the natural objects upon its surface laid down, is referred to in a deed as containing a description of the premises therein conveyed, this map or plan is to be regarded as giving the true description of the land conveyed, as much as if it was expressly recited and marked down in the deed itself.

DEED—CONFLICTING DESCRIPTIONS.—If a deed contains conflicting descriptions, that description is to be adopted which is the least likely to be affected with mistakes.

SAME.—Where a deed referred to another deed previously made for a description of the premises conveyed, and also to a map previously made for a description of the same premises, and the description in the deed referred to did not fix any monument at the initial point which could be determined with accuracy, and the end of the line running from the initial point terminated at "the base of the mountain," and then turning down at right angles was to follow down the base of the mountain, and the character of the country was such that witnesses might differ as to the location of these lines, and the map referred to represented all the natural and artificial objects found upon the land—such as streams, buildings, and roads—and there was a conflict between the verbal description as found in the deed and the boundaries as laid down on the map; held, that the description presented by the map must be adopted as the one most stable, and least likely to be affected with mistakes.

SAME.—Where a deed contains two descriptions of the land conveyed, and both are of equal authority, that one which is most favorable to the grantee must be adopted.

APPEAL from the District Court, Seventh Judicial District, Solano County.

Pena and Baca were the co-grantees of the Mexican Government of a tract of land confirmed and patented to them by the United States, which grant included the demanded premises.

Baca's deed to McDaniel, referred to in the opinion of the Court was for a portion of the grant, and was dated August 21st, 1850.

Pena's deed to Currey and Clarke, dated January 27th, 1853, also mentioned in the opinion of the Court, besides referring to the McDaniel deed for a description of the property conveyed, contained an additional reference to a map made by Swan, a surveyor. This map, Swan made after the purchase by McDaniel, at the request of McDaniel and one Mizner. The description contained in the McDaniel deed, literally followed, did not include the demanded premises; the map made by Swan, however, did include the demanded premises. The tract of land in controversy was a parallelogram, having for its base an arroyo lying south of the land described in the McDaniel deed, but was included in the Swan map. On the 7th day of November, 1853, Pena executed to Vance, the plaintiff, a deed, which, both parties admitted, included in its description the demanded premises. Vance claimed under this deed, and it was insisted by him that the deed to Currey and Clarke did not convey any land except the quantity within the literal calls of the McDaniel deed, while the defendants claimed that the deed to Currey and Clarke conveyed all the land laid down on the Swan map to which it referred. As both parties claimed under the same grantors, there was no question about title. Vance purchased with full knowledge of the prior deeds, so that the only issue before the Court was the construction of the description contained in the Currey and Clarke deed. The defendants, a part of them, claimed under Currey and Clarke, and a part of them set up an outstanding title in Currey and Clarke, or their grantees.

The Court below gave judgment for the defendants, and plaintiff appealed from the judgment, as well as from an order denying a new trial.

The other facts are stated in the opinion of the Court.

W. W. Stow, for Appellant.

All the surveyors agree that there was and is no difficulty in locating by the description in the McDaniel deed the lands thereby conveyed and therein described; and hence, if the deed to Clarke and Currey contained no other words of description, there could be no dispute, and no hesitation in determining that Vance did, by the conveyance from plaintiff, acquire title to the lands for which he brought ejectment, and which are claimed under the deed to Clarke and Currey.

But because of the following language in the deed to Clarke and Currey: "the same being the land as laid down on a map or plat thereof made by Thos. M. Swan, Esq.,"—it is claimed that Clarke and Currey acquired title to one thousand nine hundred more acres than McDaniel's deed conveyed. This argument and pretension rests for its sole foundation upon the proposition that all other words of descriptions in the Clarke and Currey deed must be rejected, or must be controlled by reference to the Swan plat or map.

In Ferris v. Coover, 10 Cal. 628, Mr. Chief Justice Field says: "The principle to be extracted from these cases is this: that the lines actually intended by the parties, if they can be ascertained, are to control. The rules adopted in the construction of boundaries are those which will best enable the Courts to ascertain the intention of the parties. Thus, preference is given to monuments, because they are least liable to mistake, and the degree of importance given to natural or artificial monuments, courses, and distances, is just in proportion to the liability of parties to err in reference to them. But they do not occupy an inflexible position in regard to each other. To hold otherwise would be to give greater importance to the rule itself than to the reason of the rule. It may sometimes happen in case of a clear mistake an inferior means of location will control a higher. In Davis v. Rainsford, 17 Mass., it was held that if, on taking the whole description together, it would be more reasonable to suppose a mistake was made in the monuments referred to than in the measurements of the distance, where the two disagree, the measurement should govern instead of the monuments; and, in that case, a diagram or plat of the land was allowed to control the designation of the monuments. 'To this admeasurement,' says the Court, 'we are bound to adhere, in order to effectuate the intention of the contending parties.' "

"In Noorwood v. Byrd, 1 Richardson, S. C. 135, it was held that when on the face of a deed the mention to convey a particular tract of land is clear, but the description of metes and bounds is, upon a survey for the purpose of locating the tract, ascertained to be erroneous, the description by metes and bounds will be rejected as surplusage, and the land located so as to cover the land clearly intended to be conveyed."

In Falwood v. Graham, 1 Richardson, 497, the Court say: "The defendant's counsel is wrong in supposing that there is any difference in the rules of location as laid down and enforced in the older or more recent cases. They all maintain that in locating lands we are to resort, first, to natural boundaries; second, to artificial marks; third, to adjacent boundaries; fourth, to courses and distances; but it has never been held that each of these occupied an inflexible position."

In this connection we refer to authorities (not cited in Ferris v. Coover); Seaman v. Hogeboom, 3 Barbour, S. C. 215; 21 Ib. 398; Jackson v. Ransom, 18 John. 107.

"The construction ought to be made upon the entire deed, not on any particular part of it." (Jackson v. Blodget, 16 John. 172.)

We therefore deduce the rule applicable to this case to be, that the intention of the parties is to be ascertained and given; that if, to ascertain it, one part of the description must be rejected or disregarded, it is proper for the Court to treat such portion as surplusage.

That when there are two attempted descriptions, which are certain in themselves, and which agree with each other, and a third which is at total variance with the other two, the third must be rejected, especially as in the case where on its face it assumes to agree with the other two, but, in point of fact, it does not.

John Reynolds, also for Appellant.

It is very clear that Swan was called to survey the lands included in the McDaniel deed, and for no other object. To every person and party that object only could have been known, and no presumption that the survey should or could include any other lands than those in that deed can be made against Pena, or the plaintiff, or any other person. And knowing that to be the object and extent of the survey, well and properly made Pena, after giving the same description in the Currey and Clarke deed as contained in the McDaniel deed, refer to the Swan map. And knowing that it could not contain more than the lands described in the McDaniel deed, that map cannot control those boundaries which are certain, and which, from all the testimony, do not include the lands in question.

The lands in the Currey and Clarke deed are described as follows:

“Beginning at a point one mile and a half due north of the point where the county road, so called, crosses the water course or branch ‘Arroyo de Agua,’ about a mile and a half east of said Manuel Baca’s dwelling house, in the County of Solano; thence running due west to the base of the mountains; thence in a southerly direction, following the base of the mountains, to a point about three English miles due south of the first mentioned course or line; thence due east three English miles; thence due north three English miles; then west to the place of beginning.”

If the description had stopped here, I think there could have been no doubt but that this description must have been confined to the land contained in the McDaniel deed, and could not have included the lands in question. All the surveyors, as witnesses, say, unequivocally, that the McDaniel deed does not include the lands in this suit.

The description in the Currey and Clarke deed then proceeds: “The same being the land as laid down on a plat or map thereof made by Thomas M. Swan, Esq.” I have already shown the object of making this map, and its effect upon the parties to this deed and the plaintiff in this action. But suppose we admit, for the sake of the argument, that it was intended to include all the lands embraced within its most exterior lines, then it could not control the description in this deed, nor extend the boundaries of this deed, so as to include the lands in question.

The description in the Clarke and Currey deed then proceeds: “And being the land the boundaries and courses whereof are described in a certain deed from said Baca to one William McDaniel, bearing date the 1st day of August, 1850.”

This, as I have already said, shows clearly that it was the intention of the parties to convey only the lands included in the McDaniel deed. After giving a full description of the lands, being the same as contained in the McDaniel deed, and referring to the map, with the knowledge that the object of that map was only to include the lands contained in that deed, they then, to make their intention more certain, and that the Currey and Clarke deed should only contain the lands in the McDaniel deed, refer again in a pointed and particular manner to the McDaniel deed, to show that the lands then to be conveyed were to be confined to the lands in the McDaniel deed, and to those only.

Whitman & Wells, for Respondents.

While it is true that no rule for the location of land described in a deed can be laid down which is not subject to an infinite variety of exceptions arising out of matters of evidence, still, it is equally true that there are certain general rules, well considered and established, which must be the guide of Courts in considering the proper construction of deeds, and by which the evidence must be measured. We propose to state some of these rules which are so well established that they cannot be disputed, and by these rules and the evidence given in the case as measured by them, to insist that the judgment of the Court below was properly rendered.

1st. Every part is to be taken most strongly against the grantor, and every uncertainty is to be taken in favor of the grantee. (Hathaway v. Power, 6 Hill, 453—this is a very full case, and we invite the attention of the Court to it, although we imagine that the dispute between counsel for appellant and ourselves is not so much as to what the rules are, as to what is their proper application to the case at bar—Middleton v. Pritchard, 3 Seam. 510; Cocheco Co. v. Whittier, 10 N. Hamp. 305; Jackson v. Shedson, 3 J. R. 375; Jackson v. Gardner, 8 J. R. 308; Jackson v. Blodgett, 16 J. R. 172.)

2d. A plan of a tract of land which is referred to in a deed for the purpose of description, is to be treated as if it were annexed to and made part of the deed, and may be referred to for the purpose of aiding in the identification of the land, showing its form, location, etc. (Lincoln v. Cullum, 4 Ala. 576.) Under this rule it has been decided that when lines are laid down on a map or plan, and are referred to in a deed, the courses, distances, and other particulars appearing on such plan are to be as much regarded as the true description of the land conveyed as they would be if expressly recited in the deed. (Davis v. Rainsford, 17 Mass. 210.) And also, if a lot of land be granted, specifying its number in a certain patent, and referring to a map on which it is laid down, the whole lot will pass, although described in the deed to contain a less number of acres than it actually does. (Jackson v. Defendorf, 1 Cal. 493.)

3d. A deed will always be construed, if possible, so as to render it operative, and to carry out the true intention and meaning of the contracting parties, whenever it is possible to ascertain the same. So it was decided in Keitte v. Reynolds, 3 Green. 393, side paging: that, "When a parcel of land is conveyed, as being the whole of a certain farm, which is afterwards described in the deed by courses and distances which do not include the whole farm, so much of the description will be rejected as that the whole may pass." (See, also, Lodge's Lessee v. Lee, 6 Cranch. 273.) So in Jackson v. Loomis, 18 J. R. 81: "The governing consideration in all cases upon the construction of deeds is to give effect to the intention of the parties, if the words they employ will admit of it; * * * here is a flat contradiction in the description, and then we ought to take that which is most stable and certain;" and in Jameson v. Balmer, 1 Shep. 425: "Though there may be a want of accuracy, or, indeed, a repugnance in some part of the language of a deed of land, the intention of the parties is to be gathered from the whole language used;" and in Stone v. Clark, 1 Met. 378: "When a deed conveying land is of doubtful construction as to the boundaries, the construction given by the parties themselves, as shown by their acts and admissions, is deemed to be the true one, unless the contrary be clearly shown;" and in Proctor v. Pool, 4 Dev. 370: "If the description in a deed be so vague and contradictory that it cannot be ascertained what thing is meant, the deed is void—but different descriptions will be reconciled, if possible, or if irreconcilable, yet, if one of them point out the thing intended, a false or mistaken reference to another particular shall not avoid it;” and in the case of Norwood v. Byrd, 1 Richardson, S. C. 135, cited by opposing counsel, the Court say: “To effect the plain intention to convey the Norwood grant, the boundaries may be rejected as surplusage.” (See, also, Jackson v. Loomis, cited supra, and the same case, 19 J. R. 488; Jackson v. Blodgett, 16 J. R. 172; Jackson v. Gardner, 7 J. R. 217.)

By the Court, SHAFER, J.

This is an action of ejectment. The question presented by the record for review involves the construction of a deed given by Pena to Currey and Clarke, January 27th, 1853, and recorded February 19th of the same year. The description of the land intended to be conveyed is as follows:

“All and singular any of the lands and lots of land embraced within the boundaries of that parcel or tract of land described in a certain deed executed by Manuel Baca to William McDaniel, bearing date on or about the 21st day of August, in the year 1850; the said land being in the County of Solano aforesaid, and the boundaries being described on a certain map thereof made by Thomas M. Swan, to which said deed to said McDaniel reference is hereby made for a full and ample description of said land.”

The description in the deed of Baca to McDaniel begins at a point near the centre of the north line of the tract to be conveyed, and proceeds as follows: “Thence due west to the base of the mountains; thence in a southerly direction three English miles, that is to say, following the base of the mountains in a southerly direction three English miles; thence due east three English miles; thence due north three English miles; thence west to the place of beginning, so as to include three English miles square, or nine square miles of land.”

The Swan map is made part of the statement on appeal, and under the adjudged cases both that map and the description given in the deed of Baca to McDaniel, are to be considered part of the deed to be construed. "When one deed refers to another for a description of the granted premises, it is regarded as of the same effect as if the latter was copied into the deed itself." (Allen v. Bates, 6 Pick. 460; Foss v. Crisp, 20 Pick. 121.) "When lines are laid down upon a plan, and are referred to accordingly in a deed, they are to be regarded as giving the true description of the parcel as much as if expressly recited in the deed itself," (Davis v. Rainsford, 17 Mass. 210; Kennebec Purchase v. Tiffany, 1 Me. 219; Thomas v. Patten, 13 Me. 329; Lunt v. Holland, 14 Mass. 149; Miller v. Cullum, 4 Ala. 576.)

The deed to McDaniel calls: First—For nine square miles; Second—Lying in the form of a square; Third—Included within certain boundaries named. The boundaries as given are courses and distances, aided somewhat as to the westerly side of the tract by reference to physical objects. The initial point is not marked by any monument. The end of the line, described as running due west from the place of beginning, is not indicated otherwise than by saying that it terminates "at the base of the mountain." The reference here is not to a visible object, but to a point, the exact location of which can never be determined with absolute precision. Witnesses of equal intelligence, after giving to the subject an equal amount of attention, might, and probably would, differ more or less in their conclusions concerning it. The western line is described as running in a southerly direction three English miles, following the base of the mountain; but the exact line of the base is not fixed by any reference to visible objects, nor is there any object named as marking the southern terminus of the western line. The residue of the description is clearly given by courses and distances, and to every practical intent we consider that the entire description is of like character. A plat was produced in evidence at the trial, based upon this description by courses and distances, and appears as a fact in the case that the included area contains nine square miles, the quantity called for by the deed; but it also appears that this result was reached only by a sacrifice of the square form constituting the second call. As between these conflicting requirements in the deed to McDaniel, the description going upon courses and distances must prevail. But the case shows that there is a discrepancy or conflict between the verbal description by courses and distances and the description furnished by the map, and the law governing that conflict is the principal question presented for our consideration.

It appears that the map includes an area larger by nineteen hundred acres than the area embraced in the verbal description by courses and distances, which excess of quantity lies in the form of a parallelogram constituting the southern portion of the map.

The map contains something more than a mere delineation of exterior boundaries. The course and location of the hills on the west side of the tract are given. The general area of the map is subdivided into lots, the positions of which are respectively indicated by interior lines and by numbers, and the quantity of land embraced in the lots respectively is stated in figures on the face of each lot. The site of the Town or Village of Vacaville is produced upon the plan, and the plan is traversed by roads and streams running in various directions. Not only are these natural and artificial objects represented upon the map, but they fill it to its exterior limits. The map further shows the position of the tract relatively to an outside object, viz: the dwelling house of Baca, and exhibits a "county road," running from the house to and across the tract in a northeasterly direction; and the question precisely stated is, whether a map so constructed, it being referred to and made part of the deed to be construed, is to be regarded as a more authoritative manifestation of the understanding of the parties than the verbal description by courses and distances.

The rule governing the construction of deeds containing conflicting descriptions is that the description the least likely to be affected with mistakes is to be adopted. (Davis v. Rains- ford, 17 Mass. 210.) By way of further exposition, it has been held that that description should be followed which is the most stable and certain, (Jackson v. Loomis, 18 John. 81,) and the only reason why monuments are followed as against courses and distances is, that of the two, monumental lines are more stable and certain, and are less liable to be mistaken. We consider that the map constituting a part of the deed now in question, replete as it is to its very outlines with delineations of natural objects found upon the land, such as hills and streams, and of constructions thereon, such as roads, houses, villages, etc., is more "stable and certain," and "less likely to be affected with mistakes," than the other description by courses and distances contained in the deed. In effect, the map makes the deed a conveyance by monuments. Baca's house to the west of the tract is a monument, and so is the chain of hills forming its western boundary, and so is every object, whether natural or artificial, delineated upon the map. These objects might have been set forth in language; and if they had been, and with that fullness of detail which the map exhibits, that such verbal description would have overruled the description by courses and distances can hardly admit of question. For all the purposes of argument here, the map may be regarded as a daguerreotype of the land which the grantor intended to convey. In Thomas v. Patten, 13 Maine, 333, it was held that all the objects represented upon a plan are to have the same effect as they would if brought into the deed by verbal description.

But there is another view under which the point in controversy may be disposed of. Assuming that we are mistaken in holding that the description furnished by the map is more reliable and therefore more authoritative than the verbal description by courses and distances, the most that can be claimed for the appellant is that the two descriptions are of equal authority. Considering the case under that aspect, the settled rule of law would require us to adopt the description most favorable to the grantee.

Allender v. Fritts et al.

EDWARD T. ALLENDER v. THOMAS G. FRITTS AND SAMUEL G. SHELDON.

APPEAL.—An appeal does not lie from an order refusing to dissolve an attachment.

APPEAL.—ORDER.—On an appeal from a final judgment the Court cannot review an order refusing to dissolve an attachment.

APPEAL from the District Court, Seventh Judicial District, Marin County.

On the 4th day of August, 1863, plaintiff commenced an action in the District Court of Marin County against defendants to recover judgment for work and labor alleged to have been done for defendants, and for brick sold them.

On the same day, plaintiff procured an attachment to be issued in the action, which was placed in the Sheriff's hands, who, on the same day, levied on personal property of defendants. The summons was served on the same day. On the 13th day of August, defendants served notice on plaintiff that they would, on the 18th of August, move the County Judge to dissolve the attachment.

The County Judge denied the motion.

Defendants answered, denying the allegations of the complaint.

November 4th, 1863, plaintiff recovered judgment. Defendants appealed from the order refusing to dissolve the attachment, and from the judgment.

G. F. & William H. Sharp, for Appellants.

John Reynolds, for Respondent.

By the Court, SAWYER, J.

This is an appeal from an order refusing to dissolve an attachment, and from the judgment entered in the cause.

The only error relied on is the refusal to dissolve the attachment. It is insisted by respondent that the question cannot be considered, for the reason that under the provisions of the Practice Act the order is not appealable; and that it cannot be reviewed on an appeal from the judgment, for the reason that the Court, on an appeal from a judgment, can only "review an intermediate order involving the merits and necessarily affecting the judgment." (Practice Act, Sec. 344.) This objection seems to us to be well founded. Section 347 prescribes the cases and section 336 the time in which an appeal may be taken. This is not an appealable order within the meaning of those sections, and an appeal, therefore, cannot be taken from it directly as an order; and it is not an order "involving the merits, and necessarily affecting the judgment," within the meaning of section 344. The attachment is merely a proceeding ancillary to the action, by which a party is enabled to acquire a lien for the security of his demand by a levy made before instead of after the entry of a judgment. This ancillary proceeding may be taken at the time of the commencement of the action, or at any time afterwards. Neither the action nor the judgment, under our law, in any manner depends upon the attachment, although the attachment depends upon the action. The judgment in the case is precisely the same, whether the attachment is dissolved or not. In those States where the attachment is used as a process acquiring jurisdiction, the consequence of dissolving or refusing to dissolve an attachment might be different. But here, the judgment is not, in any respect, affected by the attachment. We could neither reverse nor modify the final judgment in any particular in consequence of any error in the attachment proceedings. The provision—"Upon an appeal from a judgment the Court may review any order involving the merits and necessarily affecting the judgment," implies that it shall not review intermediate orders not affecting the judgment. We think the question cannot be reviewed in this form of proceeding. It is a case for which the Practice Act has made no provision.

The case of Taaffe v. Rosenthal, 7 Cal. 518, appears to have been decided on the authority of Griswold v. Sharpe, 2 Cal. 17. But the latter case arose under the Practice Act of 1851, which provided for an appeal "from an order * * * which affects a substantial right in an action or special proceeding." Probably this provision would embrace an order of the kind under consideration. The attention of the Court, in the case of Taafe v. Rosenthal, does not appear to have been called to the amendment of the Practice Act in this particular. Besides, the objection does not appear to have been raised or discussed in Griswold v. Sharpe.

No error appearing which affects the judgment, it must be affirmed, and it is so ordered.

G. T. DORSEY v. JOHN BARRY.

ELECTIONS—CONTESTING.—The statutory proceeding contesting an election is a special case, provided for by section nine of Article VI of the Constitution; wholly distinct in form and substantially different from the common law remedy.

JUDGMENT IN CONTESTED ELECTION.—Upon the entry of a judgment in a contested election case under the statute, the power of the Court over the cause ceases, and it cannot grant a new trial or re-examine the issues of law or fact.

SAME—APPEAL FROM.—An appeal lies from such judgment to the Supreme Court, which may, upon a reversal of the judgment, if it be found necessary or proper, order a new trial in the Court below.

APPEAL from the County Court, Tuolumne County.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the Court.

Edwin A. Rodgers, and George Cadwalader, for Appellant.

The Court below exhausted its authority when it entered its judgment confirming the election of Barry. (Wood's Dig. 785, Sec. 69.)

This final judgment was rendered on the 6th of November, 1863, and ended the controversy, as well as the special term.

H. P. Barber, for Respondent.

The County Court is a Court of record. (Wood's Dig. 157, Sec. 694.)

In Courts of record the power to grant new trials may, so far as the United States are concerned, be considered as a common law right, independent of statute, dating back even prior to the case of Wood v. Gunston, in 1655. Sty. 462; Rex v. Corp. of Bewdley, 1 P. Wons. 207; 2 Gr. & Wat. on New Trials, 38.)

Dorsey v. Barry.

No special power is given to either the District or County Courts by our statute to grant new trials, except in providing the means necessary to attain that end. The general power, as to Courts of record, appears to be conceded by implication. (Wood's Dig. 192, Arts. 927, 928.)

The County Court, in these contested election cases, acts as a Court. The Judges of the Supreme Court of New York, on the contrary, in proceedings to open streets, act more as quasi Commissioners than as a Court. (2 Hill, 15, cited in the opinion.)

The Act in question refers to the County Court as a Court, and its only effect is not in any manner to limit the general powers of that Court, but simply to provide that contested election cases shall be tried there.

As regards the time of appeal from the judgment of the County Court, referred to in the opinion, it must be remembered that the old Act (Compiled Laws, 785, Sec. 69) provided for an appeal to the District Court, where the whole matter was retried.

We respectfully suggest that the County Court has the right, where it exercises its functions as a Court, to grant new trials in all cases; that the object of the contested election Act was not to limit the power of the Court, but to provide a tribunal where such cases should be tried.

County Judges have the power to hear and determine motions for new trials out of Court and at Chambers. (Laws of 1861, Chap. 339, p. 199.)

Cases of alleged fraudulent insolvency are also "special proceedings" tried in the County Court, and the statute providing for such trial makes no provision for a new trial. (Wood's Dig. 499, Arts. 26, 67.) Yet, we imagine your honors would hesitate long, before deciding that the County Court could not grant a new trial in such cases.

By the Court, RHODES, J.

Dorsey and Barry, and two other persons, were candidates at the general election of 1863 for the office of constable for Township No. 1, in Tuolumne County. The Board of Supervisors canvassed the election, and declared Barry and John Edwards duly elected as constables for said township. On the 23d day of October, 1863, Dorsey filed in the County Court of Tuolumne County his petition contesting the election of Barry, and praying that he (Dorsey) might be declared elected in the place of Barry. A citation was issued to Barry to appear before the Court on the 2d day of November; and on that day, at a special term held for the hearing of said contested election case, the parties appeared before said Court, and the defendant filed his demurrer and answer, and the Court proceeded to hear said cause, and on the 6th day of November rendered judgment confirming the election of Barry. On the 10th of November, Dorsey filed his notice of intention to move for a new trial, and on the 14th of November, the motion was heard and a new trial granted, and the hearing was ordered for the 30th day of November to which day the cause was continued. It appears from the statement that "on the 11th day of December, 1863, the Judge of said Court opened said special term," and proceeded with the trial of said cause, and on the 13th of December the Court rendered judgment annulling the election of Barry as declared by the Board of Supervisors, and declaring Dorsey duly elected as constable.

Barry gave notice on the following day of a motion for a new trial, and the motion being denied, he gave notice on the 23d of December of an appeal from the judgment and the order overruling the motion for a new trial.

After the entry of the judgment in favor of Barry, on the 6th of November, he objected, at each stage of the proceedings, to the further action of the Court in the premises. The proceedings were instituted and conducted under the provisions of the Act of 1850, and the amendments thereof (Wood's Digest 380-2.) The cause is not one of which the Court had jurisdiction by virtue of its organization, but it falls within the class of "special cases" provided for by section nine of Article VI of the Constitution, the jurisdiction of which may be conferred upon that Court by the Legislature. In Saunders v. Haynes, 13 Cal. 150, it is said that "the statute of 1850 creates a special proceeding wholly distinct in form and substantially different from the common law remedy." The Act itself provides a complete mode of procedure, leaving but little, if anything, dependent upon implication or the common law powers of the Court.

The written statement of contest, the filing of it in the Clerk's office, the fixing of the time of hearing, the process and its service, the attendance of witnesses, the continuances, the hearing by the Court, the fees of officers and witnesses, the liabilities of the parties therefor, the judgment for costs and the manner of collecting the same, the dismissal for insufficiency of the proceedings or for want of prosecution, the judgment and the appeal therefrom, are all specially provided for in the Act. One of the usual rules of all Courts sitting in the trial of actions does not prevail here. A judgment by default or nil dicit cannot be rendered. The Court must proceed to hear the proofs and allegations of the parties, and without regard to the allegations of the contestant or the default of the defendant, if the contestant does not offer his proofs the proceedings must be dismissed. (Searcy v. Grow, 15 Cal. 117.) No provision is made for taking depositions nor for any of those proceedings which, in an action between parties, would result in delays and continuances. In special proceedings, the Court vested with jurisdiction by the statute possesses only such powers as the Act creating the special case has conferred, and in the exercise of those powers it is limited by the terms of the Act. (Whitney v. Board of Delegates, 14 Cal. 503.)

It is held also, in Saunders v. Haynes, that "the statute evidently intended to afford a new and summary remedy in cases of contested elections," and it is a cardinal rule, that in summary proceedings, the law must be strictly pursued. (Sedgwick on Stat. and Const. Law, 319.)

In section sixty-two of the Act, provision is made for the continuance of the special term, not exceeding twenty days, upon good cause shown before the commencement of the trial; and it further provides that after the commencement of the trial it may be continued from day to day until such trial is ended. The continuance in those two cases being provided for, all further power of continuance is excluded.

It is not directly asserted by counsel that the Court had authority to continue the cause otherwise than is provided for in that section, and it does not appear that the Court has assumed to exercise such authority. The judgment was rendered on the 6th of November, and it does not appear from the record that on that day the Court continued the special term to a future day; and in the absence of proper evidence to the contrary, it will be presumed that the special term ended upon the entry of the judgment; and, therefore, there was no special term of the Court at the time of the filing or hearing of the motion for a new trial, unless one had been created by the Court. Upon the entry of the judgment the power of the Court over the cause ceased, for the reason that the statute has not conferred upon it any further jurisdiction. In People v. Supervisors of Greene, 12 Barb. 217, it was held that the power of the Board of Supervisors ended upon declaring the result of the election, and that they could not hold a further session to correct an error in the canvass, because they were not authorized to do so by the statute. It will be observed that the statute does not authorize the Court to appoint a new term after the expiration of the term appointed upon the filing of the petition. In special proceedings, the Court looks to the statutes alone for authority; and the question whether, in a given case, the Court can exercise any power or adopt any of the forms of procedure common to Courts of law, must be determined by the provisions of the statute conferring jurisdiction. Thus, it is held that there can be no jury in special proceedings unless it is provided for in the statute. (Koppi-

kus v. State Capitol Commissioners, 16 Cal. 248; Beckman v. Saratoga and Schenectady Railroad Company, 3 Paige, 75; Livingston v. Mayor of New York, 8 Wend. 85.)

In proceedings to acquire the right of way, where it is provided that certain orders or judgments shall be final, and no appeal is provided, it is held that no appeal lies. (Ex parte Ransom, 3 Code R. 148; New York Central Railroad Company v. Marvin, 11 N. Y. 276.)

The new trial granted on the 14th of November was void, and of no effect for any purpose, unless the special term, in existence when the judgment of November 6th was rendered, still continued; and in our opinion, even in the event that the Court was still holding the special term, the order granting the petitioner's motion for a new trial was without authority, and void. The statute has not made provision for the re-examination of the issues of law or of fact in that Court, but has expressly provided for the taking of an appeal. It is said In the Matter of Beekman Street, 20 J. R. 269, and affirmed In the Matter of Mount Morris Square, 2 Hill, 14; 15 Barb. 37, and many other cases, that the Supreme Court, in revising, confirming, or setting aside reports of Commissioners of Streets appointed by them, derive their powers from the statute under which they act, not as a Court, but as Commissioners. In the Matter of Canal Street, 11 Wend. 154, In the Matter of Mount Morris Square, 2 Hill, 14, and in Visscher v. Hudson River Railroad Company, 15 Barb. 37, the Court held that they could not reconsider their decisions confirming the report of Commissioners appointed by them, because the statute did not vest in them the jurisdiction to review their decisions. And in People v. Supervisors of Greene, the Court said that if they should, by mandamus, order the Supervisors to re-examine the election returns, the action of the Board would be void, for the Board was not vested with that power by the statute, though the error in the decision of the Board was apparent.

We are aware that it was held by the late Supreme Court that in special proceedings to contest elections the County Court could grant a new trial. The decision in that case (Dickinson v. Van Horn, 9 Cal. 207) seems to have been founded upon the provisions of section sixty-three of the Act of 1850, to regulate elections, and upon the idea that the appellate power of the Supreme Court could not be properly exercised unless it could order a new trial in the County Court, and that if the Supreme Court could so order, the County Court must necessarily have that power without an order from the Supreme Court. In our opinion, section sixty-three has no reference to the power to grant a new trial, nor, indeed, to any proceeding that might be had after judgment, as in a civil action. The only portion of the section that can, under any construction, be held to bear upon the question of the authority to order a new trial is as follows: "Such Court shall be governed in the trial and determination of the contested election by the rules of law and evidence governing the determination of questions of law and fact so far as the same may be applicable." This clause evidently means simply that questions of law and questions of fact arising in the progress of the trial of the contested election shall be determined by the Court according to law; and that evidence shall be admitted and its effect determined by the rules of law governing the production and effect of evidence on the trial of an action at law.

It does not necessarily follow that if the appellate Court can order a new trial in the inferior Court, that the inferior Court can, of its own motion, grant a new trial. It will be remembered that in the early history of the common law Courts of England, the Court of Chancery directed a new trial at law in those Courts, and it enforced its decree under the penalty of a perpetual injunction if the adverse party should refuse. (1 Gra. & Wat. New Trials, p. 4.)

The power to grant new trials, and the mode of its exercise, are dependent mainly, if not entirely, upon the statute, in both civil and criminal actions. The grounds upon which it may be obtained, and the manner of applying for and procuring it, are therein prescribed.

Dorsey v. Barry.

If the appellate power of a Court does necessarily include or imply the power to order a new trial, the Legislature might with propriety leave the exercise of that power to the appellate Court, and in cases like the one before us, which was intended to be a summary proceeding, the Legislature may well be supposed to have intended that the judgment of the County Court should be final, unless appealed from, and that the order for a new trial should proceed from the appellate Court upon a reversal of the judgment, if it should then be found necessary or proper. This would appear both reasonable and probable, upon examination of section 73. It is therein provided, that if an appeal be not taken from a judgment annulling an election within ten days, the commission or certificate, if issued, shall become void. If the contestant should desire to appeal from such a judgment, and it should be held necessary for him first to move for a new trial, prepare his statement, procure its settlement by the Court, and have the motion heard and determined by the usual course of proceeding in civil actions, it would be found that before his appeal could be taken from the order denying the new trial his certificate or commission had become void, and that he had been ousted from the office, through no default or neglect on his part, while proceedings were pending to try his right to the office.

Since the decision in Dickinson v. Van Horn, 9 Cal. 207, the late Supreme Court have more accurately ascertained and defined the character of the proceedings under the statute relating to contested elections, and, as already remarked in the cases before cited, they held them to be special proceedings, and in one case denominated them "summary proceedings." We regard them in every sense as special proceedings, and subject to the well settled rule, that in adjudicating upon them, the tribunal exercising jurisdiction must resort to the statute alone to ascertain its powers and mode of procedure.

Upon examination of the several provisions of the statute, and construing the proceedings under them by the well established rules applicable to special proceedings, our conclusions are, that the judgment entered on the 6th day of November, not having been appealed from, was final; that the special term, not having been continued from day to day after that time, expired on that day; that thereafter the County Court had no jurisdiction of the proceedings, and that the order granting the petitioner's motion for a new trial was coram non judice and void.

The judgment appealed from is reversed, and it is ordered that all the proceedings subsequent to the entry of the judgment, on the 6th day of November, 1863, be set aside.

J. W. CASGRAVE v. J. H. HOWLAND.

NEW TRIAL—STATEMENT.—Where a statement is made and settled on motion for a new trial, and an appeal is taken both from the judgment and from the order denying a new trial, the statement can be used in reviewing the order appealed from, but cannot be used in determining the appeal from the judgment.

NEW TRIAL—CONTESTED ELECTION.—In a special case to contest an election under the statute, the County Court has no power to grant a new trial, and an appeal to the Supreme Court must be taken from the judgment, and a statement on appeal be made and settled to enable the Supreme Court to review the proceedings below outside the judgment roll.

APPEAL from the County Court, Napa County.

Howland and Casgrave were candidates for the office of County Recorder of Napa County at the general election in the fall of 1863. Howland was declared elected, and received his certificate and qualified.

Casgrave contested the election. The Court below rendered judgment in favor of Howland.

Casgrave moved for a new trial and appealed.

The other facts are stated in the opinion of the Court.

P. W. S. Rayle, for Appellant.

O. Hartson, for Respondent.

By the Court, SANDERSON, C. J.

Miller v. Van Tassel.

This is a proceeding under the provisions of Article VI of the Act to regulate elections, to contest the right of the defendant, Howland, to the office of Recorder of Napa County. The appeal is taken from the judgment and an order overruling a motion for a new trial. The transcript contains a statement on the motion for a new trial, and it may be used as such in determining the appeal from the order, but cannot be so used in determining the appeal from the judgment, in the absence of any stipulation to that effect. No such stipulation is to be found in the transcript.

In Dorsey v. Barry, 24 Cal. 449, we held that the proceedings authorized by Article VI of the Act to regulate elections are special and summary, and that no remedy can be had under the provisions of that Article, except such as is therein expressly or by necessary implication provided. We also held that a new trial was not authorized by the provisions of the Article in question, and that the remedy of a party who is dissatisfied with the judgment of the County Court is by appeal only.

Under the decision in that case, we cannot consider the appeal from the order denying the motion for a new trial. As already stated, there is no statement on the appeal from the judgment, and it therefore stands upon the judgment roll alone. No error is assigned upon the judgment roll, and we have been unable to find any.

Judgment affirmed.

SAMUEL MILLER v. NELSON VAN TASSEL.

ACTIONS — PLEADINGS IN.—The forms alone of the several actions have been abolished by statute, but the substantial allegations of the complaint in a given case must be the same under our practice as are required at common law.

VENDOR OF CHATTELS — ACTION AGAINST.—Under the forms of pleading at common law, the vendee of chattels sold with a warranty of title could, on a breach of the warranty, recover damages in assumpsit, or he might sue in an action on the case for deceit, if there had been deceit, as well as warranty of title; but, in the first case, he must aver specially that the defendant warranted his title to the property, and that a breach of the warranty had occurred, and in the latter, that the defendant falsely or fraudulently represented himself to be the owner of the property, and that he knew his representations were false.

SAME—COMPLAINT ON.—Under our practice, whichever ground of recovery the pleader adopts, his complaint must contain the same allegations of fact as were required at common law.

OBJECTION TO EVIDENCE.—The ruling of a Court, during a trial, in excluding testimony, will be sustained if its introduction was improper, although counsel do not state the correct grounds of objection, provided the correct grounds, if stated, could not have been obviated.

CHATTELS—WARRANTY OF TITLE.—The vendor of chattels in his possession warrants the same by implication. The warranty is a presumption of law arising from the possession of the vendor and the sale.

SAME.—This presumption may be rebutted by proof on the part of the defendant that he refused to give a warranty of title, and that the plaintiff agreed to take the property at his own risk.

BILL OF SALE OF CHATTELS—WARRANTY.—Where the vendor of chattels in his possession gives a written bill of sale to the vendee containing no covenant of warranty, there is an implied warranty, the same as though the sale was by parol.

SAME.—Where the vendor of chattels in his possession gives a written bill of sale to the vendee, containing no covenant of warranty, the warranty arising by implication may be rebutted by parol evidence, the same as it could be if the sale was a verbal one.

WARRANTY OF CHATTELS—EVIDENCE OF.—The record of a Court in an action to recover possession of personal property, containing the summons, proof of service, and a voluntary surrender of property, and dismissal of the action, is not admissible in evidence to show that the plaintiff in the possessory action owned the property, in an action between the defendant in the possessory action and his vendor of the same property.

APPEAL from the District Court, Fifteenth Judicial District, Tehama County.

The record of the Circuit Court of the United States, spoken of in the opinion of the Court, contained a certified copy of a summons in an action brought by the United States against Miller to recover possession of the jack, proof of service on Miller, his voluntary surrender of the property, and a dismissal of the action by the Attorney for the United States.

The plaintiff recovered judgment in the Court below, and the defendant appealed.

“This is to certify that I have sold to William Miller my brown Maltese Jack, for $1,000.

“N. VAN TASSEL.”

Miller v. Van Tassel.

The other facts are stated in the opinion of the Court.

W. S. Long, for Appellant.

Defendant offered to prove that Miller expressly waived a warranty of title, and agreed to take the jack at his own risk; which testimony was rejected by the Court. For our right to have introduced such testimony, I cannot do better than to call the attention of the Court to Mr. Parson's very able work on Contracts, Vol. I, pages 456, 457, Chap. V, and the notes referred to.

There is no clause of warranty in the instrument of writing, and in fact nothing more or less than a simple statement that he had sold the jack. If there had been a warranty in the writing, then the Court would properly have excluded the evidence. But as there was none, we think we had as much right to show the terms of the sale as if the sale had been made verbally.

W. H. Rhodes, for Respondent.

The evidence sought to be introduced was inadmissible for any purpose, because it would vary, contradict, and add to the written bill of sale, and parol proof cannot be introduced for any such purpose. The rule is too well settled to admit of doubt that the sale and delivery of personal property by one in possession thereof, carries with it a warranty of the right to sell, and of the title.

Mr. Parsons, in his treatise on Cont. Vol. I, page 456, thus states the rule: "And in this country it seems to be now well settled by adjudications in many of our States, that the seller of a chattel, if in possession, warrants by implication that it is his own, and is answerable to the purchaser if it be taken from him by one who has a better title than the seller, whether the seller knew the defect of his title or not, and whether he did or did not make a distinct affirmation of his title." In support of this view, the learned author cites almost innumerable authorities. (Vide, also Hill on Sales, 292, § 36, and authorities to same effect.)

There having been, therefore, a warranty of title, as evidenced by the bill of sale, the question arises, can the vendor now prove by parol that there was no warranty of title?

This proof would add a clause to the written contract, and contradict its written terms by a disaffirmance of the legal effect of the instrument, which testimony is inadmissible.

"Where there is a bill of sale, or a written agreement respecting a sale, no action can be maintained upon a mere parol warranty," that is, of the quality or quantity of the article sold, and this upon the principle contended for, that the written instrument contains all the contract. Thus in the case of Mumford v. McPherson, 1 John. 414, Mr. Justice Thompson delivered the opinion of the Court: "The warranty alleged to have been made is, that the ship was completely copper fastened. Upon the trial, the bill of sale was produced, which contained no such warranty. The plaintiff then offered to prove by parol that one of the defendants, after the bill of sale was executed, and before the same was delivered, did, to a question put by one of the plaintiffs, express himself to the effect of the warranty contained in the declaration." This evidence was ruled out, and Mr. Chief Justice Kent, in reply to one of the counsel arguendo, said: "You do not show any express authority that where you have reduced a contract to writing, and the previous conversations are thereby merged in the written instrument, you can bring an action on such previous conversations," and we add in this case, or defend one.

There are two cases in the English Chancery Reports offering the same doctrine distinctly, the first being Gannis v. Erhart, 1 H. Black. R. 289.

The sale was at auction, and there were certain printed conditions, one representing "that the property was free from encumbrances." Parol proof was offered that the auctioneer, on offering the property, stated the encumbrances, but not to the vendor personally. The proof was rejected, as it contradicted the written conditions of sale. The second case is Pow- ell v. Edmunds, 12 East. 6. The synopsis of the case is as follows: "Printed conditions of sale of timber growing in a certain enclosure, not stating anything of quantity. Parol evidence that the auctioneer at the time of sale warranted a certain quantity is not admissible as varying the written contract." To the same effect is the case of Van Nostrand v. Beed, 1 Wend. 432.

By the Court, RHODES, J.

This action was brought by the vendee of an American jack to recover back from the vendor the purchase money, on the ground that the vendor had no title at the time of the sale. The first count of the complaint amounts merely to the common count for money had and received by the defendant to the use of the plaintiff. The second count states, in substance, that the defendant represented to plaintiff that he, the defendant, was the owner of and entitled to sell the property; that thereupon the defendant executed to the plaintiff a bill of sale of the property, a copy of which is inserted; that the plaintiff paid the defendant the price, and received possession of the property; that the United States is the owner, and reclaimed and took possession of the jack; that the sale was void, and that the plaintiff rescinded the sale and demanded from the defendant the price, with interest, and that defendant refused to pay the same.

The case was treated by the parties in the Court below as an action upon the warranty of title, and the counsel of both parties have submitted the case to this Court on that theory. But evidently no recovery can be had for a breach of the warranty under the first count, because it contains no allegation of a warranty. (Edick v. Crim, 10 Barb. 445.)

Under the forms of pleading at common law, the vendee of chattels sold with a warranty of title, could, on a breach of the warranty, recover in assumpsit, or he might sue in an action on the case for deceit, if there had been also deceit on the sale, as well as a warranty of title; but in either case, the plaintiff was obliged to plead specially. (Chitty on Pleading, 383.)

The forms alone of the several actions have been abolished by the statute; substantial allegations of the complaint, in a given case, must be the same under our Practice Act as are required at common law. The second count fails to state that the defendant warranted his title to the property, or that the property or the value thereof had been recovered from him by law by a person having a better title, or that any breach of the supposed warranty had occurred. Nor can it be considered as a count in case for deceit, for it is not alleged that the defendant falsely or fraudulently represented himself to be the owner of the property, nor that he knew that his representations were false.

The defendant, in his answer, denies that the property was the property of the United States, that the sale was void, or that the plaintiff had the right to rescind the contract; and he sets up that the plaintiff bought the property at his own risk; in other words, he denies what is not alleged in the complaint—that is to say, that he warranted the title.

This explanation of the state of the pleadings is necessary in order to clearly understand the force and effect of the ruling of the Court in excluding the testimony, which is the error mainly relied upon by the appellant. He offered to prove that at the time of sale the defendant refused to give a warranty of title, that the plaintiff said he did not wish the defendant to warrant the title, and that he would take the property at his own risk. This testimony was objected to by the plaintiff, on the ground that the defendant could not contradict his own bill of sale by parol, and the Court sustained the objection. The ruling of the Court will be sustained in excluding the testimony, if its introduction was improper, without regard to the grounds of objection stated by counsel, if the true objections could not have been obviated on being stated. The true ground of the exclusion of the testimony was because it did not tend to disprove any of the allegations of the complaint, nor to prove any allegation of the answer that amounted to a defense to the cause of action. In other words, the testimony was irrelevant to the issues in the case.

It is a rule well established in the American Courts, that the vendor of chattels in his possession warrants the title by implication. (1 Parsons on Contrs. 456, and notes.) This implied warranty amounts to nothing more than a presumption of law of the existence of a fact, arising from the proof of certain other facts, to wit: the possession of the vendor, and his sale of the chattel; but this is not a conclusive presumption. If the whole evidence of the sale had rested in parol, there would be no question that in an action brought to recover damages for a breach of the warranty of title, evidence of the character of that offered by the defendant would have been competent and material in support of the answer denying the warranty. The plaintiff urges that there being a bill of sale of the property, the warranty of title arising by implication attaches itself to the writing, and thereby becomes a part of the written instrument, and thus is subject to the rule of law forbidding an instrument of writing to be contradicted by parol testimony. There is much force in the point, but in our opinion it is untenable. No case is cited by the respondent directly to the point, and it is doubtful if any well adjudged case can be found sustaining that doctrine. The language of the Court in Munford v. McPherson, 1 John. 414, is broad enough to exclude parol proof of a warranty of any description, when there was a contract in writing which was silent in regard to a warranty, because, if allowed, it would add a new term to the written instrument of sale; but in that case, the question of adding to the written contract a further warranty of quality was under consideration. Van Ostrand v. Reed, 1 Wend. 424, Powell v. Edmunds, 12 East. 6, and a large number of English and American cases, decide that a warranty of quality or quantity cannot be added by parol to the written contract of sale; but they do not hold, as counsel argues, that an implied warranty of title, arising out of a sale of chattels, cannot be varied or contradicted by verbal evidence.

The fallacy of the learned counsel's argument consists in considering the warranty as arising out of the terms of the contract; in holding that a contract of sale means a sale and a warranty by the same process and in the same manner that the words "grant, bargain, and sell," in a conveyance of land import a warranty as against the grantor; or as the term demise, in a lease of real estate, implies a covenant for quiet enjoyment; or as a clean bill of lading (as was held in Creery v. Holly, 14 Wend. 30) means, according to commercial usage, that the goods were stowed under the deck.

A warranty of title of a chattel, not directly expressed either verbally or in writing, is an implied agreement of the vendor, presumed by law from the concurring facts of the sale of the chattel by the vendor, and his possession at the time of the sale, without regard to the terms of sale, or the fact that the sale is or is not evidenced by writing. Chancellor Kent adds the further fact that the sale was for a fair price, (2 Kent, 478,) but the current of the late American cases does not regard that as an essential fact. Familiar illustration of such contracts arising by implication may be found in the cases of sale of chattels, either verbal or in writing, where no price or terms of payment are expressed. In such cases the law presumes, from the fact of sale, that the purchaser promised to pay the reasonable value of the chattels; also, to pay on demand, and to pay in money. A tenant holding over after the expiration of a lease in writing, is presumed to hold as a tenant from year to year, and upon the terms expressed in the lease. But, in all these cases the implied contracts may be varied or contradicted by parol evidence, showing an agreement differing from that presumed by law. This doctrine is further enforced by the fact that if the warranty is presumed from the contract, as distinguished from the facts of the sale and possession by the vendor, none could be presumed when the contract was in writing, unless the writing also stated that the vendor was in possession at the time of sale, for it would certainly not be allowable to presume the existence of a fact which might as well not be true as be true, and thereupon to presume an agreement that could not arise by implication unless that fact was true. The implied agreement of warranty does not form a portion of the contract in writing, and may be varied or contradicted by parol. "It is a general rule that oral and extrinsic evidence is admissible to rebut a presumption of law or equity." (2 Starkie on Ev., 568.)

An instrument simply expressing that the vendor has sold to the vendee a certain chattel at a specified price, the receipt of which is acknowledged, and which is usually denominated a bill of sale, does not amount, in legal contemplation, to a contract, defined by Parsons (Vol. I, p. 6) as "an agreement between two or more parties for the doing or not doing of some specified thing," but amounts rather to a bill of parcels, according to commercial usage. But even if it is said to be a contract in any sense, yet the rules of law might not preclude the defendant in this case from introducing the evidence offered by him, for, in a case where a writing is not required by law, "oral proof of a distinct parol contract, relative to terms not noticed in the written memorandum, and showing that the memorandum was confined to one part only of the transaction, may be received." (Chitty on Cont., 109.) The bill of sale is silent in respect to the warranty.

This question, so far as it affects the bill of sale in this case, has been discussed at this time because, upon a new trial, it will again arise in the Court below if the pleadings shall present the issue of the warranty of title, and the defendant shall offer evidence of the conversation of the parties respecting the warranty.

The record from the United States Circuit Court, offered in evidence by the plaintiff, and admitted by the Court, was not admissible, because there was no judgment rendered in the case, and the record, if it amounted to anything at all, simply showed that the United States claimed the property, not that they had recovered it by law from the plaintiffs in this action.

The judgment is reversed and the cause remanded for a new trial.

Robinson v. Russell et al.

HENRY E. ROBINSON v. JOHN RUSSELL, SAMUEL DRURY, AND B. N. BUGBEY.

MORTGAGEE—HIS POSSESSION.—The entry of the mortgagee of real estate into the possession of the mortgaged premises by consent of the mortgagor, does not invest him with any other or greater rights than he would have had without such entry.

ACTION OF MORTGAGEE FOR DAMAGES.—An action can be maintained by the mortgagee of real estate to recover damages for wrongful and fraudulent injuries done to the mortgaged property, by which the security of the mortgage has been impaired.

INJUNCTION TO RESTRAIN WASTE BY MORTGAGEE.—An injunction will be granted at the suit of the mortgagee of real property to restrain the commission of waste upon the mortgaged premises; but before it is granted, it must be made to appear that the commission of the threatened waste will materially impair the value of the mortgaged property, so as to render it inadequate security for the mortgaged debt, and that the defendants are insolvent, or unable to respond in damages for the threatened injury.

APPEAL from the District Court, Sixth Judicial District, Sacramento County.

A. P. Smith was the owner of a tract of land containing about fifty acres, near the City of Sacramento. A large portion of the land was planted to fruit trees, and devoted to raising fruit for sale. A portion of it was also used as a nursery for rearing fruit trees, which were dug up at the proper season of the year and sold. In 1859, Smith borrowed of Robinson, the plaintiff, ten thousand dollars, for which he gave the latter his note, payable in two years, and to secure the note executed a mortgage on the land.

On the 15th and 28th days of August, 1862, John Russell and Samuel Drury, two of the defendants, commenced actions against Smith on money demands due from him; procured attachments, which were placed in the hands of defendant Bugbey, as Sheriff, who, by virtue of the attachments, levied on the pendant fruit and nursery trees, and placed a keeper in possession or charge of the same. Smith was living on the land and in possession at the time.

On the 28th of August, and after the attachments had been levied, Smith entered into a written contract with the attachment creditors, authorizing the defendant, Bugbey, to sell, at private sale, the fruit attached by him, and hold the proceeds subject to the order of the Court.

On the 10th of September, Robinson, whose mortgage had not been paid, commenced an action for the foreclosure of the same. On the 12th of September, A. P. Smith took Robinson's attorney on to the land, and told him he delivered up to Robinson possession of the same. The Sheriff's keeper refused to recognize Robinson's right to the possession. The Sheriff continued to sell the fruit, and after the proper season arrived commenced digging up the nursery trees, planted in rows, for market, upon which he had levied.

On the 17th day of January, 1863, Robinson, who had not yet obtained judgment in his foreclosure suit, commenced this action.

The other facts are stated in the opinion of the Court.

J. G. Hyer, for Appellant.

As by our law an officer is not authorized by attachment process to seize upon and take into his possession real property, the first question to settle is, what species of property is fruit growing on the trees, and trees growing in plantations?

For if they are personal property, then the defendants are justifiable; if, on the other hand, they are real property, (and they are either the one or the other,) the defendants are not excused by virtue of any authority claimed under the attachment process.

That the fruit unplucked was a part of the realty, and that it, as such, became, by transfer of possession by Smith to Robinson, property of the latter, I quote:

"That fruit is a parcel of the land, that it descends to the heir and not to the executor, (which is the ultimate rule to determine to what class any particular species of property belongs,) and that it cannot be taken in execution, is fully shown in the case of The Bank of Lansingsburgh v. Creary, 1 Bar. 544; Green v. Armstrong, 1 Denio, 550; 2 East., in notes, and the authorities there cited."

Robinson v. Russell et al.

Pendant fruit is part of the realty. (Bouvier's Inst. 2, 157-159; 4 Kent's C. 73; 10 Cal. 258; Coke on Littleton, 56.)

Trees growing in a plantation or nursery also belong to the realty; are a parcel of the land, with the exception when, as between the tenant and the landlord, the law considers them as emblems. And when the law attaches to them the character of emblems, it has done so as in the case of fixtures—liberalized its rules for the benefit of trade, and impresses this character upon these subjects only in controversies between the landlord and the tenant; but with regard to all others, they, both the nursery or plantation trees and the fixtures, are real property.

These views are fully sustained by the English Court of Common Pleas, in the case of Lee v. Ridsen, 7 Taunton, 191, where the Chief Justice, in discussing the more general question of fixtures, says: "That the trees in a nursery ground are part of the freehold until severed." And in the case of Miller v. Baker, 1 Metcalf, 38, the Court, after quoting the above recited portion of the opinion of the Judge of the Common Pleas, say: "That there is no doubt that this is true as between the heir and executor, and would be, also, when the entire property in the land, and in the trees growing therein, united in the same person." And in the case at bar, the union did and does exist. Smith was the owner of the land and the trees in the nursery or plantation, and Robinson was equally in possession, by the same title as Smith, of the land and the nursery.

This being an action on the equity side of the Court, if they find that the fruit was real estate, the money derived from its wrongful severance and sale will also be regarded as such.

H. H. Hartley, for Respondent Russell.

The bill is totally devoid of equity, and should absolutely be dismissed, inasmuch as it contains none of the elements which a bill of that character should possess—it does not aver irreparable injury to the fee, permanent destruction of the inheritance, or the insolvency of the defendants.

Robinson v. Russell et al.

Nursery trees, planted out by Smith in rows for the purpose of being removed and taken up by him and sold at any time, particularly where they were planted on the premises after the date of the mortgage, were clearly and beyond doubt personal chattels, and did not form a portion of the realty. (Penton v. Robart, 2 East. 88; Taylor, Land. & Ten. 81; 1 Washburn, 102.)

Growing trees or grass may be severed in law from the land, and become personal property without an actual severance, as where the owner of the fee, by instrument in writing, sells or deeds them to a third person; in those cases the chattels become distinct from the soil, for, in contemplation of law, they are abstracted from the earth.

Mr. Washburn, in his recent treatise on Real Property, page 592, Vol. II, goes further than the previous cases, and lays down the rule that a man may grant trees growing on his land without deed; also corn in the ground; fruit upon the trees standing on his land, though they had not been severed; and that they may be conveyed by parol, an instrument in writing not being necessary, the law regarding them so much of the character of chattels as not to require the formality of a deed to pass them. (2 Barb. 624; 1 Barb. 547.)

P. L. Edwards, for Respondent Drury.

"An injunction will not be granted to prevent a mere trespass, unless the complainant has been in the previous undisturbed enjoyment of the property under claim of right, or where, from the want of responsibility in the defendant, or otherwise, the complainant could not obtain a relief at law." (5 Bacon's Abr. 198; Hart v. Mayor, etc., 3 Paige, 213.)

Both the fruit and nursery trees, vines, etc., were simple personalty.

In regard to the fruits: We regard them as neither fixtures nor emblements, but as mere chattels. The terms of the deed impress neither of the former characters, and the true character must result from the facts. (2 Hilliard on Mort. 310.)

As between landlord and tenant the rule is well established that nurseries are personalty. (Amos & Ferrard on Fixtures, 65; Miller v. Baker, 1 Met. 25; 1 Washburn on Real Property, page 3, Secs. 5, 6, 7 and 8.) "Where land is let for nurturing trees and plants until they are fit to be transplanted, without any specific limitation of time, the interest of the owner of the trees in them continues until that purpose is accomplished." (King v. Wilcomb, Barb. Sup. Ct. 263.)

In any view of the case we had a right to attach and sell the residuary interest of the mortgagor both in the personalty and realty. The mortgagee has no right of interference with the fruits, nursery, or realty, until foreclosure and sale; in fact, as before stated, until the lapse of six months from the time when he himself shall have become the purchaser, although from the time of such sale and purchase he would be entitled to the rents and profits. Thus the creditors had a right to take all the residuary right, title, and interest of the mortgagor, whether in the realty or personalty, and they did attach prior even to the pretended entry. (1 Washburn on Real Property, 545, Sec. 6.)

Probably the most satisfactory definition of a fixture is that given by the Supreme Court of Ohio:

"The true criterion of a fixture is the application of these united requisites:

"1. Actual annexation to the realty, or something appurtenant thereto.

"2. Application to the use of purpose to which that part of the realty with which it is annexed is appropriated.

"3. The intention of the party making the annexation to make a permanent accession to the freehold." (Laff v. Hewatt, 1 Ohio State Reports, 511.)

Basing the argument on this definition, we further state, that to constitute a fixture there must be a complete annexation to the soil, otherwise the thing remains a mere chattel. (Amos & Ferrard on Fixtures, 3, 6; 2 Smith's Leading Cases, 204; 2 Hilliard on Mortgages, 311, Sec. 17; Ib. 373, Sec. 59; Gale v. Ward, 14 Mass. 357.)

Gardeners, nurserymen, etc., entitled to sell, may remove.

(Amos & Ferrard on Fixtures, 65-6; Miller v. Baker, 1 Met. 27.)

By the Court, RHODES, J.

The object of this action was to procure an injunction, restraining the defendants from removing from "Smith's Gardens" certain growing trees and vines, and a steam engine and pump erected to irrigate the land, and restraining the defendant Bugbey from paying over to the other defendants certain money in his hands, which it was agreed represented certain fruit sold by him from the gardens. The Court below found all the material issues of fact for the defendants, and rendered judgment in their favor.

The Court found, among other things, that the defendants had not removed, and did not intend removing from the premises anything besides the growing fruit and the nursery trees and vines which had been attached by the Sheriff at the suit of the other defendants. There was some conflict in the evidence in relation to the matters included in that finding, but we think there was sufficient evidence to authorize the Court to arrive at the conclusion stated.

The first and most obvious point presented in the case, and one that is decisive of this appeal, is that the whole case, as made by the allegations and proofs, does not present such a cause as entitles the plaintiff to relief in equity, or to the process of injunction to restrain the defendants from the commission of the injuries complained of. The plaintiff claims that he is a "mortgagee in possession" of the premises, and insists that by reason of that relation he possesses some further right or interest in the land than he had as a simple mortgagee, but he does not allege or prove that the mortgagor had conveyed to him any interest in the premises other than the lien which he acquired by the mortgage. He alleges and proves merely that the mortgagor let him into possession. It was recently held by this Court that the entry of the mortgagee into the possession of the premises could not invest him with any other or greater right than he would have had without such entry. (Cunningham v. Hawkins, 24 Cal. 403.) The term "mortgagee in possession" is unknown to the law regulating the rights of parties to a mortgage in this State. It signifies no more than would the term "creditor in possession." The plaintiff is to be treated simply as a mortgagee of the premises, and will be restricted to the rights and remedies pertaining to that relation.

There can be no doubt but that an action can be maintained by the mortgagee for injuries of the character set forth in the complaint in this case, when it appears that by the acts complained of the mortgage security is impaired. This is clearly shown in Yates v. Joyce, 11 Johns. 136, Lane v. Hitchcock, 14 Johns. 213, and Gardner v. Heartt, 3 Denio, 232, cited by the appellant's counsel, and more fully in Van Pelt v. McGraw, 4 N. Y. 110. But all those were actions on the case for the wrongful and fraudulent injury committed upon the premises, whereby the mortgagee's security was impaired. There can be as little doubt that the mortgagee may, by injunction, stay the commission of waste upon the mortgaged premises, when he makes a proper case in equity and shows that the commission of the threatened acts will materially impair the value of the property subject to the lien so as to render it an inadequate security for the mortgage debt.

In the case before us, the acts of the defendants, committed or intended to be committed, as found by the Court, consisted in the removal of the pendant fruit and the growing nursery stock. Injuries resulting from such acts are not irreparable. Full and adequate damages could be recovered in an action for the trespass, if the acts bring the case within the rule laid down in Van Pelt v. McGraw. The doing of these acts does not materially impair the value of the inheritance—the substance of the realty. It is not stated that the defendants are insolvent or unable to respond in damages for the alleged or threatened injury. The plaintiff, therefore, is not entitled to relief in equity. (2 Story's Eq. Juris., Sec. 925; Burnett v. Whitesides, 13 Cal. 156; Hanson v. Gardner, 7 Ves. 305, note.)

Judgment affirmed.

Wood et al. v. Truckee Turnpike Co.

D. J. WOOD, AND S. D. WOOD v. THE TRUCKEE TURNPIKE COMPANY.

SHERIFF'S SALE OF CORPORATE FRANCHISES.—The franchises of a corporation organized for the construction of a plank or turnpike road, do not pass by a Sheriff's deed, where the Sheriff, by virtue of an execution issued on a judgment against the corporation, levies upon all the right, title, interest, claim, and property of the corporation in their road, advertises and sells the same, in the manner in which real estate is advertised and sold and executes to the purchaser a deed therefor.

FRANCHISES OF CORPORATION—SALE OF.—The franchises of a corporation are privileges granted and held in personal trust, and cannot be transferred by forced sale, or by voluntary assignment, except by permission of the Government, and when that permission is granted, the mode of transfer pointed out must be followed.

EJECTMENT.—Ejectment does not lie to try the right to a road or right of way.

SAME.—A road or right of way is an incorporeal hereditament, and ejectment is maintainable only for corporeal hereditaments.

CORPORATION—RIGHT TO HOLD LAND.—Corporations organized for the construction of plank or turnpike roads cannot acquire or hold lands, or the possessory right thereto, or any interest therein, beyond the easement or right of way over the same.

TITLE TO LAND WHERE ROAD PASSES.—The road of a turnpike company is not the private property of the company, but belongs to the public, and all the interest the company has in it is the right and power to collect tolls on the line of the road as a compensation for building it.

RIGHTS OF TRAVELLERS ON TOLL ROAD.—Every traveller has the same right to use the road of a turnpike company upon paying the toll established by law that he has to use any other public highway.

SHERIFF'S SALE OF ROAD.—The levy upon and sale of a road, by virtue of an execution, gives to the purchaser no right or title to the same, for, being the property of the public, the defendant in the execution has no interest therein which can be conveyed by the officer.

APPEAL from the Seventeenth Judicial District, Sierra County.

The Truckee Turnpike Company was a corporation organized for the construction of a turnpike road.

The company constructed a turnpike road, leading from the southern line of Sierra County, running thence in a northeasterly direction through said county, by way of Plum Valley, Fred's Ranch, Cornish Ranch, and Jackson's Ranch, to the northeastern boundary line of the county.

The road was built upon public lands.

Wood et al. v. Truckee Turnpike Co.

The execution upon which the road was sold was in the usual form, and the Sheriff levied and sold in the manner required by statute for levying upon and selling real estate. At the end of six months the Sheriff executed to the purchaser a deed.

The other facts are stated in the opinion of the Court.

Charles E. Filkins, for Appellant.

The main and about the only material proposition in this case is, can property or rights like this be sold under execution, as this was sold? The statute of this State, the law and decisions of other States, and the policy of the Government, are against such a conclusion.

To commence with our own statute (Wood's Dig. p. 117, from section 20 to section 28 inclusive): The manner and form in which such rights and interests may be sold under execution is clearly defined; for it will not be disputed that the power that created the franchise had the right to provide and say the manner in which it could be held or disposed of.

The officer having an execution against "any turnpike or other corporation authorized to receive toll," shall give notice for thirty days, (and in this case twenty days notice was given,) and at the sale the person who will satisfy the execution, etc., and agree to take such franchise for the shortest period of time and receive the tolls, "shall be considered the highest bidder," and the officer making such sale shall transfer to the purchaser all privileges and immunities belonging to the corporation, and shall, immediately after the sale, deliver to the purchaser possession of all the toll houses, etc., and the purchasers may demand and receive tolls, etc., in the same manner as the corporation could before such sale, and may recover penalties imposed by law for any injury to the franchise; and by section twenty-six the corporation is bound to repair and keep the road in order, and are liable to all penalties and forfeiture as before the sale.

This statute was passed to govern cases exactly like this, and it will trouble the ingenuity of respondent's counsel to imagine a case that this statute would control if not this one.

Again: under the twenty-seventh section of the same statute the corporation have one year to redeem after the sale, and in this case the Sheriff executed his deed and this action is brought in less than seven months after the sale; and I might, with confidence, rest this case solely upon the statute, confident that the Court can come to no other conclusion than that the plaintiff acquired no rights under this sale.

Counsel for respondent upon the argument contended that they only sold the land over which the road was constructed, and not the franchise. I contend that the only interest or right that the defendant had in the land was the franchise itself—an easement or right of way over the land; and all the authorities define it as such.

A turnpike company own the road, but not the ground over which it passes; and their ownership of the road does not vest in them any right but such as is essential to the enjoyment of their rights and franchise. (Kelly v. Donahoe, 2 Metcalf, Ky. 482.)

The public have an interest in the road as much as the company, and their interest has been lost sight of entirely in this sale. After a most thorough examination of the reports of almost all of the States, I am unable to find but one case where a turnpike road has ever been sold absolutely, and that is the case of Armant v. New Alexandria Turnpike Co., 13 S. & R. 210. It was that case which, I believe, was the cause of the State of Pennsylvania passing an Act whereby creditors could enforce their judgments against such franchises.

The defendant was incorporated by virtue of an Act of the Legislature for a special purpose in which the public are much interested. The only right defendant had was, under the corporate law, to enter upon the land of the Government, construct a road, and when complete, to collect certain tolls, and, for such right they were compelled to keep the road in repair, and were responsible for all damages caused by their negligence; and under our statutes, as cited, after a sale of their road, with the purchaser in possession, the company are under the same responsibilities, and the only right or control the purchaser gets is to collect the tolls. It would be an absurdity to contend that after the company had been sold out absolutely, they should be subject to all their original responsibilities, yet, the position of the counsel for appellants in connection with the statute would place the defendant in that position.

And again: in the case of McKeon v. Odom, 3 Bland, Maryland Chancery, 422, Chancellor Bland, in his opinion, says: "The road itself cannot be taken and closed by virtue of dis-tringas, or sequestration, because that, as one of the highways of the Republic, it could not nor ought not to be obstructed by any process whatever against those whose only interest in it is the toll they are allowed to exact in consideration of keeping it in repair." And it seems to be the whole policy of all the law and decisions to protect Government and corporations in property of this kind from being sold so as to transfer the absolute ownership and control by forced sale to third parties, who might be wholly irresponsible, or close up the road entirely, and thus deprive the public of the use and enjoyment of one of the great thoroughfares leading across the Sierras; and there can be no doubt in the mind of the Court that the right of a corporation of constructing a road and collecting toll is a franchise, and is not at common law nor by our statute the proper subject upon which to levy and sell under execution, as in ordinary cases, and this doctrine and principal is fully discussed in Seymour v. Mifford Turnpike Co., 10th Ohio, 476, in which case a sale was had under a statutory law very similar to our statute.

Again: the Sheriff had no power or authority at common law to sell the fee in land, and his only authority in this State comes from the statute, and where the statute points out a way, in which way or what he must sell, (as the rents and profits first,) and he does not sell in accordance with the statute, his deed, is void, and the purchaser takes nothing by his purchase; and I say that the deed from the Sheriff to the plaintiffs, and under which plaintiffs seek to recover in this action, is absolutely void, and not voidable. (Lessee of Grantly et al. v. Ewing et al., 3 Howard U. S. 707; 13 S. & R. 210.)

"The easement enjoyed by the public in a turnpike road is vested in the public as much as that of a common highway." (State v. Main, 27 Connecticut, 64.)

Geo. Cadwalader, also for Appellant.

An action of ejectment will not lie against one claiming an easement in a parcel of land, to try his right to enjoy the same. (Jackson v. May, 16 Johns. 184; Doe v. Alderson, 1 M. & W. 210; Crocker v. Fothergill, 2 Barn. & Ald. 652.)

Apart from the statute, these authorities show with great clearness that a turnpike corporation takes nothing but an "easement," or a "right of way," while the Act itself, which vests the defendant with whatever faculties it possesses, merely gives it the easement or right of way over public or private property—while they also prove that for a right of way or an easement the action of ejectment does not lie, and we are warranted in declaring that it would be impossible for a Sheriff to put a party in possession of a road thirty miles long, or to eject the adverse party therefrom—the same being a highway to which everybody has the right of access and transit, subject to a single condition, and that he paid the tolls fixed by the Board of Supervisors. The Legislature, giving to the defendant the mere easement, or the right of way, and reserving to the public the use thereof upon the payment of toll, can hardly be said to recognize such an estate or possession of the land itself as would enable judgment creditors of a turnpike corporation to sell and take exclusive possession of the road, and to exclude the public therefrom by closing the highway or obstructing it, for a doctrine of this kind would be at war with every principle applied to highways, turnpikes, or roads, and carried out to its logical conclusion, would enable A., a creditor, to sell ten miles of the road, B., another creditor, to sell five miles, and in this way defeat the rights of the public, adjacent property holders, and place a most effectual embargo on the trade of large sections of country.

In Kelly v. Donahue, 2 Metcalf, Ky. 482, it was remarked: "A turnpike company own the road, but not the ground over which it passes, and their ownership of the road does not vest in them nor take from the owner of the land any right but such as is essential to the enjoyment of their own rights and franchises."

But the plaintiffs were not divested of the fee of the land by laying out the highway, nor did the public thus acquire any greater interest therein than a right of way. (Perley v. Chandler, 6 Mass. 454; Jackson v. Hathaway, 15 Johns. 447.)

Ordinarily — and we may say always — a person obstructing or claiming possession of a public highway is not proceeded against by the action of ejectment, but he is subject to arrest, and proceeded against criminally. (See Sec. 13 of Act "concerning roads and highways;" Wood's Digest, page 652; and also Secs. 32 and 33 of Act "concerning plank or turnpike roads,") under which the defendant organized as a corporation. And it would be the sheerest folly to suppose that the defendant's road, public in its character, with the tolls thereof regulated by the Supervisors, could be entered and fenced or obstructed by persons against whom the law would only furnish a remedy by ejectment.

Vanclef & Bowers, for Respondent.

The position most relied on seems to be that the interest which a turnpike company has in the land upon which it has dug and constructed its road, is but a mere easement, and therefore a part of the franchise. But it is not strictly or purely an easement within any definition we have ever seen. An easement proper is one species of incorporeal hereditaments, and consists of a right in the owner of one parcel of land by reason of such ownership to use the land of another for a special purpose without profit.

"The essential qualities of an easement," says Mr. Washburn, "are these: First — They are incorporeal; Second — they are imposed on corporeal property, and not upon the owner thereof; Third — They confer no right to a participation in the profits arising from such property; Fourth—There must be two distinct tenements—the dominant, to which the right belongs, and the servient, upon which the obligation rests.” (Washburn on Easements, pp. 3, 8; Wolf v. Frost, 4 Sanf. Ch. 89.)

There are one or two other classes of rights which resemble easements, and partake of their nature, but which are not purely such.

“The above definition,” observes Mr. Washburn, “does not embrace the class of rights which one may have in another’s land, like a right of way or of common, without its being exercised in connection with the occupancy of other lands, and therefore called a right in gross. * * * But, after all, it partakes so much of the character of an easement, that, like the rights which the inhabitants in certain localities may acquire by custom, or the public by dedication, to pass over the land of an individual, for instance, it would be difficult to treat of easements and servitudes without embracing these rights, as well as that of taking profits in another’s land, which one may enjoy in connection with the occupancy of the estate to which such right is united.”

In Post v. Pearsall, 22 Wend. 432, Chancellor Walworth says: “Ordinary easements are either personal, and confined to an individual for life merely, or are claimed in reference to an estate or interest of the claimant in other lands, as the dominant tenant, for a profit a pendre in the land of another, when not granted in favor of some dominant tenement, cannot properly be said to be an easement, but an interest or estate in the land itself.”

If the right which turnpike corporations have to the land on which their roads are constructed is to be classed with those rights which resemble easements, it belongs to the latter species above named by Chancellor Walworth. The company is in actual occupancy of the land, and takes a profit from the use of it, of precisely the same nature of the profits taken by a railroad company.

“This,” says Chancellor Walworth, “constitutes an interest or estate in the land itself, which is of course subject to seizure and sale on execution, as held by the Court in The State v. Rives, 5 Iredell, 304."

In the case last cited, the charter of the railroad company provided for the condemnation of lands for the use of the road in the usual manner, and added that, after the company should acquire the right of way over lands in any of the modes prescribed by its charter, that it should have the same power and authority over such lands during the existence of its charter, and for the purposes of its road, "as though it owned the fee simple therein." This, the Court said, constituted the company "the tenant of the land for the term of its charter, subject to the earlier determination of the charter from any cause."

And the Court further remarked that some estate in the land was necessary for the preservation of the road — which is equally true of turnpike companies.

It is said, however, by appellants' counsel, that the charter of this company was peculiar, in giving a greater estate in the land than is usual in such cases, and greater than that given to turnpike companies in this State; but we see no substantial difference.

Our statute (Wood's Dig., 654) which provides for the condemnation of lands, declares that a confirmation of the report of the Commissioners shall have the effect of a judgment on which execution may issue for the possession of the land. This, it seems to us, is fully equivalent to the provisions of the charter in the case above cited. It gives the turnpike companies full power and authority over the land for all the purposes of its road during the life of its charter, and, in addition to this, shows beyond controversy that turnpike companies have such an interest or estate in the land as may be seized and delivered by the Sheriff; for, if the company may receive the possession at the hands of the Sheriff, it ought not to be denied that the Sheriff may deliver the possession to a purchaser on execution. It will be seen, by reference to the authorities cited by appellants, that all of them, except one or two early Pennsylvania cases, apply to pure easements, to public rights of way, and to those rights in gross which give no general possession nor profit.

Again: it is urged by the counsel for appellant that the right to take toll is a part of the franchise, and that the company has lost this right by the sale, etc.

Whether the right to take toll be a part of the franchise or not, it is but a conditional right, and cannot be exercised until the company has a road in travelling order, nor after the company has lost its road by sale or otherwise. In other words, the right is limited to taking toll upon its own road, and does not extend to one which has passed from it, either by its voluntary act or by a judicial sale.

In this State, the remedy by sale of the franchise is not exclusive, for the same section (20th) which provides for a sale of the franchise also provides for a sale of all the corporate property, both real and personal, on execution. A particular mode is required for the sale of the franchise, but the other property is to be sold as in other cases. When the judgment creditor elects to sell the franchise, he must bid the full amount of his judgment, and satisfy it, so that he cannot afterward look to the personal liability of stockholders. If his judgment is twenty thousand dollars, and the franchise is only worth five thousand dollars, he cannot sell the franchise for its value and then resort to the stockholders for the balance, but must allow the sale to satisfy the judgment.

George R. Moore, also for Respondent.

The interest of the defendant in this road is the same as that of any party upon the public lands of which he has the peaceable and exclusive possession, and on which he has made valuable improvements. This interest, under the statutes of this State, and under numerous authorities, can be seized and sold under execution in the same manner as other property.

The plaintiffs obtained a judgment against the defendant for a little less than ten thousand dollars, for work done and materials furnished in the construction of this very road, and it would be extremely hard and unjust if the defendant, after the road had been built by the labor and money of the plaintiffs, could hold and enjoy the fruits and benefits of their toil without being compelled to pay for its construction.

The defendant has the exclusive possession, management, and control of this road, and this constitutes a perfect title as against the whole world, except the Government and its grantees.

Section two hundred and seventeen of the Practice Act provides that "all goods, chattels, money, and other property, both real and personal, or any interest therein of the judgment debtor, not exempt by law, and all property and rights of property seized and held under attachment in the action, shall be liable to execution. Shares and interests in any corporation or company, and debts and credits, and all other property, both real and personal, or any interest in either real or personal property," etc., shall be liable to seizure and sale under execution. No more comprehensive and explicit language than this could be used. Under it, every species and character of property, not exempt by law, and any interest therein of every kind and nature, may be levied upon and sold. Now, is the possession, rights, and claim of the defendant in this turnpike road an interest in real or personal property? If so, it can be sold under execution and conveyed by the Sheriff; if not, the company has no interest whatever in the road, and no right or power to defend this action.

"Property," says Mr. Chief Justice Spencer, in Jackson v. Housel, 17 John. 283, "is the exclusive right of possessing, enjoying, and disposing of a thing; it is the right and interest which a man has in lands and chattels to the exclusion of others, and the term is sufficiently comprehensive to include every species of real and personal estate."

In connection with his many other fallacies, appellant's counsel argues that the interest of defendant in this road is a mere easement over the land over which the road runs. The company undoubtedly has an easement or right of way—but it has much more. It had this before it commenced to build its road; but when it took actual possession, and performed labor all along the line of the road in excavating, filling up, bridging, building toll houses, gates, etc., it acquired a good title to the soil as against the whole world, except the Government. The policy of the Government from the first organization of the State has been and is to give to the occupant of public lands such a title to and interest in the soil as to enable him to maintain possession by ejectment and other modes, and thus encourage him to develop the resources of the country.

The reason urged why ejectment will not lie is, that the Sheriff cannot put the party in possession. But this view, under our statute and under the authorities, will be found to be a mistake.

The objection was fully answered by Lord Mansfield in the case of Goodtitle v. Alker, 1 Burr, 133-145. He says that where the easement does not pass, the Sheriff delivers the possession subject to the easement.

You might as well say that ejectment would not lie for lands in the present possession of a tenant, because the Sheriff cannot deliver the actual possession; and yet it has been held in numerous cases that such action would lie, and was the proper remedy.

Although the interest of a person owning a church pew is only usufructuary, yet ejectment will lie for its recovery. (Baptist Church v. Wetherell, 3 Paige, 296; Ithaca Church v. Bigelow, 16 Wend. 32.)

It is a well settled rule of the common law that ejectments will lie wherever the right of entry exists, and the interest is tangible. It will lie for anything attached to the freehold whereof the Sheriff can deliver possession.

If it will lie for things attached to the lands, it most certainly ought to lie for the land itself.

It will lie for a coal mine. (Comyn v. Kynets, Cor. Jac. 150; Comyn v. Wheatly, Noy, 121.) Also for a fishery. (King v. Old Arlesford, 1 T. R. 358.) Also for a mining claim. (Pennsylvania Mining Company v. Owens, 15 Cal. 136; Lowe v. Alexander, 15 Cal. 302.) Also for the right to herbage or grass. (Wheeler v. Toulson, Hard: 330; Adams on Ejectment, 24.)

By the Court, SHAFTER, J.

This is an action of ejectment. It is averred in the complaint that the defendant is "a body politic and corporate, duly organized under and by virtue of the laws of the State of California;" that "on the 27th day of May, 1862, the said plaintiffs were seized and possessed of and lawfully entitled to the possession of all that certain turnpike road and the land upon which the same has been constructed, built, and excavated," lying between certain termini named; "said road being about fifty feet in width, bounded on each side by the public lands of the United States, and wholly within said County of Sierra; also, all the bridges, toll gates, and toll houses upon said road and the line thereof, and attached thereto; together with all and singular, the hereditaments, rights, and privileges unto the said road, land, bridges, toll gates, and toll houses, belonging or in anywise appertaining. * * * And being so seized and possessed and entitled to the possession of the above described property and premises, the defendant, by its agents, on said 27th day of May, 1862, wrongfully and unlawfully entered upon the same, and wrongfully and forcibly ejected the plaintiff therefrom, and still wrongfully withholds the same and the possession thereof from the plaintiffs."

The answer admits that the defendant is a corporation, duly organized, etc., but denies all the other allegations.

The trial was by the Court. The defendant appeals from the judgment and from the order overruling defendant's motion for a new trial.

The plaintiffs, at the trial, to prove their title alleged in the complaint, offered in evidence the judgment roll in an action brought by them against the defendant, by which it appeared the plaintiffs, on the 23d day of September, 1861, recovered a judgment against the defendant for the sum of nine thousand eight hundred and forty-eight dollars. They also offered in evidence an execution issued upon said judgment, together with the officer's return thereon, showing that the Sheriff on the 28th of October, 1861, levied "upon all the right, title, interest, claim, and property of the Truckee Turnpike Company in and to the Truckee Turnpike Road, a highway," etc.; and "advertised all the above described property for sale at public auction," etc. * * * "And on the 23d day of November, 1861, * * * sold the same to D. S. Wood and son for the sum," etc. The plaintiffs also offered in evidence the Sheriff's deed to the plaintiffs. The deed is not inserted in the record, but we shall assume its subject matter to be identical with the subject matter levied and advertised and sold, viz: "All the right, title, interest, claim, and property of the Truckee Turnpike Company in and to the Truckee Turnpike Road, a highway," etc.

The defendant objected to the introduction of these documents, and on grounds sufficiently comprehensive to include all the questions of error that we shall have occasion to consider.

The discussions in this case have taken a wide range, and involve questions of law of great practical moment, which have not been passed upon as yet in this State by the Court of last resort. In considering the case we shall, however, refrain from passing upon questions a decision of which is not necessary to a just determination of the appeal upon its merits.

The general question raised by the record is, whether the plaintiffs by the Sheriff's deed acquired any property rights, and if they did, then were the rights so acquired of the character recognized by the law as the basis of an action of ejectment.

1. The franchise of the defendant did not pass by the Sheriff's deed, nor by the Sheriff's return under the Act of 1850, (Wood's Digest, 118, Sec. 24,) and for the following reasons: Franchises are special privileges conferred by Government on individuals, which do not belong to the citizens of the country generally by common right. (A. & A. on Corps. Sec. 4.) The persons to whom such privileges are granted hold them in personal trust, and therefore they cannot be transferred by forced sale, (Munroe v. Thomas, 5 Cal. 470; Thomas v. Armstrong, 7 Cal. 286,) nor by voluntary assignment (Redfield on Railways, 419-422,) unless by the permission of Government, and even then, if a special mode of transfer is pointed out, that mode must be followed. Therefore the franchises of the defendant did not pass to the plaintiffs by the Sheriff's return nor by his deed, for the mode of sale prescribed by the Act of 1850 was not followed.

Again: the sale does not purport to have been a sale of the franchises of the company, and for that reason the plaintiffs can have no interest in them. All that was offered for sale, and all that the plaintiffs bought was the "road." Even if the plaintiffs by their purchase acquired a title to the "road," still they could not claim the franchises as appurtenant to the road, for franchises are principal things, and lie in grant as such. They are appurtenant to nothing.

2. The plaintiffs acquired nothing by the purchase of the "road" to which the action of ejectment has any remedial relations. "Road" is a legal term, strictly synonymous with the term "way," and in the complaint, and throughout all the title papers of the plaintiffs, their identity is fully recognized. A way is an easement, and consists in the right of passing over another man's ground. (Wash. on Eas., 161.) It is an incorporated hereditament, a servitude imposed upon corporeal property, and not a part of it. It gives no right to possess the land upon which it is imposed, but a right merely to the party in whom the way is vested to enjoy the way. Neither is it considered that the owner of the way is entitled, by reason of such ownership, to a participation in the rents and profits arising from the land upon which the easement is imposed. (Wash. on Eas., 8.) A deed of a way or of a right of way would pass to the grantee no title to or interest in the land. It may be true, as was held in Sparks v. Hess, 15 Cal. 186, where the owner of a private bridge, who also owned the land on which the bridge rested, had conveyed the "bridge and all the privileges and appurtenances appertaining or in anywise belonging to said bridge," that the deed passed the title of the land on which the bridge rested. In the first place, a bridge is a visible structure, and not in itself an incorporeal hereditament; and in the second place, the abutments of a bridge are considered a part of it. (King v. West Riding of York, 7 East. 588; Bardwell et al. v. Jamaica, 15 Vt. 438.) The fact that a certain descriptive term used in a deed has been held to include what it obviously does include, is certainly not authority for holding that another term includes what it obviously does not include. The authoritative definition which we have given of the term "way" shows that neither land, nor rents of land, nor profits of land, nor any possessory rights in land, are included in its meaning. If the plaintiffs, then, took anything by force of the term "road," they took nothing but a right of way. But it is well settled that an action of ejectment will not lie in favor of a party to try his right to enjoy an easement, nor will it lie against one claiming an easement in land to try his right to enjoy it. (Child v. Chappel, 9 N. Y. 246, 251; Wash. on Eas., 568.) And the reason is obvious—the very subject matter of controversy is incorporeal. It is for that reason that an easement "lyeth in grant, and not in livery." It is for that reason that the owner of a way cannot be disseized or otherwise ousted of it; he can only be "disturbed" or "obstructed" in its enjoyment, and for such injury the remedy is by action on the case at common law, or by bill in equity. The rule is stated in Tillinghast's Adams, p. 19, as follows: "Ejectment is maintainable only for corporeal hereditaments."

3. But there is another ground upon which we hold that the plaintiffs acquired no title to the land traversed by the road, and no possessory interest in it. The defendant had no such title or interest to be transferred. The reason is found in the want of capacity in the company to hold lands by title. The capacity of corporations to take and hold lands in full ownership was unlimited at common law. The vast social and political abuses engendered by this state of things induced the passage of the statutes of mortmain, ranging from the 9th of Henry III to the 8th of George II. The Act of 1850, previously referred to, is a statute of mortmain, in so far as it limits the capacity of corporations to take and hold lands. The provision is as follows: "They (corporations) may take and hold such real and personal estate as the purposes of the corporation shall require." Under this provision the capacity is not absolutely fixed. It depends upon occasion. An estate in land adequate to the necessities or reasonable convenience of one class of corporations might be inadequate to the needs of another. We consider, however, that a turnpike company, prima facie, has no occasion for any larger interest in land than a way over it. This has been fully demonstrated, as a general truth, by a wide and unbroken observation and experience. On this point the authorities are numerous and decisive. We cite Tucker v. Tower, 9 Pick. 108; 3 Kent, 532, 8th ed.

It appears that the lands traversed by the Truckee Turnpike are public lands of the United States, and it is urged that inasmuch as settlers on public lands are considered as the owners of their possessory claims as against all the world except the Government, and are therefore allowed to sue and are held liable to be sued in ejectment, that symmetry of decision requires that the like rule should be applied in the case of turnpike corporations whose roads cross public lands. The argument proceeds upon a false analogy. Settlers, as natural persons, have an unlimited capacity to acquire estates in land, and to hold them indefinitely when acquired. Turnpike companies, prima facie at least, can take no estate in land above the level of a servitude upon it. Again: the possessory interests of the settlers named are not analogous to easements or servitudes.

4. But the plaintiffs did not acquire a title to the "road" or way, which, so far as words are concerned, they purchased at the Sheriff's sale.

The way levied upon and sold as the property of the company did not belong to it by any proprietary right. The way was publici juris. Its uses were not only public, but it belonged to the public by title. All the interest that the company had in the matter was by reason of the fact that it had both the right and the power to collect tolls on the line of the road, as a compensation for the public service it had performed by opening a public road for the public good. In legal theory, "A turnpike is a public highway, established by public authority for public uses, and is to be regarded as a public easement, and not as private property. The only difference between this and a common highway is, that instead of being made at the public expense in the first instance, it is authorized and laid out by the public authority, and is made at the expense of individuals in the first instance; and the cost of construction and maintenance is reimbursed by a toll levied by public authority for this purpose. Every traveller has the same right to use it, paying the toll established by law, as he would have to use any other public highway." (Commonwealth v. Wilkinson, 16 Pick. 176.) In pursuance of this doctrine it has been considered (Erie and Northeast Railway v. Casey, 26 Penn. 287) that the land is not disburdened of a railroad easement by the surrender, forfeiture, or other determination of the charter, but remains subject to it still as a subsisting public right.

Without passing upon the other interesting and important questions raised by counsel, we consider that the ruling of the Court below, in admitting the plaintiff's documentary evidence of title, was erroneous; and inasmuch as the facts found by the Court do not warrant the judgment, the judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded with directions to enter judgment, upon the findings, for the defendant.

T. N. WILLIS v. A. B. FARLEY, MARY FARLEY, JAMES M. SHIRLEY, JACOB H. SHIRLEY, JOHN
Y. SHIRLEY, THOMAS SHIRLEY, SARAH SHIR-LEY, AND LUOY SHIRLEY.

DISCHARGE AND ASSIGNMENT OF MORTGAGE.—A mortgage is a mere incident of the debt it was intended to secure, and passes by an assignment of the debt, is discharged by a payment of the debt, and is barred by the Statute of Limitations when the debt is barred.

JURISDICTION OF DISTRICT COURTS IN EQUITY.—The District Courts, by Article VI, section 6, of the Constitution, have "original jurisdiction in all cases in equity," and an Act of the Legislature depriving them of that jurisdiction, or transferring it to any other Court, is unconstitutional and void.

WHAT COURT CAN FORECLOSE MORTGAGES.—The foreclosure of a mortgage and sale of the mortgaged property for the payment of the debt thereby secured, is a "case in equity," of which the District Courts alone can take cognizance; and the Probate Courts are not competent to afford the full relief to which mortgagees are entitled.

CREDITOR OF DECEASED MAY FORECLOSE MORTGAGE.—A creditor of the estate of a deceased person, whose debt is secured by mortgage, may, after having presented his claim for allowance to the executor or administrator and Probate Judge, whether it be allowed or rejected, proceed at once to foreclose his mortgage in the District Court.

ACT OF ONE OR MORE ADMINISTRATORS.—Administrators in law are deemed but as one person, and the act of any one of two or more co-administrators, in a matter within the sphere of his authority as administrator, is the act of all.

SAME — ALLOWANCE OF CLAIM.—Where there are two or more administrators, the allowance of a claim against the estate by one is the act of all, and binding upon all.

SAME — FILING OF IN PROBATE COURT.—The allowance of a claim against the estate by the administrator and Probate Judge prevents the claim from becoming barred by the statute, even if it is not filed in the Probate Court.

WHEN HEIRS CANNOT PLEAD SUIT AGAINST ADMINISTRATOR IN BAR.—Where a claim against an estate secured by mortgage was presented to the administrator and Probate Judge, and allowed, and after the administrator had presented his final account and been discharged, the owner of the mortgage commenced an action against the administrator in the District Court to foreclose his mortgage, and obtained a decree foreclosing the same, and for a sale of the mortgaged property; held, that this decree was no bar to a subsequent suit against the heirs of the deceased to enforce the lien of the mortgage, and for a sale of the mortgaged property.

DISCHARGE OF ADMINISTRATOR.—When an administrator has presented his final account and been discharged, he is no longer the representative of the estate, and has no authority to appear for or bind it in any manner.

APPEAL from the District Court, Fifth Judicial District, San Joaquin County.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the Court.

H. O. Beatty, for Appellants.

The first question presenting itself, then, is, was the claim regularly presented to the administrators for rejection or allowance, and were the regular steps taken thereafter? The facts are, it was presented to one administrator, and by him allowed, and then to the Probate Judge, and by him allowed; to the other administrator it was never presented. Here, the question arises: is this presentation to one only of the administrators a compliance with the requirements of the statute? I am decidedly of the opinion it is not. But, for the present, let us waive this point, admit that the presentation was correct, and the allowance by one administrator and the Probate Judge sufficient to establish the claim against the estate. What other steps were necessary to enforce the claim? After the allowance, the next thing is to file the claim. Section one hundred and thirty of the Act in relation to estates reads as follows: "Every claim which has been allowed by the executor or administrator shall be filed in the Probate Court, and be ranked among the acknowledged debts of the estate, to be paid in due course of administration." There is no time fixed within which the claims are to be filed; but surely they must be filed before the final decree of distribution of the estate, or else the claim must be treated as abandoned. It does not appear from the complaint in this case that the claim was ever filed in the Probate Court as a claim against the estate. If it was regularly allowed, and filed as a claim against the estate, the Probate Court obtained competent and exclusive jurisdiction of the same as a claim allowed, and must enforce the sale of the property and the distribution of the proceeds. The parties interested could not be subjected to the expenses of a suit in equity, where the claim was allowed as a valid claim against the estate.

It seems to me, however, the proper view of this case is this: The claim never was properly presented to the administrators for rejection or allowance. Sections one hundred and thirty, one hundred and thirty-one, and one hundred and thirty-two, all relate to the presentation of claims, and all speak of the executor or administrator in the singular. No allusion is made to the supposable case of a plurality of the executors or administrators. There is nothing definite in the language of the statute in regard to how claims should be presented when such plurality of executors or administrators exists.

But it seems reason and common sense would require the consent of all the representatives of deceased to make a claim valid against the estate.

If this view of the subject is right, then there was no proper presentation of the claim to the administrators within the time limited by the law, and the claim is barred by the statute as a claim against the estate. If it is barred by the statute as against the estate, it is equally barred against those holding the property of deceased which was included in the mortgage. (Graham v. Vining et al., 2 Texas, 433-447.)

If the claim was duly presented and allowed, the Probate Court obtained exclusive jurisdiction, and no action thereafter could be maintained in the District Court. If, on the other hand, the presentation to one administrator was not sufficient, the claim is bound under the one hundred and thirty-first section of the Act in relation to estates.

Again: if the District Court never could, under the circumstances of the case, obtain jurisdiction in this case, did it not obtain that jurisdiction in the suit brought in July, 1862, against J. M. Shirley, the administrator who approved the account? If the District Court obtained jurisdiction in that case, then any irregularity in the decree should have been remedied by opening up that case and correcting the decree—not by bringing a new suit. (Goodenow v. Ewer, 16 Cal. 470; Boggs v. Hargrave, 16 Cal. 566.)

Budd & Carr, for Respondent.

The decree in the case of Willis v. Shirley, Administrator, was simply a nullity. There was no personal judgment. At the time of the commencement of that suit, Shirley was no longer administrator of the estate of Thomas J. Shirley. That decree bound no property, and could affect no person. Clearly, a decree of foreclosure and sale in a suit in which a person who had no interest in the land mortgaged, and who is not liable for the debt, was sole defendant, can be no bar to a subsequent action against the real parties in interest. To constitute a judgment or decree at bar, it must be between the same parties, and they must stand in the same relation and character. (2 Phillips' Ev. 8.)

In this case, appellant did not sue any one as administrator. He merely seeks to enforce a specific lien on certain real estate, and to foreclose the interest of certain parties therein, no matter how they obtained that interest, (and one of whom, Farley, was not heir of the deceased.) No judgment is sought over against any of the defendants, nor to be enforced as a claim against any estate.

The statute will not allow an administrator to be sued, unless on a claim presented and rejected, but it does not prevent the District Court—a Court of general equity jurisdiction—from enforcing a specific lien against real estate because the person creating the lien had since died, and his administrator had become discharged from liability without paying the claim. After the administrators were discharged, and the real estate surrendered up to the heirs, the administrators were no longer necessary parties to a suit to enforce the specific lien on the land. True, if the claim had not been presented for allowance within proper time, it would have been barred against the heirs. (Graham v. King, 2 Texas, 433; Belknap's Probate Practice Act, Sec. 130.) So if rejected, if suit is not brought within three months after it becomes due. (Same Act, Sec. 134.)

It has never been held that in event of the discharge of an administrator that a person having a specific lien on lands of an estate cannot enforce the same in the District Court, and more especially when the land is a homestead, subject only to the lien, and cannot be administered on or ordered sold by the Probate Court to pay the debts of the deceased or for any other purpose. (Estate of Tompkins, 12 Cal. 125; James et al. v. James, 23 Cal. 415.) Even a mere claim, not secured by a lien, if presented and allowed, but not paid, and the administrator is discharged before the estate is fully administered, and the balance of the estate passed over to the other heirs, can be enforced by suit against the heirs in the District Court. (Montgomery v. Carlton, 18 Texas, 736.)

By the Court, CURREY, J.

Thomas J. Shirley, being indebted to Rufus Lowell in the sum of twelve hundred dollars, made and delivered to him a promissory note for the amount, and afterwards, in December, 1858, for the purpose of securing its payment according to the tenor and effect of the note, executed and delivered to Lowell a mortgage on two tracts of land—the one situated in the County of Tuolumne, and the other in the County of San Joaquin. Shirley died in November, 1859, intestate, leaving him surviving his wife (who, before the commencement of this action, became the wife of the defendant Farley) and seven children, his heirs-at-law, and also leaving an estate of which the mortgaged premises were a part. In the same month letters of administration were granted by the Probate Court of Tuolumne County to J. H. and J. M. Shirley, sons of the deceased, who immediately thereafter entered upon the duties of their office. Early in January, 1860, the note and mortgage, properly verified, were presented to one of the administrators—J. M. Shirley—for allowance, and the same were allowed as a claim against the estate of the deceased, and on the day following his claim was presented to and allowed by the Probate Judge. It does not appear that it was ever filed in the Probate Court.

The mortgaged premises situated in San Joaquin County were, in October, 1860, set apart by the Probate Court for the use and benefit of the widow and minor children, subject to the mortgage; and in December of the same year, the administrators rendered their final account for settlement, and the same was allowed and confirmed by that Court, and a distribution of the assets of the estate was decreed, and afterwards, in May, 1861, the administrators were finally discharged from their office and trust as administrators.

The claim of Lowell was not entered into the account submitted upon final settlement, nor was any portion of it paid in the distribution of the assets, or otherwise. During the administration of the estate, the plaintiff became the owner and holder of the note and mortgage, and sometime in 1862 commenced an action in the District Court for San Joaquin County, against J. M. Shirley, as the administrator of the estate of his father, for the foreclosure of the mortgage, and such proceedings were had in the action that, upon the default of the defendant therein, a decree was entered, ascertaining the amount due on the note and for the sale of the mortgaged premises. No further proceedings were taken under this decree; but upon discovering that the administrators had been discharged before such action was instituted, the plaintiff brought this action against the defendant Farley and his wife, and the children of the deceased, for the foreclosure of the mortgage.

In this action the plaintiff has not sought any other decree than for the foreclosure of the mortgage and the sale of the premises for the payment and satisfaction of the sum due on the note and for the costs of suit.

To the complaint the defendants, Farley and his wife, demurred on several grounds, and the demurrer having been overruled, the same defendants, and J. M. Shirley, answered. The other defendants, some of whom were infants, represented by a guardian ad litem, appeared, but made no answer.

The answer filed admitted all the material allegations of the complaint, and set up as an affirmative defense that the portion of the mortgaged premises situate in Tuolumne County had been sold under an order of the Probate Court during the administration, and that the proceeds of the sale had been applied, under the direction of the Court, to the payment of debts of the estate; and, also, that the note in question was never filed in the Probate Court.

At the trial of the action the Court rendered a decree for the foreclosure of the mortgage and for the sale of the mortgaged premises situated in the County of San Joaquin, for the payment and satisfaction of the amount found to be due on the note, and for the costs of the suit, but no personal judgment was rendered against any of the defendants.

From this decree all the defendants have appealed, and the grounds upon which they rely for a reversal are, in substance:

First—That the debt evidenced and secured by the note and mortgage was a simple money claim against the estate of the deceased, and that it was necessary to present such claim, properly authenticated, to the administrators and to the Probate Judge for allowance; and that the presenting of the same to one only of the administrators, and obtaining his allowance thereof, with its approval and allowance by the Probate Judge, was abortive, and that therefore the claim became barred by the one hundred and thirtieth section of the Probate Act.

Second—That the claim, if duly presented and allowed, was not filed in the Probate Court, and therefore it should be regarded as abandoned.

Third—That if the claim can be deemed as duly presented and allowed, and that it thus became ranked among the acknowledged debts, to be paid in due course of administration, without having been filed in the Probate Court, then it became a quasi judgment in the Probate Court, and no action could thereafter be maintained in the District Court for the recovery of the debt by a foreclosure of the mortgage.

Fourth—That if the District Court could acquire jurisdiction in such a case, then the decree obtained in the action of the plaintiff against J. M. Shirley, as administrator, after the final settlement and discharge of the administrators, was a bar to this action.

In Sheldon v. Sill, 8 How. 450, the Court, in passing upon the character of a bond and mortgage as a "chose in action," say: "In equity the debt or bond is treated as the principal, and the mortgage as the incident. It passes by the assignment or transfer of the bond, and is discharged by its payment. It is, in fact, but a special security or lien on the property mortgaged." The doctrine that a mortgage is a mere incident of the debt which it is executed to secure, and follows the same in whosoever hands it may come by transfer or assignment, and that it remains of subsisting validity so long as the debt so remains, and becomes extinguished by the payment of the debt, and barred by the Statute of Limitations, when the principal of which it is the incident becomes barred, may be regarded as the settled law of this State. Ord v. McKee, 5 Cal. 516; Peters v. Jamestown Bridge Co., 5 Id. 336; Guy v. Ide, 6 Cal. 101; McMillan v. Richards, 9 Cal. 409; Naglee v. Macy, Id. 428; Haffley v. Maier, 13 Cal. 14; Johnson v. Sherman, 15 Cal. 293; Lord v. Morris, 18 Cal. 484; McCarthy v. White, 21 Cal. 501.) Thus, it is to be observed that debts secured by mortgage are generally subject to the same rules of law applicable to those which are not secured; and it will hereafter be seen that the only advantage which a mortgage creditor of an estate has over others, is in respect to his remedy for obtaining payment of the amount which may be his due.

At the time letters of administration were granted upon the estate of the deceased, Shirley, the Act concerning estates of deceased persons (Wood's Dig. 404) required all persons having claims against the deceased to exhibit them, with the necessary vouchers, to the executor or administrator, within ten months after notice to the creditors so to do, and declared that claims not presented within the time prescribed should be barred forever; provided, that claims not then due, or that were contingent, might be presented within ten months after they might become due or absolute. And the same Act further provided, that "No holder of any claim against an estate shall maintain any action thereon, unless the claim shall have been first presented to the executor or administrator." In the cases which have come before the Supreme Court in this State, involving a construction of the provisions of the Act here referred to, it has been held necessary to present debts secured by mortgage to the legal representative and the Probate Judge for allowance, in order to secure their payment out of the general estate, and to prevent them from being barred by the statute. (Ellissen v. Halleck, 6 Cal. 392; Pico v. De La Guerra, 18 Cal. 428; Fallon v. Butler, 21 Cal. 32.) The language of the Probate Act on this subject is plain, and, it seems to us, imperative in its terms. The manifest object of the law was to subserve the interests of those concerned in the estates of deceased persons, by affording to the legal representatives the necessary information respecting existing claims, and a reasonable time within which to pay them, without litigation and unnecessary expense. A debt secured by mortgage on specific property, if claimed as due from the estate, forms no exception to the rule prescribed by the statute. If presented and allowed, it is placed in the list of acknowledged debts, to be paid in the due course of administration.

In some of the earlier cases it was held, that a mortgage creditor whose claim was allowed could not maintain an action in the District Court for the foreclosure of his mortgage, but that his debt must abide the administration and settlement of the estate under the supervision of the Probate Court. (Ellissen v. Halleck, 6 Cal. 392; Faulkner v. Folsom's Executors, 6 Id. 412.) But the doctrine of these cases, in this respect, may be said to have been disapproved by the Court in its later decisions, mainly, if not entirely, on the ground that the District Courts had, under the Constitution as it then existed, original jurisdiction, in law and equity, in all cases where the amount in dispute exceeded two hundred dollars exclusive of interest. (Belloc v. Rogers, 9 Cal. 123; Hentsch v. Porter, 10 Cal. 559; Fallon v. Butler, 21 Cal. 80.) By the Constitution as amended, it is provided that the District Courts shall have original jurisdiction in all cases in equity. (Article VI, Section 6.)

The foreclosure of mortgages, and the sales of the premises for the payment of debts thereby secured, are matters of purely equitable cognizance. Powers which are granted by the Constitution cannot be taken away by legislative enactments, and remedies which are secured to the citizen by the organic law cannot be destroyed by a department of the Government that exists in subordination to the Constitution.

The Probate Court does not possess the power to afford the relief to mortgagees to which they may be entitled in the tribunals created for their use by the Constitution; and as a mortgage creditor has the right to foreclose his mortgage upon condition broken, he can invoke the aid of a Court competent to afford adequate relief. Hence it is that a creditor of an estate of a deceased person, whose debt is secured by mortgage, may, after having duly presented it to the executor or administrator and Probate Judge, whether it be allowed or rejected, proceed at once to foreclose his mortgage in the proper Court of original equitable jurisdiction.

It is objected by the appellants that the debt which is the subject of this action was presented to and allowed by one only of the administrators, and also that it was not filed in the Probate Court; and it is also insisted that because it was not allowed by the other administrator also, and filed in the proper Court, it became barred by the statute. We do not regard this objection as well founded. At common law, executors were esteemed as but one person, representing the testator, and therefore the acts done by any one of them which related either to the delivery, gift, sale, payment, possession, or release of the testator's goods, were deemed the acts of all. (4 Bacon's Ab., Tit. Executors and Administrators, D.) The reason given for this rule by Lord Hardwicke was, that each executor was considered as entirely representing the testator. (Hudson v. Hudson, 1 Atk. 460.) And though it was determined, in a few early decisions of the English Court of Chancery, that administrators had no such power, yet subsequently, in Jacomb v. Harwood, 2 Vesey, Sr., 267, it was decided that one administrator stood on the same ground and foundation as one executor. In Murray v. Blackford, 1 Wend. 617, Mr. Chief Justice Savage, in speaking of the subject, said: "The difference between the powers of executors and administrators in this respect was said to be founded in the different sources from which the powers were derived — the one being by the appointment of the testator, the other by the appointment of law. I apprehend there never was any reason for the supposed distinction. Their liabilities and responsibilities were ever the same, and their powers should be so."

In Dean v. Duffield et al., 8 Texas, 235, which was a case arising under a statute substantially the same as our own, the plaintiff had presented his claim, duly authenticated, to one only of several administrators, who refused to allow it, and in his action for the recovery of the rejected demand he alleged the fact of having so presented it and its rejection. The administrators who were defendants demurred, and the demurrer was sustained and the case dismissed. On the appeal, the judgment on demurrer was attempted to be supported on the ground that it appeared that the claim had been presented to and rejected by one only of the administrators. But the Court held this objection untenable, and declared it to be the settled law that joint administrators stand on the same footing and are invested with the same authority in respect to the administration of the estate as co-executors, and, like them, are regarded in law as one person, and consequently, that the acts of one of them, in respect to the administration, are deemed to be the acts of all, inasmuch as they have a joint and entire authority over the whole property. (See, also, Gage v. Johnson, 1 McCord, 492.)

These well considered authorities we regard as decisive of the question.

Another objection made by the appellants is that the claim, as presented and allowed, was not filed in the Probate Court. The one hundred and thirty-third section of the Probate Act, as it stood before it was amended in 1861, provided that, "Every claim which has been allowed shall be filed in the Probate Court," etc. The statute did not declare by whom it should be so filed; and whether this duty was to be performed by the creditor or administrator cannot affect the question, as the statute has specified the presentation of the claim as the only act essential to save the debt from becoming barred. (Sections 130, 136.)

The remaining objection to be considered is that the decree obtained by the plaintiff against J. M. Shirley, as administrator, after the final settlement and discharge was a bar to this action. In the action against J. M. Shirley, as administrator, the plaintiff only sought to foreclose the mortgage and to obtain satisfaction of his demand by a sale of the mortgaged property. J. M. Shirley was sued as administrator, and through him, in his supposed representative capacity, it was sought to obtain a foreclosure that would bind not only the estate, but all those who might be interested in the property mortgaged. When that action was commenced and the decree was entered there was no such administrator, and hence, the whole proceeding was of no binding validity—it was to all intents and purposes a nullity; for, by the discharge of the administrators, they were as completely separated from the business of the estate as if they had been dead; and J. M. Shirley had no right to appear in or be a party to any suit as the representative of the estate which had passed from his hands, and respecting which his authority had long before then wholly ceased. At that time he was to the estate functus officio. (Taylor v. Savage, 1 How. 284.)

The questions raised by the demurrer are comprehended in the objections of the appellant, which we have already considered, and hence, no further notice of them is required. We are of opinion the decree should be affirmed.

Decree affirmed.

HENRY MILLER v. GEORGE W. STEWART, CHAUNCEY STEWART, AND SYLVESTER MARSHALL.

FRAUDULENT INTENT—QUESTION OF FACT.—In an action where one of the issues raised is a question of fraudulent intent in the sale or disposition of property, the fraudulent intent is a question of fact alone, to be left solely to the determination of the jury.

INSTRUCTIONS ON QUESTIONS OF FACT.—In such cases it is error for the Court to instruct the jury as to the effect or force of the evidence upon the question of fraudulent intent.

SAME.—The Constitution prohibits Judges from charging juries with respect to matters of fact, except to state the testimony and declare the law resulting from the evidence.

APPEAL from the District Court, Sixth Judicial District, Sacramento County.

George W. Stewart and Chauncey Stewart, on the 21st day of August, 1862, recovered a judgment against D. C. Miller and the plaintiff, Henry Miller, in the District Court of Sacramento County, and George Stewart, on the same day, recovered a judgment in the same Court against the same parties.

Executions were issued on said judgments and placed in the hands of defendant Marshall, as Sheriff, who, by virtue of the same, levied upon and took from the possession of Henry Miller a span of horses and wagon.

This action was brought to recover possession of the same, or their value.

Plaintiff averred in his complaint that he was a farmer by occupation, and that the team was exempt from execution.

The answer denied that plaintiff was a farmer, and averred that he was engaged in the livery business as a co-partner of D. C. Miller; that the team at the time of the levy was the joint property of plaintiff and D. C. Miller, and that about the 7th day of August, 1861, plaintiff and D. C. Miller combined and confederated with one B. Cahoon, to defraud the Stewarts and their other creditors, and made to said Cahoon a fraudulent sale of all their visible property, with the exception of the property sued for, for the purpose of preventing the Stewarts from collecting their judgments, and to enable Henry Miller to claim the property in dispute as exempt from execution.

Harrison & Estee, for Appellants.

The Court charged the jury, "That there was no sufficient evidence from which they could infer generally that the transactions which took place about that time were fraudulent as to creditors."

This we consider clearly erroneous. It is a question of fact, strictly for the jury, if there is any evidence or circumstances tending to establish the fact. In the case of Kendall v. Hughes, 7 B. M. 370, the Court say: "The instruction given for the plaintiff, that the fraudulent intention cannot be presumed, but must be proved like any other fact, is obviously misleading. Fraud, or any other fact, may be presumed, if there be sufficient evidence of other facts which authorize the inference of fraud."

Robert Robinson, for Respondent.

By the Court, SANDERSON, C. J.

This is an action brought to recover certain personal property described in the complaint, or its value in the event a delivery thereof cannot be had. The principal question involved in the case is, as to the bona fides of certain transactions or sales on the part of the plaintiff and his brother and co-partner, alleged to be fraudulent as against the defendants, who were creditors of the firm. Among other instructions given by the Court is the following which was excepted to by the defendants, and is here assigned as error: "The circumstances under which this sale of the interest in the property by the partner, D. C. Miller, to Henry Miller took place, have been detailed to you by the witness (Miller) himself; and there is no sufficient evidence in the case from which you could infer generally that the transactions which took place about that time were fraudulent as to creditors. You do not know—it was not elicited by the counsel for either party—whether or not there was a fraudulent misappropriation of the funds raised about that time. Indeed, these circumstances have not so far been detailed to you as for you to find fraud in the transaction. I instruct you upon that point, merely as a matter of law."

Section twenty-third of the Act concerning fraudulent conveyances and contracts (Wood's Dig. 107) reads as follows: "The question of fraudulent intent in all cases arising under the provisions of this Act shall be deemed a question of fact, and not of law" * * *. Whether the transactions in question were entered into by the Millers with intent to hinder, delay, or defraud their creditors, is a question which the statute leaves to the determination of the jury upon such evidence as may be presented for their consideration. The intent is expressly declared to be a question of fact, and must, therefore, be for the jury, and not the Court. In the instruction above quoted, the Court, in effect, takes the question from the consideration of the jury, and assumes the decision thereof, notwithstanding the express prohibition of the statute. As a charge, it is also repugnant to the seventeenth section of Article VI of the Constitution, which provides "Judges shall not charge juries with respect to matters of fact, but may state the testimony and declare the law."

If there was no evidence whatever tending to support the allegation of fraudulent intent, we might disregard the error upon the ground that it is an error without prejudice; but there is some evidence in the record tending to establish the alleged fraud upon which the defendants were entitled to take the opinion of the jury. (Pico v. Stevens, 18 Cal. 376.) That there is such evidence, the language of the instruction itself implies. This disposes of the appeal, and makes it unnecessary to consider the remaining points made by counsel for the appellant.

The judgment is reversed, and a new trial is ordered.

MORTGAGE — SUBSEQUENT LIENHOLDERS.—The mortgagee of real estate cannot, by virtue of the lien of his mortgage alone, cut off the judgment creditors of the mortgagor who have, by virtue of their judgments, acquired a lien on the mortgaged property subsequent to the mortgage, from all recourse upon the mortgaged property.

FORECLOSURE OF MORTGAGE — PARTIES TO.—A judgment creditor whose judgment lien is subject to the lien of a prior mortgage is not concluded nor are his rights affected by a decree of foreclosure of the mortgage unless he was a party thereto.

SALE OF MORTGAGED PROPERTY BY JUDGMENT CREDITOR — EFFECT OF.—After the execution of a mortgage upon real estate, a judgment was rendered against the mortgagor, which became a lien upon the mortgaged property; the mortgagee then foreclosed the mortgage, making the mortgagor alone a party defendant, had the mortgaged property sold under the decree, became the purchaser, and obtained a Sheriff's deed; afterwards the judgment creditor procured an execution upon his judgment, and had the property advertised for sale; the holder of the title under the Sheriff's deed filed a bill in equity to enjoin the sale; held, that he was not entitled to an injunction, and that the judgment creditor had a right to sell any interest in the land held by the judgment debtor at the rendition of the judgment or levy of the execution. Held, further, that the judgment creditor's equitable right of redemption not having been cut off by the foreclosure, he might, during the two years that his judgment was a lien upon the premises, sell under an execution, and purchase the legal title of the mortgagor, not only that he might assert his right of redemption at any time within the period allowed by the Statute of Limitations, but, also, that he might realize any other benefit or advantage that might accrue to him from the sale.

APPEAL from the District Court, Fifth Judicial District, Tuolumne County.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the Court.

George Cadwalader, for Appellant.

The owner of the judgment was neither a party to the foreclosure suit, nor to any of the transactions between the other parties.

He stood upon his judgment lien, which the law declares bound the estate of Daubenspeck for the period of two years, as well as any subsequent interest that Daubenspeck might acquire in the land.

He issues an execution, and the Sheriff is about to sell the interest of the judgment debtor in the land, when both himself and the Sheriff are perpetually enjoined at the instance of plaintiffs.

His right to sell is given by the first subdivision of the two hundred and tenth section of the Practice Act, and he is entitled to the fruits of his execution.

The objection of the respondent is confined to the quantity of the estate which the judgment lien covers; and where some estate is apparent on which the judgment lien attaches it is impossible in a proceeding of this kind to stop its being ripened into a deed without the judgment is paid.

It will likewise be observed that all the proceedings related in the bill were carried on in the face of our judgment and its lien.

We stood passive, granting nothing away—consenting to nothing. There stood our judgment lien as a monument to guide all persons dealing with the property. They may have treated it as “non-existent,” or considered it as worthless—nevertheless, such error of judgment on plaintiffs’ part does not diminish the vigor of the lien or make it cling to a smaller estate than that declared by law.

But again: we are not bound by the foreclosure—not being a party thereto; and, in any event, we have the right to sell and then redeem as against the purchaser at the mortgage sale or his grantees, at any time within the period of the Statute of Limitations. (Macovich v. Wemple, 16 Cal. 106; Goodenow v. Ewer, 16 Cal. 468.)

The point that because judgment was rendered in the foreclosure suit on the 23d of November, 1860, the case must have been commenced before the 19th, is untenable; because, as a matter of practice, it is well known that many suits are commenced and ended on the same day. If, however, this were true, it would go to show that Greenwood was not a party to the suit.

These considerations show the necessity of pleading the essential facts, where they exist to be pleaded.

H. P. Barber, for Respondent.

The case is identical in principle with that of A., being the owner of real estate, selling to B., (who has a judgment standing against him of record at the time,) and taking back a mortgage for the purchase money. There, though B. has an apparent legal seizin which would be bound by the judgment of record against him, yet, equity considers the whole as one simultaneous transaction, and prefers A.’s subsequent mortgage to the prior judgment against B.

The complaint shows inferentially and presumptively that the Greenwood judgment was obtained after the commencement of the foreclosure suit by Winne.

Whether, as a matter of fact, the Greenwood judgment was entered before or after the commencement of Winne's suit to foreclose, Greenwood is still a statute redemptioner, his judgment having been obtained long subsequent to the date of the Winne mortgage, as is shown by the record. The decree of foreclosure takes effect by relation from the date of the mortgage, and the judgment creditor, if his judgment be obtained subsequent to the date of the mortgage, is still a subsequent encumbrancer, having a right to redeem under section two hundred and thirty of the Practice Act, though his judgment may be entered prior to the decree of foreclosure. (McMillan v. Richards, 9 Cal. 365; Goodenow v. Ewer, 16 Cal. 461.)

A subsequent encumbrancer (as a judgment creditor) has no right at all to issue execution after the purchaser has obtained a Sheriff's deed under a prior encumbrance. The Sheriff's deed takes effect by relation from the date of the prior judgment; the execution on the subsequent judgment directs the Sheriff to sell all the interest of the judgment debtor at the date of the subsequent judgment. But after the execution of the Sheriff's deed on the prior judgment, and its taking effect by relation from that date, the judgment debtor would have no interest whatever to dispose of at the date of the second judgment. If a subsequent judgment debtor could, under such circumstances, issue execution against the land, after Sheriff's deed to a purchaser under a prior judgment, this result would follow: that as a judgment is a lien for two years, the purchaser, though having a Sheriff's deed, could put no improvements on his land for two years, for fear that the land might be sold within that period under the subsequent judgment. The statute makes a judgment a lien for two years only where the prior rights of third parties are not affected. In case of sale under a prior judgment, the subsequent judgment creditor must enforce his right of sale under execution before Sheriff's deed under the prior judgment. After Sheriff's deed, the subsequent judgment creditor is barred both of sale by execution and his statutory right of redemption under all circumstances, and there remains to him solely, not a right of sale under execution, but simply what may be termed his common law right of redemption.

This common law right of redemption, even, does not exist in the present case, for to enforce that, the judgment creditor must have a lien on the whole premises purchased, whereas, in the present case, he has a lien only on Daubenspeck's share of them. (Erwin v. Scriver, 19 Johna. 379.)

By the Court, RHODES, J.

This action was brought to restrain the defendants—the one being a judgment plaintiff and the other the Sheriff—from selling certain real estate under an execution issued upon the judgment. A decree was entered perpetually enjoining the sale of the premises under the execution already issued, or any that might be issued upon that judgment. The appeal is taken from the final decree alone. The record does not contain the evidence in the cause nor the findings of the Court. The question presented for consideration is, whether the facts stated in the complaint are sufficient to entitle the plaintiffs to the decree as rendered by the Court below.

The plaintiffs allege that Daubenspeck, Sturman, and Fulton, being the owners of a certain ranch, on the 19th day of November, 1859, mortgaged it to Winne for two thousand five hundred dollars, with interest at two per cent. per month, payable in six months after said date, and that on that day the mortgage was recorded, etc.; “That said amount not being paid according to contract, said Winne commenced suit for the recovery thereof and foreclosure of said mortgage against said parties in this Court, and on the 23d day of November, 1860, recovered judgment therein for the sum of three thousand one hundred and seventeen dollars and thirty-three cents,” and interest and costs, with a decree for the sale of the mortgaged premises; that under an order of sale issued upon said decree, the premises were sold by the Sheriff to Winne on the 29th day of December, 1860; that on the 11th of July, 1861, the premises, not having been redeemed, were conveyed by the Sheriff to Winne; and that by meane conveyance the title so conveyed to Winne vested in the plaintiffs. They also allege that on the 19th of November, 1860, defendant Greenwood recovered judgment in said Court against Daubenspeck for four hundred and eighty-three dollars and ninety-five cents, upon which an execution was issued, and the Sheriff levied the same upon the premises, and under it advertised the premises for sale on the 8th of November, 1862. Other facts are alleged respecting certain contracts and conveyances not necessary to be noticed here.

The complaint does not state when the action was commenced by Winne to foreclose the mortgage, and it will be presumed that it was commenced some time before the rendition of the decree of foreclosure, but not ten days, nor any other certain time, for the decree could, under certain circumstances, have been properly rendered immediately after the filing of the complaint. It is not directly nor inferentially stated in the complaint that Greenwood's judgment was rendered after the commencement of the action of foreclosure. The averments upon this point are entirely consistent with the existence of the Greenwood judgment before and at the commencement of the suit by Winne. The plaintiffs have not negatived this state of facts, but as their allegations are to be most strongly construed against them, they will be considered as having averred that the Greenwood judgment was, in fact, entered before the commencement of the foreclosure suit.

The plaintiffs allege in their complaint that it is now pretended that Greenwood's judgment is a lien upon a momentary seizin of an undivided portion of the premises held by Daubenspeck, during the passage of the title from Winne to Platt, the grantor of the plaintiffs, the deed having been executed by Winne to Daubenspeck and Sturman, and by them immediately to Platt, in pursuance of an agreement between the parties, having for its object the vesting of the title in Platt, and the giving to Daubenspeck and Sturman the right to purchase from Platt, upon certain terms mentioned in the complaint.

The decree, however, not merely restrains the defendants from selling the momentary seizin of Daubenspeck only, but it enjoins them from levying upon or selling the land under any execution issued or to be issued upon the Greenwood judgment; and the decree cannot be maintained, if the defendants might, under such execution, sell any interest of Daubenspeck in the land.

The plaintiffs represent the rights of Winne, and the defendants those of Greenwood, and the action is to be determined as it would be if Winne and Greenwood were alone parties to the suit.

It is assumed by both parties, for the purpose of the argument, that the Greenwood judgment became a lien at the date of its entry upon the premises, subject in all respects to the prior lien of Winne's mortgage. It therefore necessarily follows that the judgment, not being satisfied or reversed, continued as a lien for two years, unless the lien was divested by proper legal proceedings. If Winne had delayed the foreclosure of his mortgage, and if, during the delay and within two years after the entry of his judgment, Greenwood had proceeded to sell Daubenspeck's interest in the premises, it would not be pretended that Winne could have enjoined the sale on the ground that his mortgage was a prior lien upon the land. The respondents urge that "the judgment creditor only takes the property of his debtor subject to every liability under which the debtor himself holds it," and there can be no doubt that this is a correct general principle; but it is not deducible from that principle that the judgment creditor can be cut off from all recourse upon the debtor's property by proceedings instituted to enforce any liability or lien upon the property prior to the judgment, (with certain exceptions specially provided for by law,) unless the judgment debtor has his day in Court. The contrary doctrine is fully recognized and affirmed in Morris v. Mowatt, 2 Paige, 586, and in most of the cases cited by counsel of the respondents, and, indeed, it is the well established rule in equity.

If Greenwood had been made a party to the foreclosure suit of Winne, he might have made it appear that the mortgage debt had been paid, in whole or in part, or that some portion of the land was not properly subject to the mortgage as against his judgment, or that some other fact existed that would have rendered his lien more valuable or effectual. And on the other hand, his right of sale might have been cut off, and his remedy restricted to the receipt of the overplus money arising from the sale under the foreclosure, and the statutory right of redemption from the sale. He was not a party to the foreclosure suit, and his rights are not affected by the decree in that case, for a decree of foreclosure is conclusive only upon the rights of the parties who are before the Court. (Montgomery v. Tutt, 11 Cal. 315; Goodenow v. Ever, 16 Cal. 469.)

Greenwood's right of sale of the equity of redemption of Daubenspeck still subsisted, notwithstanding the decree of foreclosure, and the sale and conveyance under it. The extent or value of the interest that he might acquire will not determine his right of sale; but he may sell the slightest interest in the land held by Daubenspeck at the rendition of the judgment or the levy of the execution. His equitable right of redemption not having been cut off by the foreclosure, he might, during the two years that his judgment was a lien upon the premises, purchase the legal title of Daubenspeck under execution issued upon the judgment, which he clearly had the right to do, (Morris v. Mowatt, 2 Paige, 586,) and then, according to the well established doctrine of this Court in Montgomery v. Tutt, he might assert his right of redemption from Winne's sale at any time within the period allowed by the Statute of Limitations.

He was entitled to the right of sale, not only that he might fully and properly exercise either the statutory or equitable right of redemption within the period allowed by law, but that he might realize any other benefit or advantage that could accrue to him by the sale under his execution. It is, therefore, unnecessary to inquire whether Daubenspeck had any present right of possession or any equitable interest in the premises, derived from the contract mentioned in the complaint, which could be sold under the execution.

The judgment must be reversed, and it is ordered that the cause be remanded with directions to the Court below to dismiss the plaintiffs' complaint.

LUCIUS A. ALDRICH v. CYRUS PALMER, EDWIN T. KING, W. H. HOWLAND, AND HORACE B. ANGELL.

NEW TRIAL.—The discovery of new evidence which is merely cumulative affords no ground for a new trial.

ERROR NOT PRESUMED.—Where the record does not contain the instructions of the Court below, the presumption will be that the law applicable to the facts was correctly given to the jury.

DAMAGES IN PERSONAL TORTS.—In actions for personal torts, the law does not fix any precise rule of damages, but leaves their assessment to the unblased judgment of the jury.

EXCESSIVE DAMAGES.—In such cases, the Court will not disturb the verdict of a jury on the ground that the damages are excessive, unless the amount of damages is so disproportionate to the injury proved as to justify the conclusion that the verdict is not the result of the cool dispassionate consideration of the jury.

APPEAL from the Twelfth Judicial District Court, City and County of San Francisco.

The complaint averred that from January, 1860, hitherto, the defendants had been engaged in carrying on the business of iron founders and machinists, and that about December 12th, 1860, defendants caused a certain large iron shaft of great weight to be placed upon trestles and supports in a careless, insecure, and dangerous position in the immediate proximity of plaintiff, who was then employed about other business of defendants at their special instance and request; that the defendants attempted to move and did move the same in so negligent and careless a manner that it fell on plaintiff's foot, by means whereof the foot was fractured, broken, and bruised, etc.

The answer denied all the allegations of careless negligence or wrong on the part of defendants, and averred that the injury was caused by the carelessness, negligence, and want of ordinary prudence of plaintiff, etc.

The jury found a verdict for plaintiff for two thousand two hundred and fifty dollars, for which sum judgment was rendered.

Defendants appealed from the judgment and from the order denying a new trial.

F. M. Pixley, for Appellants.

The rule regulating the obligation between master and servant is, the servant has no remedy against his employer for accidents occurring in the course of his employment which are not induced by the carelessness or improper conduct of the employer. If the servant contributes to the accident by his own negligence or carelessness, he cannot recover against the master unless for his gross or criminal negligence. The proof of unskilful conduct or negligence lies with the plaintiff. If the injury happens from unavoidable accident, no one is liable.

The servant takes the risk of his employment, and is presumed to know and understand the perils of the position to which he hires; his compensation is adjusted accordingly. An employer is not responsible to a servant for an injury incurred by the act of another servant in the same employ, unless the master has hired an incompetent and improper person, and placed him in a position where his negligence or unskilfulness directly occasions the injury.

A servant is presumed to be in the enjoyment of all his senses, and must exercise ordinary precaution and reasonable care in preventing an accident, and in taking care of himself. (4 Edition Cowen's Treatise, 193; 5 Carr & Payne, 379; 6 Carr & Payne, 23; 19 Wend. 400; 1 Cal. 366; 21 Wend.

Shafters, Heydenfeldt & Gould, for Respondent.

By the Court, SANDERSON, C. J.

This is an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been sustained by the plaintiff while in the employment of the defendants, through their carelessness, negligence, and unskilful management. The case was tried by a jury, who found a verdict in favor of the plaintiff for the sum of two thousand two hundred and fifty dollars. The defendants move for a new trial upon the following grounds: First—Newly discovered evidence; Second—The verdict is against law and evidence; Third—Excessive damages, appearing to have been given under the influence of passion or prejudice.

In support of the first ground several affidavits were read. The new evidence disclosed by the affidavits is merely cumulative, and does not present any facts which were not before the jury at the trial. Where such is the case, as has been repeatedly held, the new evidence affords no ground for a new trial.

As to the second ground, the evidence is conflicting, and the record does not contain the instructions which were given to the jury. In the absence of the instructions, we are bound to presume that the law applicable to the facts of the case was correctly given by the Court. As to the facts, the evidence, as presented to us in the record, is conflicting, as we have already stated; and where such is the case, this Court has uniformly held that the verdict cannot be disturbed.

Nor, in our judgment, should a new trial be granted upon the ground that the damages are excessive. The testimony clearly shows that by reason of the carelessness, negligence, and unskilful management of the defendants and their employés, the left foot of the plaintiff was seriously and permanently injured; that in consequence thereof he was for a long time confined to his apartments under medical treatment, attended with much suffering and pain; that two of his toes were fractured, and in consequence thereof twice amputated, and two of the others mutilated and thrown out of joint; that at the time of the last amputation great doubt of his recovery was entertained by his surgeon, in consequence of symptoms of tetanus; that for about three months he was unable to walk, and was prevented from attending to his business, which was that of a machinist; that at the end of thirteen months after the injuries were received, he was unable to walk without limping, and, in the opinion of the surgeons who were examined as witnesses, his condition in that respect will never improve; that the efficiency of his foot, thus disfigured and mutilated, is greatly impaired for the remainder of his life.

In actions for personal torts the law does not attempt to fix any precise rules for the admeasurement of damages, but, from the necessity of the case, leaves their assessment to the good sense and unbiased judgment of the jury. Their verdict, as in all other cases, is subject to review by the Court, but it will never be disturbed unless the amount of the damages is obviously so disproportionate to the injury proved as to justify the conclusion that the verdict is not the result of the cool and dispassionate consideration of the jury. The leading object of such actions is to obtain reasonable and just compensation for the injury sustained, comprehending both the present and the future. But to ascertain what is a fair and just compensation in such cases, is a judicial problem of difficult, if not impossible, solution. None, however, are more competent to its proper solution than the jury. Hence, the Courts have always sparingly exercised the power of granting new trials in such cases. Where the law furnishes no rule for the measurement of damages, their assessment is peculiarly the province of the jury, and the Court will never interfere with their verdict merely on the ground of excess. Upon such a question the Court has no right to substitute its opinion for that of the jury, merely because it happens to differ from theirs.

In Bodwell v. Osgood, 3 Pick. 379, Judge Wilde said: "We do not doubt our power to grant new trials on the ground of excessive damages in cases of personal torts; and when they are clearly excessive and greatly disproportionate to the injury proved, we are bound to interpose. But a strong case must be made out."

"In actions for personal injuries," say the Supreme Court of Illinois, in McNamara v. King, 2 Gilm. 432, "Courts will not set aside verdicts for excessive damages unless the damages are so excessive as to make it manifest that the jury acted from passion, partiality, or corruption; and to enable the Court to draw this conclusion it is not enough that, in their opinion, the damages are too high, or that much less damages would have been a sufficient satisfaction to the plaintiff."

"In actions of trespass," say the Court of Appeals of Kentucky, in Vanzant v. Jones, 3 Dana, 464, "a new trial will not be granted on the ground of excess of damages, unless they are so excessive as per se to indicate passion or prejudice."

In Worford v. Isbel, 1 Bibb, 247, which was an action for assault and battery, the Court said: "In cases sounding merely in damages, without any medium of admeasurement, the Court should be very cautious in setting aside a verdict barely for excess. If, in such cases, a new trial is granted for that cause, the rule is that the damages must be such as that all men who hear the circumstances would pronounce the damages outrageously excessive at first blush."

In Edgell v. Francis, 1 Man. and G. 222, it was said: "To induce the Court to grant a new trial on the ground of excessive damages, it must be shown that they are very excessive, or that a perverted view of the case has been taken by the jury."

Under the rule laid down in the foregoing cases, and numberless others to the same effect which might be cited, we are unable to perceive how it can be seriously contended, in view of the severe and permanent injuries proven to have been sustained by the plaintiff, that the damages found by the jury in the present case are either outrageous or excessive. In our judgment, no candid man, after a careful perusal of the evidence, would be either shocked or startled at the verdict. The amount of the verdict is not suggestive of either passion or prejudice, or corruption; but, on the contrary, we are fully satisfied from the evidence adduced that the jury have not gone beyond the exercise of a sound discretion.

Judgment affirmed.

Mr. Justice SHAFTER, having been of counsel, did not sit on the trial of this case.

WHEELER N. FRENCH v. HENRY F. TESCHEMAKER, A. H. TITCOMB, MYLES D. SWEENEY, H. DE LA MONTANYA, H. L. KING, DOMINICK GAVEN, W. C. HINCKLEY, G. W. BELL, JOHN C. MERRILL, JOHN H. REDINGTON, FRANK MCCOPPIN, AND J. W. CUDWORTH.

CONSTRUCTION OF CONSTITUTION.—Constitutions, like statutes and private instruments, must be so construed, if possible, as to give some force and effect to each of their provisions.

STOCKHOLDERS OF CORPORATIONS — PERSONAL LIABILITY OF.—Section thirty-six of Article IV of the Constitution, relating to the liability of the stockholders of corporations for corporate debts, is not self-executing, nor does it contain within its own terms a rule of conduct broad enough to embrace and definitely settle every question that may arise touching the individual and personal liability which it imposes upon the stockholders.

SAME.—Legislation is necessary to give practical effect to said clause in the Constitution, and without the aid of legislation it is inoperative.

SAME — POWER OF LEGISLATURE.—The Legislature has the power to say, not that the stockholder shall not be liable for any of the debts of the corporation, but that he shall be liable for his portion, and what that portion shall be.

SAME.—The Legislature must also impose the same rate of liability upon all stockholders, and the law must operate alike upon all corporations.

CORPORATIONS — POWER OF LEGISLATURE.—An Act of the Legislature authorizing the formation of corporations, without attaching to the stockholders an individual liability, would be unconstitutional, and the persons organized under such an Act would acquire none of the rights of a corporation.

French v. Teschemaker et al.

STATUTE — PART UNCONSTITUTIONAL.— A provision or section of an Act which is unconstitutional, but independent, and does not enter into the general object and purpose of the Act, and may be stricken out without prejudice to the general intent and design of the Act, does not vitiate those portions of the Act which are constitutional.

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS — POWER TO SUBSCRIBE STOCK.— Municipal corporations have no power to subscribe to the stock of private corporations without being authorized so to do by the Legislature.

SAME — HOW MADE.— When such power is given by legislative enactment, the subscription must be made in the mode and manner and upon the conditions prescribed in the Act.

SAN FRANCISCO — SUBSCRIPTION OF STOCK TO CENTRAL PACIFIC R. R. COMPANY.— The seventeenth section of an Act entitled "An Act to authorize the Board of Supervisors of the City and County of San Francisco to take and subscribe one million dollars to the capital stock of the Western Pacific Railroad Company and the Central Pacific Railroad Company of California, and to provide for the payment of the same, and other matters relating thereto," approved April 22d, 1863, is not an independent provision which could be left out without doing violence to the intent of the Legislature in passing the Act.

CONSTRUCTION OF STATUTES.— When an Act of the Legislature is ambiguous upon its face, and susceptible of different constructions, such construction as would declare it unconstitutional should be avoided when it can be fairly done.

SAME — VIEWS OF ELECTORS VOTING ON.— The intent or proper construction of an Act of the Legislature which took effect upon the contingency of receiving a majority of the votes of the electors of a municipal corporation, is not to be determined by the views entertained of its provisions by the electors when they adopted it.

WAIVER OF PERSONAL LIABILITY OF STOCKHOLDERS.— An Act of the Legislature authorizing a municipal corporation to subscribe for stock of a railroad company, the subscription to be made upon the condition that the municipal corporation shall not be liable for the debts of the company, and that the provision as to said liability be made a part of and be stipulated in all contracts made by the railroad company for the construction and equipment of its road, does not exempt the municipal corporation from liability for the debts of the railroad company further than such exemption can be secured by persons contracting with the railroad company expressly stipulating in their contracts to waive all claims against the municipal body for payment of the debt.

SAME — BY CONTRACT.— Persons contracting with a corporation may insert a stipulation in the contract waiving the right to hold the stockholders of the corporation liable for a debt or liability of the corporation created thereby, and such stipulation is not unconstitutional, but may be enforced.

SAME.— Corporations, by inserting such stipulations in all contracts whereby corporate debts are created, may effectually guard stockholders from all liability for the debts of the corporation.

APPEAL from the Twelfth Judicial District, City and County of San Francisco.

April 22d, 1863, the Legislature of this State passed an Act to authorize the Board of Supervisors of the City and County of San Francisco to take and subscribe one million of dollars to the capital stock of the Western Pacific Railroad Company, and the Central Pacific Railroad Company of California.

The first section of the Act provided that on the third Tuesday in May, 1863, a special election should be held in the City and County of San Francisco, for the purpose of submitting to the qualified electors of said city and county the proposition for said subscription, and that if the majority of the electors voted for the subscription, then, when the result of the election was declared, the Board of Supervisors should immediately subscribe, in the name of the city and county, and for its use, benefit, and advantage, the sum authorized in the said Act.

The Act further provided that the subscription should be paid in the bonds of the city and county, and that as the payment to such subscription should be required to be made by the Board of Directors of each of the railroad companies, the Board of Supervisors should direct its President, and the Auditor and Treasurer of the city and county, to issue the bonds in sums of one thousand dollars each.

The election was held in pursuance of the law, and a majority of the electors voted in favor of the subscription.

The defendants constituted the Board of Supervisors of the City and County of San Francisco, and on the 23d of May, 1863, the plaintiff commenced this action.

The complaint averred that the plaintiff was an owner of real estate and personal property in the city and county, liable to taxation, and that he brought the action on his own behalf, and on behalf of all other tax payers in the city and county, and that the defendants were about to make the subscription as directed by the law, and order their President and the Auditor and Treasurer to issue bonds to the railroad companies to the amount directed by the law, and thus cause the city and county to become a stockholder in said railroad companies to that amount.

The complaint further averred that prior to the commencement of the action each of the railroad companies had contracted debts and liabilities to a large amount, for which, if the subscription was made and the bonds were issued, the city and county would become liable in a larger amount than the proposed subscription; that the Act of the Legislature under which the Board of Supervisors proposed to subscribe was in conflict with and in violation of the provisions of the Constitution of the State of California, and therefore conferred no power or authority on the Board of Supervisors to make the subscription; that the seventeenth section of the Act expressed the conditions upon which the electors voted their assent to the subscription, and that it was unconstitutional, and could not be maintained, and it would operate as a fraud upon the electors and upon the city and county to allow the subscription to be made; that if the subscription was made and the bonds were issued, plaintiff and the other tax payers of San Francisco would be subjected to a large amount of increased taxation, etc.

A perpetual injunction was prayed for, prohibiting the Board of Supervisors from making the subscription, and from ordering the President of the Board and the Treasurer and Auditor to issue the bonds.

The Court below denied the injunction and gave judgment for defendants. Plaintiff appealed.

H. & C. McAllister, and Hoge & Wilson, for Appellant.

Our sole point is, that the Act of April 22d, 1863, in authorizing the City and County of San Francisco to subscribe one million dollars to the capital stock of the Western Pacific Railroad Company and the Central Pacific Railroad Company of California, is unconstitutional and void.

Constitution of California, Art. IV, sec. 36: "Each stockholder of a corporation or joint stock association shall be individually and personally liable for his proportion of all its debts and liabilities."

Respondents contend that sections thirty-two and thirty-six of Article IV of the Constitution are inoperative without legislation.

This may be true as to section thirty-two, but section thirty-six is all-sufficient for our purpose, and is self-executing. The stockholder is thereby liable for his proportion of all the debts and liabilities — that is, the amount of his liability is proportioned to the amount of his stock, and that liability is not satisfied by the whole value of the stock he holds, but may extend far beyond his interest in the stock of the corporation. The meaning of the Constitution is plain and palpable.

Debates in the Constitutional Convention of California, p. 136: "The 36th section of the report of the committee being under consideration, as follows: '36. The stockholders of every corporation or joint stock association shall be individually responsible to the amount of their respective share or shares of stock in any such corporation or association for all its debts and liabilities of every kind;' Mr. Jones moved to strike out the section and insert the following, which was adopted, viz: '36. Each stockholder of a corporation or joint stock association shall be individually and personally liable for his proportion of all its debts and liabilities.'"

The Constitution upon this question, to-wit: the liability of a corporator, is clear, explicit, and plenary — requiring no legislation to give it force and activity, but self-operative, and constituting of itself a practical law of corporate conduct and corporate responsibility.

An illustration of the self-acting power of the Constitution is to be found in Article XI, section fourteen:

"Sec. 14. All property, both real and personal, of the wife, owned or claimed by marriage, and that acquired afterwards by gift, devise, or descent, shall be her separate property, and laws shall be passed more clearly defining the rights of the wife, in relation as well to her separate property, as to that held in common with her husband. Laws shall also be passed providing for the registration of the wife's separate property."

Selover v. American Russian Com. Co., 7 Cal. 266, syllabus: "The capacity of the wife to hold separate property is created by the Constitution, and her title thereto depends upon the mode of acquisition, and vests before the inventory can be filed. * * * Mr. Justice Burnett: 'The counsel for the defendant assumes, substantially, that the capacity of the wife is created by the statute, and that she can only acquire that capacity by strictly complying with the provisions of the third, fourth, and fifth sections in the same way that a feme sole trader does, by complying with the statute creating that capacity. And he insists, that until the property is properly inventoried, it is not separate property within the meaning of the Act, and is subject to the disposition of the husband.' This position would seem to be incorrect. The capacity of the wife is created by the Constitution, and her title to her separate estate depends alone upon the mode of its acquisition, and vests in her before the inventory can be filed."

Whenever the organic law can execute its own provisions, there is no necessity of legislation; neither should the whole operation of the Constitution be dependent upon the legislative will; for a Constitution whose provisions are put into activity or made inoperative by statute, is no Constitution at all.

Besides, if this clause of the Constitution as to the liability of stockholders is, as claimed by respondents, a mere power conferred, to be executed by legislation, there has been a valid execution of the power; laws have been passed which impose the same liability upon the stockholder as that established by the Constitution, and those laws cannot be so repealed as to render this constitutional provision inoperative.

By Article IV, section thirty-six, Constitution, every stockholder of a corporation is explicitly liable "for his proportion of all its debts and liabilities."

The Constitution imposing the liability, the statute seeking to release the liability, use the very same terms. The former establishes, the latter seeks to overthrow, to destroy the organic policy—to nullify the very language and letter of the Constitution.

Can there be a clearer, grosser violation of Constitutional provisions? The exemption from liability is general — there is no limiting or qualifying language; it is made the condition of subscription; it is to be inserted as part and parcel of the subscription “on the books of each of said companies,” and is to apply to all debts and liabilities. The words are: “Upon the express condition that the said city and county shall not be liable for any of the debts and liabilities of either of said companies.”

The subsequent provision, that this exemption shall be expressly stipulated for in all contracts for construction and equipment, is a mere additional precaution, suggested, doubtless, by the idea that the general exemption from liability might prove invalid, and in the vain belief that these contracts for equipment and construction would constitute the primary and principal liabilities of the corporations.

The comprehensive grasp of the Constitution embraces every form in which associated wealth secures to itself any of the powers or privileges of corporations not possessed by individuals or partnerships. The power to incorporate for banking purposes is taken away. Additional guards and restrictions are provided for, and then follow the provisions aimed at the great evil of the system, so much complained of, and leading to such disastrous consequences to the general public: “Every stockholder of a corporation or joint stock association shall be individually and personally liable for his proportion of all its debts and liabilities.” This is the great provision for the security of the public. It is inserted in pursuance of grand considerations of public policy for the guaranty and protection of great public interests and forms, with the other provisions alluded to — a harmonious whole, well calculated to promote the great object in view.

It is beyond the reach of legislative expediency. It cannot be avoided or defeated by any legislative arrangement or manoeuvre. It enters into and becomes a part of the very meaning and essence of a corporation. There can be no such thing in this State as a corporation without it. The Constitution has made the principle enter into and become of the very nature of the corporation. To strike it out, to avoid it by any indirection, to dispense with it upon any pretext, however plausible, is to destroy the very essence of the corporation itself. To create a corporation with freedom from this constitutional necessity, or to engraft it upon an existing one, is beyond the power of the Legislature.

While a common law policy may be modified or waived so far as the discretion and judgment of Courts may permit, a constitutional policy, when not a mere personal privilege, never can be.

The usages, customs, policy of the common law, may be swept away by statute, stipulated away by contract; but against constitutional language and policy all such attacks are futile. It is an instrument above public clamor, above legislation; and this Court has recently vindicated its invincibility against the strongest legislative, political, and public pressure.

In Matter of Oliver Lee & Co.'s Bank, 21 N. Y., 7 Smith, 11: Mr. Justice Denio: "The first question to be determined relates to the construction of the constitutional provision imposing personal liability upon the stockholders of banks (Const. Art. VIII, Sec. 7); and the inquiry is, whether it is limited to banks thereafter to be created, or applies equally to existing banking corporations. There is nothing in the language which looks to a discrimination between the two classes. It declares, generally, that the stockholders in every corporation and joint stock association for banking purposes issuing bank notes after January 1st, 1850, shall be individually responsible, etc. * * * It is argued that because the Act left it to the election of the stockholders to determine whether they would embark in the business upon the footing of personal liability, or upon that of corporate liability only, and they declared by the articles that they would not incur any individual responsibility, a private contract was established which was beyond the influence of the clause allowing a modification or repeal of the Act. It is not in the power of the associates, by any stipulations inserted in their articles of association; to limit the power of the Legislature under the reservation contained in the Act. * * *. The power of the corporation to contract at all was a corporate franchise, and subject to the control of the Legislature by force of the reservation."

In Matter of Reciprocity Bank, 22 New York, 8 Smith, 12. Mr. Chief Justice Comstock: "This Court has recently determined in the matter of Oliver Lee & Company's Bank, 21 N. Y. 9, that the free banking associations in this State, created before as well as after the Constitution of 1846 was adopted, are within the personal liability clause of that instrument, and also within the Act of April 6th, 1849, which was enacted to provide the means of enforcing such liability. * * * Proceeding now to such questions as affect the separate or particular interests of some of the appellants and not others, it appears that Mrs. Lansing, in 1840, while a feme sole, became the owner of some shares of the stock. She was married to Mr. Lansing in 1841, but the stock has stood in her name to the present time, and she has received the dividends thereon. It is insisted that she is not liable to be assessed in respect to this stock to pay the creditors of the bank. * * * It is said that Mrs. Lansing, being under the disabilities of coverture, could not make a transfer of her shares, and so avoid this liability, if she had wished to do so. This is a circumstance which might have been properly addressed to the legislative discretion, if, indeed, the Legislature had any discretion under the injunction of the Constitution; but it does not authorize the Courts to allow an exemption where neither the Constitution nor the law has declared any. It is also said, that femes covert are not liable to suit or judgment at the common law, and in general, this is true. It is also true that the apportionment of liability amongst stockholders in banks, when duly confirmed, becomes a judgment against each stockholder, to be enforced by execution as in other cases. But it was competent for the Legislature to depart from the rules and analogies of the common law, and to make married women and their estates liable in this proceeding as other shareholders in banks are made liable. This, we think, has been done, and it seems to us proper to add, that we see no reason why it ought not to be done, in order to effectuate the policy in which the constitutional provision and the statute are founded. It might go far to defeat that policy, if married women could take and hold stock without liability to the creditors."

If the provisions of this statute of April 22d, 1863, exempting San Francisco from liability as a stockholder, are unconstitutional and inoperative, then the proposed subscription must fail; for these provisions are intimately connected with the whole subject matter of the statute, are prominent considerations to the passage of the Act, and also to the assent to subscribe, and constitute the terms and conditions upon which the subscription is to be made and the stock is always to be held.

The statute has but one subject matter, to wit: the subscription by San Francisco of one million of dollars.

The seventeenth section is of the essence and pith of the statute. Note its emphatic expressions, and observe, also, that it contains strong language, not found in the statute, as to the Sacramento subscription passed upon in Robinson v. Bidwell—such as, that the subscriptions are to be made "on the books of each of said companies," and that "the said City and County shall never make any other or further subscription to the capital stock of said companies, or either of them, than that provided for by this Act."

The conditions of subscription set forth in the seventeenth section are clearly and emphatically expressed; they are to be embodied in the very terms of subscription, "on the books of each of said companies," in the primary and principal obligation of the municipality, the act of subscription, to which the bonds are but of subordinate importance.

The power of subscription is coupled with these express conditions of the seventeenth section; the proposition submitted by the Legislature to the electors is a proposition of which these conditions are part and parcel; the vote taken, the assent given, has been upon the faith of this restricted liability—this complete exemption from corporate responsibilities; the municipal act which executes this huge mortgage is to embody them; the construction and equipment contracts of the companies are to express them; whether or not expressed therein, these exempting conditions "shall be a part" of such contracts; and, under all circumstances and contingencies, "the said City and County shall not be liable for any of the debts or liabilities of either of said companies beyond the amount so subscribed."

Mr. Justice Norton observes in his second opinion in Robinson v. Bidwell, of a similar section of the Sacramento law: "The purpose of that section is only to add a certain incident and effect to the act of becoming a stockholder."

An incident signifies "something beside the main design." Can it be said that these terms and conditions were beside the main design?

They were manifestly and prominently in the mind of the Legislature; without doubt, constituted important inducements and considerations to the passage of the Act; are fully and clearly set forth therein; are made the express conditions of the whole subscription; are obviously serious and substantial parts of this statute. Can they with justice be called mere incidents, immaterial additions?

Though the last words of the statute, they should lose no importance from that fact, but rather receive, by the usual rules of construction, especial weight.

"If a proviso in a statute be directly contrary to the purview of the statute, the proviso is good; and not the purview, because it speaks the later intention of the legislators." (Attorney-General v. Governors Chelsea, etc., Fitzgibbon, 195, cited 9 Bacon Abridg. 243.)

"The proviso is generally intended to restrain the enacting clause, and to except something which would otherwise have been within it, or in some measure to modify the enacting clause." (Wayman v. Southard, 10 Wheat. 30.)

There is no law granting the power of subscription to a municipal corporation, where so important a part, so much of the essence of the whole legislative scheme, has been invalidated as in this case, that has been allowed to stand.

Are all the burdens of the statute to be enforced, and all its benefits annulled? A huge mortgage of one million of dollars to be fastened upon the homesteads of San Francisco for thirty years to come, and longer if not then paid, with all the onerous provisions of the mortgage binding and operative, and all the alleviating and compensatory conditions invalid and of no effect?

The Legislature evidently thought—must be presumed to have thought—these express conditions constitutional, valid, and susceptible of practical operation. It will hardly be supposed that the Legislature intended a fraud upon the voters of San Francisco, and inserted these ameliorating conditions and exemptions as a delusive deceit. If, then, the Judicial Department adjudicates them unconstitutional and invalid, shall the subscriptions still be enforced?

They are terms of no unimportant character, but of vital benefit. Terms which might, could they be effectuated, protect our metropolis from future bankruptcy; which any business man would eagerly grasp; which, could they be applied to all corporations in this State, would largely increase the number of such organizations.

There can be no exaggeration of the plain and palpable injustice of compelling the subscription under such circumstances. It is as if a deed and defeasance, constituting but one transaction, are so enforced that the defeasance is annulled and the deed is construed as an absolute conveyance.

Neither should the rights of the minority of the electors be lost sight of in this case. (Foster v. The City of Kenosha, 12 Wis. 622.) One of the great advantages and blessings of a written constitution above all others is that the minority can invoke its protection against the demands and oppression of a violent majority."

The evidence shows a large minority (perhaps representing the greater property interest) opposed to this subscription. Their interests are entitled to the protection of the Constitution; and that protection they have a right to invoke. If they are to be subjected to taxation to meet and defray the liabilities imposed upon them by the majority, they have at least the right to demand that this should be effected according to the principles of the Constitution, and the whole mandates of the law which that majority sets in operation against them.

The majority cannot be permitted to waive or avoid constitutional protections for the minority; nor can the Legislature authorize a majority to sacrifice the rights or interests of a minority upon any pretext whatever.

This is one answer to the argument that the electors must be presumed to have known the law unconstitutional when they voted for it.

Only the majority voted for it; they could not accept an unconstitutional law for the minority.

The true view, however, is that the law was constitutional or unconstitutional at the moment of its passage; and that its character in that respect was not and could not be affected by the vote of the people.

Pixley, Smith, & Hale, for Respondent.

Section thirty-two is neither repealed nor qualified by the subsequent section, thirty-six. They both stand as if in a single section, jointly expressive of a single principle. Taken separately, and without legislation, they are both defective and inoperative.

The very language used points to the necessity of legislation, and not legislation to carry out a specific law in a certain manner, but broadly empowers the Legislature to pass laws "for the securing of dues from corporations," "by individual liability or other means. Had the intention of the Constitution been merely to make corporators irrevocably liable to the extent of their corporate interests without further legislation, then the language of the Constitution would have been definite and certain; and without providing for securing the same by "other means, as may be prescribed by law," would have fixed the same upon the individual responsibility of its stockholders, and thus cut off legislative interference: whereas, the Legislature has been by this section, not prohibited the use of, but clothed with power somewhat discretionary to pass such laws as will effect the "collection of dues from corporations," that being the gist of the section, and not the mere holding of stockholders individually responsible.

The statute of April 22d, 1864, is perfect without section seventeen, and the unconstitutionality of that section does not invalidate the Act.

This section is not the essence of the Act. Take it away, and the Act in all its parts remains perfect and unimpaired. Without it, the meaning of the Act is still full, definite, certain, and without vagueness.

We suppose the principle is now well settled that where a statute has been passed by the Legislature under all the forms and sanctions requisite to the making of laws some part of which is not within the competency of legislative power, or is repugnant to any provisions of the Constitution, such part thereof will be adjudged void and of no avail, whilst all other parts of this Act not obnoxious to the same objection will be held valid, and have the force of law. (Commonwealth v. Kimball, 24 Pick. 359; Fisher v. McGirr et al. 1 Gray, 21.)

If the main objects and purposes of the Act are constitutional, they may be carried into effect, although there may be isolated clauses or separate or independent enactments obnoxious to the charge of being in violation of the Constitution. (Warren v. Mayor of Charlestown, 2 Gray, 97.)

But why search for authorities in Massachusetts, Ohio, or New York, when our own Courts have repeatedly and emphatically decided the very point here at issue?

In the case of Guy v. Hermance, 5 Cal. 74, the Court say: "That portion of the Act of 1853, entitled 'An Act to provide for the sale of the interest of the State of California in the property within the water line,' etc., which prescribes that no injunction shall be issued against the Commissioners, is invalid."

The seventeenth section of this statute does not, in either its language or meaning, deprive or take away the rights of any individuals—it interferes with no existing contracts, lessens no remedy, and infringes upon no privilege of either life or property.

The intention of the Legislature was simply to create a condition upon which, in the giving out of certain contracts, parties desiring to take them may, by a voluntary act of their own, stipulate in writing to waive all personal claim against the City and County of San Francisco in the event of default of payment.

It was clearly not the design of our Legislature to pass an Act that should be unconstitutional in one of its provisions, even though an immaterial one, for after enacting that the city and county “shall not be liable for any of the debts or liabilities of either of said companies beyond the amount so subscribed,” immediately and in the same section qualifies the general language by the subsequent provision, thus: “and this provision as to the liability of said city and county shall be a part of, and so expressly stipulated, in all contracts made by said companies for the construction and equipment of said roads.” Then the penalty is prescribed, in the event “said companies shall fail or refuse to make such stipulation in all of their said contracts,” etc.

Now, had the Legislature intended the first sentence of section seventeen to be interpreted independent of the subsequent parts of the same section, and as including liabilities of all and every character, why specially provide for stipulations in contracts, and not in bonds, agreements, and notes, etc., or is the term “contract” sufficiently comprehensive to embrace all liabilities that can be incurred?

Therefore, the most natural and rational construction is, that the Legislature, deeming it competent for parties to waive, by voluntary act, their constitutional right in the premises, provided by section seventeen that the companies shall contract (where contracts are necessary) with only such parties as are willing, by their written consent, to so release the City and County of San Francisco.

In this construction there can be no constitutional objection ; which mere fact is of itself sufficient to recommend it to the mind of the Court; for where a statute can be so construed as to render it free from constitutional objection, it is the duty of the Court to give it such construction.

Unless the first sentence of section seventeen is sufficient of itself to exempt the city and county, (and if so, then the section should have stopped there,) and the Courts will hold the residue of the section with its penalty clause to be mere surplusage; in which event every agreement or obligation of the companies, every charge or liability, whether contingent or certain, written or parol, executory or executed, it must be assumed (in defiance of the Statute of Frauds, and of every hitherto established principle of law) exists by virtue of the law, independent of any personal claim, on the city and county, and the force of which enactment, by its own inherent power, is sufficient to create that exemption without regard to the consent of the contracting parties; and this is too monstrous a proposition for even illustrative use, otherwise contracts would be inevitable with every clerk, engineer, fireman, and laborer—for every nail, bolt, bar, or pound of coal bought—with every passenger, and consignor of freight, with every cattle owner in the county, and every inhabitant of the State, who might possibly be run over; for without any regard to the amount involved or the time of performance, every such contract, being in fact a promise by certain of the stockholders to answer for the debt or default of a certain other stockholder, (unless the first sentence of section seventeen repeals the Statute of Frauds, and all other conflicting laws,) must be in writing, and for a consideration, to be of any valid effect.

If it be not such agreement on the part of the stockholders, it must be an agreement by the contractors or creditors, whereby they covenant, in default of payment, to release such proportion of the companies' liabilities as the stock owned by the City and County of San Francisco bears to the whole; but even then an agreement in writing and for a consideration would be necessary. In short, take any view of the meaning of the Legislature besides the one advanced, and the amount of writing and time necessary to carry into practical effect its provisions would be so to hinder and clog their business as to make the intended benefit to these companies burdensome and insupportable.

It is perhaps not essential to discuss in this form of action, whether it is competent or not for contractors or creditors to waive a constitutional right; yet as we desire to dispose fully of all the issues raised, we ask the indulgence of the Court for a brief space.

Admitting the provisions of the Constitution to be in full force without legislation, then it is in force as to the creditors of the company, and they may at their own volition waive that right; in fact, the question of waiving a constitutional right has been affirmatively determined repeatedly in America. In the case of Lee v. Tillotson, 24 Wend. 338, as to the right of trial by jury, Judge Cowen held that "the objection called for the less countenance in this case, inasmuch as the parties mutually consented to the reference by writing. This of itself is a waiver of the objection, even if the Constitution stood in the way. A party may waive a constitutional as well as a statute provision made for his own benefit. The contrary argument would deprive a criminal of the power to plead guilty."

Again: as to the waiver of the right of trial by jury, in People v. Murray, 5 Hill, 472, Mr. Chief Justice Nelson held that "the defendants took the grant to build the dam, with the condition attached to it, and they are not now at liberty to make the objection, though under other circumstances it might have been effected. It was competent for them to waive the right of a trial according to the common law, even if without such a waiver they would be considered entitled to it."

As to the laying out of roads, in Baker v. Braman, 6 Hill, 48, and which principles were subsequently sustained in the Court of Appeals in Embury v. Conner, 3 Com. 518, Judge Cowen says: "In the light of the Constitution, if not that of a law which lies at the foundation of all governments, this statute must be read with the proviso that the owner consent. That consent removes all obstacles, and lets the statute in to operate the same as if it had in terms contained the condition."

In the case referred to above of Embury v. Conner, 3 Com. 518, the Court say: "But it is insisted that, as the enactment is only held to be void on the ground that it takes private property for private uses against the owner's consent, if the consent be given, all objection on the ground of unconstitutionality is removed. The decisions to which I have referred proceed upon that principle; and Mr. Justice Bronson, in Taylor v. Porter, in terms concedes that the objection has no application when the owner consents. If we read the statute in question with a proviso that the owner consent, and I think we should, that consent removes all obstacles and lets the statute in to operate, the same as if it had in terms contained the condition."

Through an entire course of English authorities the doctrine is sustained that parties may waive their statutory rights, provided it is done by consent.

We refer the Court to Hallett v. Dowdall, 9 Eng. Law and Eq., 347; 4 Exchequer, 324.

Mr. Sedgwick, in his able treatise on statutory and constitutional law says, at page 111: "The general rule holds good as well in regard to Constitutions as to statutes—a party may waive a constitutional as well as a statutory provision made for his benefit."

It must also be borne in mind that the cases of Wilson v. Pollock, 2 Cal. 94, and Exline v. Smith, 5 Cal. 112, turned on the absence of consent to the waiver of a constitutional right, and not to the waiver itself, which the Court in both cases held would have been good if consented to, and to which cases, as authorities for respondent, we respectfully refer the Court.

Patterson, Wallace & Stowe, also for Respondents.

"Where a provision in a statute is of such a nature and has such a connection with the other parts of the statute as to be essential to the law, its unconstitutionality vitiates the whole enactment. But if an independent provision, not in its nature and connection essential to the other parts of the statute, be unconstitutional, it may be treated as a nullity, leaving the rest of the enactment to stand as valid." (3 Ohio State R. 34.)

To the same effect are: 11 Indiana, 424, 482; 1 Gray, Mass. 1; 2 Id. 84; 5 Id. 100; People v. Hill, 7 Cal. 97; 19 Illinois, 376; Mills v. Lathrop, 19 Cal. 518.

Section thirty-seven, Article IV of the Constitution, provides: "It shall be the duty of the Legislature to provide for the organization of cities and incorporated villages, and to restrict their power of taxation, assessment, borrowing money, contracting debts, and loaning their credit, so as to prevent abuses in assessments and in contracting debts by such municipal corporations."

Now, by the Act under consideration the Legislature authorized the city and county to contract a liability to a certain amount and no other. It has no power by its charter as a municipal government to become a stockholder at all; the power given by the Act is a restricted power, and cannot be exceeded. The city and county does not voluntarily propose to exceed it. The railroad corporations do not ask that it shall be exceeded. The plaintiff does not show it will be exceeded, but contends it possibly may be.

The city and county cannot become liable on an implied obligation against the express stipulation of her contract and against the restriction imposed by the Act. (New York F. Ins. Co. v. Ely, 5 Conn. 572; Head v. Providence I. Co., 2 Cranch, 127; Goszler v. Georgetown, 6 Wheaton, 597.)

The position of the city and county is like the case of an infant who subscribed to stock; like that of a married woman under disability; like that of a lunatic.

The claim that section seventeen is unconstitutional ought to be considered determined by reference to section eighteen, page three hundred, of the Session Laws of 1857. "Neither the said Board, etc., * * * shall in any event be liable for the debts of said railroad company in any amount beyond the subscription made as herein provided;" and the case of Pattison v. Board of Supervisors of Yuba County, 13 Cal. 175, where the question was raised upon the constitutionality of the whole Act (p. 182,) and the case of Robinson v. Bidwell et al., 23 Cal. 379.

E. B. Crocker, for Respondents.

Corporations have a clear and undoubted right, under the Constitution, to thus limit the liability of their stockholders by express stipulations to that effect in their contracts. A creditor of the corporation, by entering into such a contract, expressly waives the benefit of the constitutional provision relating to the liability of the stockholders of a corporation. Section thirty-six of the Constitution, above cited, was intended for the benefit of the creditors of the corporation. Its most enlarged construction is to confer upon the creditor a right which did not exist at common law—that is, a right to resort to the individual and personal responsibility of the stockholders. But the Constitution does not compel the creditor to accept this benefit, or prohibit him from waiving it. It is clearly to be classed among those rights which he may waive by agreement, and he will be held bound by an agreement to that effect, for a person may waive a constitutional as well as a statutory provision made for his benefit. (Sedgwick on Stat. and Const. Law, 111; People v. Murray, 5 Hill, 472; 3 Comstock, 518; 24 Wend. 337.)

By the Court, SANDERSON, C. J.

The only question presented for our consideration in this case relates to the constitutionality of an Act passed by the Legislature in 1863, entitled "An Act to authorize the Board of Supervisors of the City and County of San Francisco to take and subscribe one million dollars to the capital stock of the Western Pacific Railroad Company, and the Central Pacific Railroad Company of California, and to provide for the payment of the same, and other matters relating thereto." (Statutes of 1863, p. 380.)

The charge that this Act is unconstitutional is founded upon certain provisions contained in the seventeenth section, which reads as follows:

"SEC. 17. The subscriptions of stock authorized by the provisions of this Act shall be made by said Board of Supervisors on the books of each of said companies, upon the express condition that the said city and county shall not be liable for any of the debts or liabilities of either of said companies beyond the amount so subscribed; and this provision as to the liability of said city and county shall be a part of and so expressly stipulated in all contracts made by said companies for the construction and equipment of said roads; and, in case either of said companies shall fail or refuse to make such stipulation in all of their said contracts, then the said Board of Supervisors shall have power to declare the said subscription to the capital stock of such company void and of no effect, and may recover of said company any previous payments that may have been made thereon at the time of such failure or refusal, and the said city and county shall never make any other or further subscription to the capital stock of said companies, or either of them, than that provided for by this Act."

It is claimed by counsel for appellant that the foregoing section exempts the City and County of San Francisco from all liability for the debts and other liabilities of the railroad corporations mentioned in the Act, and is therefore in direct conflict with the thirty-sixth section of Article IV of the Constitution. And it is further contended that the provisions of the section in question are so interwoven and interblended with the whole scope and purpose of the Act as to entirely vitiate the same and render it unconstitutional and void.

I. There are two sections (thirty-two and thirty-six in the fourth Article of the Constitution touching the individual and personal liability of members of a corporation, between which there is an apparent repugnancy. They provide as follows:

“Sec. 32. Dues from corporations shall be secured by such individual liability of the corporators and other means as may be prescribed by law.”

The first is a positive injunction requiring the legislative department of the Government to provide security for corporate dues, by laws imposing, in connection with other means, some degree of individual liability upon the members of the corporation, but leaving the extent of that liability to the wisdom and sound discretion of that department. But the latter section, by itself considered, seems to fix, upon first impression, the precise degree of liability, leaving no room for the exercise of legislative judgment. To harmonize these apparently conflicting provisions, or, if the conflict is irreconcilable, to determine which is to furnish the rule of conduct, is the office of judicial construction.

Constitutions, like statutes and private instruments, must be so construed, if possible, as to give some force and effect to each of their provisions. The legal intendment is that each and every clause has been inserted for some useful purpose, and when rightly understood may have some practical operation. For the purpose of harmonizing apparently conflicting clauses, each must be read with direct reference to every other which relates to the same subject, and so read, if possible, as to avoid repugnancy. And, to that end, sections, paragraphs, and sentences may be transposed; elegance of composition may be sacrificed; and the meaning of words and phrases may be restricted or enlarged.

If we read the thirty-sixth section as imposing a liability separate and distinct from that imposed by the thirty-second section, it is clear that the latter has no office to perform, and is, in effect, stricken from the Constitution. This result, however, must be avoided, if possible, and some practical operation accorded to the latter section. And this may be done, if it appear, upon a careful examination, that the thirty-sixth section, when considered by itself or with the aid of some established rule of the common law, is not complete or self-executing, or, in other words, does not, within its own terms, provide a complete rule of conduct, and such defect is not cured by any rule of common law. If such be the case, the power of supplying the needed element exists in the legislative department, and its exercise is enjoined by the provisions of the thirty-second section. Is the thirty-sixth section, then, complete in itself? Is it self-executing, and does it contain within its own terms, aided or unaided by the established rules of the common law, a complete rule of conduct broad enough to embrace and definitely settle, in all its relations, every question that may arise touching the individual and personal liability which it imposes upon stockholders?

That it does not contain such a rule in its own terms is manifest. It declares that each stockholder of a corporation or joint stock association shall be individually and personally liable for his proportion of all its debts and liabilities, but does not determine what that proportion shall be, nor does it prescribe any rule by which it shall be ascertained. Is this manifest omission supplied by any established rule of common law? If so, it may be intended that the section was framed with direct reference to such rule, and that in legal contemplation such rule was impliedly incorporated in the section, with the same force and effect as if expressed in terms.

At common law no individual liability is imposed upon the members of a corporation, and there is therefore no department of the common law to which we can look for such a rule, except that which relates to partnerships or associations formed for trading purposes. Upon examination it will be found that that fountain fails to supply the needed element. By the law of partnership each member, as to third persons, is jointly and severally liable for the full amount of the liabilities of the firm. As between themselves, each one's proportion of liability may or may not be regulated by private agreement. In the absence of any such agreement they are bound to share the burden equally, and the right to contribution exists. It will not do, therefore, to say that the section in question has adopted the common law rule of partnership liability and extended it to stockholders of a corporation, because that proves too much, and carries us beyond the express terms of the section. Whatever be the extent of the liability, and by whatever rule it is to be ascertained, it is clear, from the terms used, that it was not the intention of the framers of the Constitution to impose upon the stockholders of a corporation a liability co-extensive with that of co-partners at common law. The liability is not joint and several, but is individual and personal, without any right to contribution, and is not for the whole amount of the debt, but is for some indeterminate proportion. So much is clear from the language itself, without foreign aid. From what has been said, it would seem that the thirty-sixth section does not contain a complete and obviously perfect rule of liability, and cannot therefore be held to be self-executing; and it would further seem that the missing quantities, necessary to make it such, cannot be drawn from the common law.

But it may be said that if the rules of law fail to cure the defect or supply the missing quantities, we are at liberty to invoke the aid of some other science. Admitting, for the sake of argument, that the law fails to supply rules sufficient for the just interpretation of legal instruments, and that a resort, if necessary, may be had elsewhere, is there any other branch of learning whose rules are sufficient to enable us to determine with certainty the precise signification intended to be given to the word proportion, as used in the Constitution? In this view there is no promise of aid except it be found in the science of mathematics. Conceding, then, that a mathematical proportion is intended, are all the difficulties in the path of the self-acting theory removed? Once in the field of mathematics, we are confronted with a complete array of proportions — arithmetical and geometrical, direct, inverse, and reciprocal, and perhaps many others which neither the bench nor the bar are bound to know. How are we to determine which of these numerous proportions is intended? But assuming, as it may be claimed we ought to do, that the simplest form of proportion is intended, we may be said to have three quantities given by which to find a fourth, the given quantities being the capital stock of the corporation, the stock of the individual stockholder, and the liability of the corporation; the fourth, or one to be found, being the liability of the stockholder. Stated in mathematical form it would read as follows: As the corporate stock is to the individual stock, so is the corporate liability to the individual liability. Substitute this language for the word "proportion," and is all that was wanting to make the section self-executing supplied? Have we now language broad enough to embrace and definitely settle every question which may arise touching the individual liability of a stockholder, or is there still an element wanting? The rule would be sufficiently comprehensive and explicit if the given quantities always remained the same. But suppose A., being a stockholder, sells to B., does the existing liability follow the stock and impose itself as a burden upon the shoulders of B., or does it follow the person and cling to the skirts of A.? Or does it divide itself, and one moiety remain with A. and the other follow B.? Or does it multiply itself by the number of individuals into whose hands it may come, and attach an aliquot part of the last multiple to each? For the solutions of these various questions even the science of mathematics, whose aid we have invoked for the purpose of upholding, if possible, the self-acting theory, manifestly furnishes no rules.

In order to render the thirty-sixth section self-executing, that is to say, operative without the aid of legislation, it should define what the proportion of the stockholder's liability shall be, and provide whether it shall embrace all the corporate debts and liabilities, past, present, and future, or be restricted to such debts and liabilities as are created or incurred during the time that he is a stockholder. If it be said that these missing quantities, if necessary to give operative effect, may be engrafted on the section by construction, the answer is, that if such a proceeding is permitted at all by the rules of construction, it is for the purpose of reconciling apparent conflict, and not for the purpose of promoting it.

From what has been said, it results that the thirty-sixth section of the Constitution, even when aided by the rules of law and mathematics, does not make a complete rule broad enough in its terms to embrace and definitely settle all the conditions upon which the liability of the stockholder must rest; and, as a corollary, it further results that legislation is necessary to give it a reasonable and practical operation. And such seems to have been the conclusion to which the Legislature has arrived.

The thirty-second section of the Act concerning corporations, passed in 1850, (Wood's Digest, 115,) provides that "each stockholder of any corporation shall be individually and personally liable for a portion of all its debts and liabilities proportioned to the amount of stock owned by him." Here the word "proportion," as used in the Constitution, is to a certain extent defined, and declared to be a mathematical proportion. But this enactment was insufficient to give a reasonable and practical operation to the thirty-sixth section, as we have already seen. This truth seems to have been discovered by the Legislature, for in 1853 they passed another Act concerning incorporations, in which we find the following section:

"SEC. 16. Each stockholder shall be individually and personally liable for his proportion of all the debts and liabilities of the company contracted or incurred during the time that he was a stockholder. For the recovery of which joint or several actions may be instituted and prosecuted."

It is true that the Legislature, in supplying what was needed and omitted from the Act of 1850, left out the provision of that Act which defines the word "proportion;" yet, although neither by itself affords a perfect rule, the two combined contain what is omitted in the thirty-sixth section of the Constitution and is needed to give it a practical operation.

If we read the thirty-sixth section in the manner suggested it is made to harmonize with the thirty-second, and each is made to serve a useful purpose, and neither is allowed to sacrifice the other.

Such seems to us to be the reasonable and proper construction to be given to the thirty-sixth and thirty-second sections of the Constitution. By such reading harmony is preserved and some force and effect is given to each. Any other reading must manifestly sacrifice one section to the ambition of the other, and practically strike it from the Constitution.

Under this construction, the Legislature has the power to say, not that the stockholder shall not be liable for any of the debts of the corporation, but that he shall be liable for his portion, and to say what that portion shall be. Thus the Constitution is made to say to the legislative department of the Government, the stockholder shall be individually and personally liable for his proportion of the debts and liabilities of the corporation, but to your wisdom and sound discretion is intrusted the power to adjust the mode and measure of the liability. It is the duty of the Legislature to carry out this provision according to its spirit, and to fix the liability of the stockholder at a figure adequate to guard effectually against the evils for which the Constitution seeks, through the co-operation of the Legislature, to provide a remedy.

But the exercise of this power is subject to the rule that "all laws of a general nature shall have a uniform operation," as provided in section eleven of Article I of the Constitution, and the same rule of liability must be imposed upon all stockholders of corporations and joint stock associations. The Constitution knows no distinction between persons, and the Legislature cannot discriminate, or grant an indulgence to one which is not accorded to another. Every general law must have a uniform operation; that is to say, it must operate equally on all persons and upon all things upon which it acts at all.

Where, under the Constitution, a law must impose some indeterminate liability upon a class of persons, as, for example, stockholders of a corporation, it must impose the liability, at whatever rate it may be fixed, upon all alike, and cannot exempt one any more than it can exempt all; nor can it attach a lower rate of liability to one than it does to another; nor can it attach a greater or less liability to the stockholders of one corporation than it does to the stockholders of another.

If it be said, that by reason of the construction which we have given the thirty-second and thirty-sixth sections of the Constitution, the Legislature are enabled to defeat the purpose of the Constitution by non-action, the answer is, that by the same non-action they would defeat the creation of corporations as contemplated and authorized by the Constitution. The individual liability of the stockholder is a constituent element in the artificial life of a corporation, made so by the author of its creation, and that life can no more exist under the Constitution without the element, than a natural person can exist when deprived of an element made indispensable to his existence by the laws of nature. Hence, an Act of the Legislature authorizing the formation of corporations without attaching to the corporators an individual liability, would be as obnoxious to the Constitution as would be the creation of a corporation by special Act; and the Courts would be bound to hold that persons organized under such an Act had acquired none of the rights of a corporation. And it may be further answered, that the adoption of a Constitution is but the initiatory step toward the organization of a Government, and its whole purpose may be defeated by a failure on the part of the people to organize the various departments of Government pursuant to its provisions, or by failure of either of the departments, when organized, to perform its allotted functions pursuant to the behests of the Constitution. For such consequences there is no remedy except in the good sense of mankind. The argument proves too much, and carries with it the germ of its own refutation.

II. It is apparent that the construction which we have given to the thirty-second and thirty-sixth sections of Article IV of the Constitution does not materially aid us in the solution of the difficulties involved in the present case. If the Act in question, upon a fair and reasonable construction of the terms of the seventeenth section, does exempt the city and county of San Francisco from all liability for the debts and liabilities of the corporations therein named, as is claimed by counsel for appellant, it is in direct conflict with the Constitution as we have interpreted it. It is not only in conflict with the thirty-second and thirty-sixth sections of Article IV, but, as we have already intimated, with section eleven of Article I. And if this be so, we are bound to declare the whole Act unconstitutional, unless, as is claimed by respondents, the seventeenth section is an independent provision, not entering into the general object and purpose of the Act, and may, therefore, be stricken out without prejudice to the general design and intent of the Legislature.

Hence, two questions are presented: First—If unconstitutional, is the seventeenth section so intimately connected and interwoven with the other provisions of the Act that we cannot intend that the Legislature would have passed the Act with the seventeenth section left out? Second—Is the seventeenth section, upon a fair and reasonable construction of its terms, made in conformity with the established rules of interpretation, in clear and manifest conflict with any provision of the Constitution?

1. In Robinson v. Bidwell, 22 Cal. 379, a statute similar to the present came before the late Supreme Court for construction. The section of that statute which was claimed to be obnoxious to constitutional objection, if unconstitutional, was more clearly so than the one now under consideration, but bore the same relations to the other provisions of the Act. The Court, however, held that it was an independent provision, and not, in its nature and connections, essential to the law, and, therefore, admitting it to be vicious, it might be treated as a nullity, leaving the rest of the statute to stand as valid.

The correctness of that conclusion has been directly assailed by counsel for appellant.

Necessarily, no precise rules can be found by which a Court can determine questions of this character. Whenever a question of this kind arises, its solution must be worked out by a patient comparison of the suspected provision with all others contained in the Act, keeping in constant view the main design and scope of the law, unaided, from the very nature of the case, by any rules of construction except such as are of the most vague and general import. Hence, it is no impeachment of each other's legal acumen if different Judges arrive at opposite conclusions upon such a question, in a case of nice discrimination.

In Lathrop v. Mills et al., 19 Cal. 529, Mr. Justice Baldwin said: "It is true that the Constitution merely interdicts Acts which oppose its provisions, and that if in any Act there be found a provision which is constitutional, that provision may be carried out, provided the excepted provision is entirely disconnected from the vicious portions of the Act; and the Legislature is presumed to intend that, notwithstanding the invalidity of the other parts of the Act, still, this particular section shall stand. The saving of the particular provision; even when not upon its face unconstitutional, in such instances is a matter of legislative intent. In order to sustain the excepted clause, we must intend that the Legislature, knowing that the other provisions of the statute would fall, still willed that this particular section should stand as the law of the land."

In Warren et al. v. Mayor of Charlestown, 2 Gray, 98, the learned Chief Justice Shaw said: "It is no doubt true, as has been argued by the learned counsel for the prosecutors of this writ, that the same Act of legislation may be unconstitutional in some of its provisions, and yet constitutional in others. * * * Such Act has all the forms of law, and has been passed and sanctioned by the duly constituted legislative department of the Government, and, if any part is unconstitutional, it is because it is not within the scope of legiti-mate legislative authority to pass it. Yet, other parts of the same Act may not be obnoxious to the same objection, and, therefore, have the full force of law, in the same manner as if these several enactments had been made by different statutes. But this must be taken with this limitation, that the parts so held respectively constitutional and unconstitutional, must be wholly independent of each other. But, if they are so mutually connected with and dependent on each other, as conditions, considerations, or compensations for each other, as to warrant a belief that the Legislature intended them as a whole, and that, if all could not be carried into effect, the Legislature would not pass the residue independently, and some parts are unconstitutional, all the provisions which are thus dependent, conditional, or connected, must fall with them."

By the light of these general rules the Act in question must be examined, and the dependence or independence of the seventeenth section determined. Viewing the Act as a whole, we find it is a grant of power to the City and County of San Francisco, a municipal corporation, and may be regarded as a last chapter in its charter, conferring powers not before possessed, and which cannot be conferred except by grant from the sovereign power, of which the City and County of San Francisco is itself a creature. The Act is divided into eighteen sections:

The first provides for the submission of two propositions to the qualified voters of the city and county, for the Board of Supervisors to take and subscribe certain amounts to the capital stock of the two railroad companies therein named.

The second provides for the publication of a notice stating the character of the propositions to be submitted; prescribes the manner of voting, and how the votes shall be canvassed: requires the Board to meet to count the votes and declare the result; and, if the result be in favor of the propositions thus submitted, to meet as a Board for the purpose of "perfecting the subscriptions of stock as hereinafter provided."

The third directs the Board to take and subscribe the stock thus authorized to be subscribed, in the name of the city and county, and "to pledge the faith and credit of the city and county for the payment of the same, in the manner hereinafter provided."

The fourth prescribes by whom the subscriptions shall be made, and that they shall be made upon the condition that they shall be paid in the bonds of the city and county, and not otherwise, and that the same shall be received at par, dollar for dollar.

Sections five and six provide for the issuing and paying over the bonds.

The seventh provides that the bonds, and an equal amount of other funds, shall be expended by the respective companies, from time to time as the bonds are issued, in the actual construction of their roads; and in the event of their failure to do so, authorizes the Board to withhold subsequent payments, and in its discretion to declare the subscriptions void; and in such event to sue and recover back payments already made.

The eighth, ninth, tenth, eleventh, twelfth, and thirteenth, provide the ways and means, and the mode and manner of raising and disbursing the same.

The fourteenth provides the liability and compensation of the officers appointed to supervise the matter.

The fifteenth and sixteenth provide the powers of the Board as stockholders, and other matters not material to mention.

The seventeenth, and suspected section, prescribes the manner and additional conditions upon which the subscriptions are to be made, and imposes upon the companies the penalties for a violation of those conditions.

The eighteenth and last declares the Act to be a public Act.

We have thus given a brief synopsis of the various provisions of the Act, in order that the leading features or ideas of the law may be brought into close proximity.

The City and County of San Francisco, being a municipal corporation, had no power to subscribe to the stock of a railroad or other private corporation. It had, therefore, to resort to the Legislature to get that power; and it was granted upon such terms and conditions, and under such restrictions, as were suggested by the wisdom of that body. The Legislature had the power to give or refuse, to grant absolutely or conditionally. The petition of the city and county was, to be allowed to subscribe to the capital stock of the railroad corporations named in the Act. The Legislature responded: You may do so upon certain terms and conditions, which must be strictly observed. Such, by legal intendment, is always the language of legislative grants of corporate power, and the exercise of such power must be enjoyed in the mode and manner and upon the conditions prescribed in the grant.

In the case of Zottman v. The City and County of San Francisco, 20 Cal. 102, Mr. Chief Justice Field said: "The rule is general, and applies to the corporate authorities of all municipal bodies; where the mode in which their power on any given subject can be exercised is prescribed by their charter, the mode must be followed; the mode in such cases constitutes the measure of the power * * *. Aside from the mode designated, there is a want of all power on the subject. This is too obvious to require argument, and so are all the adjudications. Thus, in Head v. The Providence Insurance Co., 2 Cranch, 156, Mr. Chief Justice Marshall, in speaking of bodies which have only a legal existence, says: 'The Act of incorporation is to them an enabling Act; it gives to them all the power they possess; it enables them to contract, and when it prescribes to them a mode of contracting, they must observe the mode, or the instrument no more creates a contract than if the body had never been incorporated.'"

In The Farmers' Loan and Trust Co. v. Carroll, 5 Barb. 613, the Supreme Court of New York said: "Where a corporation relies upon a grant of power from the Legislature for authority to do an act, it is as much restricted to the mode prescribed by the statutes for its exercise as to the thing allowed to be done."

If the law governing the exercise of corporate powers be correctly stated in the foregoing cases — of which there can be no question; if the mode of its exercise is the measure of the power, as stated by Mr. Chief Justice Field; or if, in cases of contract, as stated by Mr. Chief Justice Marshall, the mode prescribed must be strictly observed, or the contract, is a nullity; or if, as stated by the Supreme Court of New York, the corporation is as much restricted to the mode prescribed as it is to the thing to be done, it follows that the mode enters into the essence, so to speak, and becomes a constituent element of the power itself, resulting in a single entity. Applying these principles to the case in hand, we find that the City and County of San Francisco is empowered to tender to the railroad corporations, and, if agreed to by them, to enter into a contract already drafted and engrossed by the Legislature, without any power on the part of either of the contracting parties to change or modify it in any particular. The contract contains the power and the mode; both are of the substance, and neither can be departed from without nullification. Can it be said, in view of the law of corporate power and the provisions of this Act, that the Board of Supervisors can subscribe the specified amount of stock in the name of the city and county, and pledge its credit in payment thereof, without first submitting the proposition to a vote of the people? Can it be said that the Board may make the subscription without stipulating that the same shall be paid in the bonds of the city and county at par, dollar for dollar? Or without stipulating that the bonds and an equal amount of other funds shall be used in the actual construction of the roads, under penalty of forfeiture and recovery? Or without stipulating for the exemptions from individual liability, as provided in the seventeenth section? The same reasoning which would declare the latter provision independent and not essential to the complete execution of the legislative intent, would erect each of the preceding provisions into independent propositions, wholly useless to what Robinson v. Bidwell calls the leading design of the law; and thus, by the hand of judicial construction, one by one, every provision of the statute, wisely intended by the Legislature for the security and protection of the city and county, may be plucked from the body of the Act. Such a sweeping slaughter of paragraphs and sections strips the Legislature of all its conservative power. Under such a doctrine the Legislature may dispense power, but it cannot direct or control its exercise. Thus, a corporation, once vested with power, becomes sovereign as to its exercise, and may set at defiance the behests of the Legislature.

Such, we think, are some of the legitimate fruits of the construction contended for by respondents. But, independent of the foregoing considerations, the Act in question bears upon its face evidence sufficient to establish the dependent condition of its various provisions, and prove beyond question that they are but parts of a single and complete design. In Robinson v. Bidwell the scope and object of a similar statute was declared to be "to authorize the City and County of Sacramento to subscribe for stock of the railroad company, and to provide for the payment of the same." (22 Cal. 387.) This statement of the main design of the Act is too broad for logical purposes, and it is, by reason of its generality, deceptive. It implies a grant of unlimited power to subscribe; whereas, it is a grant of restricted power. It is not a grant of power to subscribe and provide the means of payment, but to subscribe in a particular mode and upon express conditions, and to provide means in a way expressly pointed out. The leading design of the Act is not to grant a power of absolute, but conditional subscription. Thus viewed, each condition is not a mere incident, or something aside from the purpose, but enters into the main design, and becomes indispensable to its achievement. Thus, the mode of subscription, in the language of Mr. Chief Justice Field, in Zottman v. The City and County of San Francisco, is made the measure of the power to subscribe, and the mode of payment is made the measure of the power to pay.

It is also worthy of remark that the expressions "as hereinbefore provided," "as herein provided," and "as herein after provided," are of frequent occurrence throughout the body of the Act. Such expressions are connecting links which bind a statute together, and establish in a measure the dependent relation of its several parts. By some of these expressions the seventeenth section only, as appears from the general context, is referred to.

In view of the foregoing considerations, with all due deference to the acknowledged learning and ability of our immediate predecessors, we are forced to the conclusion that the seventeenth section is not an independent provision, and that it cannot be left out without doing violence to the legislative intent; nor can we, under the rules of legal construction, intend that the Legislature would have passed the Act, had they known that the seventeenth section could have no legal effect. We are, therefore, of the opinion that the seventeenth section, if it must fall by reason of its alleged repugnancy to the Constitution, is so interblended with the main designs of the Act as to vitiate the whole.

2. We have now to determine what is the proper and legal construction of the seventeenth section of the Act. If that section is to be read as exempting the City and County of San Francisco from all liability to third persons for the debts and liabilities of the corporations named in the Act, we must, in accordance with the views already expressed, hold that it is unconstitutional and that the whole Act must fall with it.

To construe a statute, is to search after the legislative intent as expressed in the language of the statute. "The end of construction is to find what was the intent and meaning, and to clear up that meaning, when obscure; to ascertain the sense of ambiguous words; to determine the design when imperfectly expressed." (Smith's Commentaries, 692.) The search, if need be, must not be confined to the doubtful passages or words, but may be extended to every provision of the Act. In interpreting the letter of the statute, punctuation may be entirely disregarded, and the rules of grammar need not be strictly followed. Mala grammatica non vitiat chartam. But the search need not be confined to the letter of the statute. The law looks to the substance and not the form. Quæ hæret in litera hæret in cortice. The whole scope and design of the statute is to be studied, and its language is to be so construed as to aid that design, and not to defeat it. Particular sentences are not always so framed as to express clearly the legislative intent; yet, if that intent can be gathered from the immediate context, or from the general scope and purpose of the Act, such sentence is to be so construed, if possible, as to harmonize with it. If a particular construction has the effect to declare the Act or any part of it unconstitutional, such construction must be avoided, when it can be fairly done, for the legal presumption is that the Legislature could not have so intended. This, however, is to be taken with the qualification that where the language used is unambiguous, and the meaning clear and obvious, an unconstitutional consequence cannot be avoided by forcing upon it a meaning, however plausible it may be, which is, upon a fair test, repugnant to its terms. But if the language upon its face is ambiguous and susceptible of different constructions, it may be forced, so to speak, to the extent of adopting the less obvious construction, in order to uphold the law. All doubts are to be resolved in favor of and not against the validity of the statute.

Upon a careful examination of the language of the statute, we are satisfied that it was not the intent of the Legislature to exempt the City and County of San Francisco from liability for the debts and liabilities of the railroad companies; but that, with a full and perfect knowledge of its inability to do so, it has sought, so far as possible under the provisions of the Constitution, to guard the city and county against the consequences of that liability. This the Legislature proposes to do by acting directly upon the railroad companies, and interposing them, so far as the circumstances of the case will permit, between the city and county and the creditors and claimants of the corporations. And that, so far as the measures adopted to that end could effect it the Legislature has intended to go, and no further. There is but a single expression in the whole Act which, even apparently, runs counter to this theory, while it is upheld by all the other language of the statute, together with its general scope and design. To what extent the measures adopted may prove effectual is a matter of no consequence here. If none of them are obnoxious to constitutional objection, that is sufficient for the purposes of the present case. Should they prove wholly inconsequential, such a result could have no effect upon the validity or invalidity of the Act. Nor is it of any consequence whether the voters of the city and county would have sanctioned the law had they understood it as we are now interpreting it. Upon this point, Mr. Justice Norton, in Robinson v. Bidwell, well said: "Whether they would or not, is, however, purely a matter of conjecture; and, besides, it is immaterial, because their vote was not the act of legislation. It is precisely because this vote is not itself the enactment of the law which relieves the Act from the objection that the Legislature cannot delegate its powers directly to the voters. The result of this vote is only the contingency upon which the Legislature have expressed their will that the law shall take effect. The event has occurred, and the law, so far as it was dependent upon this event, takes effect, because the Legislature has enacted that it should take effect on the happening of that event. The result of the vote is a fact the effect of which cannot be varied by any speculations as to what it might have been."

The language which, as is claimed, exempts the city and county from liability is as follows: "The subscriptions of stock authorized by virtue of the provisions of this Act shall be made by said Board of Supervisors on the books of each of said companies upon the express condition that the said city and county shall not be liable for any of the debts or liabilities of either of said companies beyond the amount so subscribed and this provision as to the liability of said city and county shall be a part of and so expressly stipulated in all contracts made by said companies for the construction and equipment of said roads."

Statutes are to be read without breaks or stops, and we have therefore omitted the punctuation. The foregoing is but one clause, and has but one subject, viz: exemption from personal liability. In order to get its full meaning, we read all that is said upon that subject, aided by the legal presumption that no word is idle or useless, and that each has its office to perform in giving expression to the legislative intent; and aided, also, by the presumption that the Legislature does not intend to do an unconstitutional act; and not forgetting that the less obvious construction, in cases of doubt, may be adopted in order to uphold the law.

It is conducive to correct results for Judges, when called upon to construe a statute, to place themselves so far as possible in the position of the Legislature, and assuming each adversary theory in turn, attempt to give it expression as near as may be in the language of the Legislature, not forgetting the established rules of construction already suggested. Assuming, then, that the Legislature has the power to exempt the City and County of San Francisco from all liability of every character and kind, past, present, and future, and desires and intends to exercise that power, we find that full, clear, and complete expression of such intent is contained in the following words: “* * * the said city and county shall not be liable for any of the debts or liabilities of either of said companies beyond the amount so subscribed.” If such was the intent, it is obvious that language more natural and apt could not be found. But, assuming such to be the intent, it is equally obvious that one of the most persistent rules of construction is grossly violated, for more than half the language used to express that intent is made entirely useless. The language used assumes the power, and declares the intent in broad and general terms, yet so clear and explicit that no doubt can attach itself to the meaning, and construction has no duty to perform. But these words do not stand alone; they are accompanied by others, to which meaning must also be allowed: “* * * and this provision as to the liability of said city and county shall be a part of and so expressly stipulated in all contracts made by said companies for the construction and equipment of said roads." These two clauses contain all that the Legislature has said upon the subject. Considered separately, it is manifest that each clause has a theory which is consistent with itself, but each theory is inconsistent with the other. The first clause proceeds upon the theory that the Legislature has the power to exempt the city and county from liability; the second proceeds upon the theory that the Legislature has not the power, but that each of the companies has, and that it lies in contract. This theory, of course, involves the doctrine of waiver, but of that, we shall speak hereafter. If the first theory is to prevail, the Act is thereby made unconstitutional, which, as we have already seen, is to be avoided, if possible. If, however, its general words may be restricted so as to harmonize with the latter theory, the Act may be upheld, if the doctrine of waiver, upon which it is founded, is not itself repugnant to the Constitution. We think that even under the strictest rules of construction these seemingly independent clauses are to be regarded as one, and as expressing but one intent. The more general words are qualified and limited by those which follow, and give a narrower scope to the legislative intent. The words "not any," used in the former part of the clause, are equivalent to the word "all," and the clause may be read in the following manner: "The city and county shall be exempt from liability on all contracts made and liabilities incurred by said companies beyond the amount so subscribed, and this provision shall be a part of and expressly stipulated in all contracts for the construction and equipment of said roads." Thus read, the meaning of the words "not any" or "all," are qualified by what follows, and their meaning confined to the character or class of liabilities specifically named. In this manner a meaning is given to the whole, which leaves no part of the language useless, and is not repugnant to the Constitution, unless, as we have before stated, the doctrine of waiver is to be so held. This reading, if not the most obvious, when merely the words and punctuation are considered, is reasonable, and in harmony with the doctrine of waiver, the application of which to the case in hand was, in our judgment, the leading intent of the Legislature. In speaking of the signification of such words as "not any" and "all," in Phillips v. The State ex rel. Saunders and another, 15 Geo. 518, the Supreme Court of Georgia said: "True, it (the statute) says that in all cases where a levy is made, etc. One is amazed, in casting a glance over our statute book, to find how often this form of expression occurs—frequently signifying, as here, not absolutely all, but all of a particular class only. Indeed, it seems to be common to all writings—lay as well as legal, sacred as well as profane—and the generality of the phrase is frequently to be restrained in an Act, not only by the context, but by the general form and scheme of the statute, as demonstrative of the intention of the Legislature."

And so in The City of Covington v. McNickel's Heirs, 18 B. Monroe, 286, say the Court of Appeals of Kentucky: "A well known rule for the construction of statutes—which, though ancient, is always adhered to—is that the general words in one clause of a statute may be restrained by the particular words in a subsequent clause of the same statute." (See, also, Dwarrris on Statutes, 765.) This rule finds a familiar illustration in the construction of powers of attorney, where the more general terms used in the commencement are always held to be restrained by the subsequent and more particular specifications.

We are therefore of the opinion that the seventeenth section does not, upon a legal construction of its terms, necessarily exempt the city and county from liability further than such exemption can be secured by express contracts of waiver; and this brings us to the last question involved in this case.

III. The construction which we have given to the thirty-second and thirty-sixth sections of Article IV of the Constitution destroys the force of the able argument made by the learned counsel for the appellant against the doctrine of waiver, so far as that argument is founded upon grounds of public policy predicated of the Constitution. If the extent of the personal liability of the stockholder is mainly left, as we hold, to the wisdom and discretion of the Legislature, the doctrine that some great end of public policy is to be subserved by constitutional inhibition is greatly weakened if not entirely destroyed. But whether it be regarded as a constitutional policy or not, we are unable to see how, although it rests upon a surer foundation, it is better sustained by sound reason and principle than it is when considered as the offspring of statutory regulation. A question of public policy is but a question of public policy, from whatever source it may take its origin; and whether it is such or not is to be ascertained by the same general rules. How the individual liability of a stockholder of a corporation can be a matter of public concern any more than the liability of a co-partner, we are unable to perceive; and we are not aware that it has ever been claimed that the latter liability has its foundation in public policy. It is merely a liability created by law, as it might be by contract, and is intended only for the benefit of those who may deal with corporations. It is but another fund to which the creditor may look when the social fund has been exhausted, and whether he chooses to look to it or not is a matter of no concern to the public. If the thirty-sixth section of Article IV of the Constitution establishes a policy which none, not even the party directly concerned, can contravene or waive, and by which we are all bound, volens volens, so does that clause of the Constitution which secures to all the right of a trial by jury; and the same may be said of the clause designed to secure a homestead to each head of a family. Nor is there a clause of constitutional or statutory law of which the same might not with equal reason be predicated.

There being, then, only a question of private right involved, there can be no question but that the party interested in the enforcement of that right may contract to waive it. Upon this question Mr. Sedgwick says: "The general rule holds good, as well in regard to Constitutions as to statutes. A party may waive a constitutional as well as a statutory provision made for his benefit. So it has been repeatedly decided that a party may waive the right to a trial by jury, although that mode of proceeding be guaranteed to him by the Constitution. So, if a private road is laid out in an unconstitutional manner, if the owner consent, the proceeding will be held valid. It is on this same doctrine of waiver that it has been frequently held that the acts of a public officer exceeding his legal authority may be adopted by the party for whose benefit the illegal act is done. So where a Sheriff had arrested a defendant on a ca. sa., and discharged the debtor on receiving his promissory note; though the act of the Sheriff was illegal and the note void in his hands, it was held that the plaintiff might affirm the Sheriff's act and claim the note." (Sedgwick on Constitutional and Statutory Law, 111.) If public policy can be predicated of the constitutional liability of a stockholder of a corporation a fortiori it may of the constitutional homestead right, and yet, can it be pretended that the homestead right may not be waived and the property voluntarily surrendered for the benefit of creditors? We think the liability in question may be waived by express contract without the violation of any principle of public policy or constitutional law.

Our conclusions are that the thirty-sixth section of Article IV of the Constitution is not self-executing, and that therefore the Legislature may constitutionally say what shall be the extent of the individual liability of a stockholder of a corporation or joint stock association. Second, that the provisions of the seventeenth section of the Act in question, providing indemnity against constitutional liability, are not independent provisions which may be disregarded, but that there is nothing in those provisions, when legally construed, which is obnoxious to constitutional objection.

Judgment affirmed.

SAWYER, J., concurring specially:

I concur in the judgment, for the reasons, among others, stated in subdivision "2" of the second point; and in the third point of the opinion of the Chief Justice, without expressing any opinion upon the other questions discussed.

WRIT OF ASSISTANCE.—A writ of assistance will not be issued against a purchaser of the mortgaged premises who buys during the pendency of a suit to foreclose, and who is not a party to the suit, without actual or constructive notice of its pendency.

APPEAL from the District Court, Tenth Judicial District, Colusa County.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the Court.

Geo. Cadwalader, for Appellants, cited Richardson v. White, 18 Cal. 120; Ault v. Gassaway, 18 Cal. 205.

W. C. Balcher, for Respondent.

By the Court, CURREY, J.

The suit to foreclose the mortgage in this case was commenced on the first of April, 1862, against Cynthia A. Rackeby as sole defendant, and a lis pendens was filed in the cause, in the proper Recorder's office, on the sixth of May following. In the meantime, the defendant conveyed the mortgaged premises to J. J. Hicok, who entered into the possession thereof. Hicok's deed was filed for record on the 16th of October, 1862. The decree of foreclosure was entered on the 11th of September of that year, and the mortgaged property was sold by the Sheriff to the plaintiff on the 25th of October; and no redemption having been made, the Sheriff, on the 18th of December, 1863, executed a deed in due form to the purchaser. At that time, Mathison Davis was in the possession of the premises under Hicok, and to him the plaintiff exhibited the Sheriff's deed, and demanded from him the possession of the land. Davis refused to comply with the demand. The plaintiff then applied, upon due notice, for a writ of assistance against Hicok and Davis, and the Court ordered the same to be issued. From this order Hicok and Davis have appealed.

When the decree of foreclosure was entered, the defendant had no interest in the premises. Whatever interest she had therein when the suit was commenced she conveyed to Hick on the 29th of April, 1862, who purchased, for aught that appears, without actual or constructive notice of the commencement of the action, and therefore the decree of foreclosure could not affect Hick, who was entitled to be heard in his defense before he could be deprived of his property. (Goodenow v. Ewer, 16 Cal. 461; Boggs v. Fowler and Hargrave, Id. 562.)

The order must be reversed.

Ordered accordingly.

AH YEW v. D. CHOATE.

MINING LICENSES — PRIVATE LANDS.—That portion of the Revenue Act of 1861 which provides for the collection of licenses from foreign miners does not refer to mines contained in lands which are the private property of individuals, but only to mines in the public lands of the State or the United States.

Query?—What are mineral lands within the meaning of the eighth section of the Act of April 16th, 1859, to provide for the issue of patents for school lands located with State school land warrants?

PATENT FOR SCHOOL LANDS — EFFECT OF.—Where land is located under a State school land warrant, and a patent is issued after all the proceedings required by law have been taken, the patent is the record of the judgment of the State, by its officers duly appointed for that purpose, that the land embraced within the patent is not mineral land within the meaning of said section eight.

PATENT OF LAND CONTAINING GOLD.—The fact alone that sufficient gold has been found upon land conveyed by such patent to induce the patentee to mine for that metal, and to extract from twenty-five to thirty dollars per day, with seven or eight hands, is not sufficient to destroy the verity of such record and make the land mineral land within the meaning of said section eight.

APPEAL from the District Court, Eleventh Judicial District, Placer County.

Suit was commenced September 28th, 1863. The complaint averred that the plaintiff was a native of China, and had been for more than three months engaged in mining on a tract of land in Placer County, described, according to the official survey of the United States, as the northwest quarter of Section Number Four, Township Number Twelve North, Range Number Seven East, Mount Diablo base and meridian,

Ah Yew v. Choata.

the district of lands subject to sale in the Marysville and District; that defendant was the collector of foreign miner's licenses; that in accordance with the Act of April 1, 1858, entitled "An Act to provide for the location and sale of the unsold portion of the five hundred thousand acres of land donated to the State for school purposes, and the seventy-two sections donated to this State for the use of a Seminary of Learning," that the State of California, by its duly authorized agents, about the 28th day of January, 1859, selected said land as a portion of the seventy-two sections donated to this State for the use of a Seminary of Learning, and that said location was, before the patent was issued, approved by the Government of the United States; that afterwards the State sold said land to Stephen B. Burdge, and gave him a certificate of purchase; that Burdge paid the State for the land, and duly advertised that he would apply for a patent; and that afterwards, T. L. & L. R. Chamberlain, became the assignees of said Burdge's interest in the land, and the State of California, on the 2d day of June, 1863, issued to them a patent for the same; that plaintiff is and for more than two months has been in the possession of a portion of said land, as the lessee of said Chamberlain, and has been engaged in mining on the same, and working several claims, and taking out from fifteen to twenty-five dollars per day in gold dust, and can continue to do so until his lease expires, which will be December 21st, 1863; that the defendant, on the 23d day of September, 1863, demanded of plaintiff the sum of four dollars for a mining license or tax for September, 1863; that plaintiff refused to pay, and defendant seized and levied upon the leased premises, and has advertised the same for sale for non payment of the mining license, and fixed the day of sale for September 30th, 1863, at two o'clock P. M.; that the sale will create a cloud upon plaintiff's title, etc., etc.

The complaint prayed for an injunction restraining the defendant, etc.

The defendant demurred to the complaint; the demurrer

Ah Yew v. Choate.

was overruled, and judgment rendered for plaintiff as prayed for.

Defendant appealed.

Jo Hamilton, for Appellant.

In looking at the merits of plaintiff's suit, can he, under any circumstances, maintain it? We think it will be found that he cannot.

Respondent's attorneys rely strongly on the decision of the Court in the case of Ah Hee v. Crippen, 19 Cal. 491, which they say is conclusive of this case. And that in Doll v. Meador, 16 Cal. 295, it is held the patent is conclusive, and cannot be attacked by any one not claiming from the same source. They seem to forget that the State of California, by her officers, is really the defendant sued, and the very party from whom plaintiff claims his rights. They forget another thing, that even if the rule they invoke should preclude us from changing the effect and exclusiveness of the patent, yet they themselves have to all intents and purposes removed the burden from us by doing it themselves. Whatever may be the effect of this patent, we must say that it never intended conveying mineral lands upon which plaintiff can mine from twenty-five, fifteen, and thirty dollars per day.

The very Act recited in plaintiff's patent—the very Act under which the patent was issued, excludes mineral lands from its operation. In Doll v. Meador, 16 Cal. 324, the Court say “that if the patent be void upon its face, or issue without authority, or were prohibited by statute, it may be impeached collaterally,” etc.

We hold that plaintiff's own complaint impeaches his patent and destroys his case, and shows very clearly not only that the State never intended to patent or deed away her mines, but that the statute precludes it, and that there was no authority in any person so to make it. The answer of plaintiff that we had a right to contest the issue of the patent, and that the issue of the patent is a determination of the question as to whether the lands were mineral or not, and that by them hav-been patented they are declared not to be mineral lands, is merely begging the question. He avers that he will be in all probability injured if prevented from working his mining claim in one sentence, and then asserts that the Courts have determined that he has no mining claim. In the next he invokes the aid of the Court to protect him in that which by his own avowing does not exist — an anomaly in pleading, a contradiction in terms, a conflict in ideas.

There certainly is a very wide difference between this case and the case of Ah Hee v. Crippen, and the reasoning of the Court in the one case will not apply and was not intended to apply to the like class of cases as the other.

The Court, in the one case, set out to construe the Act of 1860, with its provisions to lands patented to the United States. In that suit, the plaintiff sued in replevin for property, wherein the power of the officer to seize and hold the resumed property sued for is brought directly in question.

In this suit, it asks injunction to restrain the beclouding title two months tenancy upon mining ground which is not a mining claim, and to prevent irreparable injury from resulting plaintiff from being prevented from mining upon lands that contain no minerals.

It is suggested that the rule as laid down in the case of Ah Hee v. Crippen is too broad; that under the Act of 1861 this Court will not sustain the grounds taken by the Court in construing the Act of 1860.

The spirit of the Act of 1861, we think, was clearly laid down years before in the case of The People v. Naglee, 1 Cal. 22, which has always been considered as the true doctrine, and the decision in the case of Ah Hee v. Crippen is not in contact with that case.

The business or vocation of mining in the hands of certain persons was the thing taxed; and the property of the person taxed was subject to its payment. And we can see no difference; and that the patentee of lands from the State could with just as much reason say that his tenants on patented land following the business of merchandise, selling groceries, etc., should pay no tax or license, because it detracted from his fee in the lands, as to say that plaintiff could maintain this suit.

The fee in the land is not brought in question; the plaintiff, doing a certain business, must pay so much to the State for the privilege.

George Cadwalader, for Respondent.

The land was private property, and the State could not collect the tax from the plaintiff. This was decided by the case of Ah Hee v. Crippen, 19 Cal. 491.

The State cannot deny the legitimate effect of her own patent, nor complain of the sale upon any ground. (Doll v. Meador, 16 Cal. 295; Cooper v. Roberts, 18 How. 173.)

By the Court, SAWYER, J.

It was held in Ah Hee v. Crippen, 19 Cal. 497, and we think correctly, that the sixty-fourth section of the Revenue Act of 1860 does not refer to mines contained in lands which are the private property of individuals, but only to mines in the public lands of the State or United States. The provisions of the Revenue Act of 1861 are substantially the same upon this point as those of the Act of 1860, and must receive the same construction. If, then, the fee of the land upon which the plaintiff was mining was in his landlord, that decision is decisive of this case, and the plaintiff is not liable to pay the license sought to be collected.

The plaintiff is mining upon lands patented to his lessors as school lands, under the Act of April 16, 1859. Section eight provides that "nothing in this Act shall be construed so as to authorize or confirm the location or purchase of any of the mineral, swamp, or overflowed lands in this State as school lands." (Laws 1859, p. 340.) The question is, do the allegations of the complaint show a title in fee in the plaintiff's lessors? It appears from the averments of the complaint, that under a lease from the patentees, and with their permission, the plaintiff is working several men, and taking out gold the value of from twenty-five to thirty dollars per day. The defendant, a collector of the foreign miners' license tax, insists that it appears from the foregoing allegations of the complaint that the lands referred to are mineral lands, and that the patent is therefore void. All lands containing gold are not necessarily mineral lands within the meaning of the question under consideration. Probably there is very little gold within the basin formed by the Sierra Nevada and Contra Costa ranges of mountains that does not contain more or less of the precious metals. It may turn out that much of the land now regarded as suitable only for pasturage and agricultural purposes contains sufficient quantities of gold to justify the expense of extracting it by mining; yet, in the present state of our knowledge upon the subject, it could not be called mineral lands. It is not easy in all cases to determine whether any given piece of land should be classed as mineral lands or otherwise. The question may depend upon many circumstances such as whether it is located in those regions generally recognized as mineral lands, or in a locality ordinarily regarded as agricultural in its character. Lands may contain the precious metals, but not in sufficient quantities to justify working them as mines, or make the locality generally valuable for mining purposes, while they are well adapted to agricultural or grazing pursuits; or they may be but poorly adapted to agricultural purposes, but rich in minerals; and there may be every gradation between the two extremes. There is, however, no certain, well defined, obvious boundary between the mineral lands and those that cannot be classed in that category. Perhaps the true criterion would be to consider whether upon the whole the lands appear to be better adapted to mining or other purposes. However that may be, in order to determine the question, it would, at all events, be necessary to know the condition and circumstances of the land itself, and of the immediate locality in which it is situated. It is the duty of the officers of the Government having the matter in charge, before making a grant, to ascertain these facts, and to determine the problem whether the lands are mineral or not. In this instance the lands appear to have been surveyed with a view of bringing them into market, for they are described by range, township, and section, "according to the official survey of the United States." It is alleged that the location was approved by the Government of the United States; that the purchase money was paid to the State of California; that the notice of intention to apply for a patent was published, as required by law, and that the patent set out in the record was duly issued by the State. The regular proceedings prescribed by law, then, have been taken, and the officers of the Government have ascertained these facts, and adjudged the lands to be subject to be granted. In the language of Mr. Chief Justice Field, in Doll v. Meador, 16 Cal. 324, the patent "is the record of the State that the land was subject to location under the grant of the United States, and has been located through its officers in pursuance of the terms of the donation;" and we may add in this case, that it is also a record of the judgment of the State, by its officers duly appointed for that purpose, that the conditions and characteristics of the land were not such as to constitute it mineral lands within the meaning of the provisions of the statute, and the verity of this record is not overthrown by the mere fact appearing in the complaint that the land patented has been ascertained to contain a sufficient amount of gold to induce the plaintiff to mine it for that metal. Prima facie, the complaint shows a title in fee in the patentees, the parties under whom the plaintiff holds. The patent is valid upon its face, and it is only upon matters dehors the instrument that it is attacked. And these matters relied on appearing in the complaint are insufficient to justify the Court in holding—in the face of the patent, and the solemn record of the action of the State to the contrary—that the lands granted by it are mineral lands within the meaning of the statute.

This view of the case renders it unnecessary to consider the question whether this is one of the cases in which the patent can be attacked collaterally, or in any mode other than a direct proceeding on the part of the State to vacate it, if so, whether the defendant stands in such a relation to State as would enable him to assail it. The judgment is affirmed.

BERT S. THORNTON v. DAVID MAHONEY, GEORGE BLISS, JOHN O'CONNOR, AND SOLOMON A. SHARPE.

PRESUMPTION AS TO CHARACTER OF MEXICAN GRANT.—Where a specific quantity of land has been confirmed to a grantee claiming under a Mexican or Spanish grant or to his assigns, and a survey has been made of the quantity confirmed, which survey has been set aside by the United States District Court, the presumption is that the grant was of a specific quantity to be selected and segregated within the area of a larger tract.

RIGHT TO POSSESSION OF MEXICAN GRANT.—A grant by the Mexican or Spanish Government of a specific quantity of land within the area of a larger tract, gave to the grantee such an interest in the entire tract as entitled him to the right to its exclusive possession, as against all persons except those having an interest in or right to the possession of the same, or some part of it, under the Government, until such time as the Government segregated the quantity granted from the general tract.

—Until the Government of the United States restricts the possession of those claiming under a Mexican or Spanish grant, by a segregation and location of the quantity granted, the grantee or his successor in interest is entitled as against third persons without title to the possession of all of the land within the exterior boundaries described in the grant.

PENDING APPEAL FROM ORDER CONFIRMING SURVEY.—If a grant has been confirmed, and a survey of the quantity confirmed has been made by which it has been located within the exterior boundaries of the larger tract mentioned in the grant, and an appeal has been taken from an order confirming the survey, the grantee or his assignee is entitled to the possession of all the land within the exterior boundaries of the grant until the final determination of the appeal.

BOND OF PROCEEDINGS PENDING SUCH APPEAL.—A bond to stay proceedings is not necessary in order to perfect an appeal from a decree of the District Court of the United States approving of a survey of a Mexican or Spanish grant.

ENFORCEMENT OF DECREE PENDING APPEAL.—One who appeals from a decree in his favor in order to obtain a decree for a larger sum, cannot, pending the appeal, carry into execution the decree.

—An appeal duly taken to the Court of last resort suspends all proceedings in the Court below.

APPEAL from the District Court, Twelfth Judicial District, and County of San Francisco.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the Court.

J. B. Crockett, for Appellant.

In support of the appeal I rely on the following propositions, to wit:

1. That the approved survey is a final location of the respondents' claim in the sense contemplated by the Act of April 26th, 1858. (Wood's Dig. 1047.)

2. That the said Act is not unconstitutional and void.

If these propositions can be maintained, the appellant is entitled to recover.

The first proposition renders it necessary to consider the Act of Congress of June 14th, 1860. (12 Statutes at Large, 38.) By the fifth section of that Act it is provided in substance, that the survey, when determined by the District Court by its decree, shall have the same effect and validity in law as if a patent for the land had been issued by the United States. The fair and just construction of the entire Act is, that after the survey has progressed to the point when it is approved by a final decree of the District Court, it is thenceforth to be deemed a final location and to have the force of a patent. The policy of the Act is obvious. It authorized the District Court to review all surveys made by the Surveyor-General, and for the first time provided a method by which adverse claimants, and even settlers claiming under the Government, could be heard in respect to the survey. Before then, the proceedings were entirely ex parte. When the survey was approved by the Surveyor-General, it was forwarded to the Land Office, and the patent issued. But, by this Act, the survey could be ordered into the District Court on the motion of the Government or of any adverse claimant, proofs were to be taken, and the Court was to enter its decree rejecting, modifying, or approving the survey. When all this was done, and the Court by its final decree approved the survey, the obvious intention was, to give to the decree the effect of a patent, so long as it remained in force. The very language of the Act admits of no other interpretation, when it declares "the said plat and vey so finally determined by publication, order, or decree, the case may be, shall have the same effect and validity in as if a patent for the land so surveyed had been issued by United States."

For is the decree any the less final, in the sense of the Act, because it is subject to appeal. The precise object of the Act to avoid the delay arising from appeals and from other causes which might retard the issuance of the patent. Hence, it provides that after all parties have had a chance to be heard in the District Court, its decree approving a survey shall be equivalent to a patent. As long as that decree remains in force it is to be accepted as final by all parties in interest. The claimant is concluded by it until reversed; and, on the other hand, he is protected by it as fully as by a patent. The fact that it is subject to appeal does not impair its effect as a final decree, so long as it remains in force. This branch of the case resolves itself into a simple question of construction, to be deduced from the face of the Act. When the Act provides that a final decree approving the survey shall have the force of a patent, does it mean a decree of the District Court, from the time it was rendered, or does it mean a decree which has become absolutely conclusive, because no appeal has been taken within the prescribed term. I insist that the former is the correct interpretation, and that the decree is final, in the sense of the Act, from the time it is rendered until it is reversed or set aside.

If I am right in this, the next question which arises is, whether or not such a decree is a final location of the land in the sense of the Act of the Legislature of April 26th, 1858. (Wood's Dig. 1047.) If the decree so long as it remains in force has the effect of a patent, then it is a final location in the sense of our statute. The claimant is under a bar from claiming or asserting title to any lands outside of the survey so long as the decree remains in force. As to him, it is conclusive until reversed. The policy of our Act is to limit the claimant to the precise land which has been set apart to him by a final survey, and to conclude him by any survey which, as between himself and the Government, has the force of a patent. If, therefore, the survey in this case is so far conclusive in favor of the claimant as that he could maintain ejectment upon it, treating it as a segregation of his land, it must follow, on the other hand, that he is concluded by it, and could not maintain ejectment for any land outside of it. If Mahoney were not in possession and was prosecuting an ejectment to recover all the lands within the exterior boundaries of his grant, would not the decree of the District Court, approving the survey of his half league, be a valid defense as to all the lands not included in the survey? In other words, is the Court prepared to hold that a party entitled to a smaller quantity, to be located within a larger area, can maintain ejectment to recover all the land within the exterior limits, notwithstanding that the quantity confirmed has been located by an official survey approved by the District Court? The Court has pushed the doctrine in favor of the claimant to the utmost verge in holding that in advance of a final survey he can recover all the lands within the exterior limits of the grant. But I apprehend that the Court would hesitate long before holding that after an official survey, approved by the District Court, the claimant could nevertheless recover in ejectment the lands outside of the survey.

On the same principle I claim that Mahoney is estopped by the survey in this action. As to him the survey is conclusive of the extent and location of his claim, so long as it remains in force. Until the decree approving the survey is set aside, he is under a bar in respect to all lands not included in it. He is absolutely estopped by it whilst the decree remains in force. I insist, therefore, that, in the sense of our statute, Mahoney's claim has been "finally located" so as not to include the land in contest.

If, on the appeal, the survey shall be set aside and a new survey ordered, so as to include the lands in dispute, Mahoney's right will attach to the new location. But so long as the decree approving the survey remains in force, he can claim no lands outside of it; and having evicted the appellant under judgment in ejectment, he should restore him to the possession.

T. J. Bergin, for Respondents.

A correct conclusion upon the question of construction involves the consideration of the nature of the several Acts of Congress in relation to Mexican land claims in California. (Act of March 3, 1851 — Bright's Dig. 111 — and the Acts amendatory thereof; Act of June 14, 1860 — 12 U. S. Stat. at Large, 33.) These Acts were passed in discharge of the treaty obligations the Government had assumed. (Wood's Dig. 20, Art. VIII.) They are to be largely and liberally construed in furtherance thereof. The duty in performance of which they were enacted, was one binding upon the United States independently of all treaty; the treaty simply superadds to such obligation the pledge of the faith and honor of the Government to the sacred discharge thereof.

Nor should the subsequent changes that have supervened in the ownership of these lands induce any different construction thereof from that which these Acts would have received at the time the title to the lands remained still vested in the original claimants. (Wilson v. State of New Jersey, 7 Cr. 164.)

The final decree of the District Court is final quoad that court, but certainly not absolutely and in all events final, else an appeal therefrom expressly allowed would not lie. The final decree, therefore, of the District Court in this case, as contemplated by the law, is simply and only final sub modo. There can be no absolute finality until all legal means of reversal are exhausted; it is only when there no longer remains any power to either party to the proceeding to question the same, that it can, strictly and properly, be said to be absolutely final. This can only be upon the issuance of the patent. (Johnson v. Van Dyke, 20 Cal. 225; Castro v. Hendricks, 23 How. 30; United States v. Sempeyerac, 7 Pet. 222; Davis v. Ballard, 1 J. J. Marsh. Ky. 564.)

In The United States v. Sempeyerac, already cited, a case of confirmation of land claim, upon proceedings analogous to those had in regard to California land claims, the claim was finally confirmed by the decree of the Court; yet, three years thereafter, Congress passed an Act to re-open the case on the part of the United States, and upon the proceedings thereupon had the claim was rejected. An appeal therefrom was taken to the United States Supreme Court, and that Court sustained the action of Congress and the inferior Court, and affirmed the decree finally rejecting the claim.

In Davis v. Ballard, cited above, the time for suing out a writ of error, according to the law in force when the judgment was rendered, had elapsed, and the judgment thus become final. Davis, after lapse of the statutory time, sued out a writ of error to reverse the judgment. Ballard pleaded in bar thereto, that it was brought and sued out after the expiration of and not within three years next after the judgment was rendered in the inferior Court. In answer to this, Davis set up a certain Act of the Legislature of Kentucky, the second section of which declared "that in writs of error already sued out, or that may hereafter be sued out, that the period between the thirty-first day of November, 1824, and the first day of April, 1827, shall be deducted from the time allowed by law in any plea, motion, or suit in which the plea of the Statutes of Limitations of writs of error may be plead or relied;" under which provision the writ was, of course, brought in time, if the Act thus making the deduction were valid. The Court, after elaborately examining the question, sustained the Act, and held the writ of error well brought.

These authorities clearly show the power of the United States over these proceedings in regard to these land claims, and it is absurd to contend, while the United States have such ample powers in the control thereof, that they are or can be finally and absolutely conclusive on them; and it is equally absurd and unjust to hold the claimant bound where the United States are not. These authorities, it is apprehended, abundantly prove, independently of all reasoning a priori, that there can be no final location, within the true intent and ning of the legislation of Congress and of the State of California, until the issuance of a patent. The error and justice of any other construction will at once be manifest if we consider that the final decree of the United States District Court already rendered in the matter of the survey of these lands may, upon the pending cross appeals to the United States Supreme Court, be reversed, and a new survey ordered in which the premises here sued for may be included; must the respondents again sue for the recovery thereof, in the meantime submit to be deprived of their lands, pay enormous damages, and be harassed with incessant litigation? The same course of proceedings may have to be repeated an indefinite number of times. How will such a course comport with the solemn pledge of the faith and honor of the United States to the protection of the claimants to these lands? Will the Government itself to do such a thing directly, it could meet with the reprobation of all men, and must forever dishonor its faith and honor. Yet, the result is practically the same to the claimants, if by misconstruction of the legislation of Congress, they are to be thus stripped of their property and condemned to interminable litigation? It would, too, be clearly in conflict with the repeated and uniform decisions of this court as to these claimants' rights under Mexican grants. (Mahoney v. Van Winkle, 21 Cal. 527; Lambertson v. Hogan, 11 Cal. 100; Warr, Penn. 22; Norman v. Heist, 5 Watts & Sergt. 171.) There is, therefore, no final location, within the true intent and meaning of the statute. This is one of the primary and essential elements of the appellant's right to recover herein. The right to recover is derived solely from the statute, and the damages, therefore, only arise upon the contingency therein provided.

By the Court, CURREY, J.

In May, 1861, David Mahoney commenced an action of ejectment in the District Court of the Twelfth Judicial District against Robert S. Thornton and others, for the recovery of the possession of a certain tract of land situated in part in the County of San Francisco, and part in the County of San Mateo, called "Laguna de la Merced." In June, 1862, Mahoney obtained a judgment in that action against certain of the defendants therein, among whom was the said Thornton, and subsequently, in June, 1863, Thornton was ejected from the land in controversy in this action and Mahoney was placed in possession thereof by the Sheriff, acting under and by virtue of an execution issued on said judgment.

This is an action of ejectment by said Thornton as plaintiff against said Mahoney and George Bliss, John O'Connor, and Solomon A. Sharpe, as defendants, commenced in August, 1863, for the recovery of the possession of the parcel of land, consisting of about one hundred and twenty acres, from which the plaintiff was ejected under Mahoney's judgment, and for the recovery also of damages which he sustained by reason of being put out and deprived of such premises.

The plaintiff bases his right to recover on the Act of the Legislature of this State, passed in 1858, entitled "An Act for the better protection of settlers on public lands in this State, and to secure the rights of parties in certain cases," (Laws of 1858, p. 345); and to show that his case comes within the provisions of this Act, the plaintiff, by his complaint, states the facts essential to the maintenance of his action under it. The most of these facts are admitted by the defendants in their answer. The defendants further answer, stating affirmatively facts in avoidance of the effect of the matters alleged by the complaint. The plaintiff, by stipulation, admitted certain of the matters so pleaded by the defendants, and the cause was submitted to the Court upon the pleadings and this stipulation for judgment.

The facts of the case, as submitted, are briefly and substantially as follows: In 1835, a grant of half a league of land, called the "Rancho Laguna de la Merced," was made by the Mexican Government to one Antonio Galindo, who immediately thereupon entered upon the land and built a house and corral thereon, and with his family lived upon the same, using it for the purposes of cultivation and grazing. Afterwards ando conveyed the property to Francisco de Haro, who entered into the house already erected, and while in possession of several houses on the rancho, and there resided, using the land for cultivation and grazing, until he died in 1848 or 1849. The heirs of De Haro presented their claim for the half league of land to the Board of Land Commissioners, appointed under an Act of Congress passed in 1851, entitled "An Act to ascertain and settle the private land claims in the State of California," for confirmation, and their claim was afterwards finally confirmed to them. Some time since the confirmation, the defendant Mahoney and one James G. Denniston acquired the title, and interest of the confirmees in said rancho. The premises demanded in this action are a portion of the rancho de la Merced.

At the time Mahoney commenced his action against Thornton and others, an official survey of the land confirmed to De Haro's heirs had been made by the United States Surveyor-General for California, and had been approved by him at the time of the trial of that action, and was then pending in the United States District Court on exceptions filed against the survey and location on behalf of the Government. After Thornton had been ejected and removed from the parcel of land in controversy, the United States District Court rejected the survey, set aside the said survey, and ordered a new survey of the lands to be made. Accordingly, another official survey was made and approved by the Surveyor-General, and by him returned to the United States District Court for its approval. The survey, which excluded the premises now in dispute, was afterwards, and before this action was commenced, approved by the same Court. After this, the United States party, and Mahoney and Denniston as claimants of the land, respectively appealed from the decree approving the second named survey to the Supreme Court of the United States, and both appeals, at the time of the trial, were pending and undetermined.

When the plaintiff was ejected from the premises, he had been growing crops on the land of the value of two thousand five hundred dollars, which Mahoney converted to his own use. In his defense to the action of Mahoney against him, the plaintiff herein expended nearly nine hundred dollars, and by reason of being ousted sustained other loss and damage to the amount of five hundred dollars, besides the loss of the use of the property, which was of the value of one hundred dollars a month. Mahoney has remained in possession of the demanded premises since the plaintiff Thornton was ejected therefrom.

To the answer of the defendants, the plaintiff demurred on several grounds. The demurrer was overruled, when the parties submitted the case upon the pleadings and the stipulation to the Court for its judgment, and the Court rendered a judgment in favor of defendants, and from this judgment the plaintiff has appealed.

The appellant by his counsel alleges that upon the facts admitted by the pleadings and stipulation, the plaintiff was entitled to judgment for the restitution to him of the demanded premises, and for the damages sustained by him by reason of his removal therefrom, and therefore he says the Court erred in giving judgment in favor of respondents against appellant.

The position thus taken on behalf of the appellant presents for consideration the effect of the survey in question as a final segregation of the half league of land to which Mahoney and Denniston became entitled as successors in interest of the confirmees of the Rancho Laguna de la Merced.

From the facts of the case it is to be inferred that the half league granted to Galindo was not so located by the grant itself as to render it entirely certain as to the limits and boundaries of the quantity designated, though the Court, in Mahoney v. Van Winkle, 21 Cal. 576, speaks of this particular grant as one for a specific tract of land, and distinguishes it from that class of grants which are "of mere quantity within vague and undefined boundaries." But from the record before us we are compelled to consider it a grant of a half league of land, the boundaries of which it was necessary to ascertain official measurement or segregation before the quantity granted could become located, and the grant itself could be attached to a specific tract of land. For this purpose may be presumed the survey was made, and it may also be presumed that the parties contesting by appeal the correctness of the survey and its approval by the District Court, deemed it within the power of the Government to confirm it or set it aside and require the land to be otherwise surveyed and located. If the grant had been of a defined tract, the survey might not have been necessary, except for the purpose of ascertaining the courses and distances of its boundaries, with a view of furnishing a description of it to be embodied in the grant to be issued; and in such case it can hardly be supposed any controversy could have arisen respecting the location made by the Government surveyor. We shall therefore regard the grant as of a half league of land within an area larger in extent than this designated quantity.

By the laws and customs of the former Government the segregation and location of the specified quantity granted was required to be made by an officer of the Government. The setting off and segregation of the land from the general area was a part and perhaps the most important part of the ceremony of the judicial delivery of possession to the grantee; where the quantity designated was to be carved out of a larger tract, the judicial measurement and location of such quantity was necessary in order to invest the grantee with a perfect title to a specific portion of the general tract. Until this duty was performed by the Government, the title of the grantee was inchoate and imperfect, consisting of a mere right and interest existing in solemn contract or obligation on the part of the Government to set apart to the grantee so much of the land within the general description as the Government designated by the terms of the grant to cede to him. (United States v. Foshat, 20 Howard, 426; Fremont v. United States, 20 Howard, 558.)

Though the grant of a specified quantity within a territory of a larger extent did not confer upon the grantee a title to any particular and defined portion of the land, still he became invested with such an interest in all the lands of the entire area as conferred upon him the right to its possession, to the exclusion of all persons except those claiming an interest in or right to the possession of the land, or some part of it, under the Government. (Waterman v. Smith, 13 Cal. 410; Cornwall v. Culver, 16 Cal. 429; Riley v. Heisch, 18 Cal. 200-202; Mahoney v. Van Winkle, 21 Cal. 576, 577.)

Such, undoubtedly, was the right of a grantee under the Mexican Government at the time the grant was made. This seems to accord with the practice of the Mexican authorities in California, and is a logical necessity, if it be admitted that a grantee of a specified quantity within an area of larger extent had the right of entry upon the land before the quantity granted was segregated from the general tract; otherwise, as has been often said by the highest Court in this State, the grantee might and probably would, by continual encroachments, be deprived of every portion of the entire tract.

In Mahoney v. Van Winkle, 21 Cal. 577, 578, the learned Chief Justice used the following appropriate language on this subject: "If there be a surplus within the designated boundaries of the tract over the specific quantity alleged by the grantee in his petition, or intended to be ceded by the grant, the Government can at any time, by directing its measurement and segregation, restrict the grantee's possession."

"The grantee cannot himself make the measurement and segregation so as to bind Government. He cannot know what particular part of the general tract the Government may assign to him, or what part it may reserve for its own use or offer for sale or settlement. He is, therefore, directly interested, until the official segregation, to protect the entire tract from waste and injury, and to improve it; and until then third persons cannot question his right to the possession of the whole. They have no authority to fix the limits of his possession, under any pretense of a desire or intention to make a settlement upon the surplus which the tract may contain over the specific quantity designated. Lands thus situated are not open settlement by the legislation of Congress, but, on the contrary, are expressly exempted therefrom. The determination, therefore, of the limits of the grantee's possession is a matter resting solely between himself and the Government."

The doctrine thus declared is in consonance with the principles of reason and justice, and meets with our approval. It preserves to the party who can justly demand of the Government the fulfillment of its treaty obligations, the right granted to him by the old Government. It cannot be presumed that the Congress of the United States would intentionally do anything to impair the right of the party who may hold an interest in lands thus situated under a grant of the Mexican nation. To deprive him of the use and enjoyment of any portion of it until a segregation of the proper quantity might be made, would subject him to the mercy of every intruder, and consequently would greatly impair, if not entirely destroy, all beneficial use whatever of the portion of the land designed for his benefit. That it was intended in such cases to protect the possessor of a valid claim to a given quantity of land comprehended within limits of a larger extent, which remained to be measured and segregated, the legislation of Congress has sufficiently indicated by withholding lands claimed under a Mexican or Spanish grant from settlement under the pre-emption laws of the Government. Then, until the Government, which alone has the authority to do so, restricts the grantee's possession by a segregation and location of the quantity granted, the grantee, or his successor in interest, must be held entitled, as against third persons without title, to all the lands within the general description of the grant. This rule may be attended with some inconveniences in cases where the amount of land embraced within the general description greatly exceeds the quantity designed to be granted; but notwithstanding all this, the claimant is entitled to the protection of the law, and as the authority to measure and locate the exact quantity to which he may be entitled under his grant rests wholly with the Government, third parties must abide the law, and wait for the surplus until the

Government shall have performed its duty to the party interested.

Then, has the Government limited and restricted the owners of the Rancho "Laguna de la Merced" to the area described by the survey now before the Supreme Court of the United States, on the appeals of the Government and the owners of the rancho, respectively? To answer this question, it is necessary to ascertain and determine the effect of the survey in the condition in which we find it at the time this action was commenced. The survey had then been made and approved by the proper Court, and was subject to examination and review by the Supreme Court of the United States, and to be disapproved and set aside by that tribunal. Whether or not appeals from the approval of the District Court had then been taken does not distinctly appear; and perhaps it is of no especial importance to know this fact; the parties agree that appeals had been duly taken by the respondents Mahoney and Denniston, and also on behalf of the Government, at the time the cause was tried, and were then pending and undetermined: and the counsel have argued the case upon the hypothesis that the appeals had been duly taken when the action was commenced—the one insisting that the decree of the District Court approving the survey is final in the sense of the Act of Congress of June 14, 1860, from the time it was pronounced until it shall be reversed or set aside; and the other as earnestly insisting that the decree is only final as to the Court which rendered it, and cannot be considered as absolutely final until after the Court of last resort shall have disposed of it, or the matter is no longer subject to the contingency of change.

The Act of Congress (12 Statutes at Large, 83) authorizes the District Court of the United States of the districts of California to order, on proper application, any survey of a private land claim within their respective districts to be returned into the District Court for examination and adjudication; and the same Act provides for the taking of testimony as to any matters necessary to show the true and proper location of the

him, and requires the Court on hearing the allegations and proofs of the parties interested, to render judgment thereon; and if, in its opinion, the location and survey be erroneous, the Court is authorized to set aside and annul the same, or to correct and modify it; whereupon it is made the duty of the Surveyor-General, on being served with a certified copy of the decree of the Court, forthwith to cause a new survey and location to be made, or to correct and reform the survey and location already made so as to conform to the decree of the District Court, to which it shall be returned for confirmation and approval. And by the fifth section of the Act it is provided, that when, after publication as aforesaid, no application shall be made to the said Court for the said order, or when said order has been refused, or when an order shall have been obtained as aforesaid, and when the District Court, by its decree, shall have finally approved said survey and location, shall have reformed or modified the same, and determined the true location of the claim, it shall be the duty of the Surveyor-General to transmit, without delay, the plat or survey of the said claim to the General Land Office, and the patent for the land as surveyed shall forthwith be issued therefor, and no appeal shall be allowed from the order or decree as aforesaid of the said District Court, unless applied for within six months from the date of the decree of said District Court, but not afterwards; and the said plat and survey so finally determined by publication, order, or decree, as the case may be, shall have the same effect and validity in law as if a patent for the land so surveyed had been issued by the United States."

By implication, at least, any party interested has the right to appeal to the Supreme Court from the order or decree of approval made by the District Court at any time within six months thereafter; and it appears in this case that the parties in interest have only availed themselves of this right.

The appeals having been perfected, all further proceedings upon the survey and the decree approving it became suspended. A patent cannot be issued for the land surveyed until the appeals are disposed of, otherwise the appeals might be wholly ineffectual. It is not the practice for the United States when appellant in cases of appeals from the decree of the District Court approving a survey made under the Act of Congress mentioned, to execute a bond in order to stay proceedings upon the decree, and we apprehend no such bond is necessary for the purpose.

In the time of Mr. Chief Justice Hale it was the law of the House of Lords in England, that the presenting of an appeal to that Court of dernier resort suspended all proceedings in the Court below. It is true their jurisdiction was for a long time questioned by the House of Commons, and also by several distinguished Judges, among whom was Mr. Chief Justice Hale himself; but notwithstanding, the jurisdiction of the House of Lords finally became established, and so remained until nearly the beginning of the present century. (Palmer's Practice of the House of Lords, 8 Paige, 381.)

In the case of The United States v. Pacheco, 20 How. 263, which was a California land case, an application was made on behalf of the defendants to docket and dismiss the appeal under a rule of the Court; and in respect to it, the Court said: "The only effect of docketing and dismissing a case under this rule is to enable a party to proceed to execute his judgment in the Court below. It removes the bar to further proceedings in that Court which the appeal created, and does nothing more." The converse of the rule here laid down is, that while the appeal remained pending it was a bar to further proceedings in the Court below.

In Taylor v. Savage, 1 How. 285, the Court say: "We are by no means prepared to say that a complainant, after having appealed from a decree in his favor, can be permitted, pending the appeal, to carry into execution the decree which he is seeking to reverse in the appellate Court in order to obtain a decree for a larger sum."

The parties who have appealed from the decree approving the survey, respectively seek to reverse it in the appellate Court, in order to obtain a different survey and location of the

to which the assignees of the confirmees are entitled by grant. The appellate tribunal may reverse this decree set aside the survey which has been approved by the District Court, and the result may be that the land in controversy eventually be selected by the Government as a portion of the quantity to be assigned to the claimants and granted by patent yet to be issued. Until this question be disposed of the plaintiff's action must be considered as premature. Judgment affirmed.

AC BRANHAM AND WILLIAM L. SMITH, TRUSTEES FOR JAMES F. REED, et al. v. THE MAYOR AND COMMON COUNCIL OF THE CITY OF SAN JOSE, AND WILLIAM DANIELS, JAMES C. COBB, AND S. O. HOUGHTON, COMMISSIONERS OF THE FUNDED DEBT.

OF AYUNTAMIENTO.—An Ayuntamiento was a municipal body, and could take and exercise only such powers as were conferred upon it by the will of the sovereign, as expressed in the laws creating it.

COMPLAINT—AVERMENT OF CONCLUSION OF LAW.—An averment in a complaint that an Ayuntamiento had full power and lawful authority to do a particular act, is an averment of a conclusion of law, and does not tender an issue of fact.

VERBEE—WHAT IT ADMITS.—A demurrer to a complaint containing such allegation does not admit its truth.

—A demurrer admits the truth of such facts only as are issuable and well pleaded.

LO LANDS—MORTGAGE OF.—An Ayuntamiento had no power to mortgage the lands of the pueblo, and a mortgage on such lands given by it was a nullity, and vested in the mortgagee no interest in the lands.

MORTGAGE—DECREE FORECLOSING.—A decree foreclosing a mortgage made by the Ayuntamiento of San José on the pueblo lands, in an action in which the City of San José, the successor of the Ayuntamiento, was a party defendant, did not affect the city, nor estop it from setting up its title to the lands.

SHERIFF'S SALE UNDER VOID DECREE.—A judicial sale under such decree, and the execution of a Sheriff's deed to the purchaser, did not vest in him any title to the lands, but all proceedings, including the decree sale and Sheriff's deed, were utterly void.

SHERIFF'S DEED—WHAT IT CONVEYS.—A decree foreclosing a mortgage, and directing a sale of the mortgaged premises, and the execution of a Sheriff's deed under the decree, transfers to the purchaser whatever interest the mortgage created and vested in the mortgagee, and nothing more.

DEALING WITH MUNICIPAL CORPORATION.—Parties dealing with a municipal corporation are chargeable with full knowledge of its powers, and act at their peril.

SAME — CONFIRMING VOID SALE.—An agreement made between the municipal authorities of San José on the one part, and the purchasers of the pueblo land at a judicial sale made under a decree foreclosing a mortgage executed by the municipality on those lands on the other part, confirming unto said purchasers all the rights and interests in such lands which they acquired by their purchase at the Sheriff's sale, and releasing unto them all the right and title which the city then had, or might afterwards have therein, was void, and conferred upon said purchasers no new right.

CONFIRMATION — EFFECT OF.—A confirmation may make good a voidable or defeasible estate, but cannot operate upon or aid an estate which is void in law.

RELEASE — EFFECT OF.—Where there is no estate in a releasee to support a release, or upon which it can operate, a release is void.

SAME — WHEN VOID.—A release, unless the releasee is in possession, is void.

SETTING ASIDE SALE.—A naked purchaser at a judicial sale made under a decree foreclosing a mortgage, is not entitled to have the satisfaction of the judgment under which the sale was made set aside and to be subrogated to the rights of the plaintiff in the judgment, because the sale was void, and he acquired no title to the property purchased.

SAME.—A purchaser at a judicial sale made under such decree cannot maintain an action to recover back the purchase money. His mistake was one of law as to the validity of the sale, and from such mistake no relief can be granted.

APPEAL from the District Court, Third Judicial District, Santa Clara County.

The demurrer to the complaint was sustained, and judgment rendered for defendant in the Court below, and plaintiff appealed.

The other facts are stated in the opinion of the Court.

J. B. Crockett, for Appellant.

The city is precluded by the proceedings on the foreclosure from raising this point. The respondent was a party to the foreclosure suit, was served with process, and appeared to the action.

If the mortgage was void for any reason, that defense should then have been made; and having failed to make it, the respondent is estopped, by the decree of foreclosure, from impeaching the validity of the mortgage. It has become res judicata, and the validity of the mortgage is no longer open for discussion.

Branham et al. v. Mayor and Common Council of San José et al.

The principle which I invoke is stated as follows in a leading case decided by Chancellor Kent, then a Justice of the Court of Errors of New York: "The judgment or decree of Court possessing competent jurisdiction is not only final as to the subject matter thereby determined, but also as to every other matter which the parties might litigate in the cause and which they might have decided." (Le Guen v. Gouverneur et al., 1 John Ca. 436.)

There is nothing new in this principle, and it is now too well established, perhaps, to need the citation of numerous authorities; nevertheless, to show how broadly it has been recognized in this State and elsewhere, I refer to the following cases: Dewey v. Gray, 2 Cal. 377; Clary v. Hoagland, 6 Cal. 37; Gunter v. Laffan, 7 Cal. 592; Cal. St. Nav. Co. v. Wright, 8 Cal. 592; Cahoon v. Leavy, 10 Cal. 216; Davidson v. Dallas, 11 Cal. 75.

The respondent, therefore, had the opportunity in the foreclosure suit to assail the mortgage as void, or fraudulent, or for any other reason invalid. But no such defense was made; if made, was overruled by the Court. If the final decree was erroneous, the respondent's remedy was by appeal. But no appeal was taken, and the judgment of foreclosure was perfected by a sale, at which the property was purchased by third parties at a large price. When these purchasers now set up the Sheriff's deed as a muniment of title, the respondent seeks to go behind the decree of foreclosure, and assails the mortgage as having been made without authority of law; and endeavors to impeach the foreclosure sale on the ground that the property could not be mortgaged or sold, and that, therefore, the sale was a nullity. These were proper defenses, if valid, in the foreclosure suit; but after a final decree in that case, the respondent is estopped by it, and cannot in this action re-try matters which might have been litigated in that case.

The counsel for respondents claim that the contract of June 2th, 1851, was void as a deed of confirmation, or as a release, because there was no title, or color of title, in Branham &

White to be confirmed, and no estate in them on which a release could operate. They assume that the Sheriff's sale was an absolute nullity, and therefore Branham & White had no title on which to predicate a release or deed of confirmation. If their premises be conceded, and if the contract of June 12th be treated only as a technical release or deed of confirmation, their conclusion may be correct. But the contract is not simply a technical release or confirmation. It is a compromise of doubtful rights, in which each of the parties concedes to the other a portion of his supposed right. The principle invoked by the counsel has no application to such a case, and applies only where a person holding a portion of the estate releases his interest to the holder of the remaining portion, or where a prior defective conveyance is confirmed by a new one. Compromises of doubtful rights rest upon a wholly different basis; for every compromise necessarily assumes that the right is with the one party or the other, but owing to a doubt as to which party is in the right, they make mutual concessions, in order to end the dispute; and hence, compromises fairly made are never disturbed, even though it afterwards appear that one of the parties was wholly without title. The contract in question purports to be, and is, simply a compromise, in which each party cedes to the other a portion of his supposed rights. The question, therefore, is entirely free from the technical difficulties suggested by the counsel.

I concede on this argument, as I did on the oral argument, that the mortgage was a nullity for want of power in the Ayuntamiento to make it. No title, therefore, passed at the foreclosure sale. It would be absurd, then, to issue a new order of sale and repeat the process of seeking to enforce a void mortgage. The counsel admit that the judgment was one of foreclosure only, and not a money judgment on which an execution could issue. The mortgage being void, the judgment founded on it was void.

The judgment as well as the mortgage being void, the original demand of Belden, Aram & Reed was not merged, and remained precisely as if no judgment had been rendered.

Branham et al. v. Mayor and Common Council of San José et al.

It remained simply a debt due from the city and Belden, Aram & Reed, and the debt was not satisfied, nor the evidence of indebtedness cancelled. The judgment being void, the proceedings of the Sheriff were void. His return on the order of sale, that the judgment was paid, was a nullity because there was no valid judgment or order of sale. He had no power whatever in the premises, and all his acts were void. The original debt, then, was not satisfied, and Branham & White, under a mistake of both law and fact, advanced to Belden, Aram & Reed the full amount of the demand which they held against the city. The principle involved is this, to wit: if a stranger, under a mistake of law and fact, pay the debt of a third person, is he entitled to be subrogated to the rights of the creditor, and particularly if the evidence of indebtedness be not cancelled? If a stranger, under the mistaken belief that he is liable as surety for the debtor, pay the debt, is he entitled to be subrogated? Or, if a surety who has been released pay the debt in ignorance of that fact, is he entitled to take the place of the creditor? If the innocent holder of a junior mortgage, which afterwards turns out to be forged, pay off a prior incumbrance, is he entitled to be subrogated to the rights of the creditor? If a junior mortgage be foreclosed, and at the sale a stranger purchases the equity of redemption and pays off the prior mortgage, and if it afterwards appear that the foreclosure sale was void for want of jurisdiction in the Court, would the purchaser be subrogated?

If, by means of fraudulent representations, a stranger be induced to pay the debt of another, he would be entitled to be subrogated on the ground that he acted upon a falsehood and would not otherwise have parted with his money. On the same principle, and for the same reason, he is entitled to like relief when he pays the debt of another under a mistake of law or fact. In this case, Branham & White acted upon a mistake, both of law and fact. They were mistaken in the law as to the power of the Ayuntamiento to mortgage the land, and as to the obligatory force of the mortgage.

They were mistaken, also, as to the fact that there was a valid decree of foreclosure. There was manifestly a mistake in the respects on the part of all concerned. It was a plain case of mutual mistake. They all supposed the mortgage and judgment to be valid. In cases of mutual mistake, the transaction ought not to stand, because it lacks the primary element of an obligatory contract, to wit: the assent of the united will and judgment of the parties.

"Equity will relieve against a mutual mistake, when the property which one party supposed himself purchasing and the other supposed himself selling, does not exist." (Marr v. Bennett, 8 Paige, 312.) The only difference between the case and this is, that though the property existed, the parties had no power to sell it as they supposed they had. They supposed the title would pass at the foreclosure sale. On that belief Branham & White advanced their money.

In a contract for the sale of lands, if both parties are mistaken as to the vendor's title, which was supposed to be perfect, but proves to be void, a Court of equity will relieve the vendee from the contract. (Hadlock v. Williams, 10 Ves. 570; Champlain v. Layton, 1 Edw. Ch. 467; Same case, reported 18 Wend. 407.)

And in a clear case, equity will relieve against a contract founded on a mistake of law alone. (Lamott v. Bowly, 6 B. & J. 500; Garner v. Garner, 1 Desau, 487; Lowndes v. Cholm, 2 McCh. 455.)

A vendee may rescind the contract, when it appears the parties supposed the vendor had the title, but in fact he had none. (Bowlin v. Pollock, 7 Monr. 26.)

If a contract of sale ought not in conscience to bind one of the parties, as if there had been mistake or fraud, a Court of equity will set aside the contract. (Hepburn v. Dunlop, Wheat. 179; Dunlop v. Hepburn, 2 Wheat. 281.)

If a judgment be supposed to be a lien on land when it is not, this is a mistake in law, which will be relieved against, the defendant can be placed in statu quo. (Crosier v. Ager, Paige Ch. R. 137; Williams v. Champion, 6 Ham. 10)

ring v. Harsen, 3 Jones Eq. N. C. 96; Schermerhorn v. Rhedt, 9 Paige, 28.)

The doctrine of subrogation does not depend on privity, nor is it confined to cases of suretyship; but it is a mode which the law adopts to compel the ultimate discharge of the debt by one who, in good conscience, ought to pay it. (McCormick v. Irwin, 35 Penn. State R. 111.)

So where the land is purchased in good faith at an administrator's sale, which is void because the requirements of the statute were not complied with, and the purchase money has been applied in extinguishment of a mortgage to which the land was subject, the purchaser will be subrogated to the rights of the mortgagee to the extent of the purchase money, and the owner will not be entitled to recover possession until he repays the purchase money. (Valle v. Fleming, 29 Mo.; 8 Mo. Rep., 152.)

In this case, Branham & Smith paid a large sum for the purchase money at the foreclosure sale, which was applied in extinguishment of a just debt due from the respondent to Belden, Aram & Reed; and I claim that if the sale was void and the mortgage a nullity, Branham & Smith should be subrogated, pro tanto, to the rights of the creditors Belden, Aram & Reed, under the original obligation, and are entitled to recover from the respondent the amount paid, with the same rate of interest to which Belden, Aram & Reed were entitled.

W. T. Wallace, and S. O. Houghton, for Respondents.

The counsel for appellant seeks to make the broad sweeping averment which he has chosen to insert in his complaint, that the Ayuntamiento had the lawful power and authority to contract the debt and make the mortgage, conclusive alike upon the law, this Court, and the rights of these defendants.

We might answer this by saying that the question as to the existence of this asserted power in the Ayuntamiento is itself a question of law, and that the opinion in Hart v. Burnett announces the law to be directly contrary to what it is averred to be in the complaint. The effect of a demurrer is to admit the truth of the facts only which are well pleaded, in order the law, as contradistinguished from but arising upon facts, may be determined — nothing more. The averment in the complaint, that the instrument of mortgage was “in respects binding and obligatory upon said pueblo, and that the Town Council or Ayuntamiento had due and lawful authority and power to enter into said contract. * * * and the contract and mortgage were in law obligatory on said pueblo” are not averments of matters of fact, but are only averments of conclusions of law, and are therefore not admitted by demurrer.

In Thomas v. Desmond, 12 Howard’s Practice Report: the allegation of the complaint was, “that the said plaintiff is the sole owner of the said demand against the said defendants.” The Court said that “is merely an allegation of a conclusion of law.”

In Adams v. Holley, Admr., 12 Howard’s Practice Report 321, the allegation was, “the plaintiff became and was the owner of all the interests, rights, and claims, * * * owner of all accounts; and that the moneys due from the said Holley, at the time of his death, to all the said proprietors became and were and still are the property of the plaintiff.” The Court said, in relation to this averment: “Here is no alleged showing the plaintiff’s title to the rights and interests of other proprietors, of which he claims to be the owner. * * *. The plaintiff only alleges that he is the owner of the said moneys, which is only a legal conclusion.” (McMurray v. Gifford, 12 How. P. R. 14; Bentley v. Jones, 4 How. P. R. 204.)

It will be seen by reference to the complaint, that in the contract of June 12th, 1851, the city authorities undertook to confirm unto Branham & White all the rights and interest which Branham & White had acquired at the said sale; and before entering upon the examination of the nature and extent of the powers of the municipality of San José in relation to the pueblo lands, we desire to submit the proposition that insofar as this is an instrument of confirmation merely, it does not aid or strengthen the title of the confirmees named therein.

Branham et al. v. Mayor and Common Council of San José et al.

in the very nature of things could not do so, because of utter nullity of the estate attempted to be confirmed.

In the case at bar the releasees had no estate in law in the land; they had no possession of any part of it; there was, of course, no privity of estate between them and the releasers; and for these reasons alone, resting as they do simply upon the situation of the confirmees and releasees in relation to the land, and conceding, for the purpose of the consideration of this proposition, the most ample power in the city authorities to confirm, we submit that the confirmation and release were simply void and inoperative, for reasons based wholly upon the con- dition and situation of the supposed releasees and confirmees in relation to the property which is the subject of release and confirmation. That this is their condition at law, and that no fraud, accident, mistake of fact, or other matter of equity entitles them to equitable relief.

The plaintiffs are not entitled to be substituted or subro-gated to the rights of Belden, Aram & Reed, who claim to have recovered a judgment against the city for an indebtedness contracted by the Ayuntamiento of the pueblo.

The plaintiffs claim that, although it be true that the instrument of mortgage made by the Ayuntamiento, and the sale made thereon by the Sheriff, were insufficient to pass the title in the land to the plaintiffs; and although it be true that the contract of June 12th, 1851, ought not, on the principles of equity jurisprudence, to be specially enforced by this Court, yet the plaintiffs are, at all events, entitled to be substituted to such rights as Belden et al. claimed upon their judgment against the city; and this asserted claim of the plaintiffs to be substituted, is made by their counsel, in his argument, to rest upon the general doctrine of subrogation, as understood in the law, and also upon the circumstance that the money of the plaintiffs went to satisfy the Belden judgment, and that the title in the property they purchased at the Sheriff's sale has failed.
 We will consider these two positions of the counsel together.
 The bill discloses the fact that in the suit of Belden v. The City, a mortgage made by the Ayuntamiento, on the 9th April,

Branham et al. v. Mayor and Common Council of San José et al.

1850, upon the pueblo lands, was pretended to be foreclosed and the premises ordered to be sold to satisfy judgment. judgment or decree simply forecloses this supposed mortgage and does not provide any relief over against the defendant any residue or deficiency remaining due after the sale of supposed mortgaged premises.

We are not indulging now in any criticism upon the verbiage of the complaint. An inspection of the record of the proceedings shows that the fact is really so.

The law in force at the time of these proceedings, (1850, p. 456,) provides that the judgment upon foreclosure might direct an execution for any deficiency remaining after the sale of the mortgaged premises; but in this case the complaint did not ask it, nor did the decree award it, although it provided that any excess in the amount realized by the sale over the amount of the debt, should be paid over to the defendant. The decree did not direct any execution for any deficiency that might remain. This was, no doubt, the intent and design of both parties, because the bill does not disclose to us that the Mayor and Common Council resisted the proceedings in any way.

Now, this prayer to be subrogated to the rights of the mortgagees in that decree simply amounts to a proposal to revise the decree to sell the pueblo lands under the invalid mortgage made by the Ayuntamiento on the 9th day of April, 1850, because the only relief awarded to the plaintiffs in that decree was a sale of these lands under that instrument of mortgage and a decree of subrogation of these plaintiffs in the suit to the rights of the other plaintiffs in the decree of Belknap et al. v. The Mayor et al. cannot alter the terms of that decree itself. If the Court were now appealed to in the first instance to decree a foreclosure of that instrument of mortgage, it would not do so with the light of the decision in Hart v. Burnett on the subject, and yet the proposed subrogation indirectly does that very thing.

Another consideration which is fatal to the claim of subrogation, is that the bill is not properly drawn for the purpose of such relief. It does not make the necessary parties d to enable the Court to render such a decree. The claim that the plaintiffs be subrogated to the rights of Belden, Reed, and Reed, under their decree against the defendants; and would seem a clear proposition of law, even without the authority of the Court, that if the supposed rights of any man are taken from him and given to another by the judgment of the Court, he whose supposed rights are to be thus transferred should be a party before the Court.

If the decree is made without the presence of Belden, Reed, and Reed, the supposed owners of these rights, would such a decree bind them? Could they not resist it whenever any right is claimed against them? Would the defendants or any one else be protected by such a decree if they afterwards treated with the plaintiffs in this suit as the real owners of such supposed rights? How can a decree be made to reach the rights or title of any kind, unless such right or title is brought before the Court to be bound by a decree?

In Mitford's Chancery Pleadings (Note on Parties, 398) it is declared that "the general rule is that all are necessary parties who have an interest in the subject matter which may be affected by the decree. The rule is founded on the great principle of preventing future litigation, and taking away multiplicity of suits, by adjudicating upon the rights of all such parties upon whom a decree may or ought to operate."

In the cases of Caldwell v. Taggart, 4 Peters, 190, and West v. Randall, 2 Mason, 181, declare that the general rule is, that wherever numerous the persons interested in the subject of a suit, they must all be made parties plaintiff or defendant, in order that a complete decree may be made—it being the constant aim of a Court of equity to do complete justice, by embracing the whole subject, deciding and settling the rights of all persons interested in that subject, and thus make the performance of the order perfectly safe to those who have to obey it, and also prevent litigation in the future.

It will be borne in mind that at the time the plaintiff paid twenty-six thousand dollars there had been no treaty or convention of any kind between them and the city authorities;

there was no privity or connection between the city and plaintiff at all in making that purchase; they never made any relation to the matter of this purchase or sale until the month of June, 1851, and which was a period of about one month after the plaintiffs made their purchase at Sheriff's sale, had paid all the money they ever paid.

The plaintiffs were therefore strangers to the proceeding of bidding and purchasing at a judicial sale just as any one else had a right to do; there is then a total want of any feature as inducements held out to plaintiffs to purchase, request or promises made, confidence reposed or abused; and if plaintiffs may be subrogated to the rights of the plaintiff in execution, then it must be because the rule is that any purchaser upon failure of the title to the property purchased at a judicial sale, may recover of the defendant in execution the purchase money that he may have expended; in other words, by a fiction of a Court of equity, the defendant in execution is supposed, upon sale of his real estate by the Sheriff, to come into the most ample covenants of seizin and general warranty with the purchaser, his heirs and assigns, as to the title under which the property is held. To support this view, the inquiry of the plaintiff's counsel has presented for the consideration of the Court a single case: McLaughlin's Adm'r v. Dana, 8 Dana, Ky. 182. The property sold in that case was real estate — it was a negro boy; possession of the negro passed to the purchaser, Daniel, at the sale, but the negro was afterwards recovered from the vendee of Daniel in an action of detinue. The Court cites no authority, and does not enter into any elaborate reasoning in its decision. The decision itself might have been put upon the ground that as in the sale of a chattel by a party where possession is delivered there is in law an implied warranty of title, so the Sheriff making the sale for the party defendant under execution would be regarded as his agent for the purpose of this implied warranty, as that officer is unquestionably considered the agent of the parties to an execution for many purposes. But this rule of implied warranty does not apply to sales of real estate, and significant that the research of the counsel has failed to produce a case where substitution was allowed in case of real estate on failure of title.

Next, as to the plaintiff's claim to be reimbursed by the defendants the twenty-six thousand dollars bid at the Sheriff's sale, by reason of the failure of the title they purchased, and their right to maintain this, an independent action, to be redressed touching their purchase at the sale under the decree of foreclosure, we cite the case of Boggs v. Hargrave, 16 Cal. 471. The facts were, that in 1857 Harbin executed a mortgage to Fowler and Hargrave upon certain premises, and after giving the mortgage, Harbin conveyed the whole of the mortgaged premises to Bristol. Fowler and Hargrave afterwards proceeded to foreclose their mortgage, but made only Harbin a defendant in the suit, and did not bring Bristol before Court. At the sale under the decree, Boggs purchased the premises and paid the purchase money. Finding that he had acquired no title to the land, he sued the mortgagees to recover back the money. It was held that he could not recover.

The Court say: "The doctrine of caveat emptor applies to sales made upon valid judgments, and is usually looked with reference to sales upon execution issued against the general property of a judgment debtor. In these latter cases, a defect of title is no ground for interference with the sale or a refusal to pay the price bid. The purchaser takes upon himself all the risks, and bids with full knowledge that in any event he only acquires such interest as the debtor possessed at the date of the levy or the lien of the judgment, and he may possibly acquire nothing."

Having thus announced the general rule as to sales upon execution, the Court proceeds to remark upon the law applicable to sales upon the foreclosure of a mortgage, thus:

But a somewhat different rule prevails in cases where particular property is the subject of sale by a specific adjudication, as where the interest of A. in a certain tract is decreed to be sold. To the validity of a decree of this character the presence of A. is essential, and when present the decree binds him, and is effectual, by the sale it orders, to transfer the estate. A valid decree in a mortgage case operates upon the interest as the mortgagee possessed in the property at the execution of the mortgage. That interest may not constitute valid title; it may not, in fact, be of any value, and the purchaser takes that risk. To that extent the doctrine of caveat emptor applies even in those cases, and in all cases of adjudication upon specific interest, but no further. The interest is specifically subjected to sale, whatever it may be worth, and the purchaser is entitled to receive; it is for that interest he makes his bid and pays his money."

We submit that this reasoning is conclusive that the plaintiffs cannot maintain this suit upon the claim of subrogation. They purchased without any misrepresentation, undue influence, or misplaced confidence. They knew that they were purchasing upon a foreclosure of a mortgage upon pueblo lands. No fact that is known to them now was unknown to them at the time. If they made a mistake, it was a mistake of law only—just the mistake that Boggs made when he supposed that he would acquire the title to the lands he purchased, notwithstanding that the plaintiff was not made a party, and for this mistake of law the Supreme Court declare that no relief can be had in an independent suit. The Court concludes that the only relief that a party purchasing can have in such cases, is by an application made to the Court in the original foreclosure suit, and not by an independent action. Such application, too, the Court must be made in a reasonable time. (Ten or eleven years after the purchase would hardly be reasonable time, we suppose.) But the counsel complains that this remedy would not be available to the plaintiffs, because there could be no resale, the mortgage itself (and, we would add, the debt, too) being void, and there being therefore nothing to sell. That is our view, also, because of this view, we do not see that it follows that the settled rules of law and equity must be disregarded in order to create a remedy for the plaintiffs. The proposition may be stated thus: the general rule at law and in equity, ning purchases such as plaintiffs made in this case, is that caveat emptor.

Branham et al. v. Mayor and Common Council of San José et als.

By the Court, SANDERSON, C. J.

The appeal in this case comes before us on demurrer to the complaint. The facts as alleged in the complaint are substantially as follows:

By the Constitution, the Pueblo of San José was declared the seat of government until removed by law. The first session of the Legislature was held at that place. There was then no building belonging to the State or the Pueblo of San José adapted to the purposes of the Legislature, and the citizens of the pueblo petitioned the Ayuntamiento, or Town Council, to procure one. This the Ayuntamiento endeavored to do, but failed for the want of means and credit. Thereupon, seventeen citizens of the pueblo purchased a lot and building, situated within the pueblo, for the accommodation of the Legislature. In accordance with an understanding to that effect, the deed was made to Aram, Belden & Reed, in trust for the purchasers, who were to convey the property to the pueblo whenever the pueblo could pay for the same. On the 14th day of April, 1850, the Ayuntamiento purchased the premises from Aram, Belden & Reed, at the price of thirty-four thousand dollars, payable within six months, with interest at six per cent per month; and to secure the payment of that sum, pledged the State scrip or temporary loan bonds in the treasury, and the revenues which might be raised that year by taxation, and mortgaged what is known as the pueblo lands. The first Legislature met in the building thus purchased by the Ayuntamiento, and on the 27th day of March, 1850, it passed an Act incorporating the City of San José. By the provisions of the Act the City of San José succeeded to all the legal rights and claims of the pueblo, and became subject to all the liabilities incurred and obligations created by the Ayuntamiento. The city government was limited in the exercise of its municipal powers to the geographical boundaries established by the Act; and over the pueblo lands situated outside of those limits the city government could exercise no authority, except to "rent, lease, or sell" the same. The City of San José thus became the successor in interest of the Pueblo of San José to the lot and building in question, which the purchase money, or a part of it, was still unpaid, and the pueblo lands mortgaged by the Ayuntamiento to secure its payment. The city authorities took possession of the lot and building, and afterwards sold them to the City of Santa Clara for the sum of thirty-eight thousand dollars, payable in three months, with interest at the rate of four and a half per cent per month, and directed the proceeds of the sale to be applied toward the payment of the debt due to the trustees, Aram, Belden and Reed; but the moneys, when collected from the county, were not so applied, but were expended by the city government for other purposes. Thereupon, the trustees sued the city, and in December, 1850, recovered judgment and a decree of foreclosure of the mortgage executed by the Ayuntamiento, under which the pueblo lands were sold by the Sheriff to Branham and White, trustees, plaintiffs in this action. The proceeds of this sale were more than sufficient to satisfy the judgment, and the same was duly satisfied of record, and the overplus was paid and received by the city. On the 26th of May, 1851, the Sheriff conveyed the pueblo lands to the purchasers.

After this purchase some dispute arose between the city and the purchasers concerning the lands in question, and the Council, by ordinance, authorized the Mayor to settle and arrange the dispute with the purchasers. Under this ordinance the Mayor entered into a contract with the purchasers on the 12th of June, 1851, whereby, after reciting the chase by the trustees at the Sheriff's sale, it was agreed that the trustees and the Mayor should conjointly sell the pueblo lands in such a manner as to realize to the trustees the amount of the purchase money paid by them and all costs and expenses. If the money thus realized should prove insufficient for that purpose, the city was not to be bound for the deficit. on the contrary, there should be a surplus, the same was to vested for the benefit of the city and trustees in a railroad contemplated between San José and San Francisco, the land to be invested in the proportion of three to one in favor of the trustees. The contract also contained certain provisions respecting "town lots" and "five hundred acre lots," and the confirmation of the pueblo title to the land; and in consideration of the covenants of the contract the city ratified and confirmed the title acquired by the trustees at the Sheriff's sale, and released to them all the right and title which the city then or might thereafter acquire to the whole or any portion of the land.

This contract was duly ratified by the Common Council of the city, and the Mayor was directed to carry the same into effect. But the city afterwards refused to do so, and conveyed the right, title, and interest in the land to the Commissioners of the Funded Debt of the City of San José. Upon the state of facts the plaintiffs ask for various kinds of alternative relief: First — A decree setting aside the conveyance made in the city to the Commissioners of the Funded Debt; Sec-— Or, if that cannot be done, a decree for the specific performance of the contract of the 12th of June, 1851, against the city and the Commissioners, and an injunction perpetually restraining them from making further sales or conveyances of the lands, except in the manner and on the conditions specified in said contract of the 12th of June, 1851, and also a decree requiring them to account with the plaintiffs for all the moneys received by them or either of them from sales of lands already made; Third — And inasmuch as the purchase money paid by said Branham and White liquidated the debt of the city to Aram, Belden and Reed, if for any reason it shall be adjudged that the Sheriff's deed and the contract of the 12th of June are invalid, plaintiffs ask that the satisfaction of the judgment in favor of Aram, Belden and Reed, and against the city, may be set aside, and the Sheriff's sale held for null and void, and that they be subrogated to all the rights which Aram, Belden and Reed had in and to said judgment and mortgage prior to the satisfaction thereof, and that they have leave to proceed under said judgment, by execution or otherwise, to collect the whole of said judgment, both principal interest, with a prayer for general relief.

Several points are made on the demurrer, which we notice, so far as it may be necessary for the purposes of case, in the order in which they are presented in the brief counsel:

I. Had the Ayuntamiento power to mortgage the pueblo land to Aram, Belden and Reed, under the circumstances and for the purposes narrated in the complaint?

This question is not discussed by counsel for appellant, upon the pretense that it cannot be made upon demurrer; holding that, inasmuch as he has averred that the Ayuntamiento has full power and authority to make the mortgage, the power and authority is admitted by the demurrer. Ayuntamiento, being a municipal body, could take and exercise only such powers as were conferred by the will of the sovereign, as expressed in the laws creating it. Every question as to what power has been conferred by such laws is a question of law and not of fact; and the averment in the complaint that the Ayuntamiento had full power and lawful authority to do the act in question, is but an averment of a conclusion of law, and does not tender an issue of fact. A demurrer admits the truth of such facts as are issuable and pleaded; but it does not admit the conclusions which counsel may choose to draw therefrom, although they may be stated in the complaint. It is to the soundness of the conclusions, whether stated in the complaint or not, that a demurrer is directed, and to which it applies the proper test.

That the Ayuntamiento had the power to execute the mortgage to Aram, Belden and Reed, does not seem to be seriously claimed by the learned counsel for appellant. Obviously, a position could not be upheld without a complete overthrow of the law, as clearly and explicitly declared in the able learned opinion of Mr. Justice Baldwin, in Hart v. Burnett, Cal. 580. The opinion in that case is a monument to ing and industrious research of the Justice by whom it delivered. It is a clear and explicit exposition of the law the powers of municipal bodies under the Spanish and Mexican regime, and of the tenure by which their lands were held and must now be regarded as a finality upon those subjects.

At page 590, Mr. Justice Baldwin says: "These lands were held for the inhabitants in perpetuity, for their use and benefit, to be used in building up, sustaining, and supporting the town, whose interests and rights are lodged in the hands of municipal agents, acting under defined and expressly limited powers, given for the carrying out of the objects and uses prescribed; but with no power to alienate or change, much less destroy the trust. That these agents were clothed with no power to make grants to settlers or others of limited portions of this land, or to dispose of portions of it for the benefit of the municipality, implies no power to sell it out in whole or even to mortgage it; for if this were the case, the prosperity, if not the existence of the town, would depend, not on the laws, but on the will of those agents, acting in violation of their spirit and letter."

Each being the law, it follows that the mortgage upon the lands made by the Ayuntamiento to Aram, Belden and others, was an absolute nullity, and vested in the latter no interest whatever in the lands. If the Ayuntamiento had no power to mortgage, it follows that all the subsequent proceedings up to and including the Sheriff's deed to Branham and others, were utterly void. Upon this point, also, at page 580, Justice Baldwin says: "If it be true, as seems clear from the citations we have given, that the municipal officers could not mortgage or sell these lands to pay a debt created by them, we do not see how it can be contended that they could accomplish the same result by borrowing money and then confessing judgment, or suffering it to be entered, or submitting to suit, thus indirectly doing through the Sheriff what they could not do by their direct action."

It is contended by counsel for appellant that the city is precluded from setting up the invalidity of the mortgage to

Aram, Belden and Reed, by the proceedings on the foreclosure. That inasmuch as the city was a party to those proceedings, duly served with process, and had an opportunity to contest the validity of the mortgage, but failed to do so, its failure has become res adjudicata, and the respondents are estopped by the decree of foreclosure from further question upon this point. In aid of this theory counsel invokes the general principle announced by Chancellor Kent in La Guen v. Gouveneur et al., 1 John. Ca. 436, to the effect that: "The judgment and decree of a Court possessing competent jurisdiction is not final as to the subject matter thereby determined, but also as to every other matter which the parties might litigate in this cause, and which they might have decided." The soundness of this general doctrine, that a party cannot litigate his rights by piecemeal, is not doubted by us; but it does not reach the real question involved in this case. It is obvious that the Ayuntamiento, being merely the agents of the pueblo, in the language of Mr. Justice Baldwin, "acting under defined and expressly limited powers," could not bind the property in trust by them for community purposes by any act strictly within those powers, either by way of contract, or the mere sufferance of judicial proceedings. Were such the case, the law of corporate power would be made subservient to the adversary will of those in whose hands its temporary exercise is placed. The subsequent judicial proceedings impart no sanctity to the transaction, nor added thereto any validity in law which it did not previously possess. Whatever right or interest the mortgage created and vested in Aram, Belden and Reed, the decree of foreclosure operated upon and subjected to the payment of their debt, but nothing more. The pueblo's interest in the land was unaffected by the mortgage, and nothing passed, it was equally unaffected by the decree and subsequent sale. Parties dealing with the authorities of a municipal corporation are chargeable with full knowledge of their powers, and act at their peril. If the authorities transcend their powers, the act is a nullity, by which the municipality are as much unaffected as if it were the act anger, and it cannot be transformed into a validity except by the will of the sovereign. In all such cases there is involved by a question of power, which lies at the foundation, and if it fails the superstructure must fall with it. We hold, therefore, that all the proceedings, up to and including the Sheriff's sale to Branham and White, were utterly void, and that the interest of the pueblo, and its successor, the city, in the lands in question, were wholly unaffected thereby.

II. We now come to the consideration of the question as to what rights, if any, the trustees, Branham and White, acquired as against the city by virtue of the contract of the 12th June, 1851, executed by and between them of the one part and the Mayor of the city of the other part. That contract, so far as its legal effect upon the title to the pueblo lands is concerned, is a contract of confirmation and release. In terms it confirms unto Branham and White all the rights and interests in said lands which they acquired by their purchase at the Sheriff's sale, and releases unto them all the right and interest which the city then had or might afterwards have there.

Aside from all questions of power in the city government to make the contract, it is ineffectual so far as it attempts to confirm unto Branham and White the rights and interests which they acquired at the Sheriff's sale, for the obvious reason that there was no estate in them upon which the confirmation could operate. Qui confirmat nihil dat. Confirmation may make good a voidable or defeasible estate, but cannot operate upon or aid an estate which is void in law, but only "confirms its invalidity." Confirmatio est nulla, ubi donum precedens est invalidum, et ubi donatio nulla est, nec valebit confirmatio. The only exception to this rule is where the confirmation is the act of the sovereign will. (Comyn's Digest, Vol. 3, p. 139; D. I. p. 10; Blessing v. House, 3 Gill and John. 290.) It was upon this view that the Act of 1858, confirming the so-called "Van Ness Ordinance" was passed, and the validity of that ordinance was upheld in Hart v. Burnett.

For much the same reasons, that part of the contract in which the city authorities attempt to release the title of the city to Branham and White is ineffectual. There was no privity between the city on the one hand and Branham and White on the other; nor had the latter, as we have already seen, any estate or interest whatever in the land, nor had they the possession. There was, therefore, no estate to support the release, or upon which it could operate. "So a release to one who has no estate or right is void, though there may be privity between them" (which is not the case here); "and a tenant in fee makes a feoffment, and afterwards releases the land to another, his seigniorship is not extinct," (Cot. Digest, Vol. 7, p. 222,) because, at the time the release was made, the releasee, having parted with his estate by entering upon another, had no estate to support the release. So a release, unless the releasee is in possession, is void. (Bennett v. Irwin, 3 John. 363.) Under the contract in question, Branham and White occupy the position of confirmees and releasees. The instrument contains no terms of grant, and they acquired thereby no new or further interest or estate in the lands being ceding, as claimed by counsel for appellants, that the city authorities, by virtue of the provisions of the Act incorporating the city, acquired power of absolute disposition over the pueblo lands. Their rights to the lands were, in law, unaffected by the contract of the 12th of June, 1851, and remained the same after the execution of that instrument as they were before. Whether the city government acquired, by the incorporation, greater power of disposition over the pueblo lands lying outside of the city limits than was possessed by its predecessor, the Ayuntamiento—a question which has been ably argued by counsel upon both sides—becomes immaterial in the view which we have taken of the case.

III. Failing of any relief upon the contract of the 12th of June, 1851, plaintiffs next ask that the Sheriff's sale and judgment may be held for naught, and the satisfaction of the judgment against the city and in favor of Aram, Belden and Reed may be set aside, and that they may be subrogated to all the rights of Aram, Belden and Reed, with leave to proceed, by action or otherwise, to collect the judgment.

Branham et al. v. Mayor and Common Council of San José et als.

According to Bouvier, there are three kinds of subrogation: first — that made by the owner of a thing of his own free will; second, for example, when he voluntarily assigns it. Second — that which arises in consequence of the law, even without the consent of the owner; as, for example, when a man pays a debt which could not be properly called his own, but which, nevertheless, it was his interest to pay, or which he might have been compelled to pay for another, the law subrogates him to all the rights of the creditor. Third — that which arises by the act of law, joined to the act of the debtor; as for example, when the debtor borrows money expressly to pay off his debt and with the intention of substituting the lender in the place of the old creditor. It is not easy to perceive how the present case can be brought within either of these definitions.

Up to the time the plaintiffs purchased at the Sheriff's sale, and until the 12th day of June, 1851, about one month after the sale, there had been no treaty or negotiation between them and the city touching the foreclosure sale. There was, so far as appears from the complaint, no understanding between them and the city as to the purchase about to be made, nor were any representations whatever made by the city to induce them to purchase. On the contrary, they acted, so far as appears, entirely upon their own judgment, uninfluenced by any one. They were not asked to purchase by the city or any one else, and no promises were made to them in the way of inducement. They stand, therefore, in the attitude of naked purchasers at a judicial sale.

In the case of Laws v. Thompson, 4 Jones, N. O. 104, it was held that a purchaser at Sheriff's sale who acquired a defective title has no right to take the place of the creditor. In Maryland, it is held that Chancery sales are made subject to all incumbrances and defects, and the rule of caveat emptor applies. In the case of "The Monte Allegre," 9 Wheat. 615, the petitioner claimed to have refunded to him the purchase price of a quantity of tobacco, (which he had purchased at a judicial sale,) because it was rotten and worthless when he bought it, and the defect was unknown to him at the time he purchased. The money which he had paid for the tobacco was still in the hands of the Court and undistributed; nevertheless, the relief was denied, the Court holding "that generally in all judicial sales the rule caveat emptor must necessarily apply from the nature of the transaction." In Arkansas, debts contracted by a steamboat for work, supplies, and materials furnished, are made by statute a lien on the boat to the exclusion of certain other enumerated claims; yet it was held in White v. Levy, 10 Ark. 411, that where a party loaned money to the boat, which was borrowed and actually used for the purpose of paying off such preferred debts, the lender was entitled to be substituted to the rights of the parties whose debts had been thus paid. And in Gadsden v. Brown, Speer Chan. 37, it was broadly declared that the doctrine of subrogation only applies to the case of a payment by a person who has previously holden for the debt. In Sanford v. McLeane, 3 Pa. 122, the Court said: "It is only in cases where the person advancing money to pay the debt of a third party stands in the situation of a surety, or is compelled to pay it to protect his own rights, that a Court of equity substitutes him in the place of the creditor, as a matter of course, without any agreement to that effect. In other cases, the demand of a creditor who is paid with the money of a third party, and without any agreement that the security shall be assigned or kept on for the benefit of such third person, is absolutely extinguished. Such is also the rule of the civil law, although by that law the surety paying the debt is subrogated to the rights of the creditor ipso facto."

Against the plaintiffs' claim to be reimbursed the amount paid by them at the Sheriff's sale, by reason of the failure to obtain the title which they purchased, and their right to maintain this, an independent action therefor, the case of Boggs v. L. L. grave, 16 Cal. 562, seems to be conclusive.

HORACE CARPENTIER v. WILLIAMSON et als.

ON UNDERTAKING ON APPEAL.—If an undertaking on appeal is filed before the notice of appeal is filed and served, the appeal will be dismissed on motion.

APPEAL from the District Court, Third Judicial District,ameda County.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the Court.

W. W. Crane, Jr., for Appellants.

Matterson, Wallace & Stow, for Respondent.

By the Court, SANDERSON, C. J.

The respondent moves to dismiss the appeal in this case upon ground that the same is irregular, and has not been perfected according to law.

It appears that the notice of appeal was filed on the 8th of February, 1864, and was served on the respondent on the 10th day of the same month, and that the undertaking on appeal was filed one day before the service of the notice. The court does not authorize or permit the filing of an undertaking before the service of notice, and hence, until the notice has been filed and served, the undertaking has no office to perform. The present case stands, therefore, as if no undertaking had been filed, and the appeal must be dismissed under the rule laid down in Buffendeau v. Edmondson, 24 Cal. 94.

Mr. Justice SHAFER, having been of counsel, did not sit on the trial of this case.

DAVID S. TERRY v. CHRISTIAN MEGERLE.

LAND GRANTED TO THE STATE—WHEN MAY BE SELECTED.—The State of California has no right to select or locate the five hundred thousand acres of land granted to her for purposes of internal improvement by the eighth section of the act of March 3, 1852, (Public Law No. 23, 30 Stat. 393.)

tion of the Act of Congress of September 4th, 1841, until after the selected have been surveyed and sectionized by the proper officers Federal Government.

SAME—WHEN STATE ACQUIRES TITLE.—No title to any specific part of said grant can vest in the State unless the land has been surveyed, a selection is made of lands to which there is no subsisting valid claim exemption or otherwise, and the selection is made in parcels conforming to sectional divisions and subdivisions of not less than three hundred and twenty acres, and the selection has been approved by the Federal Government.

PRE-EMPTIONERS—RIGHTS OF.—The State can make no valid selection under said Act of land in the possession of a bona fide pre-emptioner under the laws of the United States, nor can it convey any valid title therefrom to another.

STATE PATENT—PRE-EMPTIONER MAY ATTACK.—If the State selects a part of said grant land in the possession of a bona fide pre-emptioner at the time of the selection, the pre-emptioner is in such privity with the source of title that he can attack a patent granted by the State for the land in an action of ejectment brought by the patentee or his assignee.

APPEAL from the District Court, Fifth Judicial District, San Joaquin County.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the Court.

Hall & Scanlker, for Appellant.

The title in fee did not pass to the plaintiff by virtue of his patent from the State of California of January, 1862. The defendant is in privity with the Government of the United States, whose land it was, and thus his status with reference to the premises enables him to assail the patent. (Doll v. Meador, 16 Cal. 295.)

The State of California has not by her legislation manifested any disposition to defeat the wise policy of the Federal pre-emption system, but, on the contrary, in various provisions of her numerous laws affecting the sale or other disposition of land claimed as her own, and derived from the Federal Government, the rights of the Government and of the pre-emptioner under it are recognized and carefully guarded.

This characteristic of State legislation is noticed by the Court in Doll v. Meador, and is observable in the Act of 1852 for the issuance of school land warrants; and as having some bearing on the case in hand, this disposition is unmistakably shown in the positive inhibition of the section of that Act, against the location of warrants "upon lands at the time of such survey and location actually occupied and improved by actual settlers," with a mode of relief to the locator of such excepted land provided by means of floating his warrants. (Sec. 7.)

In the Act of 1857 for patenting of school lands, the patent postponed until a Government survey is had, and application to the Federal authorities, and an affidavit of the non-existence of any adverse claim, are made conditions precedent to the issuance.

By the Act of 1858, the consent and permission of the Register and Receiver must be procured, attended with full proof from the oath of the applicant and others, of the same fact, before the location is to be allowed by the State officers. This Act almost amounts to a legislative declaration, in so many words, of a want of power on the part of the State Government to prescribe any manner of selection of the lands donated under Act of Congress which could or might interfere with the paramount right of adverse claimants under the Federal law. For, what adverse claims can these be which it must be so satisfactorily shown not to exist, before the permission of the Government officers to locate is granted—unless they consist of the adverse claims resting on reservations of the proposed land by the Government or settlers—actual settlers—claiming under it?

Again: the Act of April, 1859, contains significant proofs of a similar deference to the law of the General Government. It provides for the issuance of patents for lands located by warrants under Act of 1852, or by selection, under Act of 1858. It carefully preserves the provision which runs through all its predecessors, of pari materia, and demands that the land shall be of the class "subject to such location," and affected by the Land Office of the United States, and by and with the consent of the Register and Receiver thereof.

But, in a further Act of the same year, authorizing the location of school land warrants on unsurveyed land, there is one express reservation "of the right of persons holding lands under the pre-emption law of the State, or of the United States,"

(Sec. 5,) and forbidding in section seven the location reserved lands of the United States.

This expression of legislative will should be considered fixing the status of the defendant in Court, and as furnishing an assurance of the favor with which Legislatures have always hitherto regarded and may be expected hereafter to regard concession to a beneficiary of the General Government in the Courts of the State of the most liberal rule in the ascertainment of his position in Court to enable him to fully assert and defend his right.

As between the defendant and the Government of the United States, and to the extent of the defendant's quarter section the question of defendant's right is "res judicata," by the decision, three times made, in favor of that right by the highest authorities having power to inquire into and to pass upon that question.

The United States, acting by their appointed officers, exercising final and plenary power over the subject, have recognized the defendant, as to his own land, to have been a lawful possessor from October 2d, 1853, and to have become fully invested with the right to a conveyance in fee, all pre-requisites having been met and price paid. (Barnard's Heirs v. Ashley's Heirs, 18 How. 44, 45; Elliott v. Pearsol, 1 Peters 340; Bird v. Ward, 1 Mo. 398; Isaacs v. Steel, 3 Seam. 9; Perry v. O'Hanlon, 11 Mo. 591.)

Congress has carefully legislated for the protection of the pre-emptor, excepting out of the operation of its patent to the State all lands not embraced by legislative grants, though, in fact, included in the lists. (Act Congress, Aug. 3d, 1859.)

If, then, the right of the defendant attached, it began with the settlement, which was, in both instances, in October, 1853, and the patent, when issued, relates to the date of entry. (Taylor et al. v. Brown, 5 Cranch, 234.)

The land was not subject to the plaintiff's location in 1853, neither by the Donation Act nor our State Act of 1853. These laws direct a selection "of any vacant or unappropriated lands" belonging to the United States and within their State subject to such location."

In determining this question, which is as to the priority of right as between the United States and California, two things should be borne in mind: First — That the State claims as a donee of the liberal Federal bounty, and not as a purchaser for value; and Second — That by the Constitution of the United States the power to regulate and dispose of the public domain rests with the General Government, as proprietor, and that the State has solemnly engaged not to interfere with the exercise of the Federal power of disposal, "and shall pass no law and do no act whereby the title of the United States to and right to dispose of the same shall be impaired or questioned." (See Act of Admission of California, Sec. 3.)

In a contest between a pre-emption claimant on unsurveyed public land, and the locator of a State warrant of the same land, occurring in Louisiana, it was decided by the Department of the Interior that the location of the warrant was invalid, not being upon public land. By reason of the pre-emption claim, the land was not of that public description to which the State is by law confined; that the selection by the State was void, by reason of the prior valid legal right of the pre-emptor. (Vester v. Dinkgrove, Lester's Land Laws, 451-454; Pre-emption Act for California, 1853.)

The State cannot grant what she does not own, and the statutory declaration that the patent shall vest the fee, does not accomplish that result. (Haye v. Swain's Lessee, 5 Md. 247; Vilcox v. Jackson, 13 Peters, 498.)

The States to which five hundred thousand acres of land were given for internal improvements, are not entitled to take any land to which pre-emption rights exist. (Opinion of Attorney-General July 11th, 1842, Vol. 4, p. 71.)

The right to assail the patent for the reason that the land was not the property of the State, and so not subject to the laws authorizing the issuance thereof, is conceded in Winter v. Crommelin, 18 How. 87.

Terry v. Megerle.

Patterson, Wallace & Stow, for Respondent.

David S. Terry, in the location of the warrants in 1854, the agent of the State, and authorized to act for the State that behalf. By the letters patent to him in 1862, issued by the State, he became the vendee and grantee of the State, clothed with just such rights and title as the State has heretofore.

The title of the State of California to the land in controversy accrued to her on the ninth day of September, 1850, the day she was admitted into the Union.

In Doll v. Meador, 16 Cal. 315, Mr. Chief Justice Field speaking of the Act of 1841, says: "Its words are, 'shall be, and hereby is granted,' words which operate to the specific quantity in each new State immediately upon admission into the Union." He proceeds then to enumerate the qualifications and clogs, to which alone this vested title of the new State is subjected, and they are only:

1. The necessity of conforming the location to the public surveys.
2. Reservation of the land by Act of Congress.
3. Reservation of the land by proclamation by the President.

As in the case at bar, it appears from the record that neither the lines of the public surveys, nor Congress, nor the President interfered with the location of the land patented to the respondent. "We do not perceive, either in the language of the patent or the object to be secured, any limitation upon the right of the State to proceed at once to take possession and dispose of the quantity to which she is entitled by the grant." (Id. 315.)

And again, on page 320, the Chief Justice, after setting forth the form and recitals of the State patent to Doll, says: "It is under this patent that the plaintiff claims title to the premises in controversy, and it is clear that if the tract containing them were subject to location as part of the five hundred thousand acres that were not reserved from sale by any law Congress or the proclamation of the President, his claim is good, and a valid title vested in him."

Again: The Statute of California declares (Acts of 1859, p. —, section four) "that such patent (as respondent has had) shall vest in the grantee therein named a good and valid title in fee simple to the lands therein described."

If, indeed, the respondent be not seized of this land, it must be because Acts of the State Legislature, Acts of Congress, and the most solemn and well considered adjudications of the highest judicial tribunal, have exhausted their united efforts in vain.

1. The grant to the State of California, September 9th, A. D. 1850;
2. The actual settlements of respondent's grantors, A. D. 1852;
3. The location of the State land warrants by respondent, A. D. 1854;
4. The filing of that location in the United States Land Office by respondent, A. D. 1856;
5. The patent of the State of California to respondent, A. D. 1862 — United, constitute a title in the respondent rather better than the average of titles upon which recoveries are accustomed to pass in this Court.

The view of this Court, as announced in Doll v. Meador, in reference to the construction of the Act of 1841, operating to vest a present interest in the State, is fully sustained in the case of Richard F. Veeder et al. v. Joshua J. Guffey, 3 Wisconsin, 202. That case involved the construction of an Act of Congress, passed August 8th, 1846, (9 U. S. Statutes at Large, 83,) to grant to the (then future) State of Wisconsin a quantity of land equal to one half of three sections in width, "to be selected under the direction of the Governor of said State, and such selections to be approved by the President of the United States." The State of Wisconsin was admitted into the Union on the 29th day of June, 1848.

The Court say: "At the time of the passage of the Act of the legislature for the disposal of their lands, none of the lands had been selected by the Governor and approved by the President; but the title of the State was as complete as it ever been to the certain quantity of land granted." No further of the United States was necessary, nor was any other act done or performed to vest the fee in the State. The selection by the Governor and the approval by the President were acts of partition only, not of conveyance, applying the reasoning of the Wisconsin case.

The Supreme Court of California, in Doll v. Meador, say: "When the selections and locations are once made, pursuant to her directions, of lands not reserved but subject to location, the general gift of the quantity becomes a particular gift to the specific lands located, vesting in her a perfect absolute title to the same, and that title passes by her patent."

4. Against this legal title of the respondent, perfect vested in him, the appellant confessedly sets up no legal title whatever.

In the action of ejectment the legal title must prevail.

The appellant by his answer does not set up any equitable defense, nor pray any equitable relief. He demands judgment in his favor, and is in this Court insisting upon such a judgment. The claim of the appellant, such as it is, has its origin in a settlement made on the premises in October, 1853. The origin of the title of this State is at least as old as the year 1850. As we have also seen, at that time the State became a tenant in common with the United States Government of the public lands within her limits. The undivided but absolutely vested quantity of land was five hundred thousand acres. She had as early as 1850 a right to locate that quantity as she chose, subject only, as we have seen, to the form of its location, and to reservations by Congress, or by the proclamation of the President. When so located it took effect by relation to the time of the admission of the State into the Union. At that time the pre-emption laws of the United States under which the appellant asserts his acquisition of rights were not extended to California. Any rights which he possesses subsequently acquired, and must be subordinated to such location by the State.

The appellant's counsel urge upon the Court that the State never received a patent from the United States. She never did, for the Act of 1841 is itself a legislative grant to her as determined in Doll v. Meador. Suppose, then, that appellant has a right to attack the respondent's patent, of what avail would such an attack be?

Suppose that appellant has title; it is subordinated to the title of the State, which is older than appellant's asserted title. The counsel states that he seeks to attack this patent on the grounds that the State had no title, for the reason that the land had been reserved by the United States from selections by the State—how or where it was so reserved he does not inform us. But if the doctrine announced in Doll v. Meador be sustained, the appellant cannot attack respondent's patent. The Supreme Court of California in that case say, (page 325): "But if the authority to issue the patent depend upon the existence of particular facts in reference to the condition or location of the property or the performance of certain antecedent acts, and officers have been appointed for the determination of these matters in advance, who have passed upon them, and given their judgment, then the patent, though their judgment of the officers be, in fact, erroneous, cannot be collaterally attacked by parties showing title subsequently." By the Act of the Legislature of 1859, such proceedings are provided for in the State Land Office, and the patent is the result of those proceedings.

These proceedings, authorized by the Legislature, are in fact authorized by the Act of Congress of 1841, (Statutes at Large, 455, Sec. 8,) "the selections of all the said States to be made within their limits respectively, in such manner as the Legislature thereof shall direct."

Here, the Legislature of California made the necessary directions, appointed the officers to determine the facts, and upon termination, the patent is based. The appellant desires in her attack "upon this patent, to show that their officers erred in their judgment," i. e., that there were certain facts or matters which ought to have been differently determined by State authorities; this is the very thing which the case of v. Meador, as we have seen, denies. The appellant contends the condition of this land was such (by reason of his settlement upon it) that a patent ought not to have issued, but the authorities issuing the patent determined otherwise; it was their duty to consider that matter.

Admitting, for the purpose of the argument, that the determination was erroneous, it cannot be collaterally annulled. He says that the fact that all the land was not vacant was the reason why the patent should not issue; if so, the State officers have determined that it was vacant. By the provision of the Act of 1859, p. 339, all the world was made a party to the issuance of patent, and the determination of the facts upon which the patent should issue; process was served by ten and printed notices, "and all persons holding adverse claims may be entitled to appear before the Register and test the application for such patent." If the appellant held adversely and desired to prove that the land was not vacant but occupied by himself, and therefore not properly the subject of a patent, he might then have done so, but not having done so, then he will not be permitted to collaterally assail the patent on the same grounds now, because if the patent could be thus assailed, why did the law require process, etc., before its issuance? It seems, according to the position of the appellant, that everything is left open to inquiry notwithstanding.

But the counsel says that the State has no power to make this regulation providing for a hearing before the Register.

In Doll v. Meador, p. 319, this Court recites this very provision of the statute, and no intimation is given that it involves any excess of authority, and it is of this legislation that the Court say, p. 324: "On the contrary, her legislation on the subject has been eminently beneficent and just."

But the State, in making this regulation, was fixing the manner of making the selections of her five hundred thousand res, which she was authorized to direct the manner of by the Act of Congress of 1841. Nor does the exercise of that power, thus conferred by the Act of 1841, make the State amenable to the charge of "interfering" in the disposal of the public lands, in defiance of the Act of September 9, 1850, admitting her into the Union.

George W. Tyler, for Appellant, in reply.

The counsel for respondent insists that the point argued has been decided in his favor in the cases of Doll v. Meador and Van Valkenburg v. McCloud. This virtually admits that if we are in a situation to attack a patent, then this case must be reversed.

I submit that the only question decided in the case of Doll v. Meador was, that the relation of the defendant in that suit to the title was not such as to allow him to question the validity and efficacy of the patent.

The Court, in speaking to this point, say: "The question here relates to the status of the parties who are permitted to assail the patent." "Can any one who has no other relation to the property sought to be recovered than that of mere possession" (that is to say, a naked trespasser upon the land without any claim of title) "take the position of assailant on that ground?"

It will thus be seen that this Court, in Doll v. Meador, virtually decides that if a party is "invested with the title of honor," or has "some claim of title," he may attack the patent in an action of ejectment.

If the learned counsel contends that a pre-emptioner who has paid for the land and got a certificate of purchase, which is conclusive proof that he has complied with all the requirements of the pre-emption laws, has no "claim of title" under the Government, then his proposition is too absurd to require an answer, and this point is not touched upon in Van Valkenburg v. McCloud.

The Registers and Receivers of districts, and the Commissioner of the General Land Office, and the Secretary of the

Terry v. Megerle.

Interior, are the persons selected by the Government to upon conflicting claims to land, and their decision is conclusive. (16 Ark. 25; 1 Pet. 340; 14 Ill. 343; 13 Ala. 13 Pet. 511; 9 Mo. 183; 16 How. 64; 16 How. 48.) especially is it conclusive when both parties have appeared had a fair hearing.

All the officers above mentioned have passed upon the conflicting claim of plaintiff (who claims under or through State) and defendant (who claims as a pre-emptioner) after hearing of both parties, and they have decided that the land belongs to defendant.

If we are in a condition to attack the patent, as I think has been conclusively shown we are, then it is perfectly competent for us to set up the defense in this suit under our term. (Kittridge v. Breand, 4 Rob. 83; 13 Pet. 436; 13 378, 486.)

The construction of the Act of April 16th, 1859, given it by the Attorney-General of the State, and acted upon the State Register, is this: that he will not allow a pre-emptioner claiming as a pre-emptioner to contest the right of a pre-emptioner claiming under the State in his office. He allows a contest only between parties each of whom claims under the State.

Under that construction, any one whose conscience is sufficiently pliable can get a patent from the State as against a pre-emptioner, no matter how good the latter claim may be.

A pre-emptioner is entitled to equal protection under our law with one who claims by virtue of a patent from the State.

By the Court, SANDESON, C. J.

This is an action of ejectment. The case was tried in the Court below without a jury. The plaintiff had judgment, the defendant appeals. The facts as found by the Court acquiesced in by both parties, and the question to be determined is whether the plaintiff, upon those facts, is entitled to recover the land in controversy.

The findings are as follows: "First—That in January, 1864, the plaintiff obtained from the State of California a pa for the land in controversy, pursuant to the several Acts for the disposal of the five hundred thousand acres of land granted by the United States to the State of California.

"Second—That the plaintiff and those under whom he claims have been in possession by inclosure and cultivation of all the land embraced in said patent, except the forty acres in controversy, since the year 1852, but neither he nor they have ever been in possession of any part of the land sued for.

"Third—That in 1854, after the public lands of which the premises are a part had been divided into townships, and before they had been sectionized, the plaintiff located two school land warrants under the Act of 1852. This location embraced the premises in controversy, and the lands for which the patent issued to him subsequently. The location was made by the County Surveyor of San Joaquin County, by actual survey, and the survey was duly recorded in the San Joaquin County Clerk's office, in November, 1854.

"Fourth—On the 14th day of May, 1856, plaintiff made the location and filed the warrants in the United States Land Office at Marysville.

"Fifth—The defendant, a citizen of the United States, settled upon that portion of the land in controversy, which is a part of the northwest quarter of section twenty-one, in October, 1853, and erected a dwelling house, with intent to secure a pre-emption right to a quarter section under the Acts of Congress of September, 1841, and March, 1853. The land at that time was unsurveyd, and ever since that time defendant has occupied and cultivated that portion of the northwest quarter of said section which is now in controversy.

"Sixth—In the month of May or June, 1855, the land was divided into sections and other legal subdivisions by the United States Government, and the defendant, on the 2d day of October, 1855, filed his declaratory statement for said quarter section in the Land Office at Benicia, to which district the land belonged, the plat or survey of the land not having been entered and filed in said office.

"Seventh—The land in controversy was afterwards transferred to the Marysville District, and the defendant, after return of the approved plat or survey to the Marysville office, filed in that office his declaratory statement, in due form of law, on the 16th day of April, 1856.

"Eighth — In 1860, at the Land Office in Stockton, which district the land then belonged,) the defendant made proof of his settlement and pre-emption, and having made payment for said quarter section, received from the Register and Receiver a certificate of location and purchase of the same in due form of law.

"Ninth — One John H. Megerle, now deceased, and whose heir-at-law and representative is the defendant, in the month of October, 1853, settled upon that portion of the land in controversy embraced in the southwest quarter of said section twenty-one, and erected a house thereon, intending to pre-empt the same under the laws of Congress, the land being unsurveyed public land, and continued to reside on and cultivate the same until 1858, when he died.

"Tenth — The land being sectionized, and the plats returned to the Marysville Land Office, said John H. Megerle, who was yet in life, to wit: on the 16th day of April, 1856, filed at said Marysville office his declaratory statement for a quarter section of land embracing the west half of the south quarter of said section twenty-one, and in April, 1859, payment was made of the entry and settlement of the said John H. Megerle, and of his notice before the proper land officers. The defendant has been thence hitherto ready and willing to make payment therefor.

"Eleventh — The defendant was in possession of the land in controversy, adversely to the plaintiff, at the time this action was brought.

"Twelfth — That the plaintiff, claiming the quarter section of land on which the defendant settled by virtue of his location of said school warrants, did contest the right of the defendant before the officers of the Stockton Land Office to pre-empt the same, and thereupon such proceedings were instituted before the officers of the Government of the United States.

Terry v. Megerle.

the matter of said contest, as that the Secretary of the Interior, on the 9th day of December, 1859, and again on the 14th day of June, 1861, did adjudge and determine that the said defendant had a valid legal right to said quarter section under the pre-emption laws of the United States."

The eighth section of an Act of Congress passed September 8th, 1841, entitled "An Act to appropriate the proceeds of the sales of the public lands, and to grant pre-emption rights," reads as follows:

"SEC. 8. There shall be granted to each State specified in the first section of this Act five hundred thousand acres of land, for purposes of internal improvements; provided, that to each of the said States which has already received grants for said purpose there is hereby granted no more than a quantity of land which shall, together with the amount such State has already received as aforesaid, make five hundred thousand acres; the selections in all of said States to be made within their limits, respectively, in such a manner as the Legislature thereof shall direct, and located in parcels conformably to sectional divisions and subdivisions, of not less than three hundred and twenty acres in any one location, on any public land except such as is or may be reserved from sale by any laws of Congress or proclamation of the President of the United States; which said location may be made at any time after the lands of the United States in said States respectively shall have been surveyed according to existing laws. And there shall be and hereby is granted to each new State that shall be hereafter admitted into the Union, upon such admission, so much land as, including such quantity as may have been granted to such State before its admission and while under a Territorial Government, for purposes of internal improvements, as aforesaid, as shall make five hundred thousand acres of land, to be selected and located as aforesaid."

Under the last clause of the foregoing section, California, upon her admission into the Union, became vested with an interest in the public lands within her borders to the extent of five hundred thousand acres, (having never received any previous grants,) the same, however, to be selected and located in the manner and at the time specified in the immediately preceding part of the section, to which the words at the close of the section "to be selected and located as aforesaid," directly refer. The words "to be selected and located as aforesaid," in our judgment, include both the manner and the time of the selection and location, and not the manner merely, as was held in Doll v. Meador, 16 Cal. 315. The language is not that the land shall be selected in the manner as aforesaid, but "as aforesaid." That portion of the section to which the words "as aforesaid" refer, prescribes not only the manner of the selection, but the time also, and by no rule of construction can it be said that they refer to the one and not to the other. There is no ambiguity in the language used; on the contrary, the meaning is too plain and obvious to admit of doubt. The language is "located as aforesaid," that is to say, in parcels of not less than three hundred and twenty acres, conformably to sectional divisions and subdivisions, and after the survey has been made. This construction is not only justified by the natural and grammatical import and meaning of the language used, but is sustained by the necessities of the subject matter. The land must be located in parcels, conformably to sectional divisions and subdivisions, of not less than three hundred and twenty acres. How can this be done until after the lands have been surveyed by the proper officers of the Federal Government? The grant imposes conditions as to the quantity, manner of selection and location, and time of location, and until it no title to any specific land can vest in the State until all of those conditions have been complied with. The State has no more right to select and locate lands before the survey has been made, than she has to locate it in tracts of a hundred and sixty acres each, or without regard to the sectional divisions and subdivisions of the United States survey. The mode, time, and quantity of the selection and location are fixed by the Act. All else is left to the legislative wisdom of the State. Agents may be appointed by the State for the purpose of selecting

g and locating the land granted to the State, and certifying the same by proper lists to the proper land officers of the Federal Government. But such selections and locations must be made upon lands to which there is no subsisting valid claim, by pre-emption or otherwise, or they cannot be recognized and held as valid by the Federal Government. The approval of the Federal Government must be had before the title of the State can attach to any specific land, and such approval ought to be had and cannot be had where there is a valid subsisting claim, under the laws of Congress, by pre-emption or otherwise, which is attached to the land before the selection is made by the State. This course is made necessary in order to preserve uniformity in the land system of the Federal Government, and enable it to preserve intact its policy toward actual settlers on the public lands. The uniform policy of the Federal Government has been to invite and encourage the settlement of the public lands by a judicious system of pre-emption laws, whereby settlers are enabled to secure the title to the land cultivated and improved by them in preference to all others. A pre-emptioner is as much the favored beneficiary of the Federal Government as a State, and equally entitled to her protection. The unoccupied land is as open to the settlement of the pre-emptioner as to the selection and location of a State, and when he has once placed his foot upon the spot of his choice he cannot be deprived of it by any system of State selection and location, provided he complies with the laws of Congress; nor need he look elsewhere than to the Federal Government for his title. Upon land in the possession of a bona fide pre-emptioner the State can make no valid selection and location, nor can it convey any valid title therein to another. Such land has a prior valid claim upon it and is not subject to State selection. Any other theory would lead to confusion and to Federal and State conflict. So careful is the Federal Government of the rights of pre-emptioners that it is provided that where any settlement, by the erection of a dwelling house or the cultivation of any portion of the land, shall be made upon the sixteenth and thirty-sixth sections granted for the purposes of public schools, other lands be selected by the proper officers of the State in lieu thereof (Act of March 3, 1853, Sec. 7, Wood's Digest, p. 749.)

The sixth section of the Act just cited provides, "that all public lands in the State of California, whether surveyed or unsurveyed, with the exceptions of sections sixteen and thirty-six, which shall be and are hereby granted to the State for the purposes of public schools, in each township, and with the exception of lands appropriated under the authority of the Act, or reserved by competent authority, and excepting the lands claimed under any foreign grant or title, and mineral lands, shall be subject to the pre-emption law of the 4th of September, 1841, with all the exceptions, conditions and limitations therein; except as herein otherwise provided, and shall, after the plats thereof are returned to the office of the Register, be offered for sale, after six months public notice in the State of the time and place of the sale, under the rules, and regulations now governing such sales, or such rules may be hereafter prescribed; provided, that where unsurveyed lands are claimed by pre-emption, the notice of such claim shall be filed within three months after the return of the plats of surveys to the land offices, and payment shall be made prior to the day appointed by the President's proclamation for the commencement of the survey, including the entry of such claims to be made by legal subdivisions, according to the United States survey, and in the compact form."

Under the provisions of this section the defendant proceeded to obtain the title of the United States to the land in controversy. He settled upon it in October, 1853, seven months after the passage of the Act, with the intent to secure the pre-emption right thereto. At that time the land was vacant and unoccupied. He erected a dwelling house thereon, and ever since that time has resided thereon and cultivated the same. In 1854 the land was surveyed and divided into townships, and in 1855 into sections and other legal subdivisions, by the Federal Government. The defendant, wi the time prescribed by the laws of Congress, to wit: on the 14th day of April, 1856, filed in the proper Land Office his declaratory statement, and within the time prescribed made proof of settlement and payment of the purchase money; and, in 1860, obtained from the proper officer a certificate of location and purchase, in due form of law, of the land in controversy.

The plaintiff, on the contrary, sought to obtain title through the State, and under its laws. In 1854, after the land was divided into townships, and before it was divided into sections and other legal subdivisions, and before the plats were returned to the proper office, the plaintiff took his first step toward obtaining his title, by locating two school land warrants pursuant to the provisions of the Act of the State Legislature of 1852. On the 14th day of May, 1856, the plaintiff made his location and filed his warrants in the United States Land Office, and in January, 1862, he obtained a patent from the State for the same land.

Thus it appears that the defendant was in possession as a pre-emptioner before and at the time at which the plaintiff located his warrants; and the declaratory statement of the defendant was on file in the proper Land Office before and at the time the plaintiff entered his location and filed his warrants. It further appears that under these circumstances the plaintiff contested the right and claim of the defendant before the officers of the proper Land Office, and, on appeal to the Secretary of the Interior, a decision was twice rendered against him, and establishing the validity of the defendant's claim; yet, by some means which do not appear, he afterwards, and after the defendant had obtained his certificate of location and purchase from the proper officers of the Federal Government, obtained his patent from the State of California.

Regarding the plaintiff as the agent of the State for the purpose of selecting and locating the land in question, as is claimed by his counsel, and which we concede, he made his selection and location upon land to which the defendant's pre-emption right had already attached. This, as we have already seen, he could not do, and by his acts the State acquires title whatever to the land in controversy, and of course cannot pass none to him by her patent. When two or more persons have settled upon the same quarter sections of land, the right of pre-emption is in him who made the first settlement. (Act of Sept. 4, 1841, Sec. 11.) The State occupies no better position than a bona fide pre-emptioner; and if her selection be subsequent to that of a bona fide pre-emptioner, her right must yield to his.

The only question remaining is, whether under the circumstances of this case the defendant can attack the plaintiff's patent; and upon this point there can be no doubt, if the previous reasoning be correct. By his certificate of location and purchase, the defendant became vested with the title to the land in question, upon which he could maintain and defend an action of ejectment under the laws of this State. (Wood's Dig. p. 1044.) We have also shown that the State acquired no title to the land in question by the acts of her agent, the plaintiff in this case, because, at the time of his location, the land was reserved from selection by the pre-emption laws of the United States, and that therefore the title of the State did not attach to the land in question, and not pass to plaintiff by her patent.

The third section of the Act of the Legislature which authorizes the location of school land warrants, and under which the plaintiff made his location, provides as follows:

"SEC. 3. The parties purchasing such warrants, and their assigns, are hereby authorized in behalf of this State to locate the same upon any vacant and unappropriated lands belonging to the United States within the State of California, subject to such location; but no such location shall be made unless made in conformity to the law of Congress, which law provides that not less than three hundred and twenty acres shall be located in one body."

By necessary implication, the purchaser and his assigns hibited from locating the warrants upon land which is already occupied. We have, therefore, a case where the State issued a patent without having any title to the land, and contrary to the provisions of one of its own statutes.

In Patterson v. Winn, 11 Wheat. 380, the Supreme Court of the United States said: "We may, therefore, assume, as the settled doctrine of this Court, that if a patent is absolutely void upon its face, or the issuing thereof was without authority or was prohibited by statute, or the State had no title, it may be impeached collaterally in a Court of law in an action of ejectment."

The doctrine of Patterson v. Winn is expressly recognized and approved in Doll v. Meador, 16 Cal. 324, and Mr. Chief Justice Field there said: "We admit, in general terms, the correctness of the doctrine declared in Patterson v. Winn to be the settled doctrine of the Supreme Court of the United States, that if a patent be absolutely void upon its face, or be issued without authority, or were prohibited by statute, or the State had no title, it may be impeached collaterally in an action of ejectment." Subsequently, in the same opinion, Mr. Chief Justice Field declares by whom, in such cases, a patent may be impeached, and by whom not, in the following language: "Nor do we question the further proposition, that a defendant might have disproved the evidence of title furnished by the patent, by showing that the land in question was not included in the Act of Congress, or was within the exceptions contained in the Act of this State. We only annex to the proposition the qualification that to do this he must first have brought himself in some privity with the common source of title. If he were a mere intruder, not possessing any claim of title either from the General or State Government, he would not be in a position to question the regularity and correctness of the action of the officers of the State in the selection of the lands and the issuance of the patent."

In the present case, as we have endeavored to show, we have two grounds upon which a patent may be impeached collaterally in an action of ejectment; and a party who, by reason of his privity with the common source of title, status in Court which enables him to question its validity.

The judgment is reversed, and the Court below directed to enter a judgment upon the findings in favor of the defendant.

SHAFTER, J., and SAWYER, J., concurring specially:

We concur in the judgment, and in the opinion except so far as it questions that portion of the opinion in Doll v. M. relating to the time when a location can be made by the State. Upon that question we express no opinion, for the reason that we do not regard it necessary to the decision in this case.

THE PEOPLE ex rel. S. C. HASTINGS v. ANDREW JACKSON AND JOHN DEVLIN.

COMPLAINT—CANCELLATION OF PATENT.—A complaint in an action in the name of The People on the relation of a private individual, to cancel a patent for a tract of land issued by the State to the defendant, which avers that the relator is seized and possessed of the land, and that he was derived from the State of California under and by virtue of the execution of a school warrant made under and in accordance with the provisions of an Act of the Legislature, that said location was duly and properly made, and in all respects according to the provisions of said Act, does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action.

PLEADING—CONDITIONS PRECEDENT.—In pleading title to land, under an Act of the Legislature which prescribes conditions upon the performance of which the title may be secured, it is necessary to aver a performance of the acts required by the statute.

SAME.—A general averment of the performance of conditions precedent is sufficient in cases of contract, but, in all other cases, the facts showing performance must be specially pleaded.

AFFIRMANCE OF JUDGMENT—EFFECT OF.—Where a demurrer to a complaint is sustained in the Court below, and plaintiff declines to amend, and the Court from the judgment and the order sustaining the demurrer, the Supreme Court, if it affirm the judgment, cannot grant plaintiff leave to amend the complaint.

APPEAL from the District Court, Seventh Judicial District, Solano County.

The complaint, besides averring plaintiff's claim of title under a school warrant, also alleged that defendant Jackson claimed under a patent from the State, and the defendant

People v. Jackson et al.

evlin has purchased under him with full notice and knowledge of relator's rights. That defendant Jackson acquired his rights subsequent to the location under which plaintiff claims, and in fraud of relator procured a patent to be issued clandestinely in this, that no notice was given of the application to the State Register for the certificate on which the patent was issued.

The other facts are stated in the opinion of the Court.

Whitman & Wells, for Appellant.

M. A. Wheaton, for Respondent.

By the Court, SANDERSON, C. J.

This is an action in the name of The People of the State of California, on the relation of S. C. Hastings, to set aside and cancel a patent issued by the State of California to the defendant Jackson, for certain lands described in the complaint, under the provisions of the Act of April 16, 1859, entitled "An Act to provide for the issuance of patents to lands located with state school land warrants, and for lands purchased under the act of April 23, A. D. 1858." A demurrer was interposed to the complaint, which was sustained by the Court. The plaintiff having declined to amend his complaint, a final judgment was rendered in favor of the defendants, from which the plaintiff appeals, and assigns as error the ruling of the Court upon the demurrer.

Several grounds of demurrer were alleged in the Court below, but they were all abandoned on the argument in this Court, except the ground that the complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action.

The complaint alleges, in substance, that the relator is seized and possessed, and for ten years last past has been seized and possessed and entitled to the possession of the tract of land described in the complaint. That his title to said land was derived from the State of California, through some grantor not named, under and by virtue of the location of a school warrant made under and in accordance with the provisions of Act of the 3d of May, 1852, entitled "An Act to provide the disposal of the five hundred thousand acres of land granted to this State by Act of Congress, that the people of the State of California may avail themselves of the benefit of the eighth section of the Act of Congress, approved April 4, A. D. 1850, Chapter Sixteen, entitled 'An Act to appropriate the proceeds of the sales of the public lands and to grant pre-emptive rights,' the following provisions are hereby enacted." That said location was duly and properly made, and in all respects according to the provisions of said Act. That the relator by proper conveyance duly executed by the party making said location, succeeded to all the rights of said party in the land in question.

Having alleged title derived from the State under and in virtue of certain statutes, it is necessary for the plaintiff to allege specially a performance by him or his grantor of all the acts required by the provisions of those statutes. An averment that "the location was duly and properly made, and in all respects according to the provisions of said Act," is insufficient. The Act prescribes the conditions upon which the title of the State to the five hundred thousand acres of public lands donated to her by the General Government may be secured. These conditions are conditions precedent, and their performance must be specially averred. It is for the Court, and not the pleader, to say whether those conditions have been complied with. The facts showing such performance must be specially pleaded. The sixtieth section of the Practice Act excuses a statement of the facts showing the performance of conditions precedent in cases of contract, and makes a general averment of performance sufficient. But this rule cannot be extended beyond the cases mentioned in the section. Expressio unius exclusio alterius est. In all cases except contracts, the performance of conditions precedent must be specially pleaded.

This disposes of the appeal, and renders it unnecessary to pass upon the other points made upon the demurrer.

Judgment affirmed.

People v. Jackson et al.

By the Court, SANDERSON, C. J., on petition for rehearing.

A rehearing must be denied. Counsel for appellant seem to apprehend the opinion which has been rendered in this case. They have not passed upon the merits, but merely upon a question of pleading, holding that a general averment of performance of conditions precedent in a complaint is insufficient, except in cases arising out of contract. What must be the status of the relator in order to enable him to attack the defendant's pleading, we have not decided, but we have decided that a general averment that he has such a status is insufficient, and that the facts upon which he bases his right to attack the pleading must be stated. Whether the relator has such a status or not, is a conclusion of law to be drawn from the facts, and is a question for the Court and not the pleader. It will be in error to pass upon the relator's right to attack the defendants' pleading when the facts upon which that right is founded are properly presented.

We are asked to modify our judgment so as to grant the relator leave to amend his complaint. However much we might be disposed to grant the petition in this respect, we are precluded from doing so by the course which counsel saw fit to pursue in the Court below. We can only review the action of the Court below, and if that be found right, the only judgment which we can render is one of affirmance. The relator had leave to amend his complaint in the Court below, but declined to do so—electing to stake his fortune upon the complaint as then stood. Had he asked leave to amend, and had leave to amend been refused, there would have been action on the part of the Court which we could review. As it is, there has been no action in the Court below adverse to the relator's right to amend, and it follows that no action can be had upon the question in this Court.

The application for a rehearing and for a modification of the judgment must be denied.

Mr. Justice CUNRY, having been of counsel, did not sit on the trial of this case.

Crary v. Campbell et al.

MILTON W. CRARY v. THOMAS CAMPBELL, PEYTON POWELL, WILLIAM McCLANAHAN, AND WILLIAM WEED.

SALE OF MINING CLAIM.—Where a mining claim is conveyed by a written bill of sale, the bill of sale is the best evidence of the transfer, and parol evidence of the conveyance is inadmissible.

PAROL EVIDENCE OF SALE.—Where a witness, in his direct examination, testifies to a sale of a mining claim, and on cross examination states that the sale was in writing, it is error for the Court to refuse, on motion, to exclude the parol evidence of the transfer.

JOINT OWNERS — ACT OF ONE ACT OF ALL.—If one of two joint owners of a flume used for mining purposes consents to and directs the opening of a water ditch above the flume, by means whereof the water from the ditch flows over and injures the flume, the other joint owner cannot recover damages for such injury.

EVIDENCE OF DECLARATION OF ONE JOINT OWNER.—If one of two joint owners of a flume used for mining purposes brings an action to recover damages for an injury to the joint property caused by opening a water ditch above the flume, it is error for the Court to reject evidence that the other joint owner gave his consent to having the ditch opened.

APPEAL from the District Court, Eleventh Judicial District, Placer County.

The complaint averred that plaintiff was the owner of a mining claim which he worked by hydraulic process, situated at a short distance below a ditch called the Miner's Ditch; that plaintiff, for the conveyance of tailings and water from the claim, had constructed a flume about seven hundred feet long, leading therefrom; that in January, 1862, defendants William and McClanahan, as agents of defendants Campbell and Powell, who were the owners of the Miners' Ditch, cut the embankment of the ditch, and thereby caused seven hundred inches of water to flow down upon plaintiff's flume, by means whereof the flume was injured.

Plaintiff recovered judgment in the Court below, and defendants appealed.

The other facts are stated in the opinion of the Court.

Charles A. Tuttle, for Appellant.

Jo Hamilton, for Respondent.

Crary v. Campbell et al.

By the Court, CURREY, J.

This action was brought to recover damages alleged to have been caused by the defendants in the cutting away of a ditch called the Miners' Ditch, of which certain of the defendants were the owners, by means of which the waters therefrom were precipitated upon the plaintiff's mining property, causing great injury and damage thereto.

The defendants, after having controverted the material averments of the complaint, alleged in substance, that the Miners' Ditch was located and the right of way for it was acquired prior to the location of plaintiff's mining claim; and they urged that the plaintiff wrongfully and without the consent of the owners of the ditch had, before the time of the happening of the injury, excavated and washed away the soil from below the ditch up to and under it, so as to destroy the same, whereby the owners of the ditch were compelled to build a flume to carry the water over the place thus destroyed; that nevertheless this, the plaintiff continued to wash away the soil, and in consequence of it the earth settled and slid away from the defendants' flume, causing it to sink, when water flowed over upon the plaintiff's claim. The defendants also alleged that at the time the injury occurred and for several days before, there had been an unusually heavy fall of rain, and that to avert the injury threatened by the flood, the defendants, McClanahan and Weed, consulted with plaintiff's managing agents, one of whom was jointly interested with the plaintiff, in respect to the propriety of cutting the Miners' Ditch, and that by the consent and with the assistance of such agents, the ditch was cut at a point a few rods distant from the place where the flume had settled, by means whereof the water was turned down the cañon there; and the defendants averred that this was done to prevent the total ruin of the plaintiff's claim, and that, if it had not been for the previous excavations of the plaintiff, it would not have been necessary to have cut the ditch. This defence to the matters pleaded is necessary for the purpose of presenting to view the points on which the case appears by the records must be decided.

On the trial the plaintiff examined a witness who gave evidence to show that this mining claim was located by certain persons whom he named, before the ditch was constructed. The witness testified that he purchased the claim of those first located it, and took possession of it in the fall of 1861 and continued to hold it until he conveyed the same to the plaintiff and others, and that from that time the plaintiff held it in possession. On his cross-examination the witness testified that, when he purchased, he received a bill of sale for the claim from his vendors, and that when he conveyed to the plaintiff and others, he executed to them a bill of sale of the property. These facts appearing, the counsel for the defendants moved the Court to strike out the testimony of the witness as to his purchase, and also as to his sale and conveyance to plaintiff and others, on the ground that the transfers of property were in writing, which was the best evidence thereof. The Court denied the motion, and the defendants' counsel excepted. This ruling of the Court the appellants assigned as erroneous.

If the facts sought to be proved by this witness were material, as they seem to have been regarded by the parties before the Court, then the bills of sale, which were the best evidence of the transfers, should have been produced. The plaintiff deemed it necessary to connect himself with the right and title acquired by the original locators of his mining claim, and apprehend it was of some importance, at least, that he should do so. But, to do this, it was necessary for him to produce the conveyances or bills of sale, the existence of which was proved. The Court ought to have ordered the parol evidence of the sales and conveyances stricken out, when the application to that end was made.

O. J. Stone was examined as a witness upon the trial, and testified that he and the plaintiff were jointly the owners of the property injured by the opening of the ditch — the plaintiff's interest being seven twelfths and that of the witness remaining five twelfths. The defendants' counsel then offered to prove by him that before the ditch was cut he contacted to it. The evidence was objected to on the ground that it was irrelevant, and inadmissible on the cross-examination, and the objection was sustained, and the defendants excepted. When the plaintiff had rested his case, the defendants called the witness Stone, on their own behalf, and offered to prove by him that two days before the ditch was cut he told the defendant McClanahan "that the flume on the ditch would probably settle, and then to cut the ditch at the cañon where the ditch crosses it." The plaintiff objected to the testimony as irrelevant, and the Court sustained the objection, and the defendants excepted. The appellants also assign this ruling of the Court as erroneous.

If the witness had been permitted to testify, we must presume he would have proved the matters suggested by the offer; and from the circumstances proved it is manifest that the direction of the witness to McClanahan, if given, was dictated by a reasonable appreciation of the dangers that were imminent. The witness was interested in the preservation of the property which he and the plaintiff owned in common, and had the right to adopt such means for its protection from injuries by the flood as the exigencies of the time seemed to require. If the defendants, in compliance with his request, opened the ditch, they ought not to be and cannot on any principle be rendered liable in damages for the injuries that followed. We think the testimony offered was relevant, and that the Court erred by sustaining the objection made thereto.

The judgment is reversed and a new trial ordered.

Noble et al. v. Hook et al.

R. W. NOBLE, AND MARGARET NOBLE v. THOMAS K. HOOK, JOSEPH JONES, R. B. PARKER, CHARLES E. GORHAM.

DECLARATION OF HOMESTEAD.—Homesteads acquired under the Act of 1851, and occupied as such up to the 28th of April, 1860, lose the character of homesteads, and become liable to forced sale on execution, unless the declaration of homestead, provided for in the Act of April 28th, 1860, was made and filed for record on or before the first day of June, 1862.

CONSTITUTIONAL CONSTRUCTION.—The sixth section of the Act of 1862, which makes the failure to make and file for record the declaration of homestead a forfeiture of the homestead right, is not unconstitutional.

APPEAL from the District Court, Fifth Judicial District, San Joaquin County.

The property claimed by plaintiff as a homestead was advertised by the Sheriff to be sold on the 15th day of July, 1863. This suit was brought on the 13th day of July, 1863.

The other facts are stated in the opinion of the Court.

J. B. Hall, for Appellants.

Cobb & Tyler, and Jenkins, for Respondents.

By the Court, SHAFER, J.

The complaint alleges that the plaintiffs intermarried in 1852, and that from that time to the filing of the complaint, July 13th, 1863, R. W. Noble was the owner of the lands described therein; and then proceeds to set forth all the facts necessary to establish a homestead right in said lands, under the Act of 1851. It is further alleged that on the 22d of June, 1862, Joseph Jones recovered a judgment against said R. W. Noble for one thousand eight hundred and sixty dollars and twenty-seven cents, for money lent in 1856 and 1857; that on the same day Parker & Co. also recovered a money judgment against said Noble, for goods sold and delivered in 1862; that executions, issued on said judgments respectively, were delivered to Hook, Sheriff, and that he has exhausted the personal property of said Noble, levied upon the alleged homestead of the plaintiffs, and advertised the said lands for sale for the purpose of satisfying the balances due on the executions respectively. A temporary injunction upon the sale was asked and granted, and on motion made thereafter on the complaint alone the injunction was dissolved. From this order dissolving the injunction the plaintiffs appeal.

Two points are made by the appellants:

First—That the homestead asserted by them under the Act of 1851 has not been lost by their failure to file a homestead declaration under the Act of 1862, for the reason that that Act, when correctly construed, attaches no consequences to such omission prejudicial to the rights of the plaintiffs acquired under the Act of 1851.

Second—That if the Act of 1862 makes the rights of the plaintiffs acquired under the Act of 1851 to depend upon a filing of the declaration referred to, then the Act is unconstitutional and void.

1. The sixth section of the Act of 1862 provides in terms that the homesteads acquired under the Act of 1851, and held by such, by virtue of that Act, on the 28th of April, 1860, shall not be deemed homesteads, or be exempt from forced sale under execution or other legal process, unless the declaration provided for in said Act shall be made and filed for record on or before the first day of June, 1862. The language is so clear and explicit that no occasion for construction is presented. The only distinction between this case and that of Bartholomew v. Hook et al., 23 Cal. 277, so far as the point now presented is concerned, is, that in that case the declaration was filed six days after the time for filing had expired, while in this case the parties have filed no declaration whatever. In the Matter of the Estate of J. L. Reed, 23 Cal. 410, it was held that property could not be deemed or held as homestead where no declaration had been filed within the time limited by the Act of 1862.

2. The objection that the sixth section of the Act of 1862 is unconstitutional and void, as impairing the obligation of contracts, or as divesting vested rights, does not appear to us to be well taken. The constitutional provision that "the Legislature shall protect by law from forced sale a certain portion of the homestead and other property of all heads of families" does not of itself create nor does it vest homestead rights in persons falling within the general description. The section is simply directory to the Legislature. The Legislature, by the Act of 1851, in the exercise of its discretion, determined the extent and value of the homestead, and the mode and manner of protecting it.

By the Acts of 1860 and 1862, the mode of protecting homestead rights created under the Act of 1851, and of creating like rights thereafter and of protecting them when acquired, was so varied as to afford more efficient protection to the rights and more efficient protection also to the community as against it. We consider that the position taken for the appellants in the arguments adduced in support of it are fully met by the decision in Stafford v. Lick, 7 Cal. 479.

The order dissolving the injunction is affirmed.

THE PEOPLE v. SAMUEL CARKHUFF.

EVIDENCE OF DECLARATION OF DECEASED.—C. was indicted for murder. The evidence against him was circumstantial, and to prove that he was a person who committed the murder, at the time of its commission, declarations of the deceased, made several hours previous, that C. expected at the house, were received in evidence. Held, to be erroneous. The declarations did not constitute a part of the res gestæ and as they were not made in extremis, and had no reference to the circumstances of the death.

APPEAL from the District Court, Eleventh Judicial District, Placer County.

S. D. Carkhuff resided about four miles from the City of Sacramento. He was a single man, and his house was situated about eighty rods from the nearest neighbor. The defendant, who was his nephew, lived with him, and there were no other inmates of the house. On the twenty-ninth of December, 1862, defendant went to Sacramento in the early part of

People v. Carkhuff.

v. About two o'clock p. m., deceased, while visiting at the house of Burns, his nearest neighbor, stated that defendant could be home that night. The next morning, about seven o'clock, defendant went to Burns' house and informed him that his uncle was murdered. Burns went with defendant to the house, and found the body of S. D. Carkhuff on the floor of the bedroom. His skull was broken and his throat cut. The weather was cold, and it appeared from the testimony of physicians that the murder must have been committed from seven to ten hours previous. Samuel Carkhuff was indicted for the murder, and in order to prove that he was at the house about the time the murder must have been committed, Burns was allowed to testify to the declarations of deceased made while at Burns' house.

Charles A. Tuttle, for Appellant.

J. G. McCullough, Attorney-General, for Respondent.

By the Court, RHODES, J.

The defendant was indicted and convicted of murder. He assigns several errors, but it will be unnecessary to consider more than one. Burns, a witness for the prosecution, testified, among other things, as follows: "Deceased and I lunched together, about two o'clock p. m.; my wife invited deceased to take supper with us; he declined, saying he must go home to attend to cooking apples; he said, Sam, meaning defendant, could be home that night; that he had gone to the Park to see a favorite officer and witness a review."

The defendant objected to the declarations and conversation of the deceased, because they were irrelevant, were not shown to have been made in extremis, and not made in the presence of the defendant.

All the evidence tending to connect the defendant with the commission of a murder was circumstantial. The deceased was last seen alive at about two o'clock p. m., on Sunday, and his corpse was found at his house between seven and eight o'clock A. M., on Monday, by witness Burns, who was informed of the death of the deceased by the defendant. Burns testified that the defendant, who lived with the deceased, left the house of the witness at eleven o'clock A. M., on Sunday, to return home to water his horses, and from that time till the following morning he was not seen at the house of the deceased. The condition of the body of the deceased, when first seen by Burns, indicated that his death had occurred several hours previously, and it became necessary for the prosecution to show by facts and circumstances, or by some competent person, that the defendant had been at his house some time during the night, and several hours previous to seven o'clock, A. M., on Monday morning. The defendant was shown to have been in Sacramento, about four miles from the house of the deceased, on Sunday evening.

The only object of the prosecution in offering in evidence the declaration of the deceased that the defendant would not return at home on Sunday night, was to enable the jury to presume from the fact that the deceased expected the defendant to return that night, that he did so return, and was there at the time of the commission of the murder. It is impossible to conceive upon what theory that declaration was admissible. If the declaration had been made to the witness by any other person it would not be contended that it was admissible in evidence, for evidently it would be obnoxious to the objection that it was hearsay testimony.

The fact that the declaration was made by the deceased does not tend to remove the objection, for the declaration of the deceased are permitted to be proven in the single instance when they are made in extremis, and have reference to the circumstances of the death, unless the declaration constitutes a part of the res gestæ, or can be classed with declarations against interest, etc. (1 Greenleaf Ev., Sec. 156.)

It was not admissible as a part of the res gestæ, for it does not constitute one of the circumstances surrounding the murder. The expectation of the deceased that the defendant would return, and that, too, unsupported by any evidence the reasons for his expectations, did not even tend to prove any fact connected with the murder. The expectation may have been without any foundation; may have been merely a surmise arising from the defendant's usual habits. His expectation or declaration that the defendant would return at the time stated would possess no more legal value as evidence to prove the fact that he did return, than would the expectation of his neighbor, Burns, that the defendant would return at the given time.

Upon this question the Attorney-General cites Kirby v. The State, 7 Yerger, 259, in which it was proved by a witness that the deceased had told him that he and the defendant were going to Pine Mountain to look for a saltpetre cave; that afterwards he told him that they had searched for the cave, but had not found it, and that they (the deceased and the defendant) were soon going again in search of it. The last conversation took place shortly before the deceased was found murdered on Pine Mountain. The Court held that the Court below erred in admitting the testimony of the witness as to what the deceased said about the defendant's intention to accompany him to Pine Mountain; that it did not prove any act done by the defendant, but left the matter depending upon a mere contingency, and, at the most, expressed but an intention that was liable to be changed at any time; and that, as the defendant was not present at the conversation, the declaration did not constitute a part of the res gestæ, and was inadmissible.

It is unnecessary as well as improper to examine the testimony to ascertain whether there was sufficient evidence, aside from the declaration of the deceased, to warrant the jury in finding the defendant guilty; for the declaration of the deceased, upon its admission by the Court as legal and competent testimony, tended to prove the presence of the defendant at the house of the deceased on the night of the murder, and that may have been the evidence that mainly satisfied the jury that he was present at that time.

The judgment is reversed and the cause remanded for a new trial.

Minturn v. Brower et al.

EDWARD MINTURN v. JOHN D. BROWER AND JOHN HOWLETT.

TREATY OF GUADALUPE HIDALGO.—Mexicans, who, previous to the acquisition of California by the United States, were established in and had acquired from the Governments of either Spain or Mexico a perfect title to lands in California, and who chose to remain in California, were, by the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo, protected in the ownership and enjoyment of the land the same as though no change of sovereignty had taken place.

MEXICAN GRANTS — AS TO CONFIRMATION.—Mexicans, whose titles to lands by grant from Mexico or Spain were perfect at the time of the acquisition of California by the United States, were not compelled to submit them for confirmation to the Board of Commissioners appointed under the Act of Congress of March 8d, 1851, nor did they forfeit their lands to the Government by a failure to present their claims for confirmation.

PERFECT TITLES.—The titles of such persons to their lands, which were perfect at the time of the acquisition of California by the United States, remained as valid under the new Government as they were under the old; and without having been presented to the Board of Commissioners for confirmation, may be asserted and maintained in the Courts of the country.

INCHOATE TITLES.—Where the titles to lands in California were inchoate and imperfect at the date of the treaty, it was necessary to submit them to the Board of Commissioners for confirmation within the time prescribed by the Act of Congress of March 8d, 1851, otherwise they became forfeited; and from that time such lands were deemed, held, and considered as part of the public domain of the United States.

PERFECT TITLES MIGHT BE SUBMITTED OR NOT.—Holders of titles to lands which were perfect at the date of the treaty, could, if they so elected, submit them to be passed upon by the Commissioners, but were not bound to do so.

EFFECT OF TREATY ON TITLES.—The provisions of the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo operated as a confirmation in present of all perfect titles to lands in California held under Spanish or Mexican grants made prior to its ratification. P., a Mexican citizen, residing in California, had, at the time of its acquisition by the United States, a perfect title to a tract of land in California, granted to him by Spain in 1820. In 1851 he died intestate, leaving him surviving sons and daughters. The sons, claiming severally distinct portions of such tract by devise of their father, as they alleged, presented to the Board of Commissioners their respective claims to such portions of the land for confirmation, and the same was confirmed and patented to them as severally claimed. The daughters were not parties to the petition presented to the Board, nor to the confirmations, nor to the patents issued. The plaintiff, who had succeeded to the title and interest of one of the sons by grant of a distinct parcel of the portion of the land confirmed and patented to him, brought ejectment against the defendants, who had succeeded by grant to the title and interest of the daughters in and to the same parcel of land. Held, that upon these facts, which were pleaded by the defendants, and admitted by the plaintiff to be true, the Court erred in giving judgment for the plaintiff.

APPEAL from the Third Judicial District, Alameda County.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the Court.

H. K. W. Clarke, for Appellants.

The Court below should have allowed defendants' evidence support of their title and right of possession.

What was it? Why, substantially, that the land plaintiff sought to recover had been, previous to 1820, subject to disposition by the Spanish Government, a former proprietor and ruler of the country; that in that year it was granted by the then proprietor, in full and absolute property, to one Luis Pelalta; that the latter was its owner and possessor for thirty years and upwards, until his death in 1851; and in the latter year he died intestate, leaving sons and daughters, and descendants of a deceased daughter, as his heirs and the inheritors of his estate; and that from a portion of these defendants deraigned title and right to the premises in question by direct mesne conveyances, and that defendants were in possession under and through the right thus acquired.

Why was it improper to allow this means of defense? The learned Court below answered, because the sovereign of the country, the Mexican Government—not the proprietor of the land—in 1848 had, by treaty, ceded its sovereignty over the country to the Government of the United States, and that the latter Government having, through Congressional legislation, established a tribunal to ascertain and settle private land claims in the ceded territory, to which all were invited, and to which resort had been had by one only of said sons and heirs, who had obtained, in a proceeding to which himself and the United States alone were parties, a decree of confirmation in his own favor of the entire granted estate, and to the exclusion, who were unheard and unnamed, of its other inheritors, through whom defendants claimed and derived their rights.

Was the Rancho of San Antonio, granted in fee to Luis Pelalta thirty years ago by its then proprietor, and remaining in his uncontrolled possession from the date of the grant until 1851, the time of his death, property belonging to the United States? If not, how could it have been disposed by or in virtue of an Act of Congressional legislation?

That it was the private property in fee simple and by perfect title of Luis Peralta at his death, and thence vested, not in A. M. Peralta, one of his heirs, but in him and others as tenants in common, through whom defendants derived, was the very thing the offered evidence would have shown.

The Act of Congress of 3d March, 1851, could not effect a change of proprietorship in and to perfect legal titles to lands vested in private individuals, under the laws of the former sovereign, nor was it so intended. This is not only manifest from a want of power to do so, but, in addition, it is unmistakably expressed by the words of its fifteenth section.

A treaty of cession is a deed or grant of one sovereign to another, and transfers nothing in which he had no right of property—and only such rights pass as he owned and could convey to the grantee.

By the treaty of Hidalgo, the United States acquired no lands in California to which any person had lawfully obtained such a right by perfect title.

Congress cannot constitutionally, by a mere enactment, deprive a citizen of his lawful estate; and if it should attempt it, this Court would not sustain such a spoliation act. (United States v. Perchman, 7 Peters, 87.)

The United States never had any title to the premises in controversy. It has been often decided: "That a patent is absolutely void and inoperative, where the State granting it has no title to the thing granted." This may be shown in an action at law. (Stoddard et al. v. Chambers, 2 How. 284–318; 9 Cranch, 99; 4 Cranch, 652; 5 Wheat. 293; 11 Wheat. 384; Rice v. Railroad Co., 1 Black, 375; Kyle & Thompson v. Tubbs, 23 Cal.)

The defendants hold under an independent title that arose prior to the acquisition of the country by the United States, and are third persons within the meaning of the fifteenth section of the Act of 3d March, 1851. (Waterman v. Smith, 13 al. 420; Biddle Boggs v. Merced Mining Co., 14 Cal. 362; Leese v. Clark, 20 Cal. 423-425.)

But, independently of this fifteenth section, the defendants are protected by the law of nations, treaty stipulations, and constitutional guarantees. (See Constitution, Treaty with Mexico, and United States v. Perchman, 7 Peters, 86, 87.)

In the Court below, it was urged that Estrada v. Murphy, 9 Cal. 248, and Lockwood v. Clark, 21 Cal. 220, had virtually decided that the action of the United States tribunals, under the Act of 3d March, 1851, on the subject discussed under this head of our brief, was conclusive.

This is incorrect. Both those cases were where Mexican grants had been confirmed on imperfect or equitable titles. In this, the title was perfect, and needed no confirmation through an Act of Congress or judicial decree. In those cases, before confirmation the legal title was in the Government. It could not, in the matter of confirmation or rejection, as it thought fit. The fee was subject to its disposition, and having disposed of its action was conclusive.

Where two or more persons have an equitable right to the same land, the fee of which is, before confirmation, in the Government, and a disposition of the fee is made to one to the exclusion of the other, it is not doubted, however wrongful such disposition may be, it is conclusive until it is set aside. But, not so as in the case here, where the title in fee was vested in individuals, and not subject to the disposition of the Government.

E. W. F. Sloan, for Respondent.

It is assumed that Luis Peralta was, in his lifetime, vested with a perfect title to the Rancho de San Antonio, and it is argued that a claim of that character need not be presented for confirmation to the Board of Commissioners. That the Act of Congress makes no distinction between perfect and imperfect or inchoate grants, is too obvious to admit of controversy; consequently the power of Congress to enact the law is disputed. If the Act of Congress is void, so far as by its terms it is applicable to perfect legal titles, it must be because it is in violation of the Federal Constitution, or is contrary to common right. I deny that it is either the one or the other.

Minturn v. Brower et al.

Article IV, section 3, of the Constitution of the United States, provides that "The Congress shall have power to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property belonging to the United States."

The State of California was "admitted into the Union upon the express condition that the people of said State, through their Legislature or otherwise, should never interfere with the primary disposal of the public lands within its limits."

Upon Congress, therefore, devolves the sole power of providing for the primary disposition of the public lands of the United States. The exercise of that power necessarily includes the means of ascertaining what is and what is not public land. The Government can see and act only through its officers and agents.

At the time of the passage of the Act in question, a vast territory had recently been annexed to the United States. This territory was then but sparsely populated, yet it was correctly supposed that portions of it had become private property. In order to facilitate the orderly settlement of this territory, and the development of its ample resources, it became necessary for Congress to exercise the powers mentioned; to cause surveys to be made; to establish Land Offices; to constitute and appoint Registers and Receivers; to provide for sales, entries, and the issuance of patents. But before proceeding to dispose of the public lands, it was obviously requisite that such portions as had become private property should be ascertained and clearly defined, through the medium of official agents.

It is evident that officers, appointed for that purpose, must either proceed upon an inspection of such record evidence or other proof as they might be able to procure unaided by claimants, or the latter must have an opportunity to be heard.

The Act of Congress secured to each claimant a patent and impartial hearing. A tribunal was specially appointed for the purpose. Ample time was given for the presentation of claims; and still further time was given for the introduction of proof in support of such claims. In case of a rejection by the Board of Commissioners, an appeal was allowed to the District Court of the United States, where additional evidence could be introduced, with the privilege of again appealing to the Supreme Court. The Surveyor-General was authorized and directed to cause accurate surveys to be made of all lands the claims to which should be finally confirmed; and patents therefor were directed to be issued to the respective confirmees. Thus, lands justly claimed to be private property, whether by titles perfect or imperfect, were rendered potentially secure against adverse titles from the Government of the United States.

It is impossible for Congress to have devised means more adequate to accomplish the end in view. A higher purpose could scarcely have claimed the attention of the national Legislature.

If it is the duty of the Government to respect private rights which depend on imperfect grants, a fortiori, is it bound to protect those in the enjoyment of their property who hold lands by perfect titles?

"The Government which has a right to do an act, and has imposed on it the duty of performing that act, must, according to the dictates of reason, be allowed to select the means." Per Mr. Chief Justice Marshall, in M'Culloch v. State of Maryland, 4 Wheat. 409, 410.)

A mere glance at the existing state of things in the acquired territory will disclose the necessity of Congressional action.

A few grants of land had been made by the Spanish Government; a greater number by that of Mexico. These grants had never been regularly surveyed. Rude diseños, intended to delineate some of the natural features of the lands of which grants had been solicited were, indeed, to be found in the archives; but even these were wanting in some expedientes.

Archive evidence consisted of petitions—with or without diseños—consultations, orders of reference, informations, correspondence, prohibitions, licenses, orders of concessions, etc., and all in a foreign language. Diseños generally represented a larger tract of land than was granted. Often, two or more diseños represented, in part, the same parcel of land. A sobranted clause was to be found in almost every título.

The giving of juridical possession—the last step in completing the title under the Mexican system—was performed by local officers, who retained in their own possession the record of their proceedings. The boundaries intended thereby to be fixed were generally so imperfectly described as to be uncertain.

Under the colonization system of Mexico, grants of land could only be made in writing, so that some sort of record evidence was supposed generally to be found; but it seems they might have been made orally, with livery, according to the Spanish system.

In such state of circumstances, it is not difficult to perceive how liable the Surveyor-General would have been to overlook even perfect grants, survey the lands included by them, and return the same as parts of the public domain of the United States.

An entry of the same land by strangers, and the issuance of patents, would naturally succeed, to terminate at last in litigious strife between the patentees and the original claimants. In such litigation it would be necessary for the latter to maintain their respective rights before juries—often prejudiced in favor of patentees; and to do so with a promptitude not required in the proceedings prescribed by the Act of Congress.

That Act confers, therefore, a special favor on all bona fide claimants of land under Spanish or Mexican grants. It provides for the confirmation of all just titles. It secures to the confirmees indisputable evidence of their respective rights in a form at once certain, compact, and convenient. It protects them against adverse grants from the United States. No other erty was imposed upon claimants except that of presenting their respective claims, with the evidence upon which they were founded, within the time limited. There was a public necessity for the limitation. Whilst ample time was allowed for the presentation and establishment of all just claims, a restraint was placed upon the fabrication of false claims to an definite extent.

Can such an Act be charged with producing the confiscation of private property? An ordinary Statute of Limitations operates upon the remedy only, but in barring the remedy it then puts an end to the right. Such a law, however, even here enacted in reference to past transactions, has always been upheld by Courts, provided a reasonable time be given for the exercise of the remedy. (Call v. Hagger, 8 Mass. 429; Brother v. Lucas, 12 Peters, 447.)

"Acts of Limitation," says Mr. Chief Justice Marshall, "defeat a contract once obligatory, and may, therefore, be supposed to partake of the character of laws which impair the obligation of contracts. But a partial view of the subject will show us that the two laws stand upon distinct principles

* *. In prescribing the evidence which shall be received in its Courts, and the effect of that evidence, the State is exercising its acknowledged powers. It is likewise in the exercise of its legitimate powers when it is regulating the remedy and mode of proceeding in its Courts." (Ogden v. Saunders, 12 Wheat. 348, 349.)

It is unquestionably within the scope of ordinary legislative power, without destroying the right, to prescribe a period within which that right shall be asserted in Courts of justice. It is alike in harmony with the dictates of private justice and public policy to prescribe such limitation.

The law in question is not the result of State legislation, and is, therefore, not directly within the restriction imposed by the Federal Constitution against the passage by States of laws which impair the obligation of contracts. The principle upon which that prohibition rests, however, lies at the foundation of all proper legislation. The same may be said with regard to the prohibition of ex post facto laws. These, and all similar restraints contained in the Constitution of the United States, were deemed sufficient to prevent the States from going beyond the limits of wholesome, legitimate legislation. They indicate what the most liberal and enlightened statesmen and jurists have regarded as the true limits of legislative power, beyond which it could not properly extend, but within which its exercise could be safely intrusted to that branch of government in which it was vested.

An Act of the Legislature of Pennsylvania, which declared valid the deed of a married woman, which was invalid before for want of a proper acknowledgment, was held to be free from constitutional objections, and of obligatory force, although the effect was to divest the right of the heirs.

"It is clear," says Mr. Justice Story, in a case in the Supreme Court of the United States arising under that Act, "that this Court has no right to pronounce an Act of the State Legislature void as contrary to the Constitution of the United States from the mere fact that it divests vested rights of property. The Constitution of the United States does not prohibit the States from passing retrospective laws generally, but only ex post facto laws." (Watson v. Mercer, 8 Peters, 110.)

Where Congress has legislative power over the subject matter, must it not be, as to that matter, equally extensive? The enactment in question, however, does not undertake to divest any settled right of property; but, on the contrary, to provide for its greater security. In doing so, it is true, it has imposed terms upon the claimant of the right; it requires reasonable activity on his part within a limited period, which he cannot safely refrain from exercising. But, has such legislation ever been condemned by jurists as contrary to common right or unjustly oppressive? Has it, when dictated by considerations of public policy, ever failed to receive the most unqualified judicial approbation? "It cannot be doubted," says Judge Martin, "that the title, or rights acquired under a contract, cannot be modified or affected by any subsequent of the Legislature; but the means of enforcing such rights and protecting such titles—in other words, the remedy provided by law to insure the enjoyment of such rights and titles—is always in the power of the Legislature, who may extend or restrict it as circumstance may require.” (Patin et al. v. Prejean, 7 La. 306.)

As heretofore suggested, a perfect title to land may have been derived from the crown of Spain without any writing whatever. The holder of such title would, of necessity, be compelled at all times to rely on the precarious security of oral evidence for its protection, unless the Government afforded him the means of procuring incontestable evidence thereof, of permanent character, by record and letters patent. Could he justly complain of a law of the United States which provides the means for that purpose, which imposes no terms other than the submission of his claim, with proof of his right, within a reasonable period? A statute which should directly declare such a title null and void might be justly condemned; but the Act of Congress does nothing of the kind.

It is said, however, that a party owning property by a perfect legal title should be permitted to assert his right thereto in any Court of law, without the necessity of taking any positive steps in reference to it which were not required by the law existing at the time the property was first acquired: that the imposition of such necessity, or of any terms or conditions whatever, is beyond the legislative power of any free and enlightened government. If so, our Legislatures have been in the habit of indulging, and our Courts of sanctioning the exercise of despotic power.

The Act of the Legislature of this State, approved April 10, 1863, (Chap. 365,) which imposes upon litigants the taking and subscribing of an expurgatory oath as a condition upon which alone they shall be allowed to prosecute or defend their rights in Courts of justice, has been judicially sustained.

Statutes of the State of New York, similar in the principle of their operation, were passed respectively January 8, 1794, and March 24, 1797. Those statutes have been approved and enforced, both in the State and Federal Courts. (Jackson v. Harrington, 6 Cow. 137, 139; Jackson v. Lamphire, 3 Peters, 289, 290.)

They operated upon deeds of conveyance already executed, and by virtue of which perfect legal titles to real estate have been acquired. They compelled the holders of these deeds to register and lodge them in a particular office, on or before a given day, upon peril of not being entitled to read them in evidence in support of such titles.

The Act of Congress, like the statutes last referred to, does not vacate or annul any grants of land; but, on considerations of public policy and private right, prescribe a convenient remedy by which those grants might be permanently established, and the property thereon dependent rendered perfectly secure.

A large majority of those who claimed the ownership of lands in California at the date of the conquest were not vested with titles definitively valid; in few instances had concessions been approved by the Departmental Assembly or Territorial Deputation, and still more rarely had juridical possession been given. And though the fee may be regarded as having passed to the United States by the transfer of the territory, yet it was subject to the equitable rights of those grantees; and it devolved on this Government to complete that which would have been accomplished by the former sovereign but for the change.

So far as the enactment in question applies to claims of that character, no complaint seems to be made. The Government of the United States was bound alike by treaty stipulations, by the law of nations, and by national honor, to recognize and respect all just rights of property, although depending on inchoate grants. Why, then, does not the objection extend to the statute in toto? The true reason is to be found in the obvious fact that it does not confiscate private property, or invade private rights in any sense.

By the Court, CURREY, J.

Minturn v. Brewer et al.

This is an action of ejectment brought to recover the possession of a specific part of the "Encinal of San Antonio," which is a portion of a larger tract of land called the "Rancho de San Antonio," situated in the County of Alameda. The plaintiff claims title to the demanded premises under Antonio Maria Peralta, one of the sons of Luis Peralta, deceased. The defendants claim title to five ninths of the same premises, derived by conveyances from the daughters and certain grandchildren of the same ancestor. Luis Peralta died in 1851, leaving him surviving four sons and four daughters, and the children of a deceased daughter, as his heirs at law.

After the cause was at issue upon the complaint and the answers first made and filed by the defendants, each of the defendants, by leave of the Court, amended his answer by adding thereto a further defense, alleging that the demanded premises was a part of the "Rancho de San Antonio," granted in or about the year 1820, by the Spanish Government to the said Luis Peralta, who died intestate in August, 1851, leaving him surviving children and grandchildren as his heirs at law; and that when he died he was seized in fee and possessed of the lands in controversy. That in 1852 the decedent's sons presented to the Board of Land Commissioners appointed under the Act of Congress of March 3, 1851, the title to said rancho for confirmation, and that the same was confirmed first by the Commissioners and afterward by the United States District Court, as good and valid. That these sons, in fraud of the rights of the other heirs, by the use of a simulated, false, and fraudulent document, purporting to be the last will and testament of the deceased, which was never proved nor admitted to probate, procured a confirmation of said rancho in parcels to themselves, and that the portion embracing the demanded premises was confirmed in the name of Antonio Maria Peralta. That the facts as to the means by which the confirmation was thus obtained were fully known to the plaintiff and his grantors at and before they or either of them acquired any claim or interest in the land. The amended answers also show that each of the defendants had succeeded to whatever rights and interests the daughters and grandchildren of Luis Peralta had in the parcels of land of which the defendants respectively had the possession long before the action was commenced. And in conclusion they pray that plaintiff be compelled to release to the defendants respectively any right in the premises in controversy that he may wrongfully have acquired by the confirmation, and for general relief.

To the amended answers the plaintiff demurred on the grounds: First—That the same did not state facts sufficient to constitute a defense to the action, or to entitle them to relief in equity. Second—That it appeared by the amended answers that there were devisees and heirs at law of Luis Peralta who were indispensable parties, but who were not made parties thereto. Third—That more than three years had elapsed since the commission of the alleged fraudulent acts mentioned in the amended answers. Fourth—That more than four years had elapsed since the alleged cause of equitable relief accrued.

The Court sustained the demurrer, and the defendants excepted.

At the trial it appeared on the part of the plaintiff, that in 1852 Antonio Maria Peralta applied, under the Act of Congress passed on the third of March, 1851, entitled "An Act to ascertain and settle private land claims in the State of California," for the confirmation to him of a certain and specific part of the "Rancho de San Antonio," embracing the land in controversy; and such proceedings were had concerning the matter that his claim thereto was finally confirmed by the proper authorities of the United States as a valid claim, and afterwards a survey was made of the land by the Surveyor-General of the United States for California, which was approved by the United States District Court.

After the plaintiff had produced further evidence in the case and had rested, the defendants, for the purpose of showing that the daughters of Luis Peralta, deceased, through whom they respectively claimed, had a perfect legal title to an undi-

ded share and interest in the demanded premises by descent est, offered in evidence duly certified copies of certain docu-ents which were in the archives of the office of the Surveyor-general of the United States for California, which are set forth the transcript of the record in this case. This documenry evidence is the same that was before the Supreme Court the United States in the case of The United States v. Peralta, How. 344, and is conceded to establish that the title of Luis Peralta to the Rancho de San Antonio was a grant in fee to a specific tract of land.

And the defendants further offered to prove that Don Luis Peralta, the grantee of the lands of "San Antonio," died in-state in the year 1851, seized of said lands, and that he left surviving him four sons and four daughters, and the children a deceased daughter, all of whose names are mentioned; and following this, the defendants offered in evidence deeds conveyance duly acknowledged and recorded, by which they succeeded to all the right, title, and interest which the daughters and grandchildren of Luis Peralta acquired in and to the demanded premises upon the death of their ancestor.

The counsel for the plaintiff objected to the evidence so offered and to every part of it, and the objection was sustained by the Court. To this ruling the defendants' counsel duly accepted.

In reviewing this case we shall first consider the question presented by the exception to the ruling of the Court in excluding the evidence offered on the part of the defendants. It is a question of great importance and of more than ordinary interest. It involves a determination of the force and effect of a final confirmation and approved survey under the Act of Congress on the one hand, and the rights of those having perfect titles to lands in California when this territory was ceded by Mexico to the United States, who have omitted to submit them to be adjudicated upon, as indicated by the Act of Congress of 1851, on the other.

It is maintained on the part of the appellants that Luis Peralta acquired from the Government of Spain, while the province of California belonged to that nation, a perfect title, or in the language of common law, a title in fee simple, to the "Rancho de San Antonio," and that this title was subsisting and indefeasible when California was acquired by the United States; and the counsel for the respondent concedes the fact so to be, but contends, notwithstanding this, that the United States in its sovereign and governmental capacity had the right, in order to ascertain the extent and limits of its own lands, to require the owners of private land claims in this State, whether by perfect or imperfect titles, to present them for adjudication to the Commissioners and the Courts appointed for the purpose of passing upon their validity, and to declare, as a consequence of an omission to comply with this requirement within the time specified, that such lands "shall be deemed, held, and considered as part of the public domain of the United States."

At the time of the ratification of the treaty entered into between the United States and Mexico, by which the former nation acquired California, it must be presumed it was well known to the high contracting parties that portions of the ceded territory had become the property of individuals, and though it may not have been necessary under the circumstances of the acquisition to have provided by treaty stipulations for the protection of private property, still it was deemed but just to place the subject beyond the questioning of those who claim for conquering nations unlimited powers over and respecting the property of the citizens of the conquered country, and hence we may suppose the Mexican nation, with a deep solicitude for the welfare of its citizens who were then residents of the territories about to be ceded to the United States, proposed the VIIIth and IXth Articles of the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo, and that the justness of the provisions therein contained was freely acknowledged and agreed to on the part of the Government of the United States in the creation of this solemn compact.

The portion of the VIIIth Article of the treaty which paricularly bears upon the question under consideration is as follows:

"Mexicans now established in territories previously belonging to Mexico, and which remain for the future within the limits of the United States, as defined by the present treaty, shall be free to continue where they now reside, or to remove at any time to the Mexican Republic, retaining the property which they possess in the said territories, or disposing thereof and removing the proceeds wherever they please without their being subjected on this account to any contribution, tax, or charge whatever."

By the IXth Article, the same care was manifested for securing the rights of Mexicans who might, in consequence of the transfer of the dominion and property of the territories about to be ceded, lose the character of citizens of the Mexican Republic before they were admitted "to the enjoyment of all the rights of citizens of the United States according to the principles of the Constitution." It was therefore stipulated that during the contemplated interval such Mexicans "shall be maintained and protected in the free enjoyment of their liberty and property, and secured in the free exercise of their religion without restriction."

That it was intended by the treaty that Mexicans then established in California, and having property therein, should retain and enjoy it or dispose of it as to them might seem proper, the language of the treaty places beyond controversy.

Then, did the Congress of the United States intend, by the Act of March 8d, 1851, to compel persons of the class mentioned in the treaty, who at that time held lands in possession of perfect titles derived from the source of paramount proprietorship, to submit them to the Board of Commissioners appointed under that Act, or else to forfeit their lands to the Government?

In Strother v. Lucas, 12 Peters, 438, the Supreme Court of the United States said, that "in following the course of the law this Court has declared that even in cases of conquest the conqueror does no more than displace the sovereign and assume dominion over the country." And in Perchman's Case, 7 Peters, 86, Mr. Chief Justice Marshall said: "A cession of territory is never understood to be a cession of the property of its inhabitants. The King cedes only that which belongs to him; lands he had previously granted were not his to cede. Neither party could so understand the treaty; neither party could consider itself as attempting a wrong to individuals condemned by the whole civilized world." And in Strother v. Lucas, Mr. Justice Baldwin said: "No construction of a treaty which would impair that security to private property which the laws and usages of nations would, without express stipulation, have conferred, would seem to be admissible further than its positive words require * * *. Without it, the titles of individuals would remain as valid under the new Government as they were under the old; and those titles, so far at least as they are consummate, might be asserted in the Courts of the United States, independently of the treaty stipulation." (12 Peters, 438; 7 Peters, 88; 9 Peters, 133 and 734.) Treaties, like the Constitution itself, are declared by that instrument to be the supreme law of the land. (Article VI.) The treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo, as we have already seen, stipulates that Mexicans established in the territories then thereby ceded, might retain the property which they possessed, or dispose of it if they elected so to do; that they should be maintained and protected in the free enjoyment of their liberty and property without restriction.

The law deems every man to be in the legal seizin and possession of land to which he has a perfect and complete title; this seizin and possession is co-extensive with his right, and continues until he is ousted thereof by an actual adverse possession. This is a settled principle of the common law. (United States v. Arredondo, 6 Peters, 743; Mitchel v. United States, 9 Peters, 734.)

The cases of Arredondo and Perchman involved the construction of the treaty between Spain and the United States, by which Florida was ceded to the latter, relative to grants of land in the ceded territory, made by the King of Spain, or by is lawful authorities therein, before the 24th of January, 1818. The treaty was drawn up in both the English and Spanish languages, and both of them were considered, in Merchman's case, as originals. The II^d Article contained the cession of the territory, and the VIIIth, stipulations respecting the titles to lands in the territory ceded. The English part of the VIIIth Article was as follows: "All grants of land made before the 24th of January, 1818, by his Catholic Majesty, or by his lawful authorities in the said territory ceded by his Majesty to the United States, shall be ratified and confirmed to the persons in possession of the lands, to the same extent that the same grants would be valid if the territories had remained under the dominion of his Catholic Majesty." The Spanish part of this Article was the same as that in English, except the words "shall be ratified and confirmed" were "shall remain ratified and confirmed;" and Mr. Chief Justice Marshall, in speaking of this difference in language, said: "Although the words 'shall be ratified and confirmed' are properly the words of contract, stipulating for some future legislative act, they are not necessarily so. They may import that they shall be ratified and confirmed by the instrument itself."

In Foster and Elam v. Nelson, 2 Peters, 814, the Court considered the words, "shall be ratified and confirmed," as importing contract, and in that case the same illustrious Judge said: "Our Constitution declares a treaty to be the law of the land. It is, consequently, to be regarded in Courts of justice as equivalent to an Act of the Legislature, wherever it operates of itself without the aid of any legislative provision. But when the terms of stipulation import a contract, where either of the parties engages to perform a particular act, the treaty addresses itself to the political not the judicial department; and the Legislature must execute the contract before it can become a rule of the Court." And he further said, had the Article declared that all the grants made by his Catholic Majesty before the 24th of January, 1818, shall be valid to the same extent as if the ceded territory had remained under his dominion, it would have acted directly on the subject; and in Perchman's Case, 7 Pet. 89, he said if the circumstances of the difference of the language referred to between the English and Spanish parts of the treaty had been known in deciding Foster and Elam v. Nelson, he believed it would have produced the construction which was given to the VIIIth Article by the Court in Perchman's Case.

In United States v. Wiggins, 14 Pet. 349, Mr. Justice Catron said: "The object of the Court in the cases of Arredondo and Perchman was to exempt perfect titles from the operation of the VIIIth Article of the treaty under consideration in these cases, for the reason that they were perfect titles by the laws of Spain when the treaty was made; and that when the soil and sovereignty of Florida were ceded by the II^d Article, private rights of property were by implication protected;" and he further said: "The Court, in its reasoning, most justly held that such was the rule by the laws of nations, even in case of conquest, and undoubtedly so in case of cession; therefore, it would be an unnatural construction of the VIIIth Article to hold that perfect and complete titles at the date of the treaty should be subjected to investigation and confirmation by the Government; and to reconcile the Article with the laws of nations, the Spanish side of the Article was referred to in aid of the meaning of the American side, when it was ascertained that the Spanish side was in the present tense; whereupon the Court held that the implication resulting from the II^d Article, being according to the laws of nations, that and the VIIIth Article were consistent, and must be so recognized by the United States in its Courts." And further on he used this language: "That the perfect titles made by Spain before the 24th of January, 1818, within the ceded territory, are intrinsically valid and exempt from the provisions of the VIIIth Article, is the established doctrine of this Court, and that they need no sanction from the legislative or judicial departments of this country."

Where the claim of an individual to lands was of the nature of an inchoate or incomplete grant, which was of such character as to have bound the conscience of the former sovereign to perfect it, the United States, having acquired the territory, received it charged with the duty of carrying out in good faith the obligations of the former Government to its grantee, existing at the time of the cession. The former Government never having parted with the title, and the United States having acquired the territory, with all the rights and obligations of the old Government, could, in its political capacity, prescribe the proceeding necessary to accomplish the duty which devolved upon it to invest the grantee with a perfect title; and hence the same political authority could impose such terms and conditions upon the claimant, for the speedy accomplishment of the end in view, as might be just to him and conducive to the public interests; and claimants under such grants could not complain if the Government upon which they depended for the perfection of their claims should provide a tribunal to examine their fairness, and should make their validity depend on their being submitted to such tribunal. (Henderson v. Poindexter, 12 Wheat. 543; McCulloch v. State of Maryland, 4 Wheat. 409; Hall v. Doe, 19 Ala. 36.) But the rule that applies to cases of inchoate titles can have no just application to titles that were already perfect and which stood confirmed by the treaty acting at the time of its creation, eo instanti, directly upon the subject.

It is argued by the counsel for the plaintiff that as the Constitution of the United States provides that "the Congress shall have power to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property belonging to the United States," and as the sole power of providing for the primary disposition of the public lands devolves upon Congress, that therefore, in order to ascertain what is and what is not public land, Congress can exercise the means that may be necessary for such purpose, and that the Act of 1851 prescribed the means for the ascertaining not only who had the legal titles and merely equitable claims to lands, but thereby provided the mode by which the Government could ascertain the limits and extent of its own lands; and he further argues that "the Government which has a right to do an act, and has imposed upon it the duty of performing that act, must, according to the dictates of reason, be allowed to select the means." (4 Wheaton, 409, 410.) While the soundness of the doctrine urged is admitted, it could not be justly claimed that Congress could, in the proper exercise of its power, prescribe means imposing conditions which, if disregarded, would operate to divest the titles that were perfect and stood protected by compact beyond the repealing power of Congress. By the common law, the King has no right of entry on lands which are not common to his subjects; the King is put to his inquest of office, or information of intrusion, in all cases where the subject is put to his action; their rights are the same, though the King has more convenient remedies in enforcing his. If the King has no original right of possession to lands, he cannot acquire it without office found, so as to annex it to his domain. (3 Black. Com. 257, 258; Mitchel v. United States, 9 Peters, 742.) If the King could not recover lands without an affirmative proceeding on his behalf, so as to annex them to his domain, who will say that the Congress of the United States intended, or could, if such was the intention, by conditions negative in their character, divest the owner in fee simple of lands of his title thereto, and transfer the same to the United States?

That the citizen of the Mexican Republic who was seized in fee simple absolute of lands in California at the date of treaty, and who thereafter elected, according to its provisions, to become a citizen of the United States, could, if he chose to do so, have submitted his title and claim to such lands to be passed upon by the Commissioners and the proper Courts, under the Act of 1851, we have no doubt; but that he was bound to do so or lose his lands, we cannot believe was intended by the Act of Congress, nor do we conceive that a construction of the Act which would so result is authorized by its language or spirit.

The eighth section of the Act of 1851, it is true, provides that "each and every person claiming lands in California by due of any right or title derived from the Spanish or Mexican Government, shall present the same to the said Commissioners when sitting as a Board," whose duty it shall be "to decide upon the validity of said claim." And the thirteenth section declares that "all lands the claims to which have been finally rejected by the Commissioners in manner herein provided, or which shall be finally decided to be invalid by the District or Supreme Court, and all lands the claims to which shall have been presented to the Commissioners within two years after the date of this Act, shall be deemed, held, and considered as part of the public domain of the United States."

The language of these sections seems sufficiently comprehensive to include titles and claims of all possible classes, and these sections of the Act were to be interpreted without reference to other portions of it, or to the treaty or the law nations affecting the subject, or could be considered independently of the principles of common right or right by the common law, we should not hesitate in coming to the conclusion that all titles and claims to lands, whether perfect or imperfect, were inexorably required to be presented to the Commissioners sitting as a Board, in order to save their forfeiture to the United States.

That Congress could select the means and prescribe the mode of perfecting just claims to lands that were imperfect and incomplete, in fulfilment of the Government's obligations, and could limit the holders of such claims to the means and mode provided, no one, we apprehend, for a moment would suggest doubt. It may be observed that the many Acts that have been passed by Congress establishing Commissioners for the ascertainment and settlement of land claims in territories acquired by the United States by cession, have been passed for the benefit of persons whose claims to land were of that inchoate and incomplete character that required action on the part of the Government before they could become invested with the legal title thereto.

In Henderson v. Poindexter, 12 Wheat. 543, the Court considered the effect of certain Acts of Congress requiring persons having claims to lands which needed confirmation to render them titles at law, to perform certain specified conditions within a time prescribed, that the Government might determine the question of their rights; and these Acts declared that in case of neglect to comply with the requirements enumerated therein such claims should become void and thereafter be forever barred. It will be seen, by reference to these Acts, that their object was twofold: first, to regulate grants of land in the ceded territory; and second, providing for the disposal of the lands of the United States in the same territory. The Chief Justice, in passing upon the case before the Court, first declared that the land claims which were confirmed as provided for in those Acts derived no validity from any other source than through the proceedings ordained by Congress, and then said: "The whole legislation on this subject requires that every title to lands in the country which had been occupied by Spain should be laid before the Board of Commissioners. The motives for this regulation are obvious; and as the titles had no intrinsic validity, it was opposed by no principle. Claimants could not complain if the law which gave validity to their claims should also provide a Board to examine their fairness, and should make the validity depend on their being laid before that Board."

In Strother v. Lucas both parties claimed under the same inchoate or incomplete title, and one of them had obtained under the Act of Congress a confirmation of his claim, while the other failed to present his to the Commissioners. In reference to his omission to present his claim to the Commissioners, Mr. Justice Baldwin said: "We find by various Acts the time of filing such claims is limited, after which they are declared void so far as they depend on any Act of Congress, and shall not be received in evidence in any Court against any person claiming by a grant from the United States. These," he said, "are laws analogous to Statutes of Limitations for recording deeds or giving effect to the awards of Commissioners for settling claims to land under the laws of the States; the time and manner of their operations and the exceptions to them depend on the sound discretion of the Legislature, according to the nature of the titles, the situation of the country, and the emergency which calls for their enactment. Reasons of sound policy have led to the general adoption of laws of such descriptions, and their validity cannot be questioned. Cases may occur where the provisions of a law may be such as to call for the interposition of the Courts, but these under consideration do not."

The case of Barry v. Gamble, 3 How. 32, is similar to that of Strother v. Lucas, and the Court decided that the claim of the party who relied upon an incomplete foreign title became barred by neglecting compliance with the requirements of the act of Congress to deliver to the proper officer by a given day and year a prescribed notice with the muniments of his right, to be recorded.

It will be seen by a careful examination of these authorities, and others of a like character, that the Court was dealing with imperfect titles. In one case they were said to have "no intrinsic validity," (12 Wheat. 543) and in others they were designated "inchoate and incomplete;" and we have not been able to find a case, nor has the learned counsel for the plaintiff, than whom no one is more thorough in his researches, furnished us with one where the question was involved, in which it was held that a perfect title could become extinguished and its holder divested of his property by omitting to submit it for adjudication to a Board of Commissioners or to a court appointed for the purpose. In Clarke's Case, 8 Peters, 4, in which it was said: "The grant which constitutes the foundation of the petitioner's claim is a complete title, subject to no condition whatever," which had been presented to a Board of Commissioners, the Chief Justice, while approving the Acts of Congress appointing Boards of Commissioners for the purpose of ascertaining and determining as to the validity of titles to lands, in order that there might be no conflict between these and those which might be acquired under the United States, said: "But neither the law of nations, or the faith of the United States, would justify the Legislature in authorizing these Boards to annul pre-existing titles which might consequently be asserted in the ordinary Courts of the country against any grantee of the American Government."

It must be admitted that if a perfect title be required to undergo the ordeal of a Board of Commissioners, it might be declared invalid, notwithstanding it, before then, stood confirmed by the treaty; and hence it is that the Supreme Court of the United States, respecting the obligations of treaties and the binding force of law, as well as the rights of the citizen, have uniformly maintained that persons holding perfect titles to lands could not be deprived of their property otherwise than by due course of law; and to attribute to Congress the intention of imposing upon persons having perfect titles to lands in California at the date of the treaty, and who in due time became citizens of the United States, the necessity of submitting them to the Board of Land Commissioners to save their property from forfeiture to the United States, we should deem a grave charge, unsupported by a fair construction of the Act of 1851.

In addition to the provisions of the Act of 1851, to which we have already directly referred, we must, in the construction of the Act, consider all its provisions, and determine from it as a whole its meaning and intent. By the fifteenth section it is provided "that the final decrees rendered by the said Commissioners, or by the District or Supreme Court of the United States, or any patent to be issued under this Act, shall be conclusive between the United States and said claimants only, and shall not affect the interests of third persons."

If such only can be the effect of decrees and patents, and the interests of third persons are not to be affected thereby, then who are these third persons, and what is the character of the interests that stand unaffected? Third persons must be regarded to be all persons who were not parties to the proceeding before the Land Commission, or standing in any such relation with those who were parties thereto, as to come affected and bound as privies; and the interests of third persons that remained unaffected by the final confirmation and patent are those subsisting in perfect titles derived from a source of paramount proprietorship, which could be relied in resisting successfully any action of the Government respecting them. (Waterman v. Smith, 13 Cal. 419, 420; Middle Boggs v. Merced Mining Co., 14 Cal. 362; Leese v. Mark, 20 Cal. 425.) In the case last cited, Mr. Chief Justice held said: "The acquisition of California by the United States did not affect the rights of the inhabitants to their property. The inhabitants retained all such rights, and were entitled by the law of nations to protection in them to the same extent as under the former Government." (Teschmacher v. Thompson, 18 Cal. 22.) And in respect to the "third persons" mentioned in the fifteenth section of the Act of 1851, he said: Third term 'third persons' refers not to all persons other than the United States and the claimants, but to those holding dependent titles arising previous to the acquisition of the country. The latter class are not bound by the decree and content, for they do not hold in subordination to the Government, nor by any title subsequent, but by title arising anterior to the conquest."

We are aware that the impression prevails to some extent at the same learned Judge, in Estrada v. Murphy, 19 Cal. 39, gave countenance to the idea that all land claims, whether resting on perfect or imperfect grants, had to be presented to the Commissioners in order to save such lands from passing to the United States; but we think such an impression is not justified by his opinion in that case, for he was then dealing with the question as involved in a case arising upon the failure of Estrada to present an imperfect or inchoate title to the Land Commission; and after having referred to the language of the Supreme Court of the United States in the cases of Fremont and Fossatt, suggested that doubts might exist as to the validity of the legislation of Congress, so far as required the presentation to the Board of claims where the lands were held by perfect titles acquired under the former Government.

It may, perhaps, be supposed that the observations of the Chief Justice in the case of Fremont, 17 How. 553, and of Mr. Justice Campbell in the case of Fossatt, 21 How. 447, are opposed to the views we have expressed as to the import and effect of the eighth and thirteenth sections of the Act of 1851. In the former case, the Chief Justice, after observing that the eighth section embraces not only inchoate or equitable titles, but legal titles also, and requires them all to undergo examination and to be passed upon by the Court, says: "The object of this provision appears to be to place the titles to lands in California upon a stable foundation, and to give to the parties who possess them an opportunity of placing them on the records of the country in a manner and form that will prevent future controversy." And in Fossatt's Case, in reference to the same subject, Mr. Justice Campbell says that the claim to be submitted to the inquiry and determination of the Board of Commissioners, it will be understood, comprehended all private claims to land in California, and that the effect of the inquiry and decision of these tribunals upon the matter submitted is final and conclusive, and referring to the Acts of Congress on the subject, he says: "These Acts of Congress do not create a voluntary jurisdiction that the claimant may seek or decline. All claims to land that are withheld from the Board of Commissioners during the legal term for presentation are treated as non-existent, and the land as belonging to the public domain."

It will be observed, by reference to the history of those cases, that both the claims of Fremont and Fossatt were of the class that required action on the part of the Government before they could become perfect and the land to which the claimants were respectively entitled could be segregated from the Government domain; and the question that exists in the case under consideration was in nowise involved in the determination of those cases.

If the opinions thus expressed in the cases of Fremont and ssatt could be considered an authoritative construction of the Act of 1851, holding that lands belonging in fee to Mexican citizens at the date of the treaty became forfeited to the United States by reason of failure to present them for adjudication to the Board of Commissioners, we should acquiesce with that spirit of obedience which we freely acknowledge should actuate us in the presence of authority which we are not disposed to question.

It is true, as we have already observed, that the language of the eighth section of the Act is sufficiently comprehensive to embrace all classes of titles, and that titles not submitted to the judgment of the Commissioners should, by the thirteenth section, be deemed, held, and considered a part of the public domain; but, as we have seen, the fifteenth section provides that neither the final decrees rendered nor any patent issued shall include third persons or affect their interests. That the fifteenth section contemplated the existence of a class of persons and a variety of interests that could be conserved by its saving provisions, there can be no doubt; otherwise we would be inevitably impelled to the conclusion that this section was without sign.

The Act of 1851 nowhere provides, as was the case by the acts considered in Henderson v. Poindexter, and Strother v. Lucas, that by failing to present his claim to land to the Commissioners the possessor of the title should not be permitted to use it as evidence in an action for the maintenance of his right; and no other consequence for the omission is declared in the thirteenth section than that the land shall be deemed, held, and considered as part of the public domain. If it were necessary to construe this provision as working an annulment of a perfect title, we should be compelled to hold it to be repugnant to the stipulations of the treaty, which are of paramount obligation; and we believe it would be so held by the Supreme Court of the United States, if directly presented to that tribunal.

The decisions to which we have referred, and to which others might be added, we regard as declaring principles and rules of law which constrain us to hold that perfect titles to lands which existed at the date of the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo in Mexicans then established in California, were guaranteed and secured to such persons, not only by the law of nations, but also by the stipulations of that treaty acting directly on the subject and operating as a confirmation in presenti of such titles.

We think the original and amended answers filed by each of the defendants constituted a defense to the action of the plaintiff, and that the Court erred in sustaining the demurrer to the amended answers, and, also, in refusing to admit the evidence offered by the defendants in their defense; and that the judgment should be reversed and the cause remanded for a new trial.

There are other points presented by the record as grounds on which the defendants ask this Court to reverse the judgment, respecting which it is not necessary to say more than that the ruling of the Court on such points was correct.

The judgment is reversed and the cause remanded for a new trial.

By JOSEPH A. JOYCE.

Revised to include citations to Volume 147, by CHARLES L. THOMPSON.

24 Cal. 11-14. PEOPLE v. JENKS.

Criminal Law.—Peremptory challenge may be made at any time before juror is sworn, or if sworn then it may be allowed for cause shown, p. 13.

Cited, People v. Scoggins, 37 Cal. 690, in concurring and dissenting opinion, but the case holds that jurors may be sworn as they are passed on; also that such challenge may be allowed after juror is sworn and good cause is shown; State v. Anderson, 4 Nev. 275, holding that jurors may be sworn before panel is completed and that the principal case is not in conflict with such rule; Statute v. Pritchard, 15 Nev. 81, 82, holding that although the court delays swearing the jury until its completion, the right to challenge a juror before he is sworn exists notwithstanding the court notifies counsel prior thereto that in passing his challenge he would be considered as having accepted all the jurors; Baker v. Stage, 3 Tex. App. 529, as authority, and explained as being decided under the statute and a peremptory challenge was not allowed even by leave of court where a juror on a special venire had been accepted.

24 Cal. 17-30. PEOPLE v. SANCHEZ.

Jurisdiction.—Term does not expire, in absence of judge, by failure of sheriff to adjourn court at noon but judge may open court in afternoon and transact business, pp. 19-22.

Cited, Loesnitz v. Seelinger, 127 Ind. 427, in connection with the failure of a board of county commissioners to meet and consequent lapse of the term; Union Pac. v. Hand, 7 Kan. 386, and also In re Dossett, 2 Okla. 386, both to the point that a court legally opened continues its term, until it adjourns sine die or such session expires by law; In re Terrill, 52 Kan. 32; 39 Am. St. Rep. 329; and also In re McCloskey, 2 Okla. 574, to the point that there being no authority in law for the clerk to open and adjourn court, the failure of the judge to appear upon the day appointed was a loss of the term; State v. Roberts, 8 Nev. 241, holding that where the judge did not appear until long after the time fixed for holding the term the same had lapsed, there being no adjournment as required by statute.

Dying Declarations must be made under the sense of impending death, and are not admissible if deceased had the slightest hopes of recovery, p. 24.

Cited, People v. Hodgdon, 55 Cal. 76; 36 Am. Rep. 31; and People v. Taylor, 59 Cal. 645, with approval; Boyle v. State, 105 Ind. 486, in dissenting opinion, but only generally as to such declarations.

Same.—Existence of such belief need not be proved by express statement but may appear from circumstances, pp. 24, 25.

Cited, People v. Taylor, 59 Cal. 645, in affirmance; State v. Cantieny, 34 Minn. 10, as to what is sufficient proof that the declarations were made in view of impending death and when such declarations in writing are admissible.

Same.—They should be received with great caution and should be of such things only as witness could have testified to if living. Matters of opinion, hearsay, or irrelevant matter should be excluded, pp. 24, 25.

Cited, People v. Taylor, 59 Cal. 645, in affirmance; Boyle v. State, 97 Ind. 329, to the same effect; Lipscomb v. State, 75 Miss. 580, sustaining instructions as to weight of such declarations.

Murder and Manslaughter.—In case of mutual combat, to reduce offense to manslaughter, contest must have been on equal terms with undue advantage taken, otherwise malice may be inferred and the killing be murder, p. 27.

Cited, King v. State, 4 Tex. App. 56; 30 Am. Rep. 161, quoting from the principal case on this point in affirmance; State v. Cochran, 147 Mo. 519, holding offense to have been murder in first degree; Bingham v. State, 6 Tex. App. 181, to the same points in connection with the question whether a certain state of facts as to justification should have gone to the jury; Dunlap v. State, 9 Tex. App. 192, where a charge as to mutual combat was held correct; Spearman v. State, 23 Tex. App. 228, where the correctness of a like rule is admitted and the decision approved, but held subject to material qualifications under the statute of that state.

No Instruction should be given which is not predicated upon some theory logically deducible from at least some portion of the testimony, p. 28.

Cited, People v. Byrnes, 30 Cal. 207, holding that instructions should always be given with reference to the facts proved and the principle was applied to a definition of murder in the second degree; People v. Best, 39 Cal. 691; People v. Atherton, 51 Cal. 498; and People v. Bourke, 66 Cal. 456, all affirming the principle; Territory v. Gay, 2 Dak. Ter. 141, as so decided and applied in connection with the correctness of an instruction as to evidence tending to reduce the grade of an offense constituting no justification.

Murder in First Degree.—Killing by means of poison, lying in wait, torture, or attempt to commit certain felonies conclusively evidences premeditation, p. 28.

Cited, People v. Taylor, 36 Cal. 265, where the construction of certain instructions based upon statutes and taken in part from the opinion of the principal case is considered; People v. Long, 39 Cal. 697, as to the difference between the two degrees of murder. So, also, in People v. Doyell, 48 Cal. 97; Kilgore v. The State, 74 Ala. 8, holding that homicide in attempt to commit a felony under the statute is murder in the first degree; Hill v. People, 1 Colo. 446, but to the point that in states where degrees of crime are recognized, intent is necessary to be proved where the statute makes a crime to consist of an act and a particular intent; State v. Gray, 19 Nev. 221, to the same effect as the instruction being a copy of a part of the opinion thereon; see next heading herein.

Murder in First and Second Degrees.—There must be not only a clear intent to kill to constitute the first degree, but also premeditation and deliberation, even though as instantaneous as successive thoughts. This constitutes the distinction between the two degrees, pp. 28, 30.

Cited, People v. Foren, 25 Cal. 365, noting the distinction between the two degrees of murder; also affirming the point that there must be a clear intent to take life; People v. Long, 39 Cal. 697, to the same effect as the principal case; People v. Doyell, 48 Cal. 96, 97, and People v. Hunt, 59 Cal. 435, all in substantial affirmance; extended note 18 Am. Dec. 778, 783, as to deliberation and premeditation and time; several other points relating to homicide are also considered fully; see preceding heading herein.

24 Cal. 31-40. PEOPLE v. WILLIAMS. S. C. 18 Cal. 187, on the first appeal.

Bias or Prejudice of Judge does not legally disqualify him to try cause, pp. 34-35.

Cited in People v. Compton, 123 Cal. 412, as rule before recent code amendment; Bryan v. State, 41 Fla. 659; Gaines v. State, 38 Tex. Cr. 215; State v. Board, 19 Wash. 14, 67 Am. St. Rep. 711, noted under McCauley v. Weller, 12 Cal. 500; In re Guerrero, 69 Cal. 102, where the principle was approved; the case holding that the fact that the mayor presided over the council which passed an ordinance did not disqualify him as judge in a trial for violating the ordinance; other matters were considered and also held not to disqualify; Mining Co. v. Mining Co., 83 Cal. 617; In re Davis' Estate, 11 Mont. 19; and Allen v. Reilly, 15 Nev. 455, all in affirmance.

Change of Venue.—Bias or prejudice on the part of the judge is no legal ground therefor, pp. 34-35.

Notes Cal. Rep.—77

Cited, People v. Shuler, 28 Cal. 495; Mining Co. v. Mining Co., 83 Cal. 617; In re David Jones, 103 Cal. 398; and Allen v. Reilly, 15 Nev. 455, all in affirmance.

Bias or Prejudice is not evidenced by the fact that the same judge had made an erroneous ruling on a previous trial of the same case, p. 35.

Cited, Graham v. Selbie, 8 S. Dak. 608, to the point that the objection that the same judge had tried the case before was frivolous, etc.

Change of Venue.—Affidavit of prejudice upon information and belief is insufficient, as it does not show the sources of information or upon what the belief is based, p. 36.

Cited in Gay v. Torrence, 145 Cal. 152, following rule; City of Emporia v. Volmer, 12 Kan. 627, to the point that such facts and circumstances must clearly be shown by affidavits or evidence as clearly establish prejudice.

Affidavit for Continuance must show due and sufficient diligence to procure testimony by legal means. If it does not, there is no error or abuse of discretion in refusing continuance, pp. 37, 38.

Cited, People v. Jocelyn, 29 Cal. 563, in affirmance and holding that it should be shown that service of subpoena of the kind witness was bound to obey was made; People v. Burke, 34 Cal. 663, in affirmance; State v. O'Flaherty, 7 Nev. 156, holding that material facts should be positively stated in such affidavit in a case where the facts were substantially the same as in the principal case; State v. Fiester, 32 Or. 260, noted under People v. Gaunt, 23 Cal. 156; Territory v. Perkins, 2 Mont. 471; also State v. O'Neil, 13 Oreg. 185, both holding that the granting or refusing a continuance rests in the sound discretion of the court below and ought not to be disturbed except for the best reasons.

Jurors are Presumed to have performed their sworn duty; to overthrow this presumption there must be some direct positive testimony contra, p. 40.

People v. Lee Chuck, 78 Cal. 334, 337, to the same point; Higgins v. City of San Diego, 126 Cal. 314, noted under People v. McCauley, 1 Cal. 379; Hutchins v. State, 161 Ind. 672, applying rule to affidavit as to misconduct of jurors; People v. Tarm Poi, 86 Cal. 231, holding that an affidavit of misconduct made on information and belief is insufficient; People v. Leary, 105 Cal. 494, as authority in regard to presumption. In this case the alleged misconduct was reading newspaper reports; People v. Kramer, 117 Cal. 650, in affirmance.

General Citation.—Eastman v. Holt, 43 W. Va. 615.

24 Cal. 41-51. PEOPLE v. BRUZZO.

Former Acquittal.—Discharge of an accomplice used as a witness operates as a bar to another prosecution, p. 46.

Cited, extended note 40 Am. St. Rep. 768, 775, fully considering the effect of state's evidence and agreements concerning same, etc.

24 Cal. 52-60. ROWLAND v. KREYENCHAGEN.

Appeal.—Dismissal is an affirmance of judgment and binds the parties unless set aside and appeal reinstated, pp. 57, 58.

Cited, Chase v. Beraud, 29 Cal. 139, holding that a dismissal affirms the judgment and binds the sureties; State v. Biesman, 12 Mont. 18, in affirmance.

Filing Remittitur in court below without inadvertence or fraud vacates appellate jurisdiction, pp. 58, 59.

Cited, People v. McDermott, 97 Cal. 248, In re Levinson, 108 Cal. 459, Hazard v. Cole, 1 Idaho, 305; Kimpton v. Jubilee P. M. Co., 16 Mont. 383, and State v. Jacobs, 11 Oreg. 320, all of said cases affirming the rule.

Remittitur filed may be recalled, in case of fraud, inadvertence, accident, or mistake, and proceedings stayed, pp. 59, 60.

Cited, Vance v. Peñña, 36 Cal. 328, in affirmance, and the rule was followed; Trumpler v. Trumpler, 123 Cal. 252, recalling for fraud under facts stated; Vernon v. Board, 142 Cal. 518, applying rule and discussing power of supervisors to rescind order; In re Jessup, 81 Cal. 469, in connection with the question of the power of the court to grant rehearings, noting also the rules of the supreme court of 1866, and that remittitur did not issue until time for petitioning for rehearing had expired; also that filing said petition stayed proceedings; Lovett v. State, 29 Fla. 393, 396, in affirmance, the judgment being vacated and case recalled, the transcript by mistake being erroneous; extended note 21 Am. Dec. 119, as to power of appellate court after remittitur.

24 Cal. 61-72. PEOPLE v. MILLER.

Tax Suits.—Jurisdiction.—Character of action will be determined by prayer of complaint. The district court has no jurisdiction of personal action for taxes for less than jurisdictional sum, but has jurisdiction to foreclose tax lien in equity in any sum, pp. 66-71.

Cited, Bell v. Crippen, 28 Cal. 328, to the same points and affirming the rule; Courtwright v. Bear etc. Co., 30 Cal. 581, as authority upon the general proposition of the right to proceed in law or equity in connection with the question of jurisdiction of actions to abate a nuisance; People v. Doe, 31 Cal. 221, as authority to the point that as the judgment upon which a tax sale took place appeared to have been obtained in a justice's court, it must have been a money judgment without any order of sale; Mahlstadt v. Blanc, 34 Cal. 580, to the point that when the relief sought is to enforce a lien for taxes or street assessments the district court has jurisdiction without reference to the amount; Nevada etc. Co. v. Kidd, 37 Cal. 504, holding upon a complaint for injunction to restrain trespass and diversion of water that the prayer may determine the nature of the action; People v. Olivera, 43 Cal. 494, to the point of jurisdiction of district courts; Locke v. Moulton, 108 Cal. 53, by counsel but declared not in point, the prayer to an answer in ejectment asking for affirmative relief being held immaterial.

Taxes.—Jurisdiction of justice's court is ousted if answer, in action to recover money judgment, puts in issue legality of tax, p. 72.

Cited, City of Santa Barbara v. Eldred, 95 Cal. 384, an affirmance and the rule applied to the police court in a tax suit.

General Citation.—Gillis v. Barnett, 38 Cal. 394, 395, as authority, but held to have no bearing upon the question of jurisdiction in that case, as in the principal case action was commenced after the organization of the new courts; Young v. Wright, 52 Cal. 410, which is declared not distinguishable in principle, since there the justice's court was held not to have equitable powers concerning the overplus in suits against animals in rem for the recovery of damages.

24 Cal. 73-78. PEOPLE v. DE LA GUERRA.

Descent and Distribution.—Civil law has been adopted as to degrees of consanguinity, but in other cases than descent and distribution the common law prevails, p. 76.

Cited, Robinson v. S. P. Co., 105 Cal. 558, and explained as having been decided before the adoption of the codes, and that section 1393 of the Civil Code establishes the degrees of consanguinity or relationship.

Judge who was disqualified by relationship or consanguinity within the third degree at common law had no right to dismiss case or to act except to arrange calendar and change of venue, and his judicial acts were void though no objection was made, p. 77.

Cited, Tracy v. Colby, 55 Cal. 72, to the point that a judge cannot act in a cause or proceeding in which he is interested; Robinson v. S. P. Co. 105 Cal. 558, holding that the fact that a supreme justice is first cousin by marriage or cousin german to a stockholder does not disqualify him from sitting in a suit in which the corporation is interested; Allen v. State, 102 Ga. 623, but holding judge not disqualified from passing a motion under facts stated; Frevort v. Swift, 19 Nev. 364, to the point that statutory prohibitions have changed the rule of the common law in several states, and holding that where a judge is disqualified his acts involving judicial discretion are not void, but only voidable; Abrams v. State, 31 Tex. Crim. Rep. 452, to the point that a judgment by a disqualified judge is a nullity. So, also, in State ex rel. v. Sachs, 3 Wash. 695; extended note 84 Am. Dec. 128, 130, 131, exhaustively reviewing the authorities upon this and analogous points.

Pleadings.—Records and papers must be annexed by originals or copies to make them a part of the pleadings, merely referring to them being insufficient, p. 78.

Cited, Ward v. Clay, 82 Cal. 505, holding that a copy of a note annexed to a complaint and referred to an exhibit formed a part thereof.

Court cannot take judicial notice of record of another case in the same court without its formal introduction in evidence, nor can it notice the existence of a record not introduced in evidence in the court below, p. 78.

Cited, Simon v. Durham, 10 Oreg. 55, to the same effect; Glaze v. Bogle, 105, Ga. 293, as to necessity for proof of plea of res judicata although record is annexed to pleading. So, also, in extended note 89 Am. Dec. 688.

General Citation.—Gage v. Downey, 79 Cal. 155, as to collateral attack on judgment and disqualification of judge, an error having been made at to what was the most accessible and nearest county seat for transfer of cause. Clement Gravel Co. v. Wylly, 105 Ga. 208.

24 Cal. 78-84. PEOPLE v. SEXTON.

Mandamus will not lie to compel the court to proceed with a trial after order changing venue, p. 83.

Cited in Kerr v. Superior Court, 130 Cal. 186, denying writ to compel respondent to issue a citation in proceedings under Penal Code, section 772; State v. Smith, 23 Mont. 332, noted under People v. Judge, 17 Cal. 548; extended note 89 Am. Dec. 739, where the question of mandamus is fully considered.

Mandamus lies to compel subordinate court to perform duty enjoined by law, but will not lie to control exercise of judicial discretion in a particular manner nor to review legality of action of such court, nor in cases where there is a plain, speedy, and adequate remedy at law, pp. 83, 84.

Cited, People v. Pratt, 28 Cal. 169, 87 Am. Dec. 111, in affirmance; People v. Weston, 28 Cal. 641, to the point that the writ will not lie to control exercise of judicial discretion; Cariaga v. Dryden, 29 Cal. 309, holding that writ will not lie to control judgment, however erroneous, where court had jurisdiction; Lewis v. Barclay, 35 Cal. 214, in substantial affirmance; Clark v. Crane, 57 Cal. 634, to the point that the writ will not lie where there is a remedy by appeal; People v. Superior Court, 114 Cal. 479, in dissenting opinion, but the case holds that the writ does not lie to review judicial errors, nor where there is a remedy by appeal.

Appeal to Supreme Court suspends all proceedings below, pp. 584, 585.

Cited and affirmed in the following cases: People v. Frisbie, 26 Cal. 139; McGarrahan v. Maxwell, 28 Cal. 91, also holding that no appeal bond was required; Hills v. Sherwood, 33 Cal. 479; McGarrahan v. New Idria M. Co., 49 Cal. 336; Harris v. Barnhart, 97 Cal. 550, also holding that in such case the judgment is inadmissible in another case, even between the same parties, and considering the effect of section 1049 of the Code of Civil Procedure; Bullard v. McArdle, 98 Cal. 359, 35 Am. St. Rep. 178, in a case of appeal from a justice court, but holding that by removal of the record the judgment was vacated and set aside; cited, Glenn v. Brush, 3 Colo. 25, as opposed to the point that a judgment suspended by a writ of error operating as a supersedeas is not evidence of title, it being suspended for all purposes. Affirmed, Plaisted v. Nowlan, 2 Mont. 362; so, also, in Sharon v. Hill, 26 Fed. Rep. 391; 11 Sawy. 371, and also deciding that such judgment is at such time not admissible in evidence.

General Citation.—Treadway v. Semple, 28 Cal. 658, distinguishing the principal case in that the question was not as in the citing case, whether, when the appeal was dismissed or the decree confirmed by the appellate court, the rights of the parties became fixed by relation to the date of the decree; noting also an error in the reference (p. 582) to the "act of Congress of June 14th, 1860," which should have been to the state act of April 26th, 1858.

Moreno*, 39 Cal. 236, 237, commenting on and explaining this doctrine. So, also, in Schmit v. Giovanari, 43 Cal. 622; Phelan v. Poyoreno, 74 Cal. 452, in affirmance. Denied in Botiller v. Dominguez, 130 U. S. 243, 254, 255, reversing S. C. 74 Cal. 457, holding that no Spanish or Mexican grant can be of any validity which has not been submitted to and confirmed by the commissioners, or, if rejected by that board, confirmed by the district or supreme court of the United States. Cited, Boyle v. Hinds, 2 Sawy. 529, deciding that although the holder of a perfect Mexican grant may not be compelled to submit it for confirmation, yet, having done so, and the grant being confirmed, surveyed, and patented, the final decree and patent are conclusive; Dodge v. Perez, 2 Sawy. 646, discussing generally the right of a claimant to purchase under act of Congress of July 23d, 1866; note 79 Am. Dec. 162; Carpentier v. Montgomery, 13 Wall. 489, but referred to as not precluding further examination as to the validity of the title in dispute, and holding that where such grant does not identify the precise tract of land granted, the title is an imperfect one, needing further action of the United States government to make it perfect.

Same.—Treaty operated as a confirmation of all perfect titles, pp. 661, 672.

Cited, Seale v. Ford, 29 Cal. 107, to the same effect; Thompson v. Doaksum, 68 Cal. 597, in affirmance.

Same.—Third persons protected against confirmation were only those holding title prior to acquisition of California, pp. 668, 669.

APRIL TERM, 1864.

REPORTS OF CASES DETERMINED IN
THE SUPREME COURT
APRIL TERM 1864.

MOTION FOR NEW TRIAL—STAY OF PROCEEDINGS.—The pendency of a motion for a new trial does not operate as a stay of proceedings, so as to deprive the Court of the power of vacating an order appointing a receiver made before the trial.

RECEIVER—VACATING ORDER APPOINTING.—The appointment of a receiver rests in the sound discretion of the Court upon a view of all the facts; one of which is, that the party asking the appointment should make out a prima facie case; and after an ex parte appointment has been made, the order may be vacated, either before or after the trial, upon a proper showing.

EFFECT OF MOTION FOR NEW TRIAL ON RECEIVER.—Where, pending an action, a receiver has been appointed, and on the trial judgment of nonsuit is rendered against the party at whose instance the receiver was appointed, a motion for a new trial suspends the operation of the judgment so as to prevent it from operating as a discharge of the receiver, unless an order is made discharging the receiver.

Larvey v. Wells, Fargo & Co., 4 Cal. 106, commented on.

APPEAL from the District Court, Sixteenth Judicial District, Calaveras County.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the Court.

W. L. Dudley, for Appellant.

By our statute, a receiver may be appointed by the Court, or a Judge thereof.

"1st. Before judgment, provisionally, on the application of either party, when he establishes a prima facie right to the property, or to an interest in the property which is the subject of the action, and which is in the possession of an adverse party, and the property, or its rents and profits, are in danger of being lost or materially injured or impaired."

"3d. In such other cases as are in accordance with the practice of Courts of equity jurisdiction." (Wood's Digest, Art. 878.)

It has been well settled by this Court that the removal of metals from a mine is "taking away the entire substance of the estate, and comes within that class of trespass in which injunctions are now universally granted." (Merced Mining Company v. Fremont, 7 Cal 321.)

Nothing has transpired subsequent to the appointment of the receiver to rebut the prima facie right of plaintiff to the mine.

The fact that on the trial of this cause the plaintiff became nonsuited, rebuts the prima facie right of plaintiff to the mine, is not tenable.

In Wilson v. Corbier, 13 Cal. 168, the Court says: "As a nonsuit determines nothing, the plaintiff may proceed, and under better proof, if he can procure it, try his case anew."

Again, we submit that the plaintiff having moved the Court to vacate said judgment of nonsuit, and grant the plaintiff a new trial, and served notice and filed statement to that end such motion operated as a stay of proceedings, extending through the whole case, until the motion could be heard and determined. (See Lurvey v. Wells, 4 Cal. 106.)

Taking this decision, which asserts that motion for new trial stays the operation of the judgment, how could the order appointing a receiver be vacated until that motion be decided? If the judgment of nonsuit did determine rights in favor of defendants, were they not held in abeyance by this motion? Judgments may operate to put a party in possession of a mine, to restore metals taken therefrom, and in the hands of a receiver; but if any proceeding stays the operation of the judgment for one purpose, why not for all? If restitution of the mine cannot be obtained while motion is pending, how is the ore to be reached that has been taken therefrom? In Justices' Courts, where the powers of such Courts are defined by statute, a Justice of the Peace has the right to appoint a receiver in actions respecting mining claims, and to keep him in possession of the gold dust or metals as "long as such action may remain undetermined in any Court." If a Justice of the Peace can appoint a receiver for such purpose, and after the action has been tried and determined in his Court, and an appeal be taken to the County Court, the receiver still remaining in possession, then what justice or equity would there be in discharging a receiver after trial and judgment in the District Court, while an appeal was pending in the Supreme Court from such judgment?

If the first subdivision of Art. 878, sec. 143, is not broad enough to cover this case, then the third is; and we submit that it is more in consonance with equity and justice that the metals taken from the mining claim in controversy should be held by the receiver until this suit is determined, than that they should now be turned over to the defendants.

M. G. Cobb, also for Appellants.

The appellants contended that a motion for a new trial, for the time being, stays all proceedings in the Court below as effectually and fully as they are stayed by force of an appeal.

In Hicks v. Michaels et al., 15 Cal. 108, the Court below, under the one hundred and sixteenth section of the Practice Act, had granted, upon a rule to show cause, a restraining order. The application was for an injunction. Subsequently, upon a hearing under the rule to show cause, the Court refused the injunction and dissolved the restraining order.

The plaintiff then applied to the Judge to fix the amount of a suspensive appeal bond, stating that it was his intention to appeal from the order, and that he had taken the necessary steps for that purpose. The Judge refused the application. Plaintiff then applied for a mandamus to compel the Court below to fix the amount of a suspensive appeal bond, on an appeal from an order refusing to grant an injunction and dissolving a restraining order, etc.

Mr. Chief Justice Field says: "The restraining order expired by its own limitation. * * * The direction of the District Judge that the restraining order be dissolved, was unnecessary. It follows, then, that no injunction was granted in the case, but expressly refused. * * * Can an appeal from an order of this character, (refusing an injunction,) operate to create an injunction, or to prolong a restraining order, until the ruling of the Judge can be reviewed by the appellate Court? It is clear that no such effect can be given to an appeal, even when the most ample bond of indemnity is tendered. Where an injunction has been refused, there is nothing operative. A stay can only be sought of that which has an existence, and by its operation is supposed to work injury to the appellant. It is, therefore, from the nature of the case, only of orders or judgments which command or permit some acts to be done, that a stay of proceedings can be had. Nor can an appeal operate to create an injunction under any circumstances."

In Wood v. Dwight, 7 Johns. Oh. 295, an injunction staying execution at law was dissolved, and from the order of dissolution an appeal was taken to the Court of Errors. The defendant thereupon moved to proceed at law, notwithstanding the appeal, and in deciding the motion Chancellor Kent said: "That after an order dissolving an injunction, or discharging a party from a writ of ne exeat, was duly entered, no subsequent appeal by the dissatisfied party could of itself affect the validity of the order, or revive the process and give it force and effect. An appeal only stays future proceedings in the Court; but here is no further proceeding. The order is perfect and finished eo instante that it is entered."

Upon the authority of these two cases, the appellants contend that the motion for a new trial in the case at bar operated as an effectual stay to the removal of the receiver.

George Cadwalader, for Respondent.

By the Court, SAWYER, J.

This action was brought on the 10th of July, 1862, to recover possession of a copper mine. On the 7th of August, the plaintiff filed an affidavit stating that "said defendants have taken from the copper mine in dispute some twenty or twenty-five tons of copper ore, and threaten to dispose of the same; and if a receiver is not immediately appointed, such threat will be carried into execution, and the said copper ore be lost to these plaintiffs." On the same day, on application of plaintiff, a receiver was appointed, and as so far as shown by the record, without notice to defendants. The cause was tried in January. On the 26th of that month, at the close of the plaintiff's testimony, the Court — being of opinion that plaintiff failed to show title — granted a nonsuit on motion of defendants. The defendants then moved that the order of August 7th, appointing a receiver, be vacated; and the motion, after argument, was taken under advisement. Afterwards, within the time prescribed by law, the plaintiff moved to set aside the nonsuit, and for a new trial. On the 30th of March, while the motion for a new trial was still undertermined, the Court entered an order vacating the appointment of the receiver, and from this order the present appeal is taken.

It is insisted that the pendency of a motion for a new trial, proprio vigore, stayed all proceedings, and that it was error to vacate the order appointing a receiver, pending the motion. Admitting that the proceedings were stayed generally by the motion, it does not follow that the Court could not vacate the order.

The exercise of the power of appointing a receiver rests very much in the sound discretion of the Court, "to be governed by a view of the whole circumstances of the case, one of the circumstances being the probability of the plaintiff being ultimately entitled to a decree." (Adams' Equity, Ed. '59, p. 725, Note 1; Edwards on Receivers, 2.)

A prima facie right must be made out in the first instance. (Practice Act, section 143.) If it should subsequently appear that the appointment of the receiver was improvidently made, the Court would undoubtedly have power to vacate it. In this instance the Court, upon the trial, was satisfied that the plaintiff, upon his own testimony, failed to sustain the prima facie case made by his pleadings and affidavit. Upon such a state of the case, it was clearly competent for the Court to vacate the order, notwithstanding a motion for a new trial was pending, and admitting the effect of the motion to be to stay proceedings generally. The order might have been vacated before trial upon a proper showing, and with much greater reason after it had appeared upon the trial, to the satisfaction of the Judge, that there was no probability of an ultimate recovery in the action. The Judge does not appear to have vacated the order as a matter of course upon granting the nonsuit. He took the question under advisement, and it must be presumed that the propriety of continuing the receiver, under all the circumstances of the case, was fully considered. We cannot perceive, from anything shown by the record that the Court, in vacating the order, exceeded the bounds of a sound judicial discretion. We may add, it is not clear that the affidavit makes a sufficient prima facie case to justify the appointment of the receiver in the first instance.

We think the case of Lurvey v. Wells, Fargo & Co., 4 Cal. 106, has been misapprehended by appellant's counsel. That case does not hold, as seems to be supposed, that at the moment a notice of motion for a new trial is served the Court loses all power over the case, except such as relates immediately to the determination of that motion, until such motion is finally decided. It simply holds that when a party, within the proper time, gives his notice and takes the steps necessary to perfect his motion, his rights as to such motion are preserved, and the Court retains its jurisdiction to grant a new trial, even though there should be an adjournment of the term before the motion is brought to a hearing. This was the only question considered by the Court, and all that was decided. The Judge below in that case construed the decision in Baldwin v. Kramer, 2 Cal. 582, as holding that unless a motion for new trial is perfected and decided at the same term at which the case is tried, the Court loses all jurisdiction over the case, and cannot grant a new trial at a subsequent term, although the party has taken all the necessary steps within the time prescribed by the statute, and no hiatus has occurred in his proceeding. On this construction he dismissed the motion for a new trial, on the ground that he had lost jurisdiction over the case by the adjournment of the term pending the motion. On the appeal the only point to which the attention of the Judge who delivered the opinion of the Court was directed, was whether, by the adjournment, the Court had lost jurisdiction to entertain the motion for a new trial. The Court did not undertake, nor did it intend to say, that all proceedings were necessarily stayed, or that no other action could be taken in the case till the motion for a new trial should be decided. There was no such question in the case, and all that was said had a direct reference to the precise question then under consideration, and to nothing else. To extend the decision of the Court beyond the question considered, would be to repeat the error committed by the District Judge in that very case, in construing the decision in Baldwin v. Creamer.

The motion for a new trial doubtless suspended the operation of the judgment of nonsuit, so far as to prevent it from operating of its own vigor as a discharge of the receiver, and preserved the rights of the plaintiff acquired under the order appointing the receiver until the order was directly acted upon by the Court. But it did not suspend the power of the Court to determine, under the circumstances of the case developed on the trial, the propriety of continuing the order in force till the motion for a new trial should be finally determined. There is nothing in the case of Lurvey v. Wells, Fargo & Co., when properly construed, inconsistent with the views here expressed. Judgment affirmed.

MINING CLAIMS — VERBAL SALE OF.—The rule allowing mining claims to be transferred by a verbal sale and delivery of possession, only applies to cases where the grantor is in actual possession and can deliver possession to the grantee; and does not extend to cases where at the time of the sale the claim is in the adverse possession of third parties. In such cases, there must be a written conveyance to pass the title.

Table Mountain Tunnel Company v. Stranahan, 20 Cal. 198, commented on.

APPEAL from the District Court, Sixteenth Judicial District, Calaveras County.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the Court.

M. G. Cobb, for Appellants.

Appellants claim that, under the decisions of the Supreme Court in English v. Johnson, 17 Cal. 107; Atwood v. Fricott, 17 Cal. 43; Table Mountain Tunnel Company v. Stranahan, 20 Cal. 199, that going upon a mining claim, posting up written notices thereon at each end of the claim showing the extent of their ground and indicative of their intention to work, and actually working upon a part of their claim—provided all this is conformable to mining customs—is a possession of the claim as full and effectual as though the claim were surrounded by a fence; that such a possession under the same decisions can be transferred without any instrument of writing, to be held in precisely the same way by the grantee or transferee.

Under the decisions the appellants fail to see what particular efficacy there might have been in a deed over the parcel transfer or surrender of possession in this case. The rule of law undoubtedly is that where an entry on land is made, under color of title by deed, the possession is deemed to extend to the bounds of the deed, although the actual settlement and improvements are only a small part of the tract. In such cases the law construes the entry to be co-extensive with the grant of the party, on the ground that it is his clear intention to assert such possession. (Ellicott v. Pearl, 10 Peters, 412.)

The Court, in Ellicott v. Pearl, 10 Peters, 441, Justice Story, says: "The assumption that there can be no possession to defeat an adverse title except in one or other of these ways—that is, by an actual residence or an actual inclosure—is a doctrine wholly irreconcilable with principle and authority. Nothing can be more clear than that a fence is not indispensable to constitute possession of a tract of land. The erection of a fence is nothing more than an act presumptive of an intention to assert an ownership and possession over the property. But there are many other acts which are equally evincive of such an intention of asserting such ownership and possession—such as entering upon land and making improvements thereon, raising crops thereon, felling and selling trees thereon, etc., under color of title."

In Barr v. Gratz, 4 Wheat. 228, the same Court, Justice Story, says: "Where two persons are in possession of land at the same time under different titles, the law adjudges him to have the seizin of the estate who has the older and better title."

In the case at bar the older and better title was in the plaintiffs, derived by them from the original locators, who located on the 29th of May, 1861.

Appellants understand the established doctrine of this Court now to be, that an entry on a mining claim under color of title by putting up notices or erecting metes or bounds, or by doing both, carries with it the possession of the whole claim to the extent claimed by the notices or defined by the metes and bounds erected, although the actual possession and improvements are only on a small part of the claim, or even not on the claim at all, but in proximity thereto.

If plaintiffs' grantors or vendors could locate a claim and hold it by posting notices, under the mining customs of the country, and if their claim as thus located could pass to plaintiffs by a transfer of possession merely — that is, such possession as they had under their notices — it then makes no difference whether the defendants entered before or after the transfer to plaintiffs, or whether they were claiming to occupy adversely or otherwise.

The entry of defendants does not come within the rule as laid down in Ellicott v. Pearl, and cases there cited, and any claim or act on the part of defendants under such an entry could not constitute an adverse possession.

The defendants' entry was upon the plaintiffs' grantors' possession, as said before, as much so as if plaintiffs' mining claim had been surrounded by a fence; and no claim or subsequent act on defendants' part can or could exalt their occupancy into anything but a naked trespass.

The plaintiffs had a right to consider the entry and acts of defendants as amounting to an ouster, and they had the right to elect the point of time at which this ouster should take place.

They have fixed it in their complaint as being on the 1st of July, 1861, four days after the transfer of possession to them.

Ouster by election is created by acts, without actual force, and in themselves equivocal and not necessarily amounting to an entire and immediate ouster of the freehold, but which the owner may, if he pleases, treat as usurpations of his freehold for the sake of vindicating his title by an action at law.

In such cases, the act of entry being equivocal, and being either a trespass or a disseizin, according to the intent, the law will not permit the wrongdoer to qualify his own wrong, and explain it to be a mere trespass, unless the owner elects so to consider it. (Prescott v. Nevers, 4 Mason, 326; Ricard v. Williams, 7 Wheat. 60; Robison v. Swett, 3 Green, 316; Allen v. Holten, 20 Pick. 458.)

George Cadwalader, for Respondent.

The question reduced to its true import: Is a parol sale of a copper mineral ledge, unattended or followed by the transfer of possession, valid?

This proposition the appellant must sustain in this Court, for the surrender by the locator, and the receipt of stock, can hardly amount to anything more or less than a purchase by the plaintiff of mining ground for shares in its capital stock.

The locator says: "I have one hundred feet in the Copper Hill Claim, which I will surrender to you for one hundred shares of your stock." The stock is delivered, and the transaction is done. This formula appellant is obliged to urge is the legal equivalent of a conveyance of a bill of sale or a transfer of the actual possession from seller to buyer.

The decisions of this Court, through twelve volumes, were to the effect that mining claims in this State were real estate or in the nature thereof, and that to pass title thereto it either required a deed, a bill of sale, or some memorandum in writing. (McCarron v. O'Connell, 7 Cal. 153; Merced Mining Company v. Fremont, 7 Cal. 319; McKeon v. Bisbee, 9 Cal. 142; Clark v. McElroy, 11 Cal. 160; Watts v. White, 13 Cal. 324; Merritt v. Judd, 14 Cal. 64; Boggs v. Merced Mining Company, 14 Cal. 374.)

Then followed the decision of this Court in the case of Table Mountain Company v. Stranahan, 20 Cal. 198, holding for the first time that the right of a miner in his claim was of such a nature that it might be parted with without a deed, bill of sale, or memorandum in writing, and by a transfer of the actual possession thereof from seller to buyer. This was the extent of the rule laid down.

When it said that rights resting in possession might be sold by a transfer of that possession, and that the transfer of that possession would be evidence of a sale, and equally efficacious as a conveyance, it surely did not contemplate the converse of the rule being true—that a right to a piece of mining ground not in possession might be sold or transferred by mere words. The transfer of possession imports some physical acts; the seller at the time must be in possession, he must give it up, and the buyer must take it. This done, the buyer becomes invested with the possessory right of the seller as fully as if a deed had been executed and delivered. The main question then is, What is evidence of the sale of a mining claim? because it is a question of evidence. We assert that there are only three ways in which such a sale can be proved:

1. By deed (which is the best way.)
2. By bill of sale.
3. By a transfer of the actual possession from seller to buyer.

Adverse counsel insists, however, there is a fourth mode, which is not by deed, nor by a bill of sale, nor by a transfer of possession, but by oral communication between seller and buyer, accompanied by the receipt of the consideration, and that the interests of the different parties in the claim in dispute passed to the plaintiff upon its stock issue to them.

It is scarcely conceivable that such a mode of conveyance of a copper ledge or a piece of mining ground can meet the sanction of this Court. Certain it is, that no decisions have at any time been made by this tribunal supporting such a doctrine, but all thereof are at war with it. A mining claim, whether real estate or not, approximates so nearly thereto as to draw to its government all the familiar rules of evidence relating to realty. Their possession is recovered in the action of ejectment; mortgages affect them in the same manner as they do real estate. Inherently they are valuable estates in law; to say that an oral sale thereof, when in the adverse possession of third parties, is valid, is to advance a doctrine that is dangerously false.

But the Court cannot fail to observe that the facts show that the defendants were in possession of the six hundred feet of ground before the plaintiff was created or acquired any interest or right in any part of the ground. Had the plaintiff entered under a paper title, conveying to it the entire claim, its possession would not have embraced the ground in our possession at that time. (Gunn v. Bates, 6 Cal. 263.)

The rule is thus stated by Judge Story in Ellicott v. Pearl, 10 Peters, 412, who says: "The entry into possession of a tract of land under a deed containing metes and bounds, gives a constructive possession of the whole tract if not in any adverse possession, although there may be no fence or inclosure round the ambit of the tract, and an actual residence only on part of it."

And here we may observe with great propriety that the entry of the plaintiff on the 26th day of June, 1861, with the oral consent of the locators, did not give the plaintiff a greater possessory right than if it had entered under a conveyance from the same parties. The doctrine, however, of Ellicott v. Pearl and Gunn v. Bates, is expressly limited to cases where parties enter under a paper title, and there would seem to be no such thing as a constructive possession of ground given by mere words, and hence it follows that whatever possession the plaintiff got from the locators could not and did not embrace the land in the possession of the defendants; and thus the Court will see that in whatever aspect the case of plaintiff is viewed, there is still the incurable defect, the broken link in the chain of title, or a failure to show an interest in the subject matter of the action.

By the Court, SAWYER, J.

This is an appeal from a judgment of nonsuit and the order denying a new trial. The suit was brought to recover six hundred feet of mining ground. The evidence of the plaintiff shows that a party of miners, on or about the 1st of June, 1861, located, in the usual mode, three thousand feet or more in length on a copper ledge, and commenced the work of developing the mine; that from the 7th to the 10th of June — certainly as early as the 10th — the defendants also located, by putting up notices and immediately commencing work upon it, that portion of the same lode now in controversy, and that they have ever since been in possession, claiming it under said location; that on the 26th of the same month the locators first named and their assigns, in pursuance of the statutes of California, organized themselves into a corporation under the name of the Copper Hill Mining Company, the present plaintiff; that the said parties then, to use their own phrase, "surrendered their claim to the corporation," and took stock in lieu of it. The language of all the witnesses on this point is nearly identical, and the following testimony of Mr. Brown will serve to express in the language of the witnesses all that was said in regard to the transfer of the title to the plaintiff: "I surrendered all my interests and those I was representing in and to said claim to corporation, Copper Hill Mining Company, plaintiff, and took certificates of stock in lieu. There were no deeds of this claim made to the corporation by any of the owners." The following is also stated in the records as an admission by plaintiff: "Plaintiff here admitted that no deeds or conveyances in writing were made to the corporation by any of the owners or holders of said mining claim; that all rights, claim, and possession of, in, and to said mining ground, whatever the same might be, are surrendered and given up to the company and merged in said corporation, such owners receiving from corporation certificates of stock according to the amount so surrendered." The foregoing facts and testimony, together with subsequent work and other acts of possession and ownership, on behalf of the corporation, on portions of the claim outside of the ground in dispute, constitute the evidence of title upon which plaintiff relied for a recovery.

The appellant claims that under the decision in Table Mountain Tunnel Company v. Stranahan, 20 Cal. 198, the evidence establishes a title sufficient to authorize a recovery. We think the principle announced in that case not applicable to the one under consideration. In the former case, the corporation had acquired the possession of the locators to the entire claim, and the defendants subsequently entered upon the possession of the corporation. In the present instance, the defendants entered into the adverse possession of the disputed ground before the corporation was formed, and they were in such adverse possession at the time of the organization of the corporation and the so-called "surrender" of the claims to the plaintiff, and the acceptance of the stock in lieu thereof by the locators. The corporation did not succeed to the possession of the locators in that part of the lode in dispute, for the reason that it was then and it has ever since been in the adverse possession of the defendants. The entry of the plaintiff upon such portion of its grantors' claims as was at that time in the possession of such grantors, did not draw after it the possession of that portion of their original claim which was then in the adverse possession of the defendants. The locators could only surrender such possession as they had, and that, as shown by the plaintiff's own evidence, did not, at the time of the surrender, or at any subsequent time, extend to the mining ground in dispute. The possession of the ground in controversy having never been transferred to the plaintiff, it was necessary to show that the plaintiff had acquired the title of the locators under whom it claimed. The witnesses, with singular uniformity of expression, use the loose language: I "surrendered" my "claim" or "interest," "and received certificates of stock in lieu." They do not state what acts they performed which they regarded as constituting the "surrender." It is manifest, however, that these parties, like many others in like cases, were at the time of the transaction acting under the erroneous impression that because they constituted the stockholders of the new corporation, they were, therefore, as to this mining enterprise, identical with the corporation itself, and that their title to the mining claims vested in the plaintiff by virtue of the act organizing themselves into a corporation for the purpose of working the mine. By that act alone, they only created an ideal being capable of receiving a conveyance of their respective interests in the mine. It did not invest the corporation with the title to those interests. In all probability there was no formal attempt or agreement to transfer the title. But place the facts appearing in the evidence in the light most favorable to the plaintiffs, and the most that can be claimed for them is, that in consideration of the receipt of the certificates of stock, there was an agreement and attempt to make an oral, verbal transfer to the plaintiffs of the respective interests of the locators in the mining ground at the time in the adverse possession of the defendants. We think that such a transfer is insufficient to pass the title. Under such circumstances a written instrument is necessary.

The appellant insists that the question as to the adverse possession of the defendants should have been submitted to the jury. The plaintiff's testimony clearly shows that the possession was adverse. The motion for nonsuit was made upon the close of plaintiff's testimony. It was not necessary to submit the question to the jury.

Judgment affirmed.

GEORGE W. TYLER v. J. F. HOUGHTON.

JURISDICTION OF SUPREME COURT.—Under the Constitution as amended, the Supreme Court has original jurisdiction to issue writs of mandamus certiorari, prohibition, and habeas corpus.

INTEREST OF TRUSTEE IN TRUST ESTATE.—A trustee of an express trust is a person having such beneficial interest in the trust estate, within the meaning of the four hundred and sixty-eighth section of the Practice Act, as to enable him to apply for a mandamus to compel the Surveyor-General to allow him to contest before him the application of a third person for the purchase of the land held in trust.

TRUSTEE—ACTION BY.—The trustee of an express trust may maintain an action to prevent waste or trespass upon the land held in trust, or to recover possession thereof, without joining with him his cestui que trust; and should he refuse to do so, his cestui que trust may compel him by action to do so.

STATE LANDS—CONTESTING PURCHASE OF.—It is the duty of the Surveyor-General to hear and determine all contests which may be brought before him by any person touching the right of the State to sell lands, or of the applicant to purchase the same, even though the contestant does not seek to purchase.

APPLICATION to the Supreme Court for writ of mandate.

In January, 1863, one Stayton was in the possession of a tract of land in the County of San Joaquin, described as the northeast quarter of section twenty-seven, the west half of the northwest quarter of section twenty-six, the southwest quarter of the southeast quarter of section twenty-two, and the southwest quarter of the southwest quarter of section twenty-three, township four north, range five east, Mount Diablo meridian.

The land was inclosed by a substantial fence, and Stayton and his grantors had been in possession of the same for about eight years. At the time aforesaid, Stayton deeded the land to Geo. W. Tyler, in trust, to pay certain debts due from Stayton to one Ryer. Stayton continued to occupy the land until October, 1863, as the tenant at will of Tyler; when, without Tyler's consent, he surrendered possession of the same to Fisher & Co. Fisher & Co., soon after, induced Granger and two other persons in their employ to apply to the State Locating Agent to locate the land for them in lieu of the sixteenth and thirty-sixth sections. The Agent made the location in the name of Granger, and sent it to the Surveyor-General for his approval.

Tyler filed in the office of the Surveyor-General his protest against the approval of the location, and claimed to be allowed to contest before him the right of Granger to have the location approved.

Tyler did not claim to locate the lands himself, but merely claimed the privilege of contesting the right of the State to select these lands.

The Surveyor-General refused to allow the contest to be made.

By the Court, SANDERSON, C. J.

This is an application for a mandamus to compel the Tyler v. Houghton.

respondent, as Surveyor-General and Register of the State Land Office, to allow the petitioner to contest before him the application of one Granger for the purchase of certain lands in lieu of the sixteenth and thirty-sixth sections, under the Act of the 27th of April, 1863.

The first question presented for our determination is as to the jurisdiction of this Court in this class of cases. Under the new Constitution, it is claimed this Court has original jurisdiction in cases of mandamus, certiorari, and prohibition. Upon this point the language of the old Constitution was as follows: "And the said Court, and each of the Justices thereof, shall have power to issue writs of habeas corpus at the instance of any person held in actual custody. They shall also have power to issue all other writs and process necessary to the exercise of their appellate jurisdiction." The new Constitution reads as follows: "The Court shall also have power to issue writs of mandamus, certiorari, prohibition, and habeas corpus, and also all writs necessary or proper to the complete exercise of its appellate jurisdiction." It is clear that under the old Constitution this Court had no original jurisdiction except in cases of habeas corpus. The only change made by the new Constitution is the addition of the writs of mandamus, certiorari, and prohibition. These writs could be issued in aid of the appellate jurisdiction of the Court previous to the amendments to the Constitution under the general power conferred to issue all writs and process necessary to the exercise of its appellate jurisdiction. Therefore, there could have been no occasion to enumerate these writs for the purpose of enlarging the appellate powers of the Court. Thus the change, in the language of the Constitution, is made purposeless, unless we hold that the intention was to add to the original jurisdiction of the Court. And we think, although it might have been more clearly expressed, that such intention is apparent from the language used. The clause in question must be read as giving express power to issue the writs of mandamus, certiorari, prohibition, and habeas corpus, and in addition thereto, all writs necessary or proper to the complete exercise of its appellate jurisdiction. By this reading only can any design be accorded to the change which has been made.

The petitioner in this case holds the title or interest in the land in question, by virtue of which he claims the right to contest the application of Granger, as trustee of an express trust, and it is urged that he is not "the party beneficially interested," within the meaning of the four hundred and sixty-eighth section of the Practice Act, which prescribes by whom an application for a mandamus shall be made. That section requires the application to be made by "the party beneficially interested." It is the duty of a trustee to look after, guard, and protect the trust estate against all enemies; and it is not the policy of the law to place stumbling blocks in his path. On the contrary, it intends to afford every facility to that end. And especially is such the case under our system of practice. The sixth section of the Practice Act is in the following words: "An executor or administrator, or trustee of an express trust, or a person expressly authorized by statute, may sue, without joining with him the person or persons for whose benefit the action is prosecuted. * * * ." That the trustee would be bound to bring an action to prevent waste or trespass upon the land in question, or ejectment to recover its possession in case of ouster, does not admit of doubt. On the contrary, should he refuse to do so, his cestui que trust may bring an action to compel him to do so. Such being the case, it is anomalous to say that he cannot apply for other relief, if necessary, in his own name. The application for a mandamus is a proceeding in the nature of an action; and in our judgment the sixth section of the Practice Act as much applies to the case of a mandamus as to any other which may arise under that Act. In our judgment, an executor or administrator, or trustee of an express trust, may invoke any remedy afforded by the law of the land, in their own names, without joining with them the person or persons for whose benefit they are acting, in all cases where such remedy is lawful and proper, and that they labor under no disability which would not attach to the parties for whom they act. It follows that the petitioner in the present case is a party beneficially interested within the meaning of the four hundred and sixty-eighth section.

The petitioner does not himself, nor on behalf of his cestui que trust, seek a purchase from the State of the land in question; and it is next urged, on behalf of the Surveyor-General and Register of the State Land Office, that he is not authorized to entertain a contest between parties who are not both applying for a purchase of the land. We do not so read the statute. There is certainly no such restriction expressly imposed by the terms of the Act, and such a restriction is repugnant to the whole scope and design of the Act. The object of the Act, as expressed in its title, is to provide for the sale of lands belonging to the State. In order to effect this object, it is of primary consequence to ascertain what land belongs to the State. When application is made for the purchase of any given parcel of land, it is of first importance, alike to the interest of the purchaser and the State, to ascertain whether such land is subject to selection and location by the State. If it is not, the State can neither pass the title, nor can the applicant acquire any by the proposed action. It would be folly, therefore, on the part of the State and the purchaser, to avoid any contest which might throw light upon the question of title. Clearly it is the policy of the Act in question to invite rather than discourage contests of this kind. The State can gain nothing by selling land to which she has no title, and to decline a contest involving that title, from whatever quarter it may come, would be practicing a species of fraud upon her own citizens, for by such a course it may not unfrequently happen that she will sell land which does not belong to her, and involve the purchaser in litigation more costly than the land itself, to which its loss may be superadded. In our judgment, it is made the duty of the Surveyor-General to hear and determine all contests which may be brought before him touching the right of the State to sell, or the applicant to purchase, in the manner prescribed in the twenty-seventh section of the Act.

Uridias v. Morrell, (No. 2.)

Let a peremptory mandamus issue pursuant to the prayer of the petitioner.

JOSE G. URIDIAS v. JOHN C. MORRELL. (No. 2.)

TENANT AT SUFFERANCE.—By the common law, a tenant who holds over after the expiration of his lease, was regarded as a tenant at sufferance; but this estate was destroyed whenever the true owner made an actual entry on the lands and ousted the tenant.

TENANT HOLDING OVER.—Section thirteen of the Act concerning forcible entry and detainer, as amended by the third section of the Act of 1862, makes no change in the common law except in the fact that it dispenses with a formal entry, and substitutes therefor a written demand.

SAME—UNLAWFUL DETAINER.—A complaint in an action based upon said section, where eight months had expired after the expiration of the lease, which does not aver that the holding over on the part of the defendant was wrongful, nor that a surrender of the possession was demanded and refused within the year ensuing the lease, does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action.

SAME—EVIDENCE EXTENDING LEASE.—An agreement made by the landlord with the tenant, after the expiration of the lease, that the tenant shall have possession of the premises one year longer, paying therefor a stipulated rent, to be paid if the land is included in a certain survey, vests in the tenant the present right to possess the lands until the expiration of the agreement, and if pleaded, is admissible in evidence as a defense to an action for holding over brought before the expiration of the time specified in the agreement.

PLEADING INCONSISTENT DEFENSES.—If inconsistent defenses are set up in an answer, the defect must be reached by motion to strike out or by demurrer; and if no objection be taken to the answer on this ground, defendant may on the trial rely on any of these defenses.

APPEAL from the County Court, Santa Clara County.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the Court.

S. O. Houghton, for Appellant.

In an action to recover possession from a tenant holding over, there should be some allegation charging not only that his lease has expired, but also that he continues in possession of the demanded premises wrongfully after a lawful demand has been made that he deliver up the possession. If the defendant is a tenant refusing to pay rent, a demand of rent was necessary to make his further holding illegal.

No such demand is alleged, nor is it alleged that the defendant is holding over after the expiration of his lease without the consent of his landlord the plaintiff, or that his holding is wrongful.

The complaint shows defendant to have entered lawfully; the presumption of law is that his continued possession is also lawful; and to overcome such presumption there should be some allegation to show such holding to be wrongful.

The mere fact of a tenant remaining in possession after the expiration of the lease under which he entered, does not necessarily make such possessing wrongful, for it may be rightful through the mere acquiescence of the landlord, or may be with his consent. The complaint should state facts sufficient to show a right in the plaintiff to the possession of the premises sued for at the time of the commencement of the action.

In Conway v. Starkweather, 1 Denio, 114, it was held that: "When a tenant under a demise for a year or more holds over after the end of his term without any new agreement of his landlord, he may be treated as a tenant from year to year, and in all other respects as holding according to the terms of the original lease. He will be a tenant if the landlord either receives or distrains for rent after the end of the original term; and when he neither says or does anything, his acquiescence may perhaps be inferred from mere lapse of time."

From the allegations of the complaint, it appears that the defendant remained in possession eight months after the end of his original term, without any notice to quit being given; and if the acquiescence of the landlord can be presumed from his silence in any case, it most certainly can under circumstances such as these.

The defendant naturally supposed from his silence that the plaintiff consented to his retaining possession for another year upon the same terms as previously stipulated.

By remaining in possession, the defendant became liable to pay to the plaintiff the rent of the premises for that year at the rate reserved in the lease under which he entered; and as a result of this liability, he became entitled to the possession for the same period as a tenant from year to year, and this tenancy could only be terminated by a notice to quit of one month, terminating with the end of the year, to wit: on the first of October, 1862. (Statutes of 1861, p. 514.)

This statute is the same as the New York revised statute, under which it was held that a tenant from year to year may be summarily removed upon one month's notice to quit, terminating with the year. (Prouty v. Prouty, 5 How. P. R. 81.)

In Jackson v. Salmon, 4 Wend. 327, it was held that when the defendant had hired the premises for one year, and continued in possession after that period, he was a tenant from year to year, and entitled to notice to quit.

The alleged notice here was premature, as was also the action. Even though the notice was good, the plaintiff's right of action did not accrue until the first day of October, 1862, the end of the current year.

In this complaint it appears that the possession is demanded against a tenant holding after the lease under which he entered has expired, and also the rent of the premises at the rate specified in said lease from the time of the expiration thereof. The only ground upon which an action can be maintained for the recovery of rent, is that the defendant is the tenant of plaintiff. Yet such facts as show rent to be due from the defendant to the plaintiff are not stated; nor are there such allegations in the complaint as show that defendant has forfeited his term by non-payment of rent after demand thereof.

Yocell & Williams, for Respondent.

The averments of the complaint are, and the proof shows, that the lease was for a certain and definite length of time. In such a case the tenant is bound to know when his term expires, and if he holds over after its termination, he is strictly a tenant at will, and would not be entitled to notice but for our statute, which treats him as a holding over tenant, entitled to three days' notice. (4 Kent, 114; Story on Contracts, sec. 934; Taylor's L. and T., 465; Forcible Entry Act, sec. 13.)

Urdias v. Morrell, (No. 2.)

No such continuing tenancy as is claimed by appellant will be presumed, unless there was payment and acceptance of rent after expiration of term, and there is no pretence of anything of the kind here. (Taylor's L. and T., secs. 58, 718, 468; 7 Cow. 747; 4 Wend. 327; 5 Wend. 26.) The defendant could not have supposed that plaintiff acquiesced in a new term, because negotiations were always pending as to character and term of lease, and amount of rent for a new term; and if he occupied during such period, it was with knowledge that the plaintiff could terminate his occupancy at any time by notice to quit, in the absence of a new contract.

By the Court, SHAFER, J.

This action is based upon the thirteenth section of the Forcible Entry and Detainer Act, as amended by the third section of the Act of 1862. The complaint alleges that the plaintiff demised the premises to the defendant for one year ensuing the first of October, 1860, at the yearly rent of two dollars per acre; that on or about the first of October, 1860, the defendant entered into possession of the premises under the lease, and that after the expiration of the term the defendant failed and refused to deliver the possession of the premises to the plaintiff, or to pay the rents therefor; and that when such delivery was demanded, in writing, on the third of June, 1862, the defendant neglected and refused to deliver. The complaint was filed July 16, 1862.

The complaint was demurred to on the ground that it did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. The demurrer was overruled, and thereafter the case was tried upon the issues of fact. The verdict of the jury was for the plaintiff, and the defendant appeals from the judgment and from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

I. It is claimed that the order overruling the demurrer was erroneous.

It is urged that there is no allegation in the complaint that the holding over on the part of the defendant was wrongful, and that in the absence of such allegation it must be presumed that the holding over was under some new and substantive agreement, or at least by leave and license of the plaintiff.

When a tenant holds over after the expiration of his lease, he is regarded by the common law as a tenant at sufferance; but this estate may be destroyed whenever the true owner shall make an actual entry on the lands and oust the tenant; for before entry he cannot maintain an action for trespass against the tenant by sufferance as he might against a stranger; and the reason is, because the tenant being in by lawful title, the law, which presumes no wrong in any man, will suppose him to continue upon a title equally lawful, unless the owner of the land, by some public and avowed act, such as entry is, will declare his continuance to be tortious. (2 Blk. Com. 150.)

Further: section thirteen, as amended by the Act of 1862, assumes the rule of the common law to be as above stated; for it provides that when a tenant holds over after the expiration of his term, that a demand for delivery of possession "may be made at any time within a year after the termination of the lease;" and if demand is so made, that thereupon the lessor may proceed to expel the tenant. The only change made in the common law by the Act of 1862 lies in the fact that it dispenses with formal entry and substitutes therefor a written demand.

The complaint does not show any renewal of the lease in terms, nor does it show a state of facts from which the law will intend a renewal, binding alike upon both parties. It does not state that the plaintiff received rent, neither does it state any other fact raising a presumption in law that the lease had been renewed; nor does it disclose facts amounting to an estoppel in pais; and if the fact that the plaintiff omitted for the period of eight months to make a formal demand for a delivery of the premises, imports that, ad interim, the defendant was in possession by license or acquiescence on the part of the plaintiff, still the license was a revocable one under the adjustments of the Act of 1862, and was revoked, in fact, by the formal demand alleged, made, as it was, within the time which the Act prescribes.

II. The appellant further insists that the Court erred in refusing to admit evidence tendered by him in support of a special defense alleged in the answer.

The defense, as stated in the answer, is as follows: "The defendant avers that said plaintiff agreed to and with said defendant, on or about the first day of December, 1861, that he, said defendant, should and might have the possession of said premises for one year ending October 1, 1862; and to pay as rent therefor two dollars per acre; said rent to be paid at the harvest season of 1862, in the event that the final survey and confirmation of said Rancho of Milpitas should include said premises. And it was also then and there agreed between said plaintiff and defendant that if said final survey and confirmation should be so made by the United States District Court in San Francisco as to exclude said premises and throw them without the boundaries of said rancho, then that said plaintiff would not ask or receive from said defendant any rent for said premises for said year ending October 1, 1862."

The counsel of the respondent justifies the ruling of the Court excluding the evidence tendered in support of this defense, on two grounds:

First—That the contract set up was executory in its character.

Second—That the defense was inconsistent with other defenses asserted in the answer.

It may be admitted that the contract was executory in its character, still it vested in the defendant, in presenti, a right to possess the lands until October 1, 1862, and a right in the plaintiff to the stipulated rent, subject only to the contingency named in the contract. It was not an agreement for a lease to be executed before the defendant could possess his term, but was itself a lease in legal effect, and not executory in any sense except in the sense in which all leases are executory: that is, the right created by it remained to be enjoyed.

As to the second position taken for the respondent in sup port of the Court's ruling, it is fully met by the decision in Klink v. Cohen, 13 Cal. 623: "If inconsistent defenses are set up, the defect must be reached by motion to strike out, or in some cases by demurrer; and if no objection be taken to the answer on this ground, defendant, on the trial, may rely on any of his defenses, as under the old system."

Judgment reversed and cause remanded.

FAILURE TO FILE BRIEFS.—Where a cause is submitted on briefs to be filed in a specified time, and no briefs are filed within the time, and the transcript contains no assignment of errors, the judgment will be affirmed.

APPEAL from the District Court, Twelfth Judicial District, City and County of San Francisco.

Plaintiff recovered judgment in the Court below, and defendants appealed.

George F. & Wm. H. Sharp, for Appellants.

J. B. Crockett, for Respondent.

By the Court, SANDERSON, C. J.

On the 24th of February, 1864, this action was submitted on briefs, to be filed in ten days by appellants and ten days thereafter by respondent. On the 14th of April, upon the application of respondent, ten days further time was granted. That time has more than elapsed, and no briefs have been filed, and the transcript contains no assignment of errors. For these reasons we affirm the judgment of the Court below.

Judgment affirmed.

Moss v. Shear.

JOSEPH MORA MOSS v. CHARLES SHEAR.

MERE PROFITS—VALUE OF IMPROVEMENTS.—A defendant in ejectment who desires to set off the value of his improvements against the mere profits, must assert his right by proper averments in his answer, or he is precluded from doing so at the trial.

TAX DEEDS—STRENGTHENING TITLE.—One who is under any legal or moral obligation to pay taxes cannot, by neglecting to pay the same and allowing the land to be sold in consequence of such neglect, add to or strengthen his title either by purchasing at the sale himself, or by suffering a stranger to buy and then purchasing from him.

SAME.—One who is under no legal or moral obligation to pay taxes is not precluded from purchasing at the tax sale, although in possession at the time the assessment was made or when the land was sold.

ASSESSMENT FOR TAXES—VALIDITY OF.—Under the Revenue Act of 1854, if lands were assessed to unknown owners, the Assessor must have stated in his list that the land was so assessed, because it was unoccupied and the owner was unknown, or the assessment created no charge upon the land, and no legal obligation was imposed on any one to pay the taxes.

SAME.—In order to impart any validity to the acts of an Assessor, the provisions of the statute must be strictly followed, and all its conditions fully complied with by him.

CHANGE OF COUNTY BOUNDARIES—LIEN OF TAX.—When, by a change of county boundaries made after land has been assessed for taxes, it falls into another county, the lien of the tax on the land still continues, and the Tax Collector of the old county may enforce the collection of the tax by sale.

TAX DEED—RECITALS OF.—It was not necessary under the Revenue Act of 1854 to recite in a tax deed the various acts showing a compliance on the part of the revenue officers with the several conditions of the statute. These acts, if inserted in the deed, are prima facie evidence; but if not inserted, may be proved alunde.

APPEAL from the District Court, Twelfth Judicial District, City and County of San Francisco.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the Court.

George Cadwalader, for Appellant.

The plaintiff proves that at the time of the assessment the Bernals were the owners of the premises; that they failed to pay the taxes due; and that one William M. Lent purchased the premises, and thereby discharged the debt due by the Bernals to the State, and that as an equivalent therefor Lent received a conveyance of the property, which the Legislature, by the ninetieth section of the Revenue Law of 1854, declared should be "prima facie evidence in all the Courts of this State of the conveyance of all the right, title, and interest in and to said property owned by the delinquent or delinquents at the time of the assessment."

The delinquents in this case were the unknown owners—the owners who in two ways had tried to evade the effect of the revenue law by neglecting to furnish the property as their own to the Assessor, and by refusing to pay the taxes when due.

The law, section sixty-four, enjoins the owner to pay the taxes upon his real estate, and goes so far as to declare that when the same are paid by the occupant he may recover the amount paid by action against the owner.

The same law, section seventy-six, says:

"In the same manner every person shall deliver up to the Assessor a just and true list of all property taxable by law."

While section eighty-two declares that:

"If the owner or owners of any property liable to taxation shall be unknown, or a non-resident, or absent, or refuse when called upon by the Assessor or his authorized deputy to give a list of his property, real or personal, subject to taxation, it shall be the duty of the Assessor or his authorized deputy in either or all the above enumerated cases, to make a list thereof from the best information he can obtain, and attach thereto such valuation as he may deem just, and enter the same upon his roll, and the assessment thus made shall have the same force and effect as though it had been made by the owner or owners of all the property thus listed."

Again: we say, the owner having failed or refused to list his property—and the Assessor having listed it to unknown owners—such assessment, by force of the statute just cited, gave it the same force and effect against the property as if its owner had performed his duty to the State.

The land was in San Mateo County at the time of the assessment, and remained there until the 18th of April, 1857.

From such premises respondent's counsel argues that the Tax Collector of San Mateo County had no authority to sell the land for the delinquent tax, it being in San Francisco County.

Moss v. Shear.

This we deny, for Blackwell, in his work on Tax Titles, observes, page 345:

“Where, after an assessment is made, the county in which the proceeding is had is divided, the Collector of the old county has power to sell land lying in the territory embraced in the newly created county. This is in conformity with the general principles of law in analagous cases.” (9 Watts & Sergeant, 80; 5 Watts, 87; 6 Watts, 435; 16 Ohio, 466; 17 Ohio, 135; 16 Mass. 86; 4 Mass. 389; 6 J. J. Marsh, 147; 4 Halstead, 357.)

It is contended by respondent's counsel that under the Revenue Law of 1854, an assessment of occupied lands to unknown owners, the State gets no lien on the land, and that a tax sale thereof would be void. We do not read the law so, nor do we believe such to be its spirit and intention. The question does not arise in this case, because there is no proof that the land was occupied at the date of the assessment; and because, as we have already seen, the Legislature of 1857 legalized the assessment. Yet, the proposition being argued by respondent's counsel, we submit the following remarks in regard thereto:

Under some of the old tax systems, (nearly all,) taxes were a personal charge, which some States enforced by confinement of the body, or seizure of the personal property of the delinquent, whose defenses were that the assessments were not in fact against him, and if they were that they were improperly made; and as they generally succeeded, to the great injury of the State, a new system was devised which made the tax upon real estate become a direct lien upon the same, only extinguishable by payment of the tax, either by a sale of the property or otherwise — and under it the question came up again whether an assessment to the wrong owner, or to no owner, exonerated the land from the tax. There is no doubt but what an assessment to the wrong owner, or no owner, releases the true owner from all personal obligation to pay the tax, but not the land. (Strauch v. Schoonmaker, 1 Watts & Serg. 166; Smith v. Northampton Bank, 4 Cushing, 1; 10 Wendell, 346; 8 Ohio, 539; 20 Ohio, 556.)

Even under statutes that require Assessors to list land to the owner thereof, an assessment to the wrong owner is valid, without it is proved "aliunde" that the name of the true owner was known to the officer. (Blackwell on Tax Titles, 175; 6 N. H. 182; 1 Foster, 400; 13 Illinois, 716.)

In 3 Richardson, Law 27, the tax execution recited an assessment against "the estate of Mrs. Hammond." This was the only informality in the proceedings, and it was insisted that the warrant ought to express upon its face the name of some person liable for the tax; that the heirs—if Mrs. Hammond were so liable in this instance—and their names ought to have been inserted. The Court held the execution valid.

H. O. Beatty, also for Appellant.

John B. Felton, for Respondent.

This case of Blakely v. Beston, 13 Ill. 714, upon which the appellant rests his whole argument, and from which he quotes the doctrine that "it does not necessarily follow that because a person is in possession of premises he is bound to pay the taxes assessed upon them," as well as the obvious corollary that in such case the tax deed should be admitted, and the holder thereof be permitted to show that though in possession he was under no obligation to pay, is certainly no authority for a case where the revenue law, as in 1854, imposed absolutely on the occupant the obligation to pay, the owner, as here, being unknown. We insist that under the law of this listing, the defendant, the party in possession, was necessarily bound to pay the taxes, and hence that he could not by any evidence remove that obligation.

It is true that in this case the land was not actually listed to the defendant, as it should have been, but was listed to "unknown owners;" but this cannot avail the defendant. It appears in proof, and is admitted by appellant in his brief, that the defendant was in possession; it could not, then, have been properly listed to "unknown owners." Section sixty-five provides: "Unoccupied lands shall be listed in the name of the owner if known—otherwise as lands of persons unknown." It is only unoccupied lands that can be listed to "unknown owners." If, therefore, the defendant attempts to avoid the obligation to pay the taxes by appealing to the listing as not to himself, but to unknown owners, he meets a more hopeless difficulty; for the land being actually occupied was improperly listed to unknown owners, and his tax sale is void on that account. Thus, it appears that the defendant is attempting to take advantage either of his own wrong or of the wrong of the Assessor; for if the Assessor had done his duty the land would have been listed to him and be liable for the taxes; his only excuse for not paying them is that the Assessor did not list them to him, as we see he should have done. Inevitably, therefore, if the tax sale is not inoperative and void as to himself, because of his own neglect of duty, it is void altogether, because of the Assessor's neglect of duty.

We insist, therefore, that to have admitted the deed would have been error, because it was apparent to the Court that the defendant could not possibly have claimed title under it. No proof could have given validity to the deed. It seems hardly necessary to elaborate an argument as to the invalidity of a seizure and sale by a Sheriff beyond the limits of his county. It is true that by the Act of April 7, 1857, (p. 184,) the time for collecting taxes in the County of San Mateo was extended to June 15th. But the subsequent Act of April 18th, changing the limits of the county, made no provision for the collection beyond the new limits. Of course the change was a restriction of the jurisdiction of all the county officers to the new limits of the county. If the tax was properly assessed before the change of boundaries, the lien would possibly continue after the change. But its enforcement must be made, if at all, by the officers of the county within which the land is included. The absence of any provision for the collection of such a tax is casus omissus that would probably practically prevent the collection of the tax; but all we contend for is that it certainly defeats the action of the Tax Collector in seizing and selling beyond the limits of his jurisdiction.

The next objection to the tax deed is its insufficient recitals. The deed, in order to be prima facie evidence of the conveyance intended to be effected by it, must, of course, contain the same recitals as are presented for the certificate. (See pp. 109, 110, of Acts of 1854.) The Act requires (p. 109) that "the amount of the assessment, and their nature," should appear. The amount and nature of the assessment can only mean the amount and nature of the tax levied and assessed upon the property; that is, the character of the sums which make up the amount of tax assessed against the property, the intention being, doubtless, that the validity of the tax and assessment should appear in the instrument. Nothing of this appears in the deed; not the several items of taxation; not the percentage of tax; not even the amount of assessment or the valuation of the property; but only the amount of assessment, with costs. Nothing appears on the face of the deed from which we can by any possible calculation arrive at the amount or nature of the assessment. This provision is dispensed with in the in other respects more elaborate recitals of the Act of 1857. But this Act of 1854 is very explicit in its requirements.

Again: the Act of 1854 provides that the recitals shall contain the date of the notice of seizure. But the deed fails to do so. The date of the seizure is recited, but not of the notice of seizure.

By the Court, SANDERSON, C. J.

This is an action for the possession of land and for the recovery of mesne profits. The complaint is in the usual form, not verified. The answer contains a denial of all the material facts stated in the complaint, and an averment of title in the defendant. The plaintiff recovered judgment for the possession of the land, and twenty-one hundred dollars rents and profits.

The defendant moved for a new trial, which was denied. The appeal is from the judgment and from the order denying a new trial.

I. In support of his case the plaintiff produced a patent from the Government of the United States, and several mesne conveyances, showing a regular chain of title from the patentees to himself, and proved that the land in controversy was included within the calls of the patent and mesne conveyances, and also proved the value of the use and occupation.

The defendant, by way of set-off to the plaintiff's claim for mesne profits, offered testimony as to the value of his improvements, which, upon the objection of the plaintiff, was excluded by the Court. This ruling of the Court is assigned as error.

No claim for improvements is made in the answer, and for that reason alone the testimony was properly excluded. A defendant in ejectment, who desires to set off the value of his improvements against the mesne profits, must assert his right by proper averments in his answer, or he is precluded from doing so at the trial. In such cases, the value of the improvements constitutes a counter claim, or set-off, and in order to make it available as a defense, it must, like any other new matter, be pleaded.

II. The defendant relied upon a tax title, in support of which he offered a tax deed from the Sheriff and ex officio Tax Collector to W. M. Lent. Then a deed from Lent to John P. Shear, and a lease from John P. Shear to himself. This evidence was objected to by the plaintiff, upon several grounds, and excluded by the Court. Which ruling is next assigned as error.

It appears from the tax deed, which is a part of the record, that the land was listed as the land of persons unknown by the Assessor, and that the same was sold for the taxes for the fiscal year 1856 and 1857. The testimony on the part of the plaintiff proved that the defendant had been in the occupation of the land since 1856. Under these circumstances it is claimed by the plaintiff that the defendant could not strengthen his title, either by purchasing at the tax sale himself, or by suffering a stranger to buy, and then purchasing from him.

If the defendant was under any legal or moral obligation to pay the taxes, he could not, by neglecting to pay the same and allowing the land to be sold in consequence of such neglect, add to or strengthen his title by purchasing at the sale himself, or by subsequently buying from a stranger who purchased at the sale. Otherwise, he would be allowed to gain an advantage from his own fraud or negligence in failing to pay the taxes. This the law does not permit, either directly or indirectly. On the contrary, if the defendant was under no legal or moral obligation to pay the taxes, there is no principle of law or equity which precludes him from purchasing at the sale, although in possession at the time the assessment was made or when the land was sold. Blackwell, in his work on Tax Titles, at page 470, uses this language: "One in possession of a tract of land at the date of the assessment, may purchase at the sale, unless it appears that he was bound to pay the taxes; in which case he can acquire no title by his purchase." (Piatt v. Sinclair's Heirs, 6 Ohio, 227; Choate v. Jones, 11 Ill. 822.)

In the present case the taxes were assessed under the Revenue Act of 1854. (Statutes of 1854, p. 88.) The sixty-fourth section of that Act is in the following language: "Lands occupied by any person not the owner thereof shall be listed in the name of the owner, if known; otherwise, in the name of the occupant, who shall pay the taxes on the same; and for the taxes paid by such occupant he shall have his action against the owner." The sixty-fifth section of the same Act provides that "unoccupied lands shall be listed in the name of the owner, if known; otherwise, as lands of persons unknown * * *." Thus, the Assessor is required to list the land in the name of the owner, when known, whether the land be vacant or occupied; but when the owner is unknown he must list the land, if occupied, in the name of the occupant; if unoccupied, he must list it as the land of a person unknown. This rule must be strictly followed by the Assessor, in order to impart any validity to the assessment. If the land is unoccupied and the owner unknown, both these facts must appear in the list made by the Assessor in order to make an assessment to an unknown owner valid. If the land is occupied and the owner unknown, both of these facts must appear in the list in order to make an assessment to the occupant valid; or, in other words, a vacancy as to possession, and an ignorance of the true owner, are conditions precedent to the validity of an assessment against an unknown owner; and, where the land is occupied, ignorance of the true owner is a condition precedent to the validity of an assessment against an occupant. If the land be listed to the owner, nothing more need be stated by the Assessor; but if it be listed in the name of an occupant who is not the owner, it must be stated by the Assessor to have been so listed because the owner was unknown to him; and if it be listed as the land of a person unknown, he must state the land is so listed because the owner is unknown and the land is unoccupied. Unless this care is observed the assessment has not been made according to law, and constitutes no charge upon the land, and no legal obligation is imposed upon any one to pay the taxes. In order to impart any validity to the acts of the Assessor, the provisions of the statute must be strictly followed, and all its conditions fully complied with by that officer. "In powers of this nature a series of acts, preliminary in character, are required by law to precede the execution of the power. Each and every step, from the listing of the land for taxation to the consummation of the title by the delivery of a deed to the purchaser, is a separate and independent fact. All of these facts, from the beginning to the end of the proceeding, must exist; and if any material link in the chain of title be wanting, the whole falls to the ground for the want of sufficient authority to support it." (Blackwell on Tax Titles, p. 84.)

From what has been said, it follows that the defendant, notwithstanding he may have been in the occupation of the land at the time the assessment was made, (the land not having been listed in his name,) was under no obligation to pay the taxes, and therefore was not precluded from purchasing the tax title. Independent of this, it does not appear that the defendant was in possession at the date of the assessment. The witness who was examined upon this point says "that the defendant has been in possession since 1856." This language embraces no part of the year 1856. The assessment, if made at the time required by law, must have been made between the first Mondays of March and August of the year 1856. In either aspect, therefore, the defendant was not precluded from buying at the tax sale.

The land was assessed for the taxes in question in San Mateo County, and was sold by the Tax Collector of that county, and the deed in question made by him. It was proved by the plaintiff that the land, at the time this action was brought, was in the County of San Francisco. The present boundaries between the two counties were established by Act of the Legislature on the 18th day of April, 1857, and the tax sale was made in June thereafter. These facts are the foundation of the second objection to the deed, which is to the effect that the sale was illegal, admitting that all the previous proceedings were regular. If the land was in San Mateo County at the date of the assessment, a subsequent change in the county boundaries, resulting in a change or transfer of the land to another county, could not defeat the lien of the assessment, nor divest the Tax Collector of San Mateo of the power to enforce the collection of the taxes by sale of the land. Upon this point, Mr. Blackwell, in his work on Tax Titles, at page three hundred and forty-five, remarks: "When, after an assessment is made, the county in which the proceeding was had is divided, the Collector of the old county has power to sell land lying in the territory embraced in the newly created county," and cites Devor v. McClintock, 9 Watts & S. 80; and adds: "This is in conformity with the general principles of law in analogous cases." The next and last objection to the deed is that it does not contain the necessary recitals. This objection, in our judgment, is also untenable. It is not necessary, under the Act of 1854, to recite in the deed the various acts which show a compliance, on the part of the revenue officers, with the several conditions of the statute. These acts are only required to be recited in the certificate of purchase. Their omission from the deed only affects the question of proof. If inserted in the deed, the deed becomes prima facie evidence of the truth of the recitals, and the burden of showing that the law has not been complied with in the preliminary steps is cast upon the adversary party. But if omitted, the party offering the deed must prove, aliunde, all that is necessary to the validity of the sale. The statute does not prescribe the form of the deed, but simply authorizes the execution of a deed of conveyance in fee simple to the purchaser; and its sufficiency must be tested by the principles of the common law. "Any deed which, according to the rules of the common law, would be sufficient to transfer the title of the former owner and vest the estate in the purchaser, is regarded as an operative mode of conveyance, provided it recites the power under which it was made, and is accompanied by proof that the law was strictly complied with." (Blackwell on Tax Titles, page 435; Chandler v. Spear, 22 Vermont, 388; Brown v. Hutchinson, 11 Ib. 569; Spear v. Ditty, 8 Ib. 419; Bank of Utica v. Mersean, 3 Barb. 528.)

It is not pretended that the deed, tested by the rules of the common law, is insufficient. It is good as an ordinary conveyance, and contains a recital of the power under which it was made. This is all that was necessary to entitle it to be read in evidence. In order to render it of any avail, the defendant would have been compelled to follow it up with other evidence, showing that the law had been strictly complied with. We cannot presume that he was unable to do this, and declare that therefore the deed was properly excluded.

The judgment is reversed and a new trial ordered.

MARIA L. P. DE CASTRO v. JAMES RICHARDSON, JONATHAN RICHARDSON, JOHN WHISMAN, G. RICH, CHARLES RICE, MINERVA RICE, JOEL LEVINE, GEORGE CHARLESTON, DANIEL FRY, EMELINE CREWS, CALEB CREWS, H. M. HENDERSON, A. JEFFREY, HUGH BROWN, HENRY RINGSTAFF, W. D. HUDSON, MATHEW W. DIXON, JAMES CREWS, ANDREW WHISMAN, STEPHEN J. LANE, AND GEORGE GLEASON.

AMENDMENT OF RECORDS OF COURT.—Where an order has been made extending the time allowed by statute to prepare a statement on motion for a new trial, and the term has adjourned, the Court has no power at a subsequent term to amend the order, so as to make it include a notice of intention to move for a new trial, unless a motion to amend has been made at the term during which the order was entered and continued, or unless the record discloses that the entry does not correctly give what was the order of the Court.

SAME.—The power of a Court to amend the record after the adjournment of a term only extends to the correction of a mere clerical error.

STRIKING OUT STATEMENT.—If the notice of intention to move for a new trial is not given within the statutory time, and no waiver of the failure to give the same is shown, the Supreme Court will, on motion, strike the statement from the transcript.

APPEAL from the District Court, Third Judicial District, Santa Clara County.

This was an action of ejectment to recover possession of a tract of land in Santa Clara County.

Plaintiff recovered judgment in the Court below, and defendants appealed. The other facts are stated in the opinion of the Court.

J. Clarke, for Appellants.

S. O. Houghton, for Respondent.

By the Court, RHODES, J.

The appeal in this case is taken from the judgment and from the order denying the defendants' motion for a new trial. The verdict for the plaintiff was rendered on the 10th day of September, 1862, and on that day the Court made an order "that the defendants have thirty days time within which to prepare a statement on motion for a new trial in this cause, and, in the meantime, proceedings on the part of the plaintiff be delayed." On the 9th day of October the defendants served the plaintiff with a notice of motion for a new trial. The plaintiff gave notice to the defendants on the 25th of December, that he would, on the 5th day of January, 1863, move the Court to strike out their motion for a new trial, on the ground that no notice of motion had been served or filed within the time prescribed by law. On the 27th of December, the defendants served the plaintiff with a notice that on the first day of January next, at the opening of the Court, they would move the Court "to amend and correct the entry in the minutes of the Court of the order made by said Court on the 10th day of September, 1862, relative to a motion for a new trial, by inserting after the words 'thirty days within which,' the words 'to give notice of intention to move for a new trial and.' Said motion will be made upon the affidavit of Alexander Campbell, a copy of which is hereunto annexed." At the January term, 1863, the motion of the defendants was called up, and the Court ordered that the entry in the minutes of the 10th of September be amended so as to read as follows: "On motion of the counsel for the defendants in this cause, it is ordered that the defendants have thirty days time within which to give notice of intention to move for a new trial and to prepare a statement on motion for a new trial in this cause, and that, in the meantime, proceedings on the part of the plaintiff be stayed."

At the May term, 1863, the motion for a new trial was argued by the counsel for the respective parties, and on the 26th of May, the Judge of said Court, at chambers, denied said motion, and this order appears to have been entered upon what the clerk entitles a "settled statement on motion for a new trial." The statement does not appear to have been settled by the Judge, and there is no certificate that it was either settled or agreed to by the parties, and it does not appear to have been filed until the 2d of June, 1863, for the only entry in respect to filing is that which follows the order of the Judge denying the motion for a new trial, and which is as follows: "Filed on return, this 2d day of June, 1863. James A. Clayton, Clerk."

The plaintiff now moves this Court to strike from the transcript the statement on the ground that the notice of the motion for a new trial was not filed or served within five days after the verdict was rendered, and that no order of the Court or Judge was made, extending the time for giving the notice.

This brings up for consideration the legality of the order of the Court, made at the January term, 1863, amending the order entered at the previous term. The order, as first entered, gave the defendant thirty days in which to prepare his statement on motion for a new trial, and the amended order gives them that length of time in which to give notice of intention to move for a new trial, as well as to prepare the statement.

The motion and the order were, "to amend the entry in the said minutes." It is not stated in the motion, nor recited in the amended order, that the Court did, at the September term, grant the defendants the thirty days in which to give the notice, and there was nothing in the record at the September term showing that the Court did give or intended to give the defendants the time for that purpose.

It is said in Blackamore's Case, 4 Coke's Report, 156: "So at common law, the Judges might as well amend their judgment as any other part of their record, etc., in the same term, for during the term the record is in the breast of the Judges, and not in the roll. * * * But at the common law the misprision of clerks in another term in the process was not amendable by the Court, for in another term the roll is the record * * *." This well established rule of the common law was affirmed at an early date in this State. (Baldwin v. Kramer, 2 Cal. 582.)

Mr. Chief Justice Murray, in delivering the opinion of the Court in Carpentier v. Hart, 5 Cal. 406, said: "We have repeatedly held that after the adjournment of the term the Court loses all control over cases decided, unless its jurisdiction is saved by some motion or proceeding at the time, except in the single case provided by statute, where the summons has not been served, in which the party is allowed six months to move to set the judgment aside." This doctrine has been too frequently affirmed by this Court to be now called in question. (Suydam v. Pitcher, 4 Cal. 280; Robb v. Robb, 6 Cal. 21; Morrison v. Dapman, 3 Cal. 255; Shaw v. McGregor, 8 Cal. 521; Bell v. Thompson, 19 Cal. 706; Lattimer v. Ryan, 20 Cal. 632.)

In this case, the judgment was rendered and the term had expired, and consequently the Court had no power, at a subsequent term, to amend the order made at a previous term, unless a motion had been made or some proceedings instituted at the previous term to procure the amendment to be made, and the motion or proceedings had been continued to that term. If the Court has the power that the entry of the amended order would imply, and if the amended order had been entered at the September term, and the defendants had relied upon it, and had given their notice of intention to move for a new trial within the thirty days allowed, the plaintiff might at the next term have moved the Court and procured an amendment, striking off the allowance of time for giving the notice, when the defendants would have been deprived of the benefit of their motion for a new trial, without any fault on their part. By reason of the want of power in the Court to make the amendment after the expiration of the term, the amended order is void.

A proper observance of this rule will not in any manner derogate from the power of Court to make an order nunc pro tunc, or to correct a mere clerical error in an order or proceeding, where a fit case for the exercise of such authority arises. It is a general rule that a mere clerical error is amendable. (See Tidd's Prac., 4th Am. Ed., 1855, p. 161, note B.) At common law, when the proceedings have been entered of record the Courts would allow of no further amendments, but by the statute of jeofails and amendments, a still further right of amendment was given. The making up of the judgment roll is the equivalent, under our Practice Act, of the entry of record at common law. We have directly adopted the English statutes, in respect to amendments, to a very limited extent, but our Courts have gone much further than our statutes, and have adopted them indirectly as rules of practice. It was found necessary to pass the statute (of 14 Edw. III, Stat. 1, C. 6,) to avoid the consequences of "misprision of the clerk in writing one syllable or letter too much or too little," which was afterwards, by construction, extended to a word, but our Courts have exercised that power very amply "in furtherance of justice." But at common law, and under the statutes of joefails and amendments, and by the practice of our Courts, the order nunc pro tunc, or the amendment of the clerical error, could not be made unless there was something in the record to amend by. (Blackamore's Case above cited; Tidd's Prac., 4th Am. Ed. 713; Morrison v. Dapman, 3 Cal. 255; Swain v. Naglee, 19 Cal. 127.)

In Morrison v. Dapman, the judgment was rendered, to be levied de bonis testatoris, and, on motion, it was at a subsequent term amended, so as to be levied de bonis propriis; but the Supreme Court held that the power to amend nunc pro tunc, was "confined to cases where the record discloses that the entry in the minutes does not correctly give what was the judgment of the Court;" and in Swain v. Naglee, the Court say that "all Courts have the power to amend clerical errors, and to enter a judgment nunc pro tunc, when the record itself discloses the error."

There is no pretence that it appears anywhere in the record that, at the September term, time was extended for the defendants to give the notice of the motion for a new trial; and under the above rule, an order nunc pro tunc, granting time for that purpose, could not be legally made at a subsequent term. This disposes of the notice, and as a consequence, the motion for a new trial fails for the want of a notice to support it. The plaintiff has not by any means consented to the motion's being entertained, but on the contrary, he moved that it be stricken out, because notice had not been given as required by law.

Polack v. McGrath et al.

The statement, also depending upon the notice of the motion, must fall with it.

This leaves for examination only the judgment roll. The statement not being settled or signed by the Judge, is not and does not purport to be a statement on appeal, and cannot avail the defendants for any purpose.

Upon examination of the judgment roll, we see no error therein sufficient to entitle the defendants to a reversal of the judgment.

Judgment affirmed.

Mr. Justice SHAFER expressed no opinion.

MARY POLACK v. PETER McGRATH AND JAMES F. DONLEN.

FORCIBLE ENTRY OR UNLAWFUL DETAINER.—P. had possession of a lot of land by having it inclosed with a fence, but did not reside on it, nor have a house on it. M. and D. entered into possession, and built a house on the premises and moved into it. Five days afterwards, an agent of P. went to the premises and told M. and D. that he had come there to take possession for P. They replied that it would be very foolish to give up the lots after making improvements on them; that they would not leave, and that it would take a pretty good force to put them off; that they had paid their money for the lots, and they would be d——d if they would leave. To another agent of P., M. and D. used substantially the same language. Held, that this did not amount to a forcible entry or unlawful detainer, and that the evidence was insufficient to authorize P. to maintain the action, and that the Court should have granted a nonsuit; held, further, that such acts amounted merely to a trespass and ouster of P., for which ejectment was the proper remedy.

APPEAL from the County Court, City and County of San Francisco.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the Court.

E. A. Lawrence, for Appellants.

The Court clearly erred in refusing the nonsuit, for the following reasons:

Plaintiff had not shown an actual possession in herself.

(Forcible Entry Act, section 9.) The counterpart in the present case is Frazier v. Hanlon, 5 Cal. 156-160. This case is affirmed in House v. Keiser, 8 Cal. 499; Cummings v. Scott, 20 Cal. 84; 23 Cal. 526; Dickinson v. Maguire, 9 Cal. 46; Scarlet v. Lamarque, 5 Cal. 63; Moore v. Goslin, 5 Cal. 266.

The fence alone did not constitute possession. (Hutton v. Schumaker, 21 Cal. 453.)

Plaintiff has not shown a forcible entry made by defendants. The complaint alleges a forcible entry as the gravamen of the charge. Unlawful holding is not alleged as a substantive cause of action, but merely as a continuation or consequence. The complaint was the same in Preston v. Kehoe, 15 Cal. 318, where it is held that force being alleged must be proved, and will not be inferred from mere refusal to deliver possession. The same was also held in Frazier v. Hanlon, on petition for rehearing, 5 Cal. 159, 160.

Spencer, Reichert & Jarboe, for Respondent.

The Court properly refused the nonsuit, if there was any evidence tending to prove the case. (Cravens v. Dewey, 13 Cal. 42.)

The Court, although it will review proceedings by the Court below so far as to reverse a judgment for errors in law occurring at the trial, or for erroneous instructions, will not set aside a judgment and verdict given upon conflicting evidence, nor reverse a decision of the Court below denying a motion for new trial when there has been a conflict of testimony.

The decisions of this Court upon this subject are uniform. The discretionary power of the Court below will not be interfered with, unless it appears that there has been a great abuse of that power. Now, there was a conflict of testimony upon every point raised in the case, and upon this conflicting testimony the jury found for plaintiff, and the Judge refused to review the action of the jury for that reason. (Peters v. Foss et al., 16 Cal. 357; McCloud v. O'Neill, 16 Cal. 397.) See, also, Burnett v. Whitesides et al., 15 Cal. 36, where the Court says: "Where the verdict is supported by any evidence we will not interfere with the order of the Court refusing a new trial, unless we are convinced there was an abuse of the legal discretion of the Court." (See, also, Walton v. Maguire, 17 Cal. 92.)

The ruling of the Court upon this point, we think, disposes of one ground of defendant's motion for new trial and of appeal.

By the Court, CURREY, J.

The plaintiff brought her action of forcible entry and detainer against the defendants to obtain the restitution of a certain parcel of land in San Francisco, and for the recovery of damages for the alleged forcible and unlawful entry upon the land, and the forcible and unlawful detention thereof. The plaintiff alleges in her complaint that at and for a long time before the defendants entered, she was and had been in the actual, peaceable, and quiet possession of the land, and was still entitled to the possession thereof; and that while she was so in the possession of the same land, the defendants, on a day named, "with force and arms, and with strong hands and multitude of people, unlawfully and forcibly entered on said described premises, and with force and violence put out and expelled said plaintiff therefrom, and took possession of the same; and that said defendants have ever since forcibly and unlawfully detained, and still do forcibly and unlawfully detain possession of said premises from this plaintiff, to her damage, etc."

The defendants meet the averments of the complaint by a specific denial, and affirmatively allege, that "they have the legal right to the present possession of said premises, and are the owners thereof."

Testimony was introduced on the trial in the County Court, going to establish the possession of the premises by the plaintiff for a long time anterior to and also when the defendants entered thereon. But she did not have a house on the premises, nor reside thereon; nor did she otherwise have the actual possession than by a fence that formed a complete inclosure of the same. The evidence showed that the defendants entered within this inclosure on or about the 24th of October, 1862, and were there in possession from thence to the time of the trial of the action.

On the 29th of the same month, the agent of the plaintiff went to the premises and told the defendants that he had come there to take possession for the plaintiff; and he testified that Donlen said "it would be very foolish to give up the lots after his making improvements on them;" and referring to both defendants, he also testified that "they said they would not leave the lots, and it would take a pretty good force to put them off; they had paid their money for the lots, and they would be damned if they would leave; * * all this was said in good humor; I saw no weapons." The defendants were shovelling sand at the time; and the witness was unable to obtain possession of the premises.

Another witness testified that between the 24th and 30th of October, he had demanded possession of the premises for plaintiff, from McGrath, who said he had bought the lot and paid for it, and did not intend to leave it; and then, speaking of the two defendants, he said: "They were annoyed and angry, and I was unable to obtain possession."

Von Schmidt, who was a witness for plaintiff, testified that there was no house on the premises until the 24th of October, 1862; that at that time he saw the defendants engaged in passing lumber through the fence, and that this was done peaceably.

This was all the evidence touching the question of a forcible entry or a forcible or unlawful detainer.

When the plaintiff had rested her case, the defendants moved the Court to order the plaintiff nonsuited on the grounds, viz:

"First—Plaintiff has not shown a sufficient possession to maintain this action.

“Second—Plaintiff has not shown an unlawful entry by defendants.

“Third—Insufficiency of proof to maintain this action.”

The Court denied the motion, and the defendants excepted.

The defendants then introduced evidence which they claimed justified their possession of the premises, and afterward the cause was submitted to the jury, who rendered a verdict for plaintiff. A motion was made for a new trial, which was denied, and this appeal is from the judgment entered on the verdict, and from the order denying a new trial.

The point to be resolved is, whether the evidence in the case sustained the allegations of the complaint of the forcible entry of the defendants into the premises, and the unlawful detainer thereof by them.

Assuming that the plaintiff had the actual possession of the premises as the owner of the same when the defendants entered thereon and ousted her, it is to be ascertained whether the remedy sought is the proper one for the injury sustained. The law has provided various remedies for the recovery of the possession of lands to which one may be entitled, and of which he may have been tortiously or wrongfully deprived. He may be entitled to maintain ejectment, or an action of forcible entry and detainer, but he cannot maintain the latter unless the facts and circumstances of the case bring it within the provisions of the Act providing the remedy for that species of wrong. In this case the complaint, which is well drawn, is for a forcible entry and a forcible and unlawful detainer.

It is laid down in Bacon's Abridgment, that a “forcible entry must regularly be with a strong hand, with unusual weapons, or with menace of life or limb;” and Sir William Blackstone's definition is, that a forcible entry or detainer is committed by violently taking or keeping possession of lands or tenements with menaces, force, and arms, and without the authority of law. (4 Black Com. 148.)

The evidence in the case failed to establish the allegations of the complaint. The most that the acts of entry and detainer of the defendants upon the premises amounted to

was a trespass and ouster of the plaintiff, for which she may have, if she have the better right, her action of ejectment.

It would not be sufficient to charge the defendants with having entered vi et armis; and the words "with strong hand" mean something more than a common trespass. (Per Lord Kenyon, C. J., in Rex v. Wilson, 8 T. R. 357.)

If there was any evidence showing that the entry of the defendants was forcible, or with strong hand, or with multitude of people, or if it appeared therefrom that they detained the premises by force, or uttered threats calculated to deter the plaintiff or her agents from entering upon the land, we should not disturb the verdict and judgment. We think the Court ought to have granted the nonsuit upon the evidence as it stood when the motion therefor was made; and this error was not cured by any evidence subsequently given in the cause.

The judgment is reversed and the cause remanded.

Mr. Justice SHAFTER expressed no opinion.

BENJAMIN WALLS, ADMINISTRATOR OF THE ESTATE OF MANUEL VERA, DECEASED, v. WILLIAM PRESTON.

STATEMENT OF GROUNDS FOR NEW TRIAL.—If the grounds upon which a party relies for a new trial are not designated, either in the notice or statement, a new trial should be denied.

SAME — WAIVER OF.—Where the attorneys of both parties appear in open Court, and by consent argue a motion for a new trial, this consent, even if it is a waiver of a notice of intention to move for a new trial, is not a waiver of a statement in some proper form of the grounds of the motion.

ASSIGNMENT OF ERRORS.—A statement on appeal is of no avail, unless the grounds upon which a party intends to rely are therein set forth.

ERRORS — HOW REVIEWED.—Error in law, occurring at a trial, may be reviewed upon a bill of exceptions, as well as upon a motion for a new trial.

LEASE — RENT PAYABLE IN PART OF CROP.—An agreement in writing between two parties, by which the party of the first part demises and leases unto the party of the second part land (describing the same) for a term specified, and the party of the second part agrees to cultivate and plant the land at his own expense, and deliver on the premises, to the party of the first part, one sixth of all the crops as soon as harvested, and not to underlet the premises or yield the possession to any person other than the lessor, without the lessor's consent in writing, is a lease, and not a contract for the services of the party of the second part, for which he is to receive as compensation a portion of the crops he may produce.

Walls v. Preston.

APPEAL from the County Court of Solano County.

The lease mentioned in the opinion of the Court was executed by both Manuel Vera and Preston, the defendant. December 1st, 1861, Vera died, and Walls was appointed administrator of the estate on the 23d day of May, 1863.

On the 23d day of October, 1863, Walls, as administrator, commenced an action before a Justice of the Peace, in Solano County, against Preston, to recover possession of the lands, under the thirteenth section of the Forcible Entry and Detainer Act, as amended in 1862. Plaintiff claimed that Preston was holding over after the termination of his lease.

The case was appealed to the County Court. On the trial in the County Court, plaintiff offered in evidence the lease; defendant objected to its reception, because it was irrelevant, and was not a lease, but a contract to cultivate land for a specific portion of the crop raised. The Court sustained the objection, and plaintiff excepted. A bill of exceptions was drawn up and signed by the judge, and is copied into the transcript.

Defendant recovered judgment in the Court below, and plaintiff appealed.

The other facts are stated in the opinion of the Court.

S. G. Hilborn, for Appellant.

The Court erred in refusing to admit the lease in evidence, in proof of the allegation of the complaint. (Act of Forcible Entry and Detainer, section 13; Wood's Digest, 469; Demarest v. Willard, 8 Cowen, 206; Evertson v. Sawyer, 2 Wend. 507.)

The point of objections to the lease is not sustained by the authorities cited. Defendant is estopped to deny the lease. Be the contract what it may, it confers upon him the absolute right to the land during the term.

Walls v. Preston.

M. A. Wheaton, for Respondent.

The paper marked "Exhibit B" was inadmissible, it not being a lease as called for by the complaint. (Bernal v. Hovious, 17 Cal. 541; Putnam v. Wise, 1 Hill, 235; Dinehart v. Wilson, 15 Barb. 595; Caswell v. Districh, 15 Wend. 379.)

Even if the complaint had been differently framed, Preston's occupation would be no more than that of a mere servant, and this action would not lie. (Bernal v. Hovious, 17 Cal. 541.)

By the Court, RHODES, J.

The motion for a new trial was properly overruled. The plaintiff failed to designate the grounds upon which he relied, either in his notice or statement. It is stated in the bill of exceptions that the plaintiff in open Court moved for a new trial, and that the motion was entertained by consent. Even if the consent of the parties could be deemed a waiver of a notice of intention to move for a new trial, it did not waive the statement, in some proper form, of the grounds of the motion. (See Stata. 1863, p. 643.) There is nothing upon which the Court below can act on the hearing of the motion, unless the grounds of the motion are designated.

The statement on motion for a new trial is of no avail as a statement on appeal, for the reason that the grounds upon which the plaintiff intends to rely are not therein set forth. This leaves for examination the errors appearing upon the judgment roll, and the only ones assigned are those set forth in the bills of exceptions.

The point mainly relied upon by the appellant is the error of the Court in excluding as evidence the instrument offered as a lease of the lands in controversy, executed by the plaintiff's intestate and the defendant. The alleged error can be reviewed upon a bill of exceptions as well as upon a motion for a new trial. (Rice v. Gashire, 13 Cal. 53; Brown v. Tolles, 7 Cal. 399.) In many cases it is preferable, and we think it the better practice, that the party complaining of the exclusion of legal and competent testimony, or of the admission of that which is illegal or incompetent, should take his exception by bill or otherwise, and assign the error on appeal from the judgment, instead of incurring the labor and expense of attempting to procure a new trial, and of making up for this Court a record, the large portion of which would serve, perhaps, in no manner to explain the errors assigned.

Walls v. Preston.

The plaintiff contends that the instrument offered in evidence by him is a lease, and the defendant insists that it is a cropping contract, which constituted the parties tenants in common of the land and of the crops during the time mentioned in the instrument.

The plaintiff's intestate, Manuel Vera, "demised, leased, and, to farm, let" the premises unto Preston, "to have and to hold" the same from the first day of December, 1861, to the first day of October, 1863; and Preston covenanted not to "underlet the said premises, or yield the possession thereof to any" but Manuel Vera, without his consent in writing, and to properly cultivate and plant the land at his own cost and expense, and to deliver thereon to Manuel Vera, on the premises, one sixth of all the crops as soon as harvested. Is this instrument a lease, or is it only a contract for the services of Preston, to be performed on the land, and for which he is to receive as compensation a portion of the crops he may produce?

It is competent for the parties covenanting for the use, occupation and cultivation of land, and the payment therefor out of the crops produced, to execute a lease in the usual form, or they may enter into an agreement constituting them tenants in common of the crops, and at the same time may provide that the owner or the occupant may hold the possession of the land, or that both may be tenants in common of the land during the time mentioned in the agreement. It is the general rule that, where a term is created, the possession given to the occupant, and the produce agreed to be paid is to be paid as rent; then the instrument is regarded as a lease. (Taylor, Land. and Ten. sec. 24.) It is also a general rule that where the occupant covenants to deliver to the owner a portion of the crops, the agreement is held to be a cropping contract—a letting upon shares—and the owner and occupant are tenants in common of the crop. (Putnam v. Wise, 1 Hill, 247; Bernal v. Hovious, 17 Cal. 544.)

In the last two cases, and the authorities therein cited, there was no question as to which of them (the owner or the occupant) was entitled to the possession of the land under the agreement.

The character of the instrument must be determined upon a consideration of all its terms and provisions, and the Court will give it such a construction as will carry into effect the intention of the parties, without regard to the technical terms employed. Although words are used which, if disconnected from other parts of the instrument, would import a lease, they will not be so construed if the evident intention was merely to make a cropping contract. Nor, on the other hand, will the instrument be so construed as to deprive the occupant of the position of a tenant of the land, if from the whole instrument it is apparent that the parties intended he should enjoy the exclusive possession of the premises.

In Putnam v. Wise, Mr. Justice Cowen says: "The true test seems to lie in the question whether there be any provision, in whatever form, for dividing the specific products of the premises. If there be, a tenancy in common arises, at least in such products as are to be divided;" and that case is cited on that point, with approbation, in Bernal v. Hovious, 17 Cal. 544.

The doctrine was deduced by the learned Judge from what he understood to be the test adopted by Mr. Chief Justice Nelson, in Caswell v. Districh, 15 Wend. 379, and that principle has been acted upon and affirmed, almost without question, in a number of cases in New York. (Dinehart v. Wilson, 15 Barb. 595; and Harrower v. Heath, 19 Barb. 337.) In all the cases in New York, affirming on this point Putnam v. Wise, and in Bernal v. Hovious, the question was merely who was entitled to the possession of the crop, not whether the owner or the occupant was in possession of the land, not whether the relation of landlord and tenant existed between the parties, though that question was incidentally discussed.

The two principles deducible from those cases are these: First—If the agreement contains terms which by themselves would import a lease, and other terms which provide for a division of the crops, and it is doubtful which it is—a lease or a cropping contract—it will be deemed a cropping contract, by reason of a division of the crops; and second, where the agreement provides for a division of the crops between the owner and occupant, they are held to be tenants in common of the crop. It cannot be maintained, upon those authorities, and certainly not upon principle, that a lease, in the usual form of a demise, for a term of years, with covenants sufficient to give the lessee the exclusive possession of the land during the time, and to require him to yield up the possession at the end of that term, shall not be a lease, and the occupant shall not be a tenant, but shall be a mere servant of the owner, because the parties have made provision for a division of some portion or all of the crops that may be produced. The term division, as applied to the crops, has no more forcible signification in aid of the interpretation of the instrument, than has the word demise, when employed in connection with the land.

Mr. Justice Cowen, in Putnam v. Wise, cites with approbation, Woodfall, (Land. and Ten.,) who says that the most proper and authentic form of words may be overcome by a contrary intent appearing in the deed of demise. No reason can be assigned, why the same rule of construction should not be applicable to the words providing for a division of the crop.

In Stewart v. Doughty, 9 Johns. 108, the Court held that the instrument that by its terms would have amounted to a cropping contract, was a lease, because the premises were let for a term certain; and in Putnam v. Wise, it was said that the last case was "very much shaken, if not entirely overturned," by Caswell v. Districh, for in the last case the demise was for a year, certain.

In Harrower v. Heath, 19 Barb. 337, the Court held, upon the authority of the cases according with Putnam v. Wise, that the parties were tenants in common both of the land and the crops; but in that case the parties agreed that the owner should have the use of certain portions of the premises for certain purposes, and the whole instrument showed that the parties contemplated a joint occupation; and it may be remarked that the right to the possession of the land, as between the owner and occupant, was not in any manner in issue.

The object of Courts in adopting rules of construction, is only to furnish means to so interpret the agreement as to ascertain the intention of the parties. The object is not to make a contract for the parties, nor to vary the terms of the covenants they have entered into; nor is it to arbitrarily insert a covenant they have not agreed to.

Where it plainly appears that the parties have made a lease, the Court will not declare it not to be a lease simply because the parties have inserted a covenant that more appropriately belongs to a contract of a different character. In the cases we have cited, the Courts were endeavoring to ascertain the intention of the parties; and having ascertained it, they declared the rights of the parties under the contract, as they made it, so far as the same were in issue.

There is certainly no rule of law, so absolute in its nature, as to prevent the occupant of land, under a contract which constitutes him a tenant in common with the owner in the crops, from having as entire a control over the premises during the term, if the parties so agree, as a tenant covenanting to pay a money rent would have. In other words, from being a tenant of the land under a lease, and at the same time a tenant in common of the crop, or of some part of it. Such agreements are constantly made, and it never occurs to the parties, and they do not intend, that the tenant is changed into a servant of the lessor, because the lessor receives a portion or all of his compensation, for the use of the land, in some uncertain quantity of the products of the land.

In Chandler v. Thurston, 10 Pick. 205, where the contract was very similar to that in Putnam v. Wise, the Court said the contract "may be regarded either as a contract to perform labor on the land of the plaintiff remaining in his own possession, and to receive his pay in produce, or as a hiring of the land for a term of time, rendering a rent payable in produce," and in considering the case the Court treated the occupant as a tenant of the land; and the same was the case in Lewis v. Lyman, 22 Pick. 437, and in many other cases. We can see nothing incompatible in the tenant of the land under a lease, being at the same time a tenant in common of the crops; and there never would have been any doubt upon this point, had not the Judges in New York, in passing upon questions concerning the rights of the parties to the possession of the crops, uttered dicta which seemed to determine the point against the occupant.

"A lease," as defined by Bouvier, "is a contract for the possession and profits of land on one side, and a recompense of rent, or other income, on the other;" or "it is a conveyance of lands and tenements to a person for life, for years, or at will, in consideration of a return of rent or other recompense." In Hunt v. Comstock, 15 Wend. 667, where Comstock purchased a tract of land from Hunt, and gave him a mortgage, and "let" to him the house and garden with certain privileges, the Court adjudged it to be a lease, though there was no reservation of rent. If a reservation of rent, or some benefit or recompense equivalent to rent, is deemed necessary, in order to constitute a contract a lease, the covenant to pay or deliver a portion of the crop, amounts in every sense to a recompense for the use and occupation of the land, as fully as would a covenant to pay money, or a certain amount of the crops, or to improve the premises, or keep them in repair, or to pay the taxes, or perform labor for the lessor, all of which have been held good, as a reservation of rent. It is apparent from the opinion of the Court in Caswell v. Districh — the case upon which the extreme doctrine in New York was founded — that the Court did not intend to destroy what was plainly a lease, and convert it into a mere contract for work and labor, because it provided for a division of the crops; for Mr. Justice

Streeter v. Rush.

Nelson, in delivering the opinion of the Court, says: "This view of the contract should be maintained, unless otherwise clearly expressed;" and in commenting upon Stewart v. Doughty, he regarded the agreement of the lessee, to pay a share of the specific crops, as an agreement to pay rent in kind.

It clearly appears to us that the parties in this case intended to make a lease, and that the instrument executed by them was a lease; that its effect as such was not destroyed by their having contracted for the payment to the lessor of a portion of the specific crops to be produced, and that that covenant was an agreement to pay the rent of the premises out of the crops.

The judgment is reversed and the cause remanded for a new trial.

JOHN STREETER v. HIRAM RUSH.

Liquidated Damages — Penalty.— Streeter sold to Rush his butcher shop, tools, etc., at Suisun, and in his contract of sale, entered into this covenant with Rush: "I also bind myself in the sum of five hundred dollars to said Rush, not to go into the butchering business in said Suisun, without the consent of said Rush, in any manner whatever." Held, that the five hundred dollars mentioned in the covenant, are to be regarded as liquidated damages, and not as penalty.

Id.— The question whether a specified sum mentioned in a contract, to be paid by either party in the event of its violation, is liquidated damages, or a penalty, must be determined by the intention of the parties, to be ascertained from a consideration of the whole contract.

APPEAL from the District Court, Seventh Judicial District, Solano County.

The following is the contract of sale executed by Streeter to Rush:

"Know all men by these presents, that I, John Streeter, of the Town of Suisun, in the County of Solano, and State of California, of the first part, for and in consideration of the sum of eight hundred dollars, lawful money of the United States, to me paid by Hiram Rush, of the same town and State, of the second part, the receipt whereof is hereby acknowledged, have bargained and sold, and by these presents do grant and convey unto the said party of the second part, his executors, administrators, and assigns, the following property, to wit: (Here follows a description of the property.) And I do for myself, my heirs, executors, and assigns, covenant and agree to and with said party of the second part, his executors and assigns, to warrant and defend the sale of said property, goods, and chattels, hereby made unto the said party of the second part, his executors, and assigns, against all and every person and persons whatsoever.

Streeter v. Rush.

"I also bind myself in the sum of five hundred dollars to said Rush, not to go into the butchering business in said Suisun, without the consent of said Rush, in any manner whatever.

"Witness my hand and seal, the 29th day of August, 1862.

"JOHN STREETER." [SEAL.]

The defendant asked the Court to give the jury the following instruction, which was refused, and defendant excepted.

"The instrument in evidence is an agreement of Streeter to pay Rush five hundred dollars, if he (Streeter) should engage in the butchering business in any manner in Suisun; and if the jury believe from the evidence that he has so engaged in the butchering business, they must allow the defendant the full amount of his five hundred dollars damages."

The jury found a verdict in favor of plaintiff for the amount due on the notes, without making any deduction for the five hundred dollars.

Defendant appealed.

The other facts are stated in the opinion of the Court.

M. A. Wheaton, for Appellant.

When from the nature of a contract it is not practicable to ascertain the amount of damages sustained by a violation of it, the sum named by the parties as such damages will be held to be liquidated damages. (Williams v. Dakin, 22 Wend. 201; Holmes v. Holmes, 12 Barb. 147; California Navigation

Streater v. Rush.

Co. v. Wright, 6 Cal. 258. See, also, Coffee v. Meiggs, 9 Cal. 363; Baldwin v. Bennett, 4 Cal. 392.)

The sum in which a person binds himself not to engage in any particular business in a particular place, is liquidated damages. (Green v. Price, 13 M. & W. 695; Smith v. Smith, 4 Wend. 468.)

Whitman & Wells, for Respondent.

The contract on which the counter claim is based is, in partial restraint of trade, not void on that account, but good or bad as founded on an adequate consideration, and as reasonable in itself. They are supported by the modern authorities, and we do not question their validity; but we do urge that the very circumstance is a ground for a lenient construction of its provisions, that the party having bound himself (for bond is the word used, and that word imports a penalty) not to engage in the business in Suisun as against Rush, simply imports that he will not do so in such a way as to damage Rush. The contract, it seems, is personal only, and if Rush should retire from the business, or cease to have any determinate interest in enforcing the contract, it might well be questioned whether he could enforce a claim for other than nominal damages. So, too, if Rush should, in the course of his business, hire the plaintiff as a butcher, could he enforce the penalty against him? Or if Rush should sell out his butchering business, and retain this contract, it would be a harsh construction that would expose the party to the penalty. We say harsh, because the presumption would be that the contract was only made to protect Rush while in the business, and that not against the plaintiff, as a person following the same trade merely, but added to that, one who just retiring from business, could, by resuming it, prevent the plaintiff from obtaining the custom relinquished by defendant. A reasonable view of the contract, its character, and object, we submit, would hold to a personal contract for the benefit or protection of Rush.

The question of liquidated damages is admitted to be one of construction, and for that purpose we urge the subject of the contract, the situation of the parties, the usages of trade, to which they are supposed to refer, and the circumstances of their conduct: all necessary and proper elements in deciding the question.

The case is not one where there is any real difficulty in assessing damages; proof of the business, its diminution, and the extent of that diminution, can be readily made. Few cases of damage are presented capable of easier proof than the one at bar. The case, then, comes within the fifth rule laid down by Mr. Greenleaf, (2 Greenleaf on Evidence, section 213,) and is not within any rule laid down by that author that would make this a matter of liquidated damages.

By the Court, RHODES, J.

The plaintiff sold to the defendant his butcher shop, the fixtures and tools, and certain personal property connected with the business, receiving therefor two promissory notes of the defendant; and in his contract of sale he entered into this covenant with the defendant: "I also bind myself in the sum of five hundred dollars to said Rush not to go into the butchering business in said Suisun, without the consent of said Rush, in any manner whatever." The plaintiff now sues on the notes, and the defendant offers to set off the sum of five hundred dollars due him by reason of the plaintiff having engaged in the butchering business contrary to his covenant.

The only question in the case arises upon the refusal of the Court to give the third instruction asked for by the defendant. The question is this: Is the sum of money expressed in the covenant to be considered as a penalty, or is it to be held as liquidated damages?

This subject has been a fruitful source of discussion in numerous cases, and it is impossible to reconcile all of them; but while there has been a conflict among them on some points, there are certain rules in which they all agree. The intention of the parties to the agreement is the point of inquiry, and is to be ascertained from a consideration of the whole instrument; and when ascertained, it is to be adopted by the Court, and full effect given to it, unless it is contrary to law. In construing the instrument, resort must be had to the signification of the terms employed by the parties, and to the rules of law, in view of which the parties are presumed to have contracted. If the parties agree upon the payment of a certain sum, whether in terms as a penal sum or not, if it can be plainly understood that the gross sum was intended as a security for the payment of a less sum, it will be held as a penalty; and it is also a general rule, that if the parties agree that the sum shall be paid as liquidated damages, the Court will so regard it, unless it clearly appears that it was intended merely as a security for the payment of damages that might be considered liquidated and certain in amount.

Where the contract contains both the terms, "penalty," and "liquidated damages," as applied to the gross sum to be paid, or equivalent terms, or where it contains neither of those terms, the Court will ascertain the intention of the parties from the whole instrument, as it would in case of any other agreement. (Sedgwick on Measure of Damages, 417 to 442.) If the damages for the performance or non-performance of the act stipulated to be done or not to be done by the party agreeing to pay the gross sum, can be ascertained with certainty, or have been agreed upon between the parties, then, as in the case where the parties have denominated it a penalty, the Court will consider it as a security; but if they are "wholly uncertain, and incapable of estimation, otherwise than by mere conjecture," as was said in Williams v. Dakin, 22 Wend. 201, the gross sum will be regarded as liquidated damages. This is a rule by which to ascertain the intention of parties in cases of doubt, and not to enlarge or limit the intention, when expressed or clearly ascertainable without its aid. Courts are not authorized to put a different construction upon a contract from what the parties intended it should bear; nor are they warranted in adding to it a further term, or in striking therefrom a term the parties have employed; nor are they justified in attempting to modify or reform a contract under the vague notion of relieving a party from the hardships of an agreement into which he has willingly and knowingly entered. Parties are more competent to make their own bargains than Courts are to make bargains for them.

In this case the plaintiff evidently intended to sell, and the defendant to purchase, the good will of the plaintiff's business; and the plaintiff agreed that if he entered into the business at the same place, without the defendant's consent, he would pay the defendant five hundred dollars. The agreement was not that the plaintiff would pay the damages that the defendant should actually sustain, for they knew that damages for such a breach of contract were uncertain and matter of mere conjecture, and they therefore preferred to establish their own measure of damages; and for that purpose they fixed upon the sum of five hundred dollars, to be paid by the plaintiff to the defendant, if the plaintiff should engage in the butchering business at Suisun without the defendant's consent. That sum is, by agreement of the parties, liquidated damages.

The Court has no greater power to relieve the plaintiff from the payment of that sum because it may exceed the damages actually sustained, than it has to discharge the defendant from the payment of the two notes in suit for the reason that they may exceed the value of the property sold to him. It only remains to add, that the Court erred in refusing to give the third instruction asked by the defendant.

Judgment reversed and the cause remanded for a new trial.

SAWYER, J., dissenting.

I regret that I am unable to agree with my associates in their construction of the covenant in question in this suit. It is in the following words: "I also bind myself in the sum of five hundred dollars to said Rush not to go into the butchering business in said Suisun, without the consent of said Rush, in any manner whatever."

Streater v. Rush.

This, in my opinion, is in the nature of a penalty, and not a covenant for liquidated damages. The principles of construction announced in the prevailing opinion, generally meet my approbation. But on one point I think a qualification is required, and that is the point upon which the construction of this covenant turns. Quoting from the decision in Williams v. Dakin, 22 Wend., a leading case in the United States on the subject, the opinion says: "But if they (the damages) are wholly uncertain, and incapable of estimation, otherwise than by mere conjecture," the gross sum will "be regarded as liquidated damages." This would, doubtless, be strictly true as applied to the covenant under consideration in that case, and uncertainty in the amount of damages is one element to be considered in the construction of such covenants when the language is doubtful. But it is not of itself a controlling test.

In the case referred to, the contract was for the sale of a newspaper establishment, and the good will and patronage of the paper; five hundred dollars was paid for the type and material, and three thousand dollars for the patronage and good will of the business. There was a covenant not to print or publish in Utica, or suffer to be printed or published in any building owned by the grantor in Utica, for a specified time, any other paper of the character designated. For the faithful performance of their covenants the parties bound themselves in the sum of three thousand dollars. "Then followed a stipulation that the said sum of three thousand dollars should be and was thereby fixed and settled as liquidated damages, and not as a penal sum for any violation of the covenant," etc. Here there would seem to be little need of calling in the aid of rules of construction to ascertain what the parties intended by their covenant. Yet it is in construing the foregoing covenant that the Court used the language quoted by Mr. Justice Rhodes. The Court also laid some stress upon the fact that the parties had fixed upon the precise sum (three thousand dollars) as the liquidated damages which was paid for the "patronage and good will" of the paper; and in that case, although the Judges and a majority of the Senators held in accordance with the covenant, that the sum should be regarded as "liquidated damages," and "not a penal sum," five Senators voted the other way.

But in the case now under consideration the covenant contains no such express and decided declaration of the intention of the parties to make the sum "liquidated damages, and not a penal sum," as is found in Williams v. Dakin. The language quoted from the opinion in that case, I think, to render it applicable generally, requires qualification; and the required qualification is found well expressed by Mr. Sedgwick, in his work on the Measure of Damages, last ed. p. 442. After a full discussion of the numerous cases on the subject, he lays down five propositions, deducible from those cases which he thinks are to govern whenever a question arises as to whether a sum named in the covenants is to be regarded as a penal sum, or as liquidated damages. The fifth proposition is as follows: "That when, independently of the stipulation, the damages would be wholly uncertain, and incapable or very difficult of being ascertained, except by mere conjecture, then the damages will be usually considered liquidated, if they are so denominated in the instrument."

The qualification at the close of the proposition is an important one; and the covenant in Williams v. Dakin contained the qualifying terms, while that in the case under consideration does not. The amount is not denominated liquidated damages in the covenant in this case. There is no direct express covenant to pay that particular sum of money. It is undoubtedly a proper case for the parties to stipulate for liquidated damages, but the question is, Have they done so? I think not. They certainly have not done so in express terms, nor by an express covenant to pay that particular sum. The defendant bound himself "in the sum of five hundred dollars" not to do a particular act, but did not agree to pay that particular sum upon a breach of the covenant, whether the actual damages sustained should amount to that sum or not.

I have examined a large number of cases, and have not found one where the sum stated has been held as liquidated damages, unless it was expressly stated to be liquidated, or there was an express covenant to pay a specific sum of money on the doing or not doing of the things provided for. On the contrary, I find many cases where a sum expressly stipulated to be liquidated damages has been held to be penal only, notwithstanding an express stipulation to the contrary; and generally, the fact that the damages are uncertain has been brought in to aid a stipulation for liquidated damages, or an express covenant to pay a specific sum on the delinquency of the party against the ordinary presumption that such sums are penal merely, and in some cases where it would seem that no such aid should be required.

It is also a rule that, "When it is doubtful on the face of the instrument whether the sum mentioned was intended to be stipulated damages, or a penalty to cover actual damages, the Courts hold it to be the latter." (Sedgwick on Dam., same ed. 440, note 1, p. 441, note 1; Bagley v. Peddie, 5 Sandf. 192.)

In the case under consideration, the most favorable construction for the appellant that can be put upon the covenant is, that there is a reasonable doubt as to the intent of the parties. Such being the case, under the last rule stated it should be construed as a penalty. But to my mind the language is not doubtful. The form of the covenant is much more analagous to the form used in cases of penalty than in cases of liquidated damages. There is no covenant to pay the specific sum of five hundred dollars whether the actual damages amount to that sum or not, and there is no express statement that the same is to be liquidated damages.

I am of the opinion, under the rules of construction established by the numerous cases upon this subject, that the covenant under consideration should be regarded as stipulating for a penal sum, and not for liquidated damages.

JOHN MIDDLETON AND SAMUEL P. MIDDLETON v.
JAMES FINDLA.

NAME OF GRANTOR IN DEED.—If the grantor's true name is recited in the body of a deed, and he also acknowledges it by his true name, the fact that he signs it by a wrong name does not invalidate the conveyance.

AUCTIONEERS—THEIR COMPENSATION FOR SERVICES.—One representing himself as the owner of real estate, who employs an auctioneer to sell the same under an agreement that in the event of a sale the auctioneer shall receive for his services a percentage on the amount bid, cannot, after a sale by the auctioneer, avoid paying him for his services because the purchaser refuses to take the property, owing to a real or alleged defect in the title.

NOTE.—The auctioneer in such case is entitled to compensation for his services, unless there is a special agreement that it shall depend on the consummation of the sale.

APPEAL from the District Court, Twelfth Judicial District, City and County of San Francisco.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the Court.

J. B. Crockett, for Appellant.

The rule appears to be well settled that a broker is not entitled to commissions unless a sale is effected and completed, provided the failure does not arise from the conduct of the seller. (Blanc v. Improvement Bank, 2 Robinson, La. 63; Didion v. Duralde, 2 Robinson, La. 163; De Santos v. Taney, 13 La. 151; McGavock v. Woodlief, 20 How. U. S. 221; Pricket v. Badger, 37 Eng. Law and Eq. 428; Broad v. Thomas, 7 Bing. 99; Read v. Riven, 10 Barn. & Cress. 438.)

This appears to me to dispose of the case. But I invoke, also, another principle. The right to commissions depends on the fact whether or not the respondents have done all they agreed to do, as the condition on which commissions were to accrue. They say they have; because, as they aver, they only undertook to find a purchaser willing to take the property at the stipulated price, and that they found such a purchaser, but he refused to take it from no fault of theirs. Now, however they understood the contract, it is quite evident the appellant did not so understand it. His understanding was that he was to pay no commissions unless the sale was actually completed.

The rule I invoke is, that performance of a condition precedent must be shown with such certainty that the Court may judge whether the intent of the contract has been fulfilled. (1 Chit. Plead. 32; Com. Dig. Tit. Pleader, C. 58.)

Haight & Pierson, for Respondent.

The rule is very well stated in the case of Glentworth v. Luther, 21 Barb. 145: "One who is employed as a broker to sell real estate, in the nature of things, can do nothing more than to find a party who will be acceptable to the owner, and enter into a contract of purchase with him; unless the owner makes him more than a mere broker by giving him a power of attorney to convey the property, and then the agent would cease to be broker and become the attorney.

"A broker becomes entitled to his commissions whenever he produces to his principal a party with whom the owner is satisfied, and who contracts for the purchase of the property at a price acceptable to the owner.

"If, after that, the purchaser refuse to perform because of the false representations of the owner respecting the property, this will not deprive the broker of his commissions."

By the Court, CURREY, J.

From the pleadings and evidence in this case it appears that in September, 1862, the respondents were partners, doing business in the City of San Francisco as auctioneers and brokers, and that the appellant, who was the owner of a storehouse and lot of land in that city, employed them to advertise and sell this property for him. The contract between the parties was, in effect:

First — That the storehouse and lot should not be sold for a less sum than twenty-two thousand five hundred dollars.

Second — That if the property was sold for that sum only, the appellant would pay the respondents for their services the sum of five hundred dollars, and the expenses of advertising the sale.

Middleton et al. v. Findla.

Third — That if the property was sold for a sum exceeding twenty-two thousand five hundred dollars, the appellant would pay the respondents the sum of two and a half per cent of the amount of the price for which the same should be sold, and the expenses of advertising the sale.

In pursuance of this contract the respondents advertised the property for sale at auction, and afterward sold the same to one Goldstein, who was the highest bidder therefor, for the price of twenty-four thousand and fifty dollars. Before the sale it was announced by the respondents, in the presence of the appellant, to the persons in attendance, that the purchaser would be required to deposit ten per cent of his bid immediately after the property was struck off to him, and that the title would be subject to legal investigation.

The terms of payment at which the appellant, by his agents, the auctioneers, offered the property for sale were half cash, and the balance in three years at one per cent per month.

The purchaser, instead of depositing ten per cent of the purchase price, deposited only five hundred dollars, with which the respondents were satisfied, as he was regarded by them as a person able at any time to respond to his engagements.

The abstract of the appellant's title to the property was placed in the hands of Goldstein's legal adviser for examination, who afterward decided and reported the title defective, because the copy of one of the deeds under which the appellant claimed, and which purported in the body of it to have been made by Edward Jones, appeared in such copy and in the book of records as signed by Edmund Jones. By the certificate of the proof of the execution of this deed, it appears that the execution thereof was by Edward Jones. Because of the supposed defect, Goldstein refused to complete the purchase; and after this, about the 10th of October, 1862, the appellant made out and tendered to him a deed for the property, duly executed, but Goldstein still refused to accept the deed and complete the contract on his part. Before the deed was so tendered, one Wood applied to the appellant to purchase the property at the sum of twenty-four thousand dollars, and after the refusal on the part of Goldstein the appellant contracted to sell it to Wood for that sum, and afterwards, on the 24th of October, conveyed the same premises to him by deed, which was recorded. Upon discovering that appellant had sold to Wood, the respondents returned to Goldstein the five hundred dollars received from him. The respondents then demanded payment of the commission of two and a half per cent, on the twenty-four thousand and fifty dollars bid by Goldstein, and the expenses of advertising the property for sale. The appellant refused payment, and the respondents brought their action for the recovery thereof. The cause was tried by the Court without a jury, and a finding and judgment was rendered for the respondents against the appellant for the amount. A motion was made for a new trial and denied.

The ground on which the appellant relies for a reversal of the judgment is that the evidence did not justify the finding and judgment, and that therefore the judgment is contrary to law.

There seems to be no material conflict in the testimony of the witnesses, and the question is directly presented whether the pleadings and evidence justified the finding of the Court and the judgment thereon entered.

There was a memorandum of the sale sufficient to obviate any objection that might have arisen under the Statute of Frauds as to the binding effect of the contract of sale and purchase; and so the counsel for the parties have seemed to consider the matter in all the stages of the case.

The property was offered for sale by the respondents, in pursuance and fulfillment of their engagement with the appellant, and upon the implied assurance on appellant's part, to the person who might desire to purchase, that the title was good and valid; and in order to give the purchaser, whoever he might be, an opportunity to examine the title, it was announced at the sale that the property would be sold, "subject to legal investigation"—which means in such cases neither more nor less than that the purchaser would buy with the privilege reserved on his part to decline the bargain if he discovered on examination of the abstract that the title of the vendor of the property was defective. The purchaser in such a case would not be justified in making a captious objection to the title, because perhaps he might, after the property had been struck off to him, repent his bargain—but having purchased on condition that the title was good, he must abide his agreement, if in fact the title be free from valid objections.

Upon offering the property on the terms mentioned, a purchaser appeared who agreed to pay for it the sum of twenty-four thousand and fifty dollars. By this agreement he became bound to pay this sum unless it was ascertained as a truth that the appellant's title was defective.

In determining upon questions of title, mere possibilities, it has been said, are not to be regarded; the Court which is called upon to decide must govern itself by a moral certainty, for it is impossible in the nature of things that there should be a mathematical certainty of a good title. (Lyddal v. Weston, 2 Atkyns, 19; Hillary v. Waller, 12 Vesey, 239; Sperling v. Trevor, 7 Vesey, 498.)

It appears from the testimony of one of the respondents, and also from that of the appellant, that the only objection made by the purchaser to the appellant's title was that there was a discrepancy between the name of the grantor as written in the body of one of the deeds constituting appellant's chain of title, and the name as subscribed to it; and it appeared also by the testimony that the proof of the execution of the deed, as found upon the record, was that it was executed in fact by Edward Jones. Edward Jones was the person through whom, it would seem from the case, the appellant claimed title, and he it was who executed the deed by the name of Edmund Jones, as shown by the certificate of the proof of the execution thereof. If the record contained a true copy of the deed, and of the certificate of the proof of the fact of its execution, as we must presume it did in the absence of the deed itself, then its execution by Edward Jones was established, notwithstanding the use by him of another Christian name than his own, and the alleged defect was harmless. (Addy v. Grix, 8 Vesey, 504; Harrison v. Harrison, 8 Id. 185; Baker v. Denning, 8 Adol. and Ellis, 94; Merchants' Bank v. Spicer, 6 Wend. 446; Brown v. Butchers' and Drovers' Bank, 6 Hill, 443.)

No other objection seems to have existed on the part of the purchaser, and the one made being invalid, the sale of the premises to him became effectual and complete as a contract of sale. This being so, the right of the respondents to compensation for their services at the rate stipulated, follows of course.

But, independent of the fact that the sale of the property became discharged of the condition that postponed the time for the consummation of the contract between the vendor and vendee, we are of opinion the right of the respondents to the commission agreed upon for their services did not depend upon the fact that the title was good and valid. The contract between the parties was not that the respondents should take any risk as to the validity of the appellant's title. In the case of the Monte Allegre, 9 Wheat. 644, Mr. Justice Thompson said: "A merchant who employs a broker to sell his goods, knows or is presumed to know the state and condition of the article he offers for sale;" and upon the same principle he is presumed to know whether or not he has title. So when one employs an agent to sell real property which he represents he owns, he cannot, in the absence of an agreement to that effect, deny to his agent compensation for his services in making a sale because the title may prove defective and thereby defeat the sale. This would not be reasonable, but would be unjust.

Then when a person representing that he is the owner of property, places it in the hands of an agent to be sold, and the agent makes a sale of it in accordance with the instructions of his principal, or in pursuance of the terms of the agreement between them, he is entitled to compensation for his labor.

Brown v. Martin et al.

The amount of the compensation will depend upon the contract, if there be one in respect to it; or in the absence of any agreement on the subject, it will be measured by the value of the services rendered.

When the sale was made by the respondents, as appears by the evidence, their work was done, and they were entitled to the wages they had earned. (Glentworth v. Luther, 21 Barb. 147; Bernard v. Minnot, 34 Barb. 93.)

Mr. Justice SHAFTEE expressed no opinion.

JOHN M. BROWN v. CHARLES MARTIN, JULIANA MORELTA, AND WILLIAM ROBSON.

COMPLAINT—AMBIGUITY OR UNCERTAINTY IN.—A complaint in ejectment which avers that on a day named "the plaintiff was, and ever since has been, and still is the owner in fee simple, seized and possessed," etc. . . . "That" on a day thereafter named, "and while the plaintiff was so the owner in fee simple, seized and possessed, defendants entered and ousted him, and from thence hitherto have and still do withhold the same," etc., is good, unless demurred to on the ground that it is ambiguous, unintelligible, and uncertain.

DEMURRER—STATUTE OF LIMITATIONS.—The defense of the Statute of Limitations cannot be made by a demurrer which states in general terms that the complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. SAME.—In order to enable a party to avail himself of the defense of the Statute of Limitations by demurrer, the statute should be distinctly stated in the demurrer.

APPEAL from the District Court, Seventh Judicial District, Marin County.

This action was commenced on the 26th day of January, 1863. The complaint alleged that the ouster took place on the second day of January, 1858.

Defendant Martin demurred to the complaint, because it did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. The Court overruled the demurrer. The defendants then filed the following answer:

"The said defendants, for answer to the allegations of the complaint in this cause, say, that the said Plaintiff is not and never was the owner in fee simple, or otherwise, nor is he nor was he ever seized or possessed of the land described in the complaint in this cause, or any part thereof. The defendants do not deny that they have occupied and possessed the said lands as alleged in the complaint, and they allege that they, the said defendants, own and are entitled to the possession of said land."

The pleadings were not sworn to.

Plaintiff recovered judgment in the Court below, and defendants appealed.

The other facts are stated in the opinion of the Court.

A. T. Wilson, for Appellants.

This Court has held and decided, some half dozen times, that when the complaint shows that the Statute of Limitations has run against the claim sued on, the objection may be raised by demurrer.

If it can be raised by demurrer, it must be under subdivision six of section forty of the Practice Act, for it can come in under no other head, if, when the complaint itself shows that the statute has run, that objection may be raised under subdivision six of section forty, then the objection is not waived by a failure to take it in that way, but may be raised either by motion in arrest or on appeal.

We might, we suppose, rest with safety on the repeated decisions of this Court upon the point, especially under the decisions of this Court in Ellison v. Halleck, 6 Cal. 386, (see last clause of opinion, found on page 394,) but will offer a few suggestions showing, as we think, not only that the objection may be taken by demurrer when the complaint shows that the statute has run, but that, consistently with the provisions of our Practice Act, it can only be taken by demurrer, motion in arrest, or appeal. We cannot under our statute, as at common law, plead any matter showing a default, but are restricted (see section 46) to, first, a denial of the allegations of the complaint; and second, to a statement of new matter constituting a defense. One of the main ends intended to be obtained by our code, was brevity, and as a means, the avoidance of repetition, especially in pleading; and hence, the limitation in answering to denials and allegations of new matter in avoidance; for what good end could be attained in setting out in the answer the very matter alleged in the complaint?

When the statute has run, but the complaint is so drawn as not to show that fact, then allegations in the answer showing the running of the statute, would be properly new matter. New matter is that which the complaint does not touch upon. It is that matter the burden of proof of which lies in the defendant. (Bridges v. Paige, 13 Cal. 640; Percy v. Sabin, 10 Cal. 22; Glaxie v. Clift, Id.) Third—By this standard, any allegations in our answer of facts showing that the statute had run, would not be new matter, for those facts are set out in the complaint, and the defendant would not have had to prove them. See Hentsch v. Porter, 10 Cal. 558, where the limitation in answering to new matter is distinctly and emphatically stated. The complaint should be looked upon as the careful, deliberate, and well considered statement of the facts of the plaintiff's case, and when not distinctly and positively denied, they are taken to be true, and a point of departure in the investigation of the cause. When, then, facts are required to be set out, and when so set out and uncontradicted are for every purpose to be taken as true, then we ask the necessity or the sense of requiring the defendant, or even permitting the defendant, in order to have the benefit of such facts, to set them out in his pleading?

It seems clear to us that if a defendant were to set up in his answer a fact distinctly set out in the complaint, the Court, on motion, would order it to be stricken out as irrelevant or redundant. On motion to strike out matter from an answer as irrelevant or redundant under section fifty-seven of the Practice Act, what is the test by which the question of relevancy or redundancy is tried? Is it not this: whether it denies any allegation of the complaint, or confesses and avoids it? Would it not be a queer way for a defendant to take advantage of a distinct and substantive defense which the complaint itself shows for him, to deny, or confess and avoid it, that the defendant is restricted either to denying or confessing and avoiding in pleading? (See Practice Act, sec. 46, and Percy v. Sabin, 10 Cal. 27.)

It was said, and a case was cited on the oral argument to show, that a different rule holds in New York. On examination since, we have found that their law sustains our view. Our Practice Act in relation to pleading is a transcript of the New York code, except that in New York there is a distinct provision in the code that the defense of the Statute of Limitations must be set up in the answer. The inference is obvious, that the codifiers and Legislature understood that without such a provision such defense need not or would not be so taken. (See New York Code, Voorhies' edition, sec. 74, page 64.) Again: our practice is a purely statutory one, and every question of practice must be tried by the provisions of the Practice Act. This is pointedly enacted by statute, (see Practice Act, sec. 37,) when it is said, that "all the forms of pleadings in civil actions, and the rules by which the sufficiency of the pleadings shall be determined, shall be those prescribed by this Act;" (and see Payne v. Treadwell, 16 Cal. 243.)

Now, our Practice Act makes no distinction between the Statutes of Limitation and any other defense; and hence, the practice being uniform, if we must plead the statute in order to take advantage of it when the complaint shows that it has run, we must also plead any other and every other defense to have the advantage of it, even when the complaint shows the defense to exist; and as our practice is uniform, if we are bound to plead the statute at law, we are equally so in equity.

George Cadwalader, for Respondent.

In McDonald v. Bear River Company, 18 Cal. 238, it was held that "the question of the Statute of Limitations cannot be raised on appeal, unless presented in some form on the trial below, even though it be pleaded."

Upon the merits of the question, we say No; because we do not believe that a demurrer, to the effect that the complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, properly raises the question whether the Statute of Limitations is a bar to an action for the recovery of the possession of a tract of land.

The decisions of this Court have avoided land cases, and are confined to actions upon written contracts; and yet the last decision of this Court, which was in De Uprey v. De Uprey, 23 Cal. 352, it was held that to raise the bar of the statute required a special demurrer.

The allegation of seizin and ouster in a complaint in ejectment are not required to be proved as made; and whatever their date, they are considered as supported by proof of title in plaintiff and possession in defendant, at any time before commencement of suit.

Thus, in Stark v. Barrett, 15 Cal. 365, Mr. Chief Justice Field said: "The variance between the date of the alleged seizin and right of possession of the plaintiff on the 1st day of January, 1857, and the date of the conveyance to him, May 22d, 1858, is immaterial—the latter being previous to the commencement of the action. In our practice, to enable the plaintiff in ejectment to recover, it is only necessary to establish his right of possession and the occupation of the defendant at that time."

In Yount v. Howell, 14 Cal. 465, it was said: "The variance between the date of the alleged seizin and possession of the plaintiff in the complaint, January 1st, 1852, and the date of the patent, December 18th, 1857, is of no consequence—the latter being previous to the commencement of the action—and the motion for a nonsuit on that ground was properly denied. The rule of the common law in relation to the proof of a legal estate, and the right of entry at the date of the demise laid in the declaration, has no application under our system. The action of ejectment at common law proceeded upon a fictitious demise; and hence, it became necessary to show title in the lessor of the plaintiff at the date of the alleged demise. In our system the fiction has no existence; in our practice it is sufficient if it appear that the plaintiff was entitled to the possession of the premises at the commencement of the action, and the date of the alleged seizin or possession and ouster become material only when the question of mesne profits is involved."

And so it appears that the date of the seizin and ouster in our complaint are not material facts; for in contemplation of law they only mean that before the commencement of the suit that we had the right to the possession of the demanded premises. This being so, it is evident that the Statute of Limitations cannot take its base of attack from them; and hence, we say that the complaint is good.

The rule of pleading and of evidence is different in actions upon written contracts, whose date must be proved as alleged.

The Court, in Barringer v. Warden, 12 Cal. 311, took a departure from the established rule of decision, when it held that our practice was in closer assimilation to the practice in Courts of equity than those of common law, and thereupon holding that inasmuch as in Courts of equity the bar of the Statute of Limitations could be invoked by demurrer, the same could be done under our system in law cases.

If they were correct in their premises, they certainly meant to carry the rule to its logical conclusion, and did not intend that it might be raised by a general demurrer, which failed to state or allude to the Statute of Limitations.

A demurrer in equity was required to state the particular ground of objection. (Adams' Eq. p. 691.)

The Statute of Limitations is nothing more or less than a personal privilege, which, if not set out in precise terms and insisted upon, is waived. It is a kind of a personal exemption from a debt or legal duty given by statute. When pleaded, it goes in abatement of the action; and here, it may be observed, that all the decisions of this Court appear to have overlooked the forty-fourth section of the Practice Act, which declares: "When any of the matters enumerated in section forty do not appear upon the face of the complaint, the objection may be taken by answer."

Brown v. Martin et al.

The face of our complaint shows a cause of action; therefore the objection thereto raised under section forty does not apply. It is the back of the complaint, not its face, that shows the point made by appellant's counsel.

By the Court, SANDERSON, C. J.

This is an action of ejectment, and the appeal stands upon the judgment roll alone. Two points are made by counsel for appellant:

First—That it appears upon the face of the complaint that the plaintiff was in possession of the premises in controversy at the time the action was commenced.

Second—That the complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action.

I. The allegations of the complaint are: "That on the 1st day of January, 1858, the said plaintiff was and ever since has been, and still is the owner in fee simple, seized and possessed, etc. * * * That on the 2d day of January, 1858, and while the plaintiff was so the owner in fee simple, seized and possessed, defendants entered and ousted him, and from thence hitherto have and still do withhold the same, etc."

It is true, as claimed, that the foregoing allegations show that the plaintiff is still possessed of the premises; but the learned counsel for appellant must see that they also show that the plaintiff was dispossessed on the 2d day of January, 1858, by the defendants, who have ever since withheld possession. All that need be said upon this point is, that had counsel interposed a demurrer to the complaint in the Court below on the ground that the same was ambiguous, unintelligible, and uncertain, it is possible the Court would have sustained the demurrer, in which event the plaintiff would have been allowed to amend so as to remove the ambiguity. No demurrer was interposed for this cause, and under the forty-fifth section of the Practice Act the objection is deemed to have been waived. It is, therefore, too late to make the objection for the first time in this Court.

II. It is next claimed that under a demurrer which merely states in general terms that the complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, the defense of the Statute of Limitations may be made. The late Supreme Court held, in several cases, that the defense of the Statute of Limitations could be interposed by demurrer, and the ground of the decision was, that the pleadings under our system more nearly assimilate equity than common law pleadings under the former system, and that in equity the defense of the Statute of Limitations could be made by demurrer. In a demurrer to a bill in equity, under the former system, it was usual to state, in addition to the cause of demurrer, the particular grounds upon which the alleged cause was based; and if the Statute of Limitations was relied on as a cause of demurrer, it had to be specially so stated. Nor could the aid of the Statute of Limitations be invoked by demurrer unless it appeared upon the face of the bill that the cause of action was barred. The form of demurrer under the old chancery system runs thus: "This defendant doth demur in law to the said bill, and for cause of demurrer sheweth that it appears by the said bill that, etc."—stating the ground upon which the defendant relies.

It was undoubtedly the design of the framers of the new system to make the pleadings conform, so far as possible, to the old chancery, rather than the common law forms, for the obvious reason that the former are better adapted to the new system, which requires the pleader to state the facts constituting his cause of action or defense in ordinary and concise language. (Practice Act, sections thirty-nine and forty-six.) This design is further apparent from the fortieth, forty-first, and forty-fourth sections of the Practice Act. The fortieth states the several causes for which the defendant may demur, provided they appear upon the face of the complaint. If they do not appear upon the face of the complaint the forty-fourth section provides that they may be stated in the answer. But whether stated in the demurrer or in the answer, the forty-first section provides how they shall be stated, and requires the grounds, not the causes or objections, to be distinctly specified. Whether the causes of demurrer enumerated in section forty are assigned in a demurrer or in an answer, their legal character is the same, and they are matters of demurrer strictly. Dilatory pleas, eo nomine, are unknown to our system. Such pleas are, in our system, made causes of demurrer, and when relied on the grounds upon which they are founded must be distinctly stated, without regard to where or in what pleading the objection is interposed. That is to say, when a cause of demurrer is assigned, the reason or the ground of it must also be stated. For example: "The defendant demurs to the complaint for the following causes appearing upon the face thereof, to wit: First—The Court has no jurisdiction of the subject matter of the action, because the amount in controversy is less than three hundred dollars, to wit: one hundred dollars. Second—The plaintiff has not legal capacity to sue, because he is less than twenty-one years of age, to wit: eighteen years. Third—The complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, because the cause of action therein alleged has not accrued within five years next preceding the filing of said complaint." Such is the form of demurrer contemplated by our system of pleading, and such was the usual, though, perhaps, not always absolutely necessary form in the old chancery practice. To the extent of making it absolutely necessary, our system has improved on the old, by providing that the demurrer may be disregarded unless the grounds are specified as above.

The forty-fifth section provides that unless the causes of demurrer are assigned in the foregoing manner, either by demurrer or answer, they shall be deemed waived, except the objection to the jurisdiction of the Court, and the objection that the complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. These excepted objections may, therefore, be made at any stage of the proceedings; but when made, they are to be made in the manner and form prescribed by the forty-first section, for that section refers to all causes of demurrer, and makes exception in favor of none. These two objections may be taken in limine, or in support of a motion for a nonsuit, or in arrest of judgment, or on appeal; but whenever taken, and wherever taken, they should be taken as provided in sections forty and forty-four; and the grounds of the objection should be stated, as provided in section forty-one, under penalty of being disregarded as therein provided.

The forty-first section reads as follows:

"Sec. 41. The demurrer shall distinctly specify the grounds upon which any of the objections to the complaint are taken. Unless it do so it may be disregarded."

We are aware that the foregoing section has been practically ignored heretofore, and it has been held sufficient to state the causes of demurrer, in the general terms prescribed in the fortieth section. Admitting that a rule of practice, so long followed and sanctioned by the Courts, ought not to be disturbed, we still think that it should be restricted in its operation, rather than extended. To say the least, the last clause in the forty-first section places it in the discretion of the Court to say whether a demurrer which does not distinctly specify the grounds of the objection shall be disregarded. Therefore, in view of the practice which has prevailed heretofore, we do not hold that it is necessary to specify the grounds of the objections in all cases, but we do hold that if it is not done it is in the discretion of the Court to disregard the demurrer; and this Court will not entertain a question on demurrer founded upon the Statute of Limitations, unless the statute be distinctly stated in the demurrer, and unless that demurrer be interposed in the Court below.

In conclusion, we recommend to the profession the practice suggested in this opinion.

Judgment affirmed.

Mr. Justice SAWYER delivered the following dissenting opinion, in which Mr. Justice SHAFTER concurred.

While we admit that the law ought to require a party who relies upon the Statute of Limitations to specifically point out this objection in his demurrer, we feel compelled to dissent from the conclusion reached in the second point of the prevailing opinion in this case, on the ground that the construction of the provision of the Practice Act relating to demurrers appears to us to have been long since settled the other way.

Sections forty and forty-one of the Practice Act are, in respect to the point under consideration, substantially the same as sections one hundred and forty-four and one hundred and forty-five of the New York code. Under those provisions it was held by the Supreme Courts of New York at a very early day, and before their adoption in California, that it was a sufficient specification of the sixth ground of demurrer to state, in the language of the Act, "that the complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action." And this construction was approved and established by the Court of Appeals of New York as early as 1851. (Haine v. Baker, 1 Seld. 359.)

As long ago as October, 1856, the question was raised in this State, and the Supreme Court, after intimating that as an original question they might, perhaps, have given a different construction to the provisions under consideration, held that as the Courts of this State had adopted and followed the construction of the Courts of New York, they would not change it. In discussing the question the Court say: "In mere matters of practice involving no principle, it would be safer to acquiesce in a rule which has been established for several years in the inferior Courts of this State, the abrogation of which might introduce confusion and operate hardly on litigants." (6 Cal. 393.) It is now nearly eight years since that decision was announced, and we are not aware that it was ever afterward questioned by the late Supreme Court. The reasons then given operate with much greater force now, after the construction has been so long acquiesced in by the highest Court in the State. As a general proposition, the Court do not now propose to overrule this construction. But it seems to us that the conclusion reached does overrule it, as to a particular class of cases. It has been held in a number of instances that the defendant may take advantage of the Statute of Limitations by demurrer, when it appears on the face of the complaint that the cause of action is barred. If so, the objection to the complaint on this ground must fall under the sixth subdivision of section forty: "That the complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action." We do not perceive any satisfactory ground upon which the Court can make a distinction between the ground of demurrer we are now considering and any other falling under the same head, where the statute itself does not seem to us to have made any. If the Court in its discretion may make one exception, we do not see why it may not another; and thus by extending the exercise of this discretion, overrule the previous decisions upon the provisions under consideration as to every case. With due deference to the opinion of our associates, we are unable to regard the case as one for the exercise of a judicial discretion. It seems to us to be a question of construction; and when the construction has been once settled, and for a long time acquiesced in, it becomes practically a part of the statute itself; and it ought not, in our opinion, to be changed except by legislative action. For these reasons we dissent.

J. E. MILLER v. THE BOARD OF SUPERVISORS OF SACRAMENTO COUNTY.

CERTIORARI.—The amended Constitution confers upon the Supreme Court original jurisdiction to issue writs of certiorari.

OFFICIAL BONDS.—In the matter of the approval of the bonds of officers, Boards of Supervisors exercise judicial functions.

RESIGNATION OF OFFICE.—One who has been elected to an office cannot resign the same until the time has arrived when he is entitled by law to possess the same, and he has taken the oath and given the required bond, and entered upon the discharge of its duties.

SAME.—An attempt by one elected to an office to resign the same before he has qualified and entered upon the discharge of its duties, is abortive and ineffectual.

REJECTION OF OFFICIAL BONDS.—A Board of Supervisors has no jurisdiction to reject an official bond, except for the reasons that it is not in form and substance in compliance with the requirements of the statute, or is not executed by sufficient and responsible sureties; and the Supreme Court will review on certiorari and annul an order of a board rejecting a bond for any other than one or more of said reasons.

Miller v. Board of Supervisors of Sacramento County.

CERTIORARI to the Board of Supervisors of Sacramento County.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the Court.

H. H. Hartley, for Petitioner.

Upton and Estee, for Respondent.

By the Court, CURREY, J.

The petitioner, John E. Miller, was elected at the general election of the year 1863 to the office of Public Administrator of Sacramento County, for the term to commence on the first Monday of March, 1864, and a certificate of his election was duly issued to him by the proper officer. On the first Monday of March, 1864, before Miller had taken the oath of office or executed the proper bond, with sureties, he tendered, in writing, to the Judge of the County Court of the county, his resignation of the office to which he had been elected, which was accepted by such Judge, and by him transmitted to the Board of Supervisors, and the same was placed on file with the Clerk of the Board. Afterward, on the 15th of March, the petitioner gave notice, in writing, to the Supervisors that he withdrew his resignation, and at the same time exhibited to them proof that he had duly taken the official oath required by law, and tendered to the Board his official bond, executed in the amount and form prescribed by law, which was received and filed with the Clerk of the Board. The Board met on the 5th of April, and proceeded to consider the matter in relation to the resignation of Miller; and, upon motion of one of its members, the same was in form accepted, and so entered in the minutes of their proceedings; and on the following day the Board met again and rejected the bond, for reasons specially assigned. The reasons so assigned were not because the bond was not in substance and form in compliance with the requirements of the statute in such cases made and provided, nor because the sureties were not sufficient and responsible; but, in effect, because the petitioner had resigned the office. Immediately before the petitioner gave the Board notice of his withdrawal of his resignation he applied to the County Judge and requested to be permitted to withdraw his resignation, and the Judge consented thereto and advised him that, as his resignation had been transmitted to the Board of Supervisors, to notify the Board of his withdrawal of it.

In the petition presented to this Court, the petitioner complains that the Board of Supervisors, by their action rejecting the bond for the reasons by them assigned, acted in violation of law and exceeded their jurisdiction, to the manifest injury of the petitioner; and he therefore prays this Court to order that a writ of certiorari be issued to said Board to certify up to this Court for review their records and proceedings in the premises, that this Court may render such judgment concerning the matter as may be proper in the case.

This writ was granted without any prejudice to any defense the Board of Supervisors might have made upon the return of an order to show cause why the writ should not be granted. The Board has caused to be certified and brought before the Court all their proceedings; and upon the record thus made up it is maintained, on behalf of the Supervisors:

First—That this Court has not jurisdiction to grant a writ of certiorari, except in aid of its appellate jurisdiction.

Second—That if the Court has such jurisdiction, the case exhibited by the record does not show that the Board of Supervisors exceeded their jurisdiction by performing the acts of which the petitioner complains.

I. The Constitution as amended provides that the Supreme Court shall "have power to issue writs of mandamus, certiorari, prohibition and habeas corpus, and also all writs necessary or proper to the complete exercise of its appellate jurisdiction." (Art. VI, Sec. 4.) This section of the Constitution as it stood before it was amended, after enumerating the appellate powers of the Supreme Court, provided that it should have power to issue all writs and process necessary to the exercise of its appellate jurisdiction. The change effected by the amendment seems to have been designed to enlarge the powers of the Court by conferring upon it original jurisdiction in the particulars specified in the fourth section of the Sixth Article. The language of this section is too clear and explicit to leave it open to any other construction, however much the Court might be disposed to decline this new jurisdiction, in view of the inconveniences and embarrassments that may attend its exercise. (Tyler v. Houghton, 25 Cal. 26.)

Miller v. Board of Supervisors of Sacramento County.

II. The main point in the case is involved in the second objection, namely: that from the record certified to this Court it does not appear that the Board of Supervisors exceeded their jurisdiction in accepting the resignation of the petitioner and in the rejecting of his bond filed with the Board.

The writ of certiorari shall be granted in all cases where an inferior tribunal, Board, or officer, exercising judicial functions, has exceeded the jurisdiction of such tribunal, Board, or officer, and there is no appeal, nor in the judgment of the Court any plain, speedy, and adequate remedy. This is so provided by the four hundred and fifty-sixth section of the Practice Act; and the only question to be considered under the authority of this statute is, whether the case presented by the record before us embodies the elemental conditions authorizing the issuing of the writ in the first place; and the giving of judgment, either affirming, annulling, or modifying the proceedings of the Board, in the second place; for the power of review possessed by the Court in this case cannot be extended further than to determine whether the Board has regularly pursued its authority, (Practice Act, Section 462,) and to give judgment either affirming, annulling, or modifying the proceedings of the Board. (Practice Act, Section 463.)

By the twenty-fourth section of the Act providing for the government of the County of Sacramento, passed April 25th, 1863, (Laws 1863, p. 512,) the Board of Supervisors are required to fix the amount of the official bonds of the several county officers, and such bonds are to be approved by such

Miller v. Board of Supervisors of Sacramento County.

Board in open session, which fact is required to be entered in the minutes of their proceedings and indorsed on the bond by the Clerk, and it shall then be approved by the County Judge. In the matter of the approval or disapproval of the bond, the Board exercises judicial functions. (Robinson v. Board of Supervisors of Sacramento, 16 Cal. 208, and cases therein cited; People v. El Dorado County, 8 Cal. 61; People v. The Supervisors of Marin County, 10 Cal. 344.)

The act performed by the Board of Supervisors, alleged to have been an excess of their jurisdiction, consisted in determining, in effect, that the petitioner had resigned the office to which he was elected, and in rejecting the bond for that reason, and because of a previous attempt on his part to sell the office. Whatever may have been the truth as to such attempt, and however open to animadversion, conduct of this kind may be, that was a question with which the Board had no authority to deal, and the inquiry must be narrowed down to the point whether the petitioner had resigned the office to which he was elected by the people of the county, and whether his resignation was a subsisting fact at the time the Board acted. If this inquiry be answered in the negative, then the Board, according to the case cited from 10 Cal. 344, exceeded its jurisdiction in treating the alleged resignation as effectual, and rejecting the bond tendered and filed for the reasons by them assigned.

At the time the petitioner undertook to resign the office of Public Administrator he was not in fact invested with that office. Before he could become so he was required by law to take the constitutional oath, and execute with sureties a proper bond to be approved by the Board. Had these things been done within the ten days allowed for the purpose, he would have become the Public Administrator of Sacramento County, and fully invested with the office. Having the mere naked right to the office of Public Administrator, the taking of the constitutional oath of office and executing the bond prescribed were conditions which, fully completed, were essential to the constituting of the petitioner such officer.

Miller v. Board of Supervisors of Sacramento County.

The first section of the Act concerning Public Administrators is as follows: "There shall be elected at the general election in and for each of the counties of this State, by the electors thereof, a Public Administrator, who shall continue in office for the term of two years, and until his successor is elected and qualified." (Wood's Digest, 51.)

There can be but one incumbent of the office of Public Administrator at the same time, and he who held the office prior to the first Monday in March remained the incumbent on that day, notwithstanding the petitioner was then entitled to the office upon taking the oath and filing the necessary bond. The petitioner's term, or the term for which he was elected, commenced on the first Monday of March; but that fact alone could not constitute him the incumbent of the office, because an incumbent is one who is in the present possession of an office. (Webster.) An officer is one who is lawfully invested with an office; and an office is a right to exercise a public function or employment and to take the fees and emoluments belonging to it. (7 Bac. Ab. 279; title—Offices and Officers.)

The twenty-third section of the Act concerning office is as follows: "Every office shall become vacant upon the happening of either of the following events before the expiration of the term of such office: 1. The death or resignation of the incumbent. 2. The removal of the incumbent from office. 3. The confirmed insanity of the incumbent, etc. 4. A conviction of the incumbent of a felony, etc. 5. A refusal or neglect of the person elected or appointed to take the oath of office, as prescribed in the seventeenth section of this Act; or when a bond is required by law, his refusal or neglect to give the bond within the same time in which he is required to take the oath of office. 6. The ceasing of the incumbent to be a resident, etc. 7. The ceasing of the incumbent to discharge the duties of the office for the period of three consecutive months, except, etc. 8. The decision of a competent tribunal declaring the election or appointment void, or the office vacant." (Laws of 1863, p. 389.)

By reference to these subdivisions of section thirty, it will be observed that the term "incumbent" refers to him alone who has become qualified and has entered into the possession of the office; and that the person who has been elected or appointed to an office, who refuses or neglects to take the oath of office, or to give a bond when required, within the time prescribed by law, is not denominated an incumbent; and nothing is said as to the resignation of any other than an incumbent of the office.

In The People v. Van Horne, 18 Wend. 518, Mr. Chief Justice Savage said: "An office cannot be said to be vacant while any person is authorized to act in it, and does so act." And in reference to a statute like the first section of our Act concerning Public Administrators, he said: "In such cases there is, in fact, no vacancy, because the officers of the preceding year hold the offices until others are chosen or appointed in their places and have qualified."

If the petitioner had not become the incumbent of the office which he was elected to fill, he had no office to resign; and though he may have supposed he had, yet that did not alter the fact, and his attempted resignation and the acceptance of it by the County Judge was abortive and ineffectual.

The petitioner having taken the oath and filed the bond required by law, the Board of Supervisors ought to have approved it, if no other objection stood in the way than those assigned for rejecting it. We think the Board, by their action, which we are called upon to review, exceeded their jurisdiction. (People v. Supervisors of Marin County, 10 Cal. 344.) For the correction of this error there is no appeal, nor in our judgment, any plain, speedy, and adequate remedy other than by certiorari.

It is therefore ordered and adjudged that the proceedings of the Board of Supervisors of Sacramento County, in holding that the petitioner had resigned the office of Public Administrator, and in rejecting his bond filed, be annulled and held for naught.

Mr. Justice SAWYER expressed no opinion.

Jones v. Parsons et al.

SYLVANUS JONES v. JAMES PARSONS, ADMINISTRATOR OF THE ESTATE OF THOMAS C. BRUNTON, DECEASED, THE PHOENIX WATER COMPANY, C. DORSEY, AND ABNER REED.

MORTGAGE OF INTEREST OF ONE OF SEVERAL PARTNERS.—If two or more persons are partners in the ownership and management of real estate, and owe partnership debts, and one of the partners mortgages his interest in the property to secure his individual debt, the mortgagee acquires only the mortgagor's interest in the surplus after the payment of the partnership debts; and if these debts equal or exceed the value of the property, and it is afterwards sold by the partners to pay the partnership debts, the mortgagee, as against the purchaser, holds no interest in the property, liable in equity to be sold, and the mortgage cannot be foreclosed.

PARTNERSHIP DEBTS—SALE OF PROPERTY TO PAY.—The purchaser of partnership property, who pays or becomes liable for partnership debts, equal in amount to the value of the property, has a valid defense against a suit in equity, brought to foreclose a mortgage executed by one of the partners for his individual debt on his interest in the partnership property.

APPEAL from the District Court, Fifth Judicial District, Toulumne County.

The note given by Brunton to Jones, the plaintiff, on the 7th of November, 1857, and to secure which he executed the mortgage, was for the sum of two thousand two hundred and forty-three dollars and eighty-nine cents, and was payable three years from date.

In October, 1860, Brunton died, and James Parsons was appointed administrator of his estate.

This action was commenced October 24th, 1862. The defendant, Reed, was made such, because he had purchased the property at a tax sale, and had obtained a tax deed. He demurred to the complaint, and the demurrer was sustained.

The defendants set up in their answer, that at the time of the execution of the mortgage the ditches were the partnership property of Brunton, Parsons, and Gleason; that the partnership was largely indebted in an amount exceeding the value of its property, and that the partnership property was sold for the purpose of liquidating the partnership debts, and settling up the affairs of the partnership.

The other facts are stated in the opinion of the Court.

Jones v. Parsons & c.

Coffroth & Spaulding, for Appellants.

The mortgage was notice to all parties after it had become a matter of record; and the titles of subsequent purchasers are subject to the lien created by the mortgage.

Dorsey purchased long after the recording of the mortgage.

We claim that the partnership indebtedness should have been disregarded and an absolute decree of foreclosure and sale made. If not, then the plaintiff is certainly entitled to a decree for the foreclosure of the mortgage, and sale of the mortgaged interest subject to the payment of the partnership indebtedness still remaining unpaid.

W. P. Barber, for Respondents.

The Court decided correctly; the appellant being only an individual creditor of one of the copartners, could not ask any relief against the property until the copartnership debts were paid; and the property failing to pay the copartnership debts, there was no surplus left to satisfy individual creditors.

This principle is fully recognized in all standard works on partnership, (Collyer on Part. p. 122, section 125 and notes,) and attaches as well to real as personal property. (Ib; 5 Metcalf, 562-585; Buchan v. Sumner, 2 Barb. Ch. R. 198; Hozie v. Carr, 1 Sumner, 181; 1 American Lead. Cases, 487-489.)

This question has also been expressly decided by this Court. (Chase v. Steel, 9 Cal. 64; Conroy v. Woods, 13 Cal. 626.)

In Jones v. Thompson, 12 Cal. 198, the Court say: "The interest of each is only the residuum of the property left after the settlement of the firm debts, and that the rights of firm creditors and the several partners are paramount to the claims of separate creditors of the firm." (See, also, Collyer on Part. sections 135, 136, 154; 1 Story's Eq. Jur. sections 674, 675.)

This appears to be the rule both at common law and in equity, and the present is a suit in equity. If a party attach or levy upon the individual interest of a copartner, he takes it subject to the payment of copartnership debts; and there is no reason why a mortgage should possess greater effect.

Coffroth & Spaulding, in reply.

The interest of one partner may be sold on execution against him for his separate debts. (Kirby v. Schoonmaker, 3 Barb. Ch. R. 46; Jones v. Thompson, 12 Cal. 191; 2 McCord's Ch. R. 302.)

If such interest can be sold on execution, why should not a decree of sale be made upon a mortgage of that interest?

At the date of the mortgage the copartnership was administering its own affairs, and consequently no lien had attached or could attach in favor of partnership creditors in the absence of any judgment in their favor. (Kirby v. Schoonmaker, 3 Barb. Ch. R. 46; Conroy v. Woods, 13 Cal. 633.)

Until a lien is obtained by the partnership creditors, either by judgment or attachment, the partners have power to make any bona fide sale of the property they think proper; and either of them may mortgage his interest in the real estate. (Conroy v. Woods, 13 Cal. 633; Collyer on Part. pp. 121, 122; Greenwood v. Broadhead, 8 Barb. 594; Ketchum v. Durkes, 1 Barb. Ch. 480.)

By the Court, RHODES, J.

Thomas C. Brunton, made to the plaintiff his promissory note, on the 17th of November, 1857, and to secure its payment, at the same time executed a mortgage of the undivided third of the Yorktown and Sonora Water Ditches. The plaintiff now seeks to foreclose the mortgage against the administrator of Brunton (now deceased) and Brunton's vendee. The Court rendered judgment against the administrator, but refused to foreclose the mortgage. The plaintiff appeals from that portion of the judgment refusing to foreclose the mortgage and from the order refusing a new trial.

It appears from the record that on the 4th of May, 1857, Brunton and Parsons were the joint owners of the Yorktown Ditch, and on that day they, with Gleason, purchased the Sonora Ditch, and Brunton and Parsons then conveyed to Gleason the undivided third of the Yorktown Ditch, whereby the three persons became equal owners in the two ditches, and they formed a partnership, the ditches forming the main part of the partnership property. Brunton and Parsons put into the firm the Yorktown Ditch on their part, against the purchase money paid by Gleason on the Sonora Ditch.

The parties continued as partners, holding the two ditches, until the 13th of July, 1859, when they dissolved partnership; by an agreement in writing, and in order to pay the partnership debts, therein stated to be twenty thousand dollars, Brunton and Parsons conveyed to Gleason their interest in the ditches, and Gleason agreed to pay the debts. In April, 1860, Gleason conveyed the ditches to the defendant Dorsey, and subsequently Dorsey conveyed the same to the Phoenix Water Company.

Gleason sold the property for the purpose of paying the partnership debts—Dorsey agreeing to pay the same. Gleason paid some portion of the partnership debts out of his own means. At the date of the plaintiff's mortgage the partnership debts amounted to twenty or twenty-five thousand dollars, and the indebtedness continued down to the sale to Dorsey, when the debts amounted to about twenty-five thousand dollars, of which amount five thousand dollars was owing by the partnership to Gleason. The value of all the partnership assets at the dissolution, amounted to about twenty thousand dollars, the water ditches constituting the bulk of the property claimed by the partners as partnership property.

The plaintiff contended, that the ditches were not partnership property, but that Brunton, Parsons, and Gleason were merely partners in the use and management of the ditches. There was no finding of facts filed by the Court, but the issue, as to their being partnership assets, was directly presented by the defendants, and the judgment of the Court, refusing to foreclose the mortgage, could not have been rendered upon any other issue in the cause, nor without finding that fact for the defendants. There was evidence in the cause showing that the partners intended to put in the ditches as capital stock, and hold them as partners, and the whole evidence was sufficient to have warranted the Court in finding as a fact, that they did hold the ditches in that capacity.

The remedies that the plaintiff was entitled to, at law, or in equity, were quite different, though the final result might be the same whichever tribunal he might resort to. If he had reduced his original debt against Brunton to judgment at law, during the time Brunton held his interest in the ditches, he could have levied his execution upon Brunton's interest in the ditches, and sold the same in satisfaction of his judgment. This point was so held in Phillips v. Cook, 24 Wend. 389.

In that case, Mr. Justice Cowen, upon a full and able review of the authorities, clearly settled that question, and says there was no good reason for holding the contrary in any case, but that every reason was in favor of the judgment creditors having that right at law. The interest that might have been sold under such proceedings was not the undivided third, nor any specific portion of or in the property, but it was only the undefined surplus interest of Brunton in the partnership property that might remain to him after all the debts owing by the partnership, and by him to his partners, on the partnership account, have been paid. (Collyer on Part. sec. 822, and notes; Story on Part. sec. 261; Washburn et al. v. Bank of Bellows Falls, 19 Verm. 278.) In Pierce v. Jackson, 6 Mass. 242, the Court say that "a creditor of one of the partners cannot claim any interest but what belongs to his debtor, whether his claim be founded on contract made with his debtor or on a seizing of the goods on execution." And the Court held that the interest of the debtor partner, is the balance coming to him on the settlement of the partnership debts. The creditor purchases at the execution sale at his own risk, for a Court of law is incompetent to take the account and ascertain the surplus, but the parties interested must resort to a Court of equity for that purpose.

The same result would accrue in case of the sale under execution of the legal interest of a partner, in the partnership real estate, as in the personal property. The partners are regarded at law as tenants in common, but in equity the property is treated as vesting in them, in their partnership capacity, the beneficial interest being held by them in trust until the partnership account is settled and the partnership debts are paid. (Dyer v. Clark, 5 Metc. 582; Howard v. Priest, 5 Metc. 582; Coll. on Part. sec. 185, and notes.)

The trust in favor of partnership creditors is worked out in equity, through the medium of the trust existing between the partners, each partner having the right to demand that the partnership property shall be applied to the payment of partnership debts, and that he shall be reimbursed out of such property for the debts paid by him, as well as his contribution to the capital stock. The creditor of a separate partner, purchasing under his execution, the legal title in the real estate held by his debtor, would take the title as the debtor partner held it, subject to all the liens and trusts with which the title then stood chargeable.

The plaintiff contends that, as he would have the right at law, to sell under execution, the interest of his debtor in the partnership property, he therefore must necessarily have the right to foreclose his mortgage. No point is made in respect to the plaintiff's receiving his mortgage bona fide and without notice, actual or constructive, of the partnership rights in the property; and there being no evidence upon that question, it will not enter into the consideration of the case. If he had procured a judgment at law, before the sale to Gleason, and under his execution, had sold the undivided third of the two ditches, held by legal title by Brunton, then he would have held the property as Brunton held it; that is to say, he would have acquired the legal title, charged with the liens and trusts in favor of the remaining partners and the partnership creditors, and the debts equalling the value of the property, the beneficial interest acquired by the execution purchaser, would have amounted to nothing.

The case before us is this: Three partners hold in common the legal title to certain property; the property is partnership property; the partnership is indebted in an amount equal to, if not exceeding, the value of the assets; one of the partners, for the purpose of securing his individual debt, mortgages to his creditors the undivided third of the partnership property; the whole partnership property is afterwards sold by the three partners, to pay the partnership debts; and now the individual creditor seeks to foreclose, in equity, his mortgage in satisfaction of his debt. The questions arising upon this state of facts are not now for the first time presented in the Courts of this State. In Conroy v. Woods, 13 Cal. 626, which was a suit in equity, the Court held that the rights of the partnership creditors, in respect to partnership property, were prior to those of individual creditors; and Mr. Justice Baldwin, in delivering the very able opinion of the Court, quotes with approbation Story on Part. sec. 97, which expressly affirms that doctrine.

In that case defendant Woods was proceeding under his execution, for an individual debt, to sell the property which had belonged to the partnership, but which had been sold to one of the partners, on dissolution, on his agreeing to pay the partnership debts, and the Court ordered the funds to be first applied to the payment of the partnership debts. The lien in that case was acquired by operation of law; in this case it was voluntarily given by the debtor partner. Has a lien voluntarily given any superiority over one acquired by law? We think it clearly has not. The lien by mortgage is in no respect better than would have been the lien of a judgment rendered at the time of the execution of the mortgage, or the lien of an attachment levied at that time on the assets of the partnership.

Whatever the rights of the parties may be at law, and admitting in its full force the doctrine of Phillips v. Cook, 24 Wend. 389, there never was any doubt that a Court of equity can restrict a party to such rights and remedies as he ought to possess, in view of the relation which he occupies in regard to the partnership assets, or that the Court will so administer the partnership assets, that the partnership creditors shall be first paid. (Conroy v. Woods, 13 Cal. 626.)

The plaintiff has sued in equity, and the defendants are entitled to invoke for their protection, the rules and remedies peculiar to that Court, and they having made it appear that the partnership debts equalled the partnership assets at the date of the mortgage, and of the sale of the partnership property, and that the sale was made to pay the debts, it results, according to the rules of that Court, that the vendees of Brunton, held no interest in the partnership assets liable in equity to be sold for the payment of his individual debts.

It will be observed that in Conroy v. Woods, the partnership property had been sold to pay the debts of the partnership, and the Court held that in equity the priority of the lien of the partnership debts, still continued as against a creditor of an individual member of the partnership. That rule would not prevent the creditor of an individual member of the partnership, any more than a creditor of the partnership, from impeaching the bona fides of the sale.

Our view of the rights of the respective parties, may be illustrated by supposing that the plaintiff had proceeded to foreclose before the sale of Brunton. In such case, it would clearly be competent to the partners and their creditors, who might intervene to secure the payment of the partnership debts due them, to allege and prove that the mortgaged property was partnership property, and that it was necessary it should be employed in the payment of partnership debts, accruing previous to the mortgage, and thereupon to have the same appropriated to that object.

The right still subsists after a sale of the property is made, as in this case, and may be asserted in defense of a suit in equity, brought by a separate creditor, to subject the property to the payment of his debt, the purchaser, for that purpose representing both the partners and the creditors, whose debts he has paid or become responsible for.

The sale by Brunton and Parsons to Gleason, and by him to Dorsey, having been made to pay the partnership debts, whether regarded as two sales, or as amounting to only one transaction, will be upheld in equity; and it will carry the same consequences as would a sale ordered by a Court of equity, in proceedings instituted for the purpose of administering the partnership assets, for the benefit of the creditors. That Court simply orders that to be done which the parties themselves should have done. If, in such case, a separate creditor should intervene, his claims will be deferred to the prior claims of the joint creditors.

Brennan et al. v. Wallace et al.

The Court proceeded properly in refusing to enter a decree of foreclosure.

The view we have taken of the principal question in the case, renders it unnecessary to consider the other points raised by the appellant.

Judgment affirmed.

JAMES BRENNAN AND JOHN McHUGH v. JAS. WALLACE, MARY WALLACE, AND DANIEL SHEEHAN.

HOMESTEAD — ABANDONMENT OF.—If both husband and wife removed from a homestead acquired and held under the law as it existed before the amendments of 1860, whether the removal was only temporary, or was an abandonment of the homestead and intended to be permanent, are questions of fact to be determined by the Court from all the evidence.

IDEM — EVIDENCE OF ABANDONMENT.—The declarations of the husband in relation to an abandonment of a homestead, acquired before the amendments of 1860 to the homestead law, and before a declaration of homestead had been filed under said amendments, are admissible in evidence in an action against both husband and wife, where the fact of abandonment is in issue.

IDEM.—A declaration of abandonment of a homestead, acquired by actual occupancy previous to 1860, made and acknowledged by both husband and wife, and recorded before any declaration of homestead had been made, is admissible in evidence, as a fact tending to show an actual abandonment.

APPEAL from the District Court, Twelfth Judicial District, City and County of San Francisco.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the Court.

John F. Swift and Selden S. Wright, for Appellants.

Brennan et al. v. Wallace et al.

We contend that the declaration of abandonment was inadmissible for any purpose.

That it could not show or tend to show an actual abandonment, and no other kind of an abandonment could help the plaintiff's case.

That a declaration of abandonment could be applicable alone after the filing of the original declaration.

In the case before us, the declaration was filed not until April, 1862, when the declaration of abandonment was made in August, 1860.

The purpose of such declaration as provided for in the Act, was to work an estoppel against the husband and wife after they had acquired their rights under the amendments of 1860.

It made no difference, after these rights were so held, whether the declaration was true or not true; it made no difference whether they actually abandoned or not; they might continue to use the homestead as such in fact, yet they would be estopped by this declaration of abandonment.

On the other hand, before the amendment of 1860 took effect, a simple declaration of abandonment, without an actual abandonment, would amount to nothing.

More particularly is it inadmissible against Mrs. Wallace, who is a married woman, and cannot be estopped by any mere declarations, however made, unless in requirement of law. The same would exclude the declarations of Wallace, as testified to by the witness O'Farrell.

These declarations ought to have been excluded as testimony in this cause. Having been admitted, this Court cannot say how much weight it has had in influencing the conclusion of the Court below in its findings of fact.

Apart from this declaration, the testimony establishes the fact that Wallace went away for his health with the intention of returning, and that he carried that intention into effect.

B. Tobin, for Respondents.

By the Court, CURREY, J.

This action was brought to recover against James Wallace the amount due on a promissory note by him made and delivered to the plaintiffs on 28th of December, 1860, payable twelve months after that date, and to foreclose a mortgage executed by him on the same day on a certain piece of land in San Francisco, to secure the payment of the note. Mrs. Wallace was not a party to this mortgage.

The defense made is that the mortgaged premises were the homestead of the defendants at the time the mortgage was executed and so remained at the commencement of this action. A great amount of evidence was produced at the trial, upon which the Court rendered judgment against the defendant James Wallace, and a decree for the foreclosure of the mortgage and the sale of the mortgaged premises. Thereupon the defendants moved for a new trial and it was denied.

The defendants have assigned several causes as grounds why, as they claim, the judgment should be reversed.

First—Because of the insufficiency of the evidence to justify the findings of the Court and the judgment entered in the cause.

The specific causes assigned under the general ground stated are in substance as follows: First—That the evidence failed to show that the defendants removed from the mortgaged premises with the intention to abandon them as their homestead, or that they intended to permanently reside elsewhere. Second—That the evidence did not establish the fact that defendants did not reside on the premises when the note and mortgage were made, nor that they did not then intend to re-occupy the same premises as their homestead. Third—That the evidence showed that long before the note and mortgage were made, and from thence to the time of the trial, the premises were defendants' homestead. Fourth—That the evidence showed that the absence of defendants from the premises was but temporary, and was occasioned by the bad health of the defendant James Wallace, while it did appear from the evidence that defendants' intention always was, during their absence, to return to the premises.

Testimony was given by several witnesses on the trial, showing that the defendants were induced to remove to Contra Costa on the account of the infirm condition of the defendant James Wallace, and it clearly appeared, and was not attempted to be controverted as a fact, that from the month of February, 1860, to November, 1862, the defendants lived upon a farm in Contra Costa County, where they were engaged in the business of farming, during which period the note and mortgage were executed and delivered. It was proved on the trial that the defendants resided on the mortgaged premises and occupied the same as their homestead from some time in 1851 until they removed to Contra Costa, early in 1860. Whether they intended to reside in that county permanently was a question to be determined, if it was of any particular importance, from the evidence before the Court; and so, too, whether they intended to abandon their homestead—the mortgaged premises—was a fact to be ascertained from the evidence. If the Court was authorized in finding that defendants abandoned their homestead before the mortgage was executed, then it is a matter of no moment what cause induced them to the step, nor whether or not they intended to reside permanently in Contra Costa.

In Cook v. McChristian, 4 Cal. 26, the Court say the homestead is the dwelling place of the family, and that by the common law such residence would raise the presumption that the premises so held were the homestead; and in Harper and Wife v. Forbes, 15 Cal. 203, the Court held that occupancy of premises by the husband with his family is presumptive evidence of their appropriation as a homestead, and that the removal of the husband with his family from the premises thus appropriated is in like manner presumptive evidence of their abandonment as a homestead. When a fact is established by the proved existence of facts and circumstances from which it is presumed, it becomes conclusive unless rebutted by other evidence in the cause. In the case last cited the Court, in undertaking to enumerate circumstances from which the presumption of abandonment, when once established, might be rebutted, say "it must appear that the removal was temporary in its nature, made for a specific purpose, with the intention of re-occupying the premises. The necessities of the family, their maintenance, their health, or the education of the children, may often require a temporary change of residence. In such cases the premises will still retain their original character as a homestead."

There can be no disputing the fact that the premises in controversy became the homestead of the defendants many years before their removal to Contra Costa County, and continued their homestead until their removal; and it may be it so remained some time thereafter, because their change of residence may have been intended to be but temporary; but whether their intention to return to the premises as their homestead existed at the date of the note and mortgage, was a question to be decided by the Court that tried the cause. If the decision that the premises were at that time abandoned as a homestead was warranted upon a fair consideration of the evidence, notwithstanding the necessities which induced the defendants' removal, and notwithstanding they may have intended at that time that their absence should be but temporary, this Court would not be authorized, in the proper exercise of its revising powers, to disturb the judgment.

The evidence shows that on the 8th of August, 1860, the defendants executed and acknowledged before a Notary Public an instrument in writing declaring that they abandoned all claim to the premises as a homestead. The note and mortgage, as already appears, were executed and delivered on the 28th of December following; and it can hardly be supposed that this written instrument, declaring that the defendants abandoned all claim to the premises as a homestead was without its effect in inducing the plaintiffs to accept the mortgage as security for the amount specified in the note; but whether this was the fact or otherwise, the solemn declaration of the parties that they abandoned all claim to the premises as a homestead furnished the Court with cogent evidence of their intention, and we think authorized the finding of the issue on that point against the defendants.

The declaration of homestead executed and acknowledged by James Wallace on the 21st of March, 1862, though it may have been effectual as a claim of homestead from that time, could not rescue the property from the lien of the mortgage created thereon more than a year before then, and at a time when the premises had lost, by abandonment, the character of the homestead of the defendants.

Second — The appellants make the point that the judgment is against law, because the Court found as a conclusion that the mortgaged premises were not the homestead of defendants when the mortgage was executed and delivered.

This point is essentially involved in the question already considered and is disposed of by our determination of that question.

Third — The appellants' third ground of objection to the decision and judgment is that the Court erred: 1st. In permitting the declarations of the defendant, James Wallace, to be given in evidence against both defendants, notwithstanding the objection thereto made on behalf of Mrs. Wallace; and 2d. By permitting to be read in evidence against both defendants the declaration of abandonment of all claim of homestead right of the defendants in the mortgaged premises, notwithstanding the defendants' objection thereto.

The question by which the evidence was elicited as to Mr. Wallace's declaration, was as to what he said about the homestead right in the premises at the time the mortgage was executed. This question was objected to on behalf of Mrs. Wallace, on the ground that the declaration of her husband was not competent to bind her. The Court overruled the objection and she excepted.

The answer of the witness was, that there was something said about a prior mortgage, and that as he, Wallace, lived across the Bay, he had no claim to the mortgaged premises as a homestead. The witness then stated in substance that about the month of September, 1861, he told Wallace that his wife spoke of setting up a claim of homestead to the premises, when Wallace repudiated the idea.

The question involved in this point is one of importance, and not entirely free of embarrassment. In a number of cases, heretofore decided, the homestead has been regarded as of the nature of an estate held in joint tenancy by the husband and wife, (Taylor v. Hargous, 4 Cal. 268; Holden v. Pinney, 6 Cal. 235; Revalk v. Kraemer, 8 Cal. 73; Estate of Buchanan, 8 Cal. 509; Estate of Tompkins, 12 Cal. 125,) and that there could be no abandonment of the homestead except by their joint action; and hence it is sometimes argued, that as the homestead could not be aliened or abandoned except by the concurrent action or conduct of the husband and wife, it follows as a logical sequence from the premises that the act or declaration of one of the spouses to show an alienation or abandonment could not affect the other, or have the effect to extinguish the homestead quality that had become incorporated into the property once dedicated as a homestead by actual occupancy. There is much force in this reasoning, if the premises assumed be true.

In Gee v. Moore, 14 Cal. 474, Mr. Chief Justice Field said there was nothing in the nature of the homestead right which justified its designation as the joint estate of the husband and wife, with the right of survivorship, as had been held in former cases; and he declared that such a doctrine never met the approbation of the profession and was not warranted by any language of the Constitution or the statute; and he then says: "The estate rests where it existed before the premises were appropriated as a homestead. The appropriation of them confers a right upon the wife to insist that their character as a homestead shall continue until she consents to their alienation, or another homestead is provided, or they are otherwise abandoned." And in Guiod v. Guiod, 14 Cal. 507, the same learned Judge said: "The statute confers upon the wife no right to the homestead, independent of the husband, which she can enforce against his consent. It affords protection to him, and only through him to the wife and children. It does not purport to interfere with the natural dependence of the latter upon the former. She is bound by her marital obligations to live with him, and when he changes his place of residence she must accompany him. * * * As by his act the premises were originally impressed with the character of homestead, so by his act they may be abandoned as such."

The question of the abandonment of the homestead in this case was a matter in issue and to be passed upon by the Court from all the evidence—consisting of acts and declarations of the defendants, and mostly those of the husband. His declarations made during his residence in Contra Costa, and especially at the time the note and mortgage were executed, might properly be regarded as of the res gestæ, and considered as a part of the series of acts and circumstances, which, it was claimed on the part of the plaintiffs, went to establish the fact of abandonment of the mortgaged premises as the homestead of the defendants.

If the wife was bound by the acts of her husband (whom she accompanied in his removal to Contra Costa County) showing or tending to establish an abandonment of the homestead—a fact which seems to result from the doctrines laid down in Gee v. Moore and Guiod v. Guiod—then there seems to be no valid objection to proving his declarations for the purpose of showing his intention by his removal to abandon his homestead which he was about to mortgage to secure the note then made and delivered. This disposes of the first alleged error specified in the third point made by the appellants in their assignment of errors, and we next proceed to consider the second objection therein specified.

The respondents produced in evidence the instrument in writing bearing date the 8th day of August, 1860, and to which we have already referred, executed and acknowledged by the defendants before a Notary Public, and which was recorded, by which they declared they abandoned all claim to the premises as a homestead. The appellants objected to this evidence when it was offered, on the ground that so far as ship property; the partnership is indebted in an amount equal to, if not exceeding, the value of the assets; one of the partners, for the purpose of securing his individual debt, mortgages to his creditors the undivided third of the partnership property; the whole partnership property is afterwards sold by the three partners, to pay the partnership debts; and now the individual creditor seeks to foreclose, in equity, his mortgage in satisfaction of his debt. The questions arising upon this state of facts are not now for the first time presented in the Courts of this State. In Conroy v. Woods, 13 Cal. 626, which was a suit in equity, the Court held that the rights of the partnership creditors, in respect to partnership property, were prior to those of individual creditors; and Mr. Justice Baldwin, in delivering the very able opinion of the Court, quotes with approbation Story on Part. sec. 97, which expressly affirms that doctrine.

In that case defendant Woods was proceeding under his execution, for an individual debt, to sell the property which had belonged to the partnership, but which had been sold to one of the partners, on dissolution, on his agreeing to pay the partnership debts, and the Court ordered the funds to be first applied to the payment of the partnership debts. The lien in that case was acquired by operation of law; in this case it was voluntarily given by the debtor partner. Has a lien voluntarily given any superiority over one acquired by law? We think it clearly has not. The lien by mortgage is in no respect better than would have been the lien of a judgment rendered at the time of the execution of the mortgage, or the lien of an attachment levied at that time on the assets of the partnership.

Whatever the rights of the parties may be at law, and admitting in its full force the doctrine of Phillips v. Cook, 24 Wend. 389, there never was any doubt that a Court of equity can restrict a party to such rights and remedies as he ought to possess, in view of the relation which he occupies in regard to the partnership assets, or that the Court will so administer the partnership assets, that the partnership creditors shall be first paid. (Conroy v. Woods, 18 Cal. 626.)

The plaintiff has sued in equity, and the defendants are entitled to invoke for their protection, the rules and remedies peculiar to that Court, and they having made it appear that the partnership debts equalled the partnership assets at the date of the mortgage, and of the sale of the partnership property, and that the sale was made to pay the debts, it results, according to the rules of that Court, that the vendees of Brunton, held no interest in the partnership assets liable in equity to be sold for the payment of his individual debts.

It will be observed that in Conroy v. Woods, the partnership property had been sold to pay the debts of the partnership, and the Court held that in equity the priority of the lien of the partnership debts, still continued as against a creditor of an individual member of the partnership. That rule would not prevent the creditor of an individual member of the partnership, any more than a creditor of the partnership, from impeaching the bona fides of the sale.

Our view of the rights of the respective parties, may be illustrated by supposing that the plaintiff had proceeded to foreclose before the sale of Brunton. In such case, it would clearly be competent to the partners and their creditors, who might intervene to secure the payment of the partnership debts due them, to allege and prove that the mortgaged property was partnership property, and that it was necessary it should be employed in the payment of partnership debts, accruing previous to the mortgage, and thereupon to have the same appropriated to that object.

The right still subsists after a sale of the property is made, as in this case, and may be asserted in defense of a suit in equity, brought by a separate creditor, to subject the property to the payment of his debt, the purchaser, for that purpose representing both the partners and the creditors, whose debts he has paid or become responsible for.

The sale by Brunton and Parsons to Gleason, and by him to Dorsey, having been made to pay the partnership debts, Trinity County v. McCammon et al.

a Board of Supervisors, and by the votes of McCammon and Quine, (Price voting against it,) made an order for the purchase of a building from defendant Edgcomb for a Court-house, and also directed the Auditor to draw his warrant on the Treasurer for the sum of about three thousand eight hundred dollars in favor of Edgcomb, payable out of the building fund, for the same; that three appraisers had been appointed to view and appraise the building, and had reported that it was unsuitable for the purpose of a Court-house; that the purchase was about to be made, and the warrant about to be issued by the Auditor and paid by the Treasurer. The usual prayer for an order enjoining the purchase, and the issuing and payment of the warrant, was inserted.

The complaint was filed on the 21st day of December, 1863, and on the same day an injunction was granted by the County Judge. The defendants Edgcomb, McCammon, and Quine, answered, and on the 23d day of January, 1864, moved to dissolve the injunction before the District Judge at chambers. The motion was denied.

George Cadwalader, for Appellant.

The bill is radically defective in joining a charge against one of the Supervisors for usurpation of office, and a charge against the Board that they had agreed to purchase unsuitable county buildings.

E. F. Allen, District Attorney, for Respondent.

The two chief points in this case are: First — John McCammon is not a Supervisor of this county, and by falsely pretending to be, he is trying to get the Building Fund paid over to James Edgcomb for a building that would be utterly worthless to the county for a Court-house, and if the money once passes out of the county's possession, no matter what the final decision may be on the hearing of the case, the cash would be out of reach or hope of recovery.

By the Court, SHAFER, J.

This is an appeal from an order refusing to dissolve an injunction.

The injunction was improperly granted, and therefore the Court erred in overruling the motion to dissolve. The difficulty with the case made in the complaint is, that it has not too little, but too much strength.

Assuming the allegations of the complaint to be true, McCammon is Supervisor, neither de jure nor de facto; on the contrary, he bears no other character than that of a naked usurper. As to Quine, the complaint charges that he is a member of the Board, and the affidavits used in support of the motion to dissolve do not deny the averment. As to Edgcomb, he is not represented in the complaint as having, or as pretending to have, any official character whatever, but he is brought in simply as the owner of a building which he is seeking to sell to the county for a Court-house.

As to defendant Musser, the complaint charges that he is County Treasurer of Trinity County, and as such has in his possession the money belonging to the "Court-house Fund."

It is further stated that, at the filing of the complaint, the Board of Supervisors of the County of Trinity was in fact composed of the defendant Quine, and A. G. Price and Henry Martin, neither of whom is made a party.

The bill, then, was filed for the purpose of restraining Edgcomb from selling his building to the County of Trinity, and to restrain one Supervisor only, out of three, from making the purchase.

To guard against the purchase effectually, the action should have been brought against two members of the Board at the least. The co-operation of McCammon with Quine in the matter of the threatened purchase, does not vary the matter, for McCammon was a mere pretender by averment, and in view of the Act of March 31, 1857, (Wood's Dig. 697,) we consider that he was a pretender in fact.

At the expiration of the time for which McCammon was elected to the office of Supervisor, his right ended; and further, he was stripped of all color of right thereafter by the act and operation of a public law. The impotency of Quine to buy could not be aided by the alleged alliance between him and McCammon.

But if the charges were made against those who constitute the Board of Supervisors, in an action brought for the purpose of restraining them from making the purchase in question, there is great doubt whether the action could be maintained. Boards of Supervisors under the general law (Wood's Dig. 694, sec. 9) have no power to purchase real property on behalf of the counties they represent, except where the value of the property has been previously estimated by three disinterested persons appointed for that purpose by the County Judge. This important check has not been removed by the Act of 1863, (Stats. p. 55,) authorizing the Board of Supervisors of Trinity County to levy a tax for a county "Building Fund." It is true that in that case three persons were appointed by the County Judge to estimate the value of the building in question; but instead of reporting an estimate of value they reported that the building was in their judgment wholly "unsuitable for a Court-house." Under such circumstances the members of the Board of Supervisors would themselves be as powerless to make the purchase as any or all of the present defendants.

The bill, then, cannot be maintained, for the reason that the purpose of Quine and McCammon to purchase in the name of Trinity County the building named, for a Court-house, is one that is impossible of accomplishment. No irreparable damage, and no damage at all, can result to the county if Quine and McCammon are left to follow their own devices. (De Witt et als. v. Hays, 2 Cal. 463; Robinson v. Gaar, 6 Cal. 275.) There is no defect so fatal as a want of power.

From what has been said, it follows that, if Quine and McCammon should make the purchase of Edgcomb, and draw on the Treasurer in his favor for the purchase money, the order would be void on its face, as having been drawn by parties who have no control over the public money. And should the Treasurer pay the money on such order, the county would have a perfect remedy at law by action on his official bond.

The order appealed from is reversed, and the Court below is directed to dissolve the injunction.

By the Court, SHAFER, J., on petition for modification of opinion.

Since the decision of the appeal taken in this action a petition has been presented on the part of the appellant, asking not for a rehearing, nor for any modification of the judgment, but for a modification of the opinion, on the ground that the opinion is to some extent obiter; and on the further ground that the Court has misapprehended the contents of the report made by the committee appointed by the County Judge to pass on the value of the building owned by Edgcomb, and which he proposed to sell to the county.

In so far as the opinion passes upon any question not necessary to the decision of the appeal, it will interpose no obstacle to a re-investigation of such question upon its merits in any case that may hereafter come to this Court in which the point shall be directly presented. In so far as the misapprehension of the contents of the committee's report is concerned, the document, as such, was not in the transcript, and we were therefore justified in assuming that it had no contents, aliunde the contents set out in the proceedings. Any case coming here hereafter showing that the report comprehended topics other than those to which the present record confines it, will be a case, to that extent, different from the present, and of course one to which the opinion in this case cannot be considered as having any just application.

Petition denied.

Hicks v. Coleman et al.

WILLIAM HICKS v. PERCY COLEMAN, C. E. CASTLE, AND WILLIAM RANDOLPH.

ADMISSIBILITY OF A DEED REFERRED TO IN ANOTHER DEED IN EVIDENCE.—If

a deed of land which does not contain a description of the land conveyed, but in the body of it refers to another deed for such description, is properly admitted in evidence, then the deed to which it refers is entitled to be received in evidence, for the purpose of showing a description of the land conveyed, without any proof of its genuineness, or that there was any such person as the one purporting to execute it, or that he had any title to the land described therein.

COPY OF DEED IN EVIDENCE.—A duly certified copy of a deed regularly recorded is admissible in evidence, under the Act of April 29, 1857, if it be shown to the satisfaction of the Court by the party offering it that the original is not under his control.

ENTRY ON A PORTION OF A TRACT OF LAND UNDER A DEED DESCRIBING ALL.—

One who enters into actual possession of a portion of a tract of land, claiming the whole, under a deed in which the entire tract is described by metes and bounds, is not limited in his possession to his actual inclosure, but acquires possession to the entire tract, if it was not in the adverse possession of any other person at the time of the entry.

SAME.—The rule in such cases is not limited to small tracts of land, such as are usually occupied and cultivated for farms.

CONVEYANCE OF LAND BY INDIANS.—A grant of land by the Mexican Government to a tribe of Indians, if of any validity, is for the benefit of the Indian community at large, and the individual members composing the tribe cannot make any valid conveyance of all or any portion of the same.

PRIOR AND SUBSEQUENT POSSESSORS UNDER COLOR OF TITLE.—One who enters upon a tract of land where there is no adverse possession, a portion of which is uninclosed, claiming the whole under a deed describing the entire tract, will prevail in an action to recover the land as against one who enters subsequently upon the uninclosed part showing color of title merely.

A RIVER AS A BOUNDARY LINE.—Where a river is named as a boundary line of a tract of land, the boundary line follows the meanderings of the stream; and where this boundary line is to run along a stream not navigable a given distance, the meanderings of the stream are to be followed until the required distance, when reduced to a straight line, is attained.

SURVEY OF LAND BOUNDED ON A STREAM.—If a deed conveys a given quantity of land, and describes it as bounded on a stream on one side, starting at a given point and running along the stream, without specifying the length of the lines, the required quantity of land is to be located by following the meanderings of the stream from the point named until, reduced to a straight line, the straight line will be of sufficient length to form one side of a square which would contain the required quantity, and then from the ends of this straight line projecting lines at right angles with the same to such distance as a line drawn from one to the other, parallel with the straight line, will include the required quantity between it and the stream.

SAME.—If the quantity of land and the length of the boundary line on such unnavigable stream is given, the meanderings of the stream are to be followed until, reduced to a straight line, the same will be of the required length, and then lines are to be projected at its ends, at right angles with it, far enough so that a line drawn between the two, parallel with the straight line, will leave the required quantity between it and the stream.

MODIFICATION OF A JUDGMENT.—When the complaint, evidence as admitted, the verdict, and judgment are in harmony, but the judgment is erroneous by reason of a wrong construction given to the description of land in a deed in evidence, the Supreme Court cannot modify the judgment, but will refuse it and grant a new trial.

JOINT AND SEPARATE VERDICTS.—When several persons whose possessions are not joint, but separate, are joined as defendants in an action to recover land, and no demand is made at the close of the trial for separate verdicts, and no objection or exception is taken to the verdict on that ground in time to afford an opportunity to correct it, the defendants cannot afterwards object to a joint verdict and judgment.

INJURY BY JOINT VERDICT.—When no damages are claimed in an action to recover real estate, no injury can result from a joint verdict.

EXCEPTIONS TO CHARGE OF COURT.—Exceptions to the charge of a Court should point out the specific portions of the charge excepted to, and should be made at the time of the trial, before the jury retires.

APPEAL from the District Court, Seventh Judicial District, Solano County.

The following is a copy of the instrument to which reference is made in the deed from Shaddon to Hicks:

"Heleno, Chief of Indians, to Thomas Shaddon:

"NEW HELVETIA, 18th May, 1848.

"Before me, John Sinclair, Justice of the Peace of this District, and also before the witnesses whose signatures appear at the foot of this instrument, personally appeared Heleno, Chief of the Christian Indians called Moquelumnes, and declared that for himself, his heirs, and executors, and in the name of his tribe, their heirs, and executors, and all others who may claim through him or them, grants, bargains, and sells unto Thomas Shaddon, his heirs and assigns forever, a piece of land granted to them by his Excellency the Governor of the Department, Manuel Micheltorrena, as per title issued to them the 22d day of December, 1844, and delivered to Augustus Sutter, he being Justice of the Peace and Military Commandant of these frontiers at that date. Said land is part of the rancho called Rancho de los Cosumnes, and conceded as above declared, consisting of one league (three miles) or five thousand square varas, (yards,) the boundaries of which are as follows: On the north or northwest the Cosumnes River; on the east or northeast by a line that starts from a point on the Cosumnes River called Paso Viejo, (Old Pass,) and runs in a line directly crossing the line of the river above referred to; on the south or southeast by a line that runs one league or five thousand varas parallel with the Cosumnes River; on the east or southeast by a line that runs one league or five thousand varas parallel with the line on the east or northeast.

"The said Heleno further declares that said property is entirely unincumbered by private or public claims of any nature, and in such conception now sells it to the said Thomas Shaddon at and for the sum of two hundred dollars, the receipt whereof he hereby acknowledges for himself and in the name of his tribe, freely giving up all his claim for himself and tribe, and guaranteeing to the said Shaddon that this sale shall prove certain, sure, and effectual.

"Witness whereof he hereunto sets his hand, date as before written.

"HELENO, X CHIEF.

"Witness: { J. A. SUTTER,
J. BIDWELL,
LEVI MCKINSTY,
THOS. M. HARDY."

Appellants during the trial offered in evidence certified copies from the office of the Surveyor-General of the United States for California of the petition of J. A. Sutter to Manuel Micheltorrena, Governor of California, for a grant to the Moquelumne Indians, with the map accompanying the same, and the grant of Micheltorrena to the Indians, dated December 22d, 1844.

The testimony was rejected on the objection of respondents.

Winans, Heydenfeldt, and Hartley, for Appellants.

The deed of Heleno to Shaddon is no evidence of title, because:

1. Its execution is not proved. (Jackson v. Vail, 7 Wend. 129.)
2. It is not shown that there was such a person as Heleno.
3. It is not shown that Heleno was Chief or member of the tribe of Mokelumne Indians.
4. It is not shown that Heleno or the Mokelumne Indians had any title.

The recitals in a deed are no evidence against those who are not parties to it. (Carver v. Jackson, 4 Peters, 83; 1 Greenleaf's Ev. sec. 23, et seq. and note.)

The Court erred in rejecting the evidence offered by the defence, being copies and translations of original papers showing the plaintiff's source of title.

If on account of the erroneous rejection of this testimony, it is to be considered on appeal, then it proves clearly that Micheltorrena did not grant the land to the Mokelumne Indians; that Micheltorrena did not intend to grant them the land; that the said tribe do not come within the terms of what is called the Micheltorrena general title.

If they are held to be within the general title, that has been decided to be void. (United States v. Nye.)

There was no authority on the part of Heleno to convey for his tribe or for himself.

Under the Mexican dominion, Indians were regarded as subjects, and no governmental organization among themselves was recognized. Tribes were held to occupy the status of families, but there was no admission of the "imperium in imperio." This is clearly evinced by the policy of granting them tracts of land for cultivation in the same manner and upon the same mode of application as were required from other inhabitants. It was not by treaty, but by simple grant to the family.

Under the system prevailing in the United States, an Indian can convey no title.

The Constitution and laws establishing the relations between the United States and Indian tribes are political laws, and went into effect here upon the cession of this territory by Mexico. (Jackson v. Porter, 1 Paine, 472.)

Hicks v. Coleman et al.

Heleno's deed to Shaddon was therefore no color of title, and the plaintiff has no color of title. (Livingston v. Peru Iron Co., 9 Wend. 520; Jackson v. Porter, 1 Paine, 457; Sunol v. Hepburn, 1 Cal.)

And the plaintiff must be confined to his actual pedis possessio. (Ricard v. Williams, 7 Wheat. 105.)

If the title be an absolute nullity, it will not serve as the foundation of an adverse possession. (Livingston v. Peru Iron Co., 9 Wend. 511.)

Heleno's deed being absolutely void, and not merely voidable, it cannot afford color of title. (Sunol v. Hepburn, 1 Cal. 225; Doe v. Turner, 9 Wheaton, 541; Pray v. Price, 7 Mass. 338; Frique v. Hopkins, 4 Martin N. S. 224.)

Where a contract has reference to another paper for its terms, the effect is the same as if the words of the paper referred to were inserted in the contract. (Adams v. Hill, 4 Shipley, 215; Buckley v. Blackwell, 10 Ohio, 510.)

Upon the question of the survey of the land described in the instrument called the Heleno deed, appellant's counsel cited Shelton v. Maupin, 16 Miss. 124; Budd v. Brooke, 3 Gill. 198; Hartsfield v. Westbrook, 1 Hayw. N. O. 258; Middleton v. Pritchard, 3 Scammon, 510; State v. Gilmanton, 9 N. H. 461; Lynch v. Allen, 4 Dev. and Bat. 62; Jackson v. Low, 12 Johns. 254.

Robinson and Beatty, for Respondents.

It is well settled that when an entry is made by one under color of title by deed, his possession is deemed to extend to the bounds of that deed, though his actual settlement and improvements were on a small parcel of the tract.

As the method of surveying, the meanders of a river are always reduced to a straight line. (Littlepage v. Fowler, 11 Wheat. 219; Craig v. Hawkins' Heirs, 1 Bibb, 58; Calk & Orear v. Stribling, 1 Bibb, 122; Bant's Heirs v. Calhoun, 2 A. K. Marshall, 591.)

Hicks v. Coleman et al.

By the Court, SAWYER, J.

This is an action to recover a portion of a tract of land situate near the Cosumnes River, in Sacramento County. The entire tract claimed by Hicks is one league. The plaintiff introduced a certified copy from the records of Sacramento County, of a deed from Thomas J. Shaddon to himself; also, evidence showing that Shaddon had been since 1848, and was at the time of the execution of said deed, in the actual occupancy of a part of the premises described in the complaint and deed, claiming the whole; that he had an inclosure of fifteen or twenty acres near the river, with a house on it, in which he lived, and a corral; that the rest was open and unclosed; that he had cattle which roamed over the tract and adjoining country in connection with other cattle; that Shaddon, also, at the time the deed was executed, sold his cattle to Hicks; that Hicks bought for himself and his partner, one Martin, and had the deed made in his own name; that upon the execution of the deed from Shaddon, said Hicks and Martin entered upon the lands, receiving actual possession from Shaddon of that portion occupied by him; that they cut a ditch from a slough to the river, some eleven hundred yards, across the head of what was called "Shaddon's Pocket"—thus inclosing between the slough, river and ditch about a thousand acres—but the location of the "Pocket" with reference to the calls of the Shaddon deed is not distinctly shown; that Martin subsequently conveyed his interest to plaintiff; that at the time plaintiff and Martin entered no one occupied any portion of Shaddon's rancho; that Hicks has continued to occupy the parts upon which he entered ever since the time of his conveyance, in 1850. There was also some testimony tending to show that there was another fence along near the road crossing the tract, and that defendant Coleman's entry was within this fence; but the evidence on this point is not very satisfactory. Coleman entered sometime about a year before the trial, which was in 1858. Castle and Randolph entered upon portions of the land embraced in the calls of the deed, but not upon any portion of the lands within any inclosure made by Hicks or Shaddon.

Plaintiff had judgment and defendants appeal.

The deed from Shaddon to Hicks, introduced in evidence, not including the instrument referred to for a description, is as follows:

“Know all men by these presents, that I, Thomas J. Shaddon, in consideration of five thousand dollars to me in hand paid, the receipt whereof is hereby acknowledged, bargain, sell, convey and deliver unto William Hicks, his heirs and assigns forever, all my right, title, claim and interest in the property described in the foregoing instrument, which is made a part hereof. And I, for myself, my heirs, etc., hereby warrant the title to said premises free from the claims of all persons claiming the same under me. Witness my hand and seal, this 30th day of September, A. D. 1860.

His

mark.

“Witness: LLOYD TEVIA.”

This deed seems to have been written upon another instrument, which upon its face purports to be a conveyance from Heleno, Chief of Mokelumne Indians, to Shaddon of a league of land therein described. This instrument in the arguments of counsel has been designated as the Heleno deed, and is the paper referred to for a description in Shaddon's deed as the “foregoing instrument.” The first ten points made in the introductory brief of appellants relate to the objections presented in various forms to the introduction in evidence of this instrument, and in relation to other papers supposed to be referred to in it, and to its effect as evidence when introduced. The substance of the objections is, that there was no proof of its execution; that the original was not produced or accounted for; that it was not shown, that there was such a person as Heleno; or that he was Chief of the Mokelumne tribe; or that he had any authority to convey for his tribe or himself:

or that there was any title in him or in his tribe; or that he or his tribe had any possession, etc. The plain answer to all this is, that the instrument was not offered as a deed at all, nor was any title claimed under it as such. It was only introduced as a part of the deed from Shaddon to Hicks. The deed from Shaddon to Hicks was offered and read in evidence, and this instrument having been made a part of that conveyance for the purpose of inserting a description of the land which Shaddon designed to convey to Hicks by his deed, it was, as a matter of course, necessarily read as a part of Shaddon's deed. It did not matter, therefore, whether the paper was executed or not, or whether there was or not any such person as Heleno; or if so, whether he had any title to the land. The only use made of the Heleno deed in Shaddon's conveyance was to show what property he conveyed, and that was "the property described in the foregoing instrument." The only office the Heleno deed performs is, to furnish a description of the land, and for that purpose it is not a matter of the slightest consequence whether it was a genuine conveyance or not. If Shaddon's deed to Hicks was properly admitted, then the Heleno deed was properly read in evidence as a part of that instrument.

But it is also objected that the certified copy of Shaddon's deed was improperly admitted, for the reason that the original was not accounted for. The instrument was duly acknowledged and regularly recorded. The Act of 1857 concerning copies of certain instruments in writing, provides that duly certified copies of such deeds shall be received in evidence, "provided it be shown that the said originals are not under the control of the party offering the said copies, or are lost." (Bancroft's Practice Act, page 441, note 2; Skinker v. Flohr, 13 Cal. 638.) The Judge who tried the case was satisfied from the evidence that the original was not under plaintiff's control, and the evidence in the record on this point is such that we cannot say he erred. The deed from Shaddon to Hicks was, therefore, properly admitted in evidence.

The plaintiff relies for recovery upon prior possession, and claims that he has shown such possession. He claims that Shaddon was in the actual occupancy of the land claimed, by having a portion of it inclosed, and residing thereon, claiming the whole, using it as a range for his cattle from 1848 till 1850, when he conveyed the whole tract to plaintiff by specific boundaries; that plaintiff entered upon a part under said conveyance, and occupied it by residence and exercising other acts of ownership, claiming the whole according to the boundaries described in his deed; and there being no other person in possession adversely at the time of his entry, that these acts, under the well settled rules of law, gave him possession of the entire tract. The appellants do not appear to controvert this proposition, provided the conveyance was such as to constitute color of title. But they insist that plaintiff claims title under the Heleno deed, and that the deed is void upon its face for the several reasons before mentioned; and being void upon its face the plaintiff is bound to know the fact; that knowing the invalidity of the deed his entry is not in good faith, and there is no color of title sufficient to give him the benefit of the rules of law upon which he relies. Unfortunately for the argument, we are not authorized to assume that plaintiff entered, or that he claims under the Heleno deed. He repudiates any such claim himself. He does not profess to trace his title beyond Shaddon, and we do not know that Shaddon claimed under the Heleno deed. He may, for aught the Court can know, have had a perfect title. We do not know that there ever was a deed from Heleno to Shaddon. None was introduced in evidence as a link in plaintiff's chain of title. The instrument called the Heleno deed was not offered as a deed, or as an independent piece of evidence. It was not proved by plaintiff to have been executed by anybody, and was certainly not admitted by defendants to be a genuine instrument. We know that there was a paper with certain words written upon it; that this paper contained a description of the premises suitable for the purposes of Shaddon and Hicks, and was referred to by them for a description instead of copying the description into the deed in evidence, and this is all we know about the document.

The deed in evidence does not pretend to recite that any conveyance was ever made to Shaddon by Heleno. It does not even call this document a deed or conveyance, but simply refers to it as "the foregoing instrument." There is no recital, properly speaking, in Shaddon's deed, unless the statement of the consideration is a recital. There is nothing by deed or recital in evidence that carries us back in the chain of title beyond the deed from Shaddon, and Shaddon's occupancy of a part of the tract conveyed claiming the whole. There is nothing in evidence, then, showing the character of the title under which Shaddon claimed, except his occupancy of the land and his assuming to own it; and occupancy alone is, as was often held by the late Supreme Court, evidence of title in fee as against a trespasser. In these respects, then, there is a material difference between this case and the case of Sunol v. Hepburn, 1 Cal. 254, Livingston v. Peru Iron Co., 9 Wend. 511, and other cases cited by appellants.

The deed from Shaddon to Hicks is valid upon its face, and sufficient to transfer any title Shaddon had at the date of its execution. It was sufficient to pass a fee simple title. There was no adverse possession of the land in any other party at the time. The plaintiff entered into actual possession of a part under the deed, claiming title to the whole tract embraced within its calls; and he continued undisturbed in his claim till the entry of the defendants. Under these circumstances does the actual occupancy of a part draw after it the possession of the whole?

The discussions upon this subject generally relate to adverse possession with reference to questions arising under Statutes of Limitations, and under Acts relating to champerty and maintenance. But there must be a possession, or there can be no adverse possession; and such a possession as would be adverse within the champerty Acts, or Statutes of Limitations, and sufficient to serve as the foundation of a title which would ultimately deprive the real owner of the land, and transfer it to the possessor, ought, certainly, to be sufficient to enable that possessor to maintain an action against a mere intruder on his rights.

In Ellicott v. Pearl, 10 Peters, 442, Mr. Justice Story, in declaring what acts are sufficient to constitute adverse possession, says:

“The argument, in support of the instruction as prayed assumes that there can be no possession to defeat an adverse title except in one or the other of these ways, that is, by an actual residence, or by an actual inclosure, a doctrine wholly irreconcilable with principle and authority. Nothing can be more clear than that a fence is not indispensable to constitute possession of a tract of land. The erection of a fence is nothing more than an act presumptive of an intention to assert an ownership and possession over property. But there are many other acts which are equally evincive of such intention of asserting such ownership and possession, such as entering upon land and making improvements thereon, raising a crop of corn, felling and selling the trees thereon, etc., under color of title. An entry into possession of a tract of land under a deed containing specific metes and bounds gives a constructive possession of the whole tract, if not in any adverse possession, although there may be no fence or inclosure around the ambit of the tract, and an actual residence only on a part of it. To constitute actual possession it is not necessary that there should be any fence or inclosure of the land. If authority were necessary for so plain a proposition it will be found in the case of Moss v. Scott, 2 Dana, 275, where the Court say: ‘It is well settled that there may be a possession in fact of land not actually inclosed by the possessor.’”

And again, on page 443: “Pearl entered into possession of the seven thousand acre tract under his deed from Edwards, and as that deed described the tract by metes and bounds, Pearl must, upon the principles already stated, be deemed to have been in possession of the whole tract, unless some part of it was, which is not shown, in the adverse possession of some other claimant. In short, his entry being under color of title by deed, his possession is deemed to extend to the bounds of that deed, although his actual settlement and improvements were on a small parcel only of the tract. In such a case, where there is no adverse possession, the law construes the entry to be co-extensive with the grant to the party, upon the ground that it is his clear intention to assert such possession. This doctrine is well settled. It was affirmed in this Court in Barr v. Grattz, 4 Wheat. 222, 223," and numerous other authorities are cited by the learned Justice. (See also 5 Pet. 320.) In these and many other cases the questions arose between parties claiming under patents which overlapped each other, and the parties entered under a title apparently good, derived from the Government. But all the cases are not of this class. (1 Conn. 285, 309.) In Ellicott v. Pearl, Mr. Justice Story also cites, with approbation, Thomas v. Harrow, 4 Bibb, 563.

In that case "it appeared that the defendants, or those under whom they hold, had, more than twenty years before the suit brought, entered upon their respective tracts or parcels of land, and cleared and inclosed parts thereof, claiming title thereto under deeds of conveyance previously made to them according to specified boundaries; but although the person who made the conveyances claimed the land under an entry, it did not appear that the entry covered the land, nor did it appear that there had been any survey made or patent issued in virtue of the entry, until within less than twenty years prior to bringing the action."

In this case the question was, whether there was an adverse possession twenty years before bringing the suit? If there was an adverse possession at that time, it was by virtue of an entry upon a part of the premises under a deed with specific boundaries from a party having no title, or shadow of a title to the particular land conveyed, and claiming the whole under the conveyance.

The Court say: "On this state of the case, the question was made in the Court below, whether the possession of the defendants should be co-extensive with the boundaries of their respective deeds, or be confined to their close or fences? That Court decided that their possession was co-extensive with the boundaries of their deeds, and so instructed the jury; and whether that decision is correct or not, is the only point presented by the record in this case."

"We have no hesitation in saying that the Court below decided correctly. The case of Fox v. Hinton, 4 Bibb, 559, we apprehend is a decision on this point. It was held in that case that where there are two patents interfering with each other, while the possession remains vacant, an entry is made on the land within the interference, by one claiming title under the junior patent, his possession shall not be limited to his close, but be co-extensive with the interference; and in principle we can perceive no difference in this respect between the case of a possession acquired under a junior patent, and a possession obtained under a deed with definite boundaries, which was made by one having no title. In either case, the tract or parcel of land, the possession of which is intended to be taken, is equally certain; and the junior patent could not, no more than such a deed, confer a title. If even color of title was necessary, as was supposed in the argument on the part of the appellant, we could not doubt that the deed would be as efficacious as the patent for that purpose. But we cannot admit that the entry, being made under color of title, can have any effect in such a case; for to constitute an ouster, whether it be by abatement, intrusion, disseizin or deforcement, the act must be tortious; and certainly it could not be less so if done without color of title, than if it had been done under color of title."

In Smith's Heirs v. Frost, 2 Dana, 149, the Court say: "A person entering on land under a deed specifying the boundaries, is in possession to the extent of those boundaries, although the person making the conveyance to him had no title. The settler on land under a bond describing the metes and bounds acquires an actual possession to the extent of those bounds whether the obligor had title or not, and the subsequent entry of an adversary patentee upon another part of the land gives no seizin to such patentee in the land so held by the settler." (See, also, 2 J. J. Marshall, 257.)

In The Proprietors of Kennebec Purchase v. Laboree, 2 Greenleaf's Rep. 286, the Court, after citing Higbee v. Rice, 5 Mass. 344, and Jackson v. Elston, 12 John. 454, (which see,) say: "From these two cases, then, it appears that if a man enters upon a tract of land under a deed duly registered, though from one having no legal title to the land, and has a visible possession, occupancy and improvement of only a part of it, such occupancy and improvement, unless controlled by other facts, being continued thirty years is a disseizin of the true owner of the whole tract; and the reason is, the nature and extent of his claim are or may be known by inspection of the public registry. His deed being registered there gives notoriety to his acts and his motives respecting the land he occupies."

In a note to this case in the last edition of Greenleaf's Reports, the editor says: "The principle here laid down has since continued to be the received and settled law in this State. The authorities seem to establish this rule, that, if the entry and adverse possession is under a deed duly registered, and duly defining the boundaries of the tract therein mentioned, then such entry and adverse possession, if in other respects sufficient, will apply to the whole tract mentioned in the deed, although the person should be in the actual occupation of but a part of the tract, and although the deed was on its face void," and cites Noyes v. Dyer, 25 Maine, 472; Robinson v. Swett, 3 Greenl. 316; Gookin v. Whittier, 4 Greenl. 16; Ross v. Gould, 5 Greenl. 204; Prescott v. Nevers, 4 Mason, 326; Green v. Litter, 8 Cranch, 229; Bailey v. Carlton, 12 N. H. 9; Crowell v. Bebee, 10 Ver. 33; and other cases. The cases already cited seem to us to go to the full extent necessary to decide the question of possession in favor of the plaintiff in the case under consideration, admitting the theory of the appellants to be correct, that color of title is necessary to extend the possession to the boundaries specified in the deed; and it is not necessary, for the purpose of this decision to hold that a deed void upon its face would be sufficient to give color of title. The deed is from a party in open possession of a part at least, claiming the whole, where there is no adverse possession, and is valid on its face. This is sufficient, under those authorities, to constitute color. It is unnecessary to determine whether or not Shaddon would have had such color of title as would have given him possession of the entire tract had he been here as plaintiff claiming possession of the whole by virtue of the Heleno deed. It is sufficient for the plaintiff that he entered under the Shaddon deed, claiming the whole.

The appellants insist that the principles established by the cases cited apply only to adverse possession set up by parties in actual occupancy of lands as a weapon of defense, and not to cases where a party out of possession relies upon a prior possession as evidence of title to recover upon against a party in possession. We have already alluded to this point, but will recur to it again. Under the authorities cited, if Hicks should remain in possession in the manner he appears by the record to have occupied, for the period prescribed by the Statute of Limitations, he could undoubtedly maintain his possession against a party having the title in fee, in an action brought by such party to eject him. According to the authorities upon the subject he would in fact, by such continued possession and claim, become vested with the title in fee. A possession which is sufficient, if continued for the prescribed period, to work such results as to the real owner of the land, ought to be sufficient, in the meantime, to protect the possession against a mere intruder. If there is any difference in the two cases, upon principle, a less rigid rule as to what shall constitute a possession should be adopted as against a trespasser than as against the real owner of the land; and this view seems to be recognized by the authorities. In Barley v. Carlton, 12 N. H. 17, the Court refers to this distinction and says: "If the possession was not of a character to indicate ownership and to give notice to the owners of an adverse claim, although the grantee might be held to be in possession according to his title in a controversy with one who should make a subsequent entry without right, his possession ought not to be held adverse to the true owner, to the extent of his deed, merely by reason of the deed itself, even if recorded, nor by any entry under it. There are several cases which tend to sustain this view of the principle." (Citing a number of cases.) And again on same page: "If it may be said that color of title gives such constructive seisin and possession that the grantee could maintain trespass against any person who did not show a better right, (that is, a title or prior possession,) there is nothing in the nature of it which can give it a character of disseizin, or possession adverse to the true owner, so as to bind him." But it is enough for the purposes of this decision that possession, as to an intruder, should be put upon the same footing as an adverse possession, which would be sufficient, if continued, to toll the right of entry of the real owner.

The principles of the cases cited by us as to what acts constitute possession was also repeatedly recognized by the late Supreme Court, and in nearly every instance in actions to recover land where the plaintiff relied upon prior possession as evidence of title.

In Gunn v. Bates, 6 Cal. 265, the defendant asked the following instruction: "The mere fact that the plaintiff or the decedent was in actual possession, by inclosing a portion of the tract described in the Mexican grant, is no evidence of possession of any land not so inclosed or marked out with clearly defined boundaries."

The Court refused it and gave the following: "If you believe from the evidence that Sheldon entered upon and took possession of the tract of land described in his grant under and by virtue of that grant; that he was put in possession in the manner described by the first witness, (General Sutter,) and that he immediately went on to occupy and improve, and continued to occupy and improve, a part of the land, and asserted his claim and possession to the whole under his grant, and no other person was in adverse possession of any portion of the land, and that Sheldon, or his representatives, never abandoned the land, and that the premises in controversy in this suit are within the boundaries described in the grant, you will find for the plaintiff." Defendants excepted, and these rulings were reviewed and sustained by the Supreme Court. Mr. Chief Justice Murray cited the rule already quoted from Ellicott v. Pearl, 10 Peters, 442, and said: "This doctrine has never within our knowledge been doubted in this Court." (Page 272.) The case turned upon this point, as the other views presented by the Chief Justice were not concurred in by the other members of the Court.

In Rose v. Davis, 11 Cal. 141, Mr. Justice Baldwin said: "The Court, at the instance of plaintiff, gave several instructions, numbered from one to five in the record, which seem to us to be correct." The first instruction referred to embodied the same principle as that given in Gunn v. Bates. But the case is, perhaps, not entitled to much weight, for the reason that a decree of confirmation seems, from another instruction, to have been read in evidence. (See, also, Baldwin v. Simpson, 12 Cal. 560; Keane v. Cannovan, 21 Cal. 299.) In the last case the deed from Ramirez to Mondolet was held admissible, "as showing the extent and boundaries of the premises of which Mondolet claimed possession."

But admitting the rule to be, that the entry upon, and occupation of, a part of a tract of land, under a deed claiming the whole, gives constructive possession to the entire tract within the calls of the deed, it is still insisted by the appellant that this principle does not apply to large tracts of land like that in controversy, but that it must be limited to tracts of the customary size, such as are usually occupied as farms, partly cultivated; and some New York cases are cited which sustain this view. It would be found very difficult to apply the principle with such a limitation. Who shall say what tract of land is of the customary size, particularly in a new and sparsely settled country, where possessions are measured by leagues rather than acres, or even miles? Prior to 1850 the customary size of tracts of land held and occupied for grazing purposes—the chief occupation of the old inhabitants of California—was much larger than the tract in question. But, admitting the limitation of the rule contended for, to exist, the tract in dispute would doubtless, at the date of Shaddon's deed, be within the rule thus limited. The tract in Ellicott v. Pearl, 10 Peters, was seven thousand acres, much larger than the tract in question. In Gunn v. Bates, 6 Cal. 265, already cited, the defendant asked the following instruction: "Possession of a portion of a large tract under a conveyance of such larger tract will not extend to the full extent of such larger tract, when the same amounts to several Mexican square leagues. Such constructive possession is limited to tracts of land usually occupied and used for farming purposes, in the usual course of husbandry in the country. If you believe, from the evidence, that Sheldon never had the boundaries of the tract described in the grant marked out, and that the same exceeds the usual limits of a farm, then his possession is limited to the land he had actually inclosed or clearly marked out; and in such case, if the tract in the possession of the defendants is not included within any such inclosure or marked boundaries, you will find for the defendants."

This instruction was refused and the refusal assigned as error. Mr. Chief Justice Murray's comments upon the instruction refused are equally applicable to the case under consideration. He said: "The Court properly refused the instruction asked by the defendants. The law does not require that the whole tract should be inclosed; it is sufficient if the grant, under which the plaintiff entered, calls for distinct boundaries; neither should the plaintiff's recovery be limited to the size of a usual farm; there is no principle we know of which should alter the rule we have laid down; besides, at the time of the execution of this grant the land was designed for grazing and not for agricultural purposes, and the grant was less than the usual size of concessions for such purposes."

There was no error in refusing to admit in evidence the certified copies of papers from the transcript in the case of the United States v. J. A. Sutter for the Mokehumne Indians. The papers could not have aided the defendants had they been admitted.

The defendant Coleman introduced deeds from some twenty-seven Mokelumne Indians, executed in 1856, to one Powers, purporting to convey to said Powers three leagues of land, including the lands in controversy. It is insisted that plaintiff and defendant Coleman derive such title as they have from the same source, and that they are therefore tenants in common.

We have already seen that there is no evidence in the case to show that plaintiff derives, or claims to derive, any title from the so-called Micheltorrena grant to the Mokelumne Indians, and this disposes of the whole basis of the long argument on this point.

It is admitted and insisted by the appellants that the Mokelumne Indians had no title, or if they had, that Indians have no capacity to convey; and for these reasons Heleno not only could not convey the title of his tribe, but that he could not even convey his own interest. In both these positions we think they are right, and the same objections apply with equal force to Coleman's conveyances from the twenty-seven Indians. If the Indians had any interest at all, it was of a public nature, for the benefit of the Indian community at large. It was not subject to sale to individual purchasers by any one or more, or even all of the members of the tribe. Such sales are contrary to the policy and laws both of the Governments of Mexico and the United States. To insist that any right, as tenants in common, or otherwise, could be acquired under a conveyance from any number of a recognized tribe of Indians sustaining the ordinary relation of individual Indians to their tribe, would be very much like claiming that any one or more citizens of California might convey their individual, undivided interest in the swamp and overflowed lands, or any other lands donated by the United States to the State of California for public purposes, and that the grantee would thereby acquire such a right of property therein as would constitute him a tenant in common with all other citizens of California, and enable him to defeat an action for their recovery, with this difference, however, in favor of the latter proposition—that a citizen of California can convey lands in which he has an interest as owner, while an Indian, sustaining the relation to his tribe above referred to, has no capacity recognized by law to convey lands. Such a claim would be preposterous in the extreme.

Yet it is insisted that Coleman, by virtue of his conveyances from the twenty-seven Mokolumne Indians, is in under color of title — that plaintiff at best only entered under color of title, and that a colorable title in Coleman is sufficient to enable him to defeat a merely colorable title in plaintiff. But admitting that plaintiff only entered under color of title, and that defendant also had color, still plaintiff derived his possession and color from an entry under a deed from Shaddon, valid on its face, at a time when he was in possession of a part, claiming the whole, and when there was no adverse possession. His possession under these circumstances, being also prior in point of time, was therefore best, for prior possession is evidence of title in fee. In the apt and accurate language of Mr. Justice Heydenfeldt, in Norris v. Russell, 5 Cal. 250, “it is objected that the defendant had color of title, although his possession was subsequent to plaintiff, and therefore it is urged his possession ought to prevail. But it must be held in view that prior possession is evidence of title, and cannot by any system of reasoning be made to yield to mere color of title, or, in other words, to that which is not title.”

Also in Keane v. Cannovan, 21 Cal. 305, Mr. Chief Justice Field used language equally applicable. He said: “The possession of Mondolet was evidence of seizin in fee in him, and no further or higher evidence of title was required to enable the plaintiff claiming through him to recover, until the defendant had shown an anterior possession or had traced title to a paramount source. It is immaterial, in this view, whether we consider the tax deed to Dumartheray sufficient to constitute color of title or otherwise.”

So it is immaterial whether we consider the deeds from the Mokolumne Indians, put in evidence by Coleman, sufficient to constitute color of title, or otherwise. We are unable to perceive that these deeds, or the certified copies of papers from the Surveyor-General's office offered in evidence by defendant

Hicks v. Coleman et al.

Coleman and rejected, are entitled to cut any figure in the case.

The next principal error relied on by appellants is that, in admitting in evidence the Cleal survey and rejecting the Brewster survey, the Court adopted an erroneous theory in locating the land described in the Shaddon deed. The construction of the description, in the conveyance from Shaddon to Hicks, was a question to be determined by the Court. Neither theory adopted by the respective surveyors was in all respects correct. But the Cleal survey was based upon the correct theory in every particular except the line opposite the river. The deed calls for one league, and the first boundary is to be the Cosumnes River. It is well settled by numerous authorities that where a river is named as a boundary the boundary line follows the meanderings of the stream. It is also established by the authorities, that when a line is to run up or down a stream, not navigable, a given distance, the meanderings of the stream are to be followed until the required distance when reduced to a straight line is attained — and where courses are not specified the other lines are to be run in such a manner that the land shall be in a form as nearly rectangular as possible. Thus in Craig v. Hawkins' Heirs, 1 Bibb, 54, a thousand acres of land was to be laid off, commencing at a point on a "branch of the Jessamine, running down the same one mile, extending northwardly for quantity." The Court say: "The beginning being admitted, it will only be necessary to construe the expressions 'running down the stream;'" and it was held that these expressions "clearly import that the branch was intended to be one boundary of the claim, and that it was to form the base of the survey." And the Court say that the land should be surveyed by beginning at the designated point, "and running thence down the branch, with the meanders thereof, one mile, when reduced to a straight line; and from the beginning and the termination of said line of one mile, extending lines off from the branch northwardly, at right angles, to the general course of so much of the branch as will be embraced by the survey, so far that a line drawn at right angles to those two last mentioned lines, and parallel to the general course of the part of the branch so embraced as aforesaid, will include the quantity of one thousand acres." See, also, Clalk v. Stribling, 1 Bibb, 123; and there are many other authorities to the same effect, which, it would seem need not be cited to sustain a construction in itself so reasonable.

The first line, then, is to commence at the point of the river called "Paso Viejo," and is to follow the meanders of the river until a point in the river is reached one league distant, when reduced to a straight line, from the point of beginning, and the straight line between these two points will form the proper basis for laying off the other lines. The second line starts from the point in the river called "Paso Viejo," and runs in a line directly crossing the line of the river. It is plain to us that this line should run at right angles with the line last referred to, being the line of the general course of the river within the survey. The fourth line is to run "one league, or five thousand varas," parallel with the last mentioned line; and the third line is to run one league, or five thousand varas, parallel with the Cosumnes River. We think the plain construction of the call for the third line is, that it is to run parallel with the river in all its meanderings, and not parallel with its general course. This is the obvious import of the terms "parallel with the Cosumnes River." No other line can be said to be parallel with the river.

In the cases where the line opposite the river has been run as a straight line, there is no specific description of that boundary. The description generally gives the starting point and the river as the first boundary, then says running in some designated direction for quantity; and it is held in such cases that a straight line is to be run corresponding with the general course of the river within the survey the designated distance, if given; if not given, far enough to constitute one side of a square containing the given quantity; that the side lines are to be drawn at right angles from the extremities, and then the fourth line to be drawn at a sufficient distance from the river to include the required quantity between it and the river. But in the case under consideration the direction of the line opposite the river is given in express terms. (See Keith v. Reynolds; 3 Greenl. 393; Williams v. Jackson, 5 Johns. 506; Van Gorden v. Jackson, 5 Johns. 441.)

The construction we have given to the calls of the deed will give the exact quantity called for — one league. While the theory upon which the Brewster survey is made would give less than a league, the construction which makes the third line a straight line, parallel with the general course of the river, would in this instance give more than a league. Had the meanders of the river been different, the quantity might have been much more, or much less than a league, depending upon the extent and direction of its sinuosities. The construction we have put upon the calls of the deed is the only one that harmonizes the quantity called for with the extent and direction of the lines, and in our judgment is the only reasonable construction the language will bear. The distance on the third line is made to harmonize with its meanderings, upon the same principles that the distance is measured on the river boundary, which is parallel with it.

The plat of the Cleal survey in evidence is constructed on the principles we have indicated, with the exception of the third line. The third line is parallel with the general course of the river, instead of its meanderings, as it ought to be. In this respect it is erroneous. The judgment follows the Cleal survey and is also erroneous in the same particular, but correct in all other respects. It therefore becomes necessary to inquire whether this error is fatal to the judgment, or whether it can be so modified as to do justice between the parties.

It is not pretended by appellants that Coleman's land and a portion of Castle's is not within the calls of the Shaddon deed to Hicks, even upon the theory of the Brewster survey, which is by far the most favorable one for the appellants that has been advanced. It is only contended that less of Castle's land would be embraced in the Brewster survey than in any other, and that Randolph's would be entirely excluded. The testimony shows that some twenty or thirty acres only of Randolph's land lay within the Cleal survey in the southwest corner, and the jury necessarily found that a part at least was within this survey. At that point the line parallel with the meanderings of the river, which we have adopted as the true line, comes down as far as and a little below the straight line of the Cleal survey, and therefore necessarily includes the same land in the possession of Randolph, or at least a part of it, that is included in the Cleal survey. To entitle the plaintiff to a judgment, it is enough that each of the defendants is in possession of any portion of the land belonging to plaintiff; and as no damages were awarded, the extent of the land in the wrongful possession of the defendants, so far as it affects the right of plaintiff to a judgment, is not a matter of any consequence to them, provided they are not ejected from any lands of which they are rightfully possessed.

There is no doubt, then, that the plaintiff is entitled to recover as to all the defendants against whom judgment is entered; but the difficulty is, the record is not in such a condition that we can make the required modification of the judgment. The complaint, instead of following the description contained in Shaddon's deed to Hicks, adopts a description as to the third line corresponding with the theory of the Cleal survey; the verdict is general, giving no specific boundaries of the tracts in possession of the several defendants, and must be held to extend to the boundaries stated in the complaint and of the Cleal survey; the judgment follows the description in the complaint. The complaint, the evidence as admitted, the verdict and the judgment are in entire harmony, and we cannot modify the judgment without setting aside the verdict and finding another upon the evidence in harmony with the construction of the Shaddon deed adopted by us. This we are not authorized to do, and for this reason the judgment must be reversed and a new trial ordered. (Clark v. Huber, 20 Cal. 198.) Had the complaint and judgment followed the description of the deed to Hicks, the judgment might have been affirmed. But it does not, and, as more land in the possession of defendants is included in the judgment than plaintiff is entitled to recover, a new trial is rendered necessary.

There is no error in the instructions relating to the declarations of Hicks. Those declarations, under the circumstances shown by the record, were clearly insufficient to constitute an estoppel as to defendants, Castle and Randolph, and the Court, might safely have directed the jury to disregard them altogether.

No exception was taken at the time to a joint verdict, admitting it to be joint, or to the judgment being entered jointly. True, at the commencement of the trial separate verdicts were demanded. But at the close of the case neither the attention of the Court or the jury appears to have been called to the matter. Had the counsel called attention to it at the time the case was submitted, doubtless the Court would have given the proper directions, or have had the verdict corrected in this respect on the coming in of the jury. At least there would have been an opportunity given for such action. It not having been done, the objection cannot be taken for the first time in this Court. Besides, no damages were awarded, and the defendants are in no way injured by the error, if it be such.

There is no error in the charge of the Judge. If there is any error in those parts to which exception has been taken in the arguments, it consists in being more favorable to the defendants than the evidence and the law applicable to it justified. The exceptions to the charge are too general in their terms. We take this occasion to remark that exceptions to a charge ought to point out the specific portions excepted to, and to be made at the time of the trial, in order that the Judge may have an opportunity, before the jury retires, to correct any error he may have inadvertently fallen into, in drawing up the charge, in the hurry and perplexities of the trial.

Lackman et al. v. Wood et al.

The other points not particularly referred to in this opinion do not require comment.

As the same questions will arise upon another trial, we have thought proper to discuss all the important questions in the case.

Judgment reversed and a new trial ordered.

Mr. Justice RHODES expressed no opinion.

HERMAN LACKMAN AND HENRY BACKEN v. JOSEPH M. WOOD, WILLIAM G. WOOD, AND EMILY WOOD.

EMANCIPATION OF A MINOR.—A father may emancipate his minor child, and when emancipated the child is freed from parental control and is in all respects his own man.

MINOR MAY TAKE AND HOLD VACANT LANDS.—An infant may become a disseisor, and whether emancipated or not, may take possession of vacant lands and hold them in his own right, the same as an adult.

PROOF OF THE EMANCIPATION OF A MINOR.—Evidence that a minor was in the habit of doing business on his own account and in his own name, and of becoming responsible for his own supplies, is admissible for the purpose of proving his emancipation.

ESTOPPEL AS TO INFANTS.—The doctrine of estoppel has no application to infants.

ESTOPPEL MUST BE FOUND OR GIVEN, ETC.—It is erroneous for the Court to assume, in the progress of a trial, for the purpose of deciding on the admissibility of testimony, that an estoppel exists; but the fact of an estoppel must be found or given before any of the consequences of an estoppel can be claimed.

APPEAL from the District Court, Twelfth Judicial District, City and County of San Francisco.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the Court.

J. F. Swift, for Appellant.

An actual entry by an infant into another's freehold, gains the possession, and makes him a disseisor. (Bacon's Abridgment, title Infancy and Age, F, G, and particularly H; Co. Litt. 357; Hawk. P. C., Chap. 64, sec. 35.)

Lackman et al. v. Wood et als.

An infant can hold and occupy lands in the United States. (4 Serg. & Rawle, 207; 3 New Hamp. 23.)

He may be, by his father, emancipated, and when he is so emancipated he is entitled to the fruits of his labor. (2 Mass. 415; 4 Mass. 97, 675; 6 Binney, 273; Greenleaf, 33; 4 Binney, 492; 2 Bailey, 497; 3 Pickering, 201; 11 Vt. 258, 477; 2 Blackford, 449; 11 New Hamp. 191; 7 Cow. 92.)

The emancipation may be proved by parol. (5 Vt. 556; 3 Ibid, 290.)

The intention of a father to emancipate his child is a question of fact, and in the absence of direct proof, may be inferred from circumstances, etc. (6 Cushing, 458; 2 Black, 449.)

It was material and proper for Joseph M. Wood to show those facts for the purpose of proving his emancipation, and for the purpose of showing that he was upon the land before his father came there.

Those facts tend to show such emancipation; and if he was emancipated then, he could acquire the possession of lands and hold them in his own right. (4 Serg. & Rawle, 207; 3 New Hamp. 23.)

If he were really emancipated then, he could enter upon the possession of White, the grantor of the plaintiffs, and disseize him and the freehold created in himself, he could not convey, during his minority; or, at all events, if he did convey it, the act would be voidable.

G. F. & W. H. Sharp, for Respondents.

A complete answer to appellants' brief is, that because a father allows his infant son to support himself, and enjoy the fruits of his labor, this does not prevent the father from controlling the personal conduct of the son so as to prevent either his committing or his continuing a trespass upon another's land; and although after a disseizin worked by an infant has, through lapse of time, ripened into a perfect title, such title would be beyond the father's control; yet, until then, the father, by virtue of his having the custody and control of his infant, must be able, against the infant's consent even, to prevent or terminate the ouster, trespass, nuisance, waste, or any other injury of the infant to another's land.

Again: "If a man carries an infant into the lands of another, and there claims the lands to the use of himself and the infant, yet the infant seems no disseizor, because he made no claim of it himself, and then shall not be charged with the tort of another person." (Bacon's Abridg., title Infancy and Age, H.)

The respondents say that the Court below did not err in excluding the testimony of A. J. Gladding. This testimony was properly rejected, because it ignored the father's consent. Even according to the doctrine contended for by appellants, the acts of the infant, unless approved of by his father, cannot prove or tend to prove emancipation by the father.

By the Court, SHAFER, J.

This is an action of ejectment, brought to recover certain lands in the "Western Addition," so called, situate in the City and County of San Francisco.

The defendants answered severally. William G. and Emily Wood denied all the allegations of the complaint, and the answer of Joseph M. Wood, in addition to a general denial, alleges the title to be in him.

The plaintiffs, at the trial, in proof of their right, relied upon a lease executed by one White to the defendant, William G. Wood, on the 25th day of November, 1851, and upon an assignment to them, by White, of the reversion; and upon the fact that the term created by the lease had expired before the commencement of the action.

For the purpose of bringing the defendant, Joseph M. Wood, within the operation of the facts named, the plaintiff introduced evidence tending to prove that Joseph M. Wood was the son of William G. Wood, and that, at the date of the lease, he was about seventeen years of age, and that Joseph M., so being a minor, went upon the lands as a member of his father's family, and not otherwise.

We consider that the plaintiffs might have safely rested their case upon this testimony; but they went further, and introduced evidence, not so much for the purpose of making out a good case prima facie in their own favor against J. M. Wood, as for the purpose of showing that he was estopped in pais from alleging that the land was his.

The testimony upon the subject of the estoppel was drawn by the plaintiffs from their witness, Williams, who testified that White, the plaintiff's assignor, in company with William G. and Joseph M. Wood, called upon him in June, 1851—five months before the lease was in fact executed—and that in the course of a conversation that ensued between the witness, William G. Wood and White, White exhibited to the witness “a roll of papers as the plan of his land, and introduced the Woods, father and son, to the witness, and said they were to be the neighbors of the witness; that he, White, had leased the premises to Wood and his family, and hoped that he, the witness, would find them agreeable neighbors.” * * * *
“Joseph M. Wood stood by his father, and said nothing.”

The plaintiffs, having closed their case, Joseph M. Wood, as we gather from the record, undertook to sustain his plea of title on the ground—first, that he was emancipated by his father prior to the execution of the lease, November 25th, 1851; second, that prior to the date of the lease, and after his emancipation, he entered upon the premises in his own right, and that he has ever since held and occupied them, adversely to the lessee, to White, and all other parties.

For the purpose of maintaining this defense, A. J. Gladding was called as a witness, and the defendant offered to prove by him “that whilst living on the premises in controversy, both before and after William G. Wood went upon the place, the defendant, Joseph M. Wood, was in the habit of doing business on his own account and in his own name, and that he purchased his own supplies of provisions, and became responsible for them.”

This testimony was objected to as irrelevant and immaterial. The testimony was excluded by the Court, and the defendants excepted.

There was no evidence that the plaintiffs, or those under whom they claimed, had ever been in possession of the premises, and none to show that the premises belonged to them by title derived from the original proprietor.

1. An infant may libel, slander, assault, convert, and dis-seize. He can contract only for necessities, but he can commit torts as efficiently as an adult; and against injuries of that character his nonage will afford him no protection. (2 Hill, Torts, p. 605.) "An actual entry by an infant into another's freehold gains the possession, and makes him a disseizor." (3 Bac. Ab. p. 592.)

From these principles it would seem to follow that if an infant, whether emancipated or not, should enter upon vacant lands and take and hold possession of them in his own right, his occupancy would be followed with all the consequences which would attend a like possession on the part of an adult. But a decision upon that question, in its breadth, is not necessary to a decision of the point now under discussion.

The offer made on behalf of Joseph M. Wood was in effect to prove that he had been emancipated by his father prior to the date of the lease, and that subsequent to the emancipation, and before the execution of the lease, he entered upon and took possession of the premises in his own right, and that this state of things, so inaugurated before the lease, continued to subsist thereafter.

We consider that the facts embodied in the offer would, if proved, have constituted, as to Joseph M. Wood, a good defense to the action.

The power of a father to emancipate his minor child cannot be questioned; nor can there be any doubt as to the effect of such emancipation upon the relations of the persons who are parties to it. The child is freed by emancipation from parental control; he can claim his earnings thereafter as against his father, and is in all respects his own man.

Emancipation is defined as "An act by which a person, who was once in the power of another, is rendered free," and the adjudged cases show that the doctrine of emancipation, as actually administered, is not less comprehensive than the definition. (Morse v. Welton, 6 Conn. 547; Jenney v. Alden, 13 Mass. 375; Chilson v. Phillips, 1 Vt. 41; Gale v. Parrott, 1 N. H. 28; Keen v. Sprague, 3 Greenl. 77; Plummer v. Webb, 4 Mason, 380; Burlingame v. Burlingame, 7 Cow. 92.)

If then the evidence offered was inadmissible, it was not for the reason that the main proposition to be proved was devoid of legal significance and value, and it remains that the ruling of the Court excluding the testimony can be justified only on one of two grounds: first—that the evidence had no tendency to prove the proposition; or, second—that the defendant was effectually estopped from proving it at the time when the evidence was offered and rejected.

The facts embraced in the offer, in so far as they relate to the question of emancipation, were secondary and circumstantial; and in so far as the offer relates to the question of Joseph M. Wood's personal occupation of the premises, the testimony offered must be considered as positive and direct.

On the tendency of the direct evidence to prove the defense in one of its branches, no question can be made, and as to the tendency of the facts enumerated in the offer to prove the emancipation asserted, we entertain no doubt. Every relation among men, whether public or private, may be said to tell its own story—that is to say, it is followed by certain sequences that argue the existence of the relation. If a father in fact emancipates his minor child, all observation and experience would lead us to expect corresponding changes in their intercourse with and in their treatment of each other. The facts named in the offer in question are not only the natural, but the known and established incidents of the emancipation which the defendant, Joseph M. Wood, was interested and offered to prove. (Canavar v. Cooper, 3 Barbour S. C. 115; Stiles v. Granville, 6 Cush. 458; Clinton v. York, 26 Maine, 167; Chase v. Smith, 5 Vt. 556.)

Nor do we consider that the defendant Joseph M. Wood was estopped by the testimony of the witness Williams from proving the emancipation and entry asserted at the bar.

The doctrine of estoppel has no application to infants. (McCoon v. Smith, 3 Hill, 147; Brown v. McCune, 5 Sandford, 224.) In the latter case Mr. Justice Sandford, in delivering the opinion of the Court, says: "In respect to the estoppel we are not aware that any case has gone the length of holding a party estopped by anything he has said or done while he was under age. And we think it would be repugnant to the principle upon which the law protects infants from civil liabilities in general. It is true that Courts of equity have sometimes refused relief on the ground of fraud or suppression of the parties seeking it, while they were minors; and we do not deem it necessary to dissent from those decisions. At the same time we are clear that the doctrine of estoppel is inapplicable to infants. A contrary doctrine would overturn the whole law relative to the contracts of infants."

But even if infants were under the law of estoppel, still neither they nor anybody else is estopped by mere evidence tending to prove an estoppel. The facts of the estoppel must be found or given, before any of the consequences of an estoppel can be claimed. When the defendant's testimony was offered and rejected, the trial was still in progress, and the Court could not properly assume, for the purposes of judgment on the interlocutory question presented, that the facts of the estoppel would be found by the jury.

There is another ground upon which the counsel of respondent seek to vindicate the ruling of the Court now in question. It is stated in the brief as follows: "The offer was too broad as to time. What the father allowed the infant to do after the father lived on the premises, or indeed after the father had taken a lease, was altogether immaterial."

Assuming, for the purposes of argument, that both the emancipation of the son and his entry upon the premises in his own right, must, in order to be available, have antedated the lease to, and entry of the father, (a point by no means free from doubt,) we consider that the question whether the son had been so emancipated or not, rested, in the absence of positive testimony, upon presumptions to be drawn from the mutual conduct of the parties during the whole of the residue of the nonage of the son. If the son, prior to the lease, was in possession of the premises, and acted independently of his father, in fact, until the lease was given, the circumstance that he continued so to act, and without parental interference, until he attained his majority, would add weight to the presumption that he had been emancipated in the first instance, and was therefore admissible.

Whether the alleged emancipation was simulated merely, or brought forward as an "after thought" upon fabricated testimony, are questions with which the state of the record excuses us from dealing.

Judgment reversed and new trial granted.

HORACE W. CARPENTIER v. HENRY WILLIAMSON, SAMUEL WILSON, JOHN WILLIAMS, GEORGE BLOOM, EVERETT BARTHOLOMEW, GUILLERMO PALLEADEW, AND LEWIS M. BEAUDRY.

MORTGAGE—PARTIES TO FORECLOSURE OF.—If the owner of land executes a mortgage on the same, which is duly recorded, and afterwards makes a conveyance of the mortgaged premises to a third party, and the mortgagee, after the conveyance, without actual notice of the deed, and before it is recorded, forecloses his mortgage and obtains a decree for a sale without making the grantee in the deed a party defendant, and before the sale the deed is recorded, the purchaser of the mortgaged premises at the Sheriff's sale under the decree acquires no title.

EVIDENCE—WHEN SHERIFF'S DEED NOT RELEVANT.—In such case the mortgage, decree of sale, and Sheriff's deed, are not relevant testimony to show title in the purchaser at the Sheriff's sale, or out of the mortgagor's grantee, or his assignee.

ERRORS—WHAT REVIEWED ON APPEAL FROM JUDGMENT.—On an appeal from a judgment, errors in the rulings of the Court below, in the progress of the trial, are subject to review when the exceptions are preserved by bill of exceptions, or brought up in a statement on appeal.

WHEN NEW TRIAL, STATEMENT USED ON APPEAL FROM JUDGMENT.—If a statement is made on a motion for a new trial, and an appeal is taken from the judgment under a stipulation that the statement on motion for new trial may be used as the statement on appeal, the statement may be used so far as it presents any question that can be reviewed on appeal from the judgment, but no further.

SEPARATE APPEALS IN SAME ACTION.—An appeal from a judgment, and from an order denying a new trial, may each be prosecuted separately in the same action, or the two appeals may be prosecuted together.

Carpentier v. Williamson et al.

QUITCLAIM DEED—WHAT IT CONVEYS.—An ordinary quitclaim deed in this State is sufficient to pass any estate the grantor has at the time of its execution, and the grantee can maintain an action to recover the land on it, provided the grantor could have done the same.

REVIEW OF EVIDENCE ON APPEAL FROM JUDGMENT.—On appeal from a judgment, the Supreme Court will look at the evidence so far only as to see the relevancy of the exceptions taken during the trial.

APPEAL from the District Court, Third Judicial District, Alameda County.

The judgment in this case was rendered July 16th, 1863. A statement on motion for new trial was made and filed, and on the 16th day of November, 1863, an order was made denying a new trial. On the 4th day of March, 1864, an appeal was taken from the judgment and from the order denying a new trial. No statement on appeal was made, but the respondents' attorneys stipulated that the statement on motion for a new trial might be also used as the statement on appeal.

The other defendants were in possession as tenants of Williamson.

The Court below found as facts, that on the 31st day of December, 1857, José Domingo Peralta was the owner in fee simple of the land; that on the 14th day of May, 1858, plaintiff became the owner of an undivided one third of the same, and on the 6th of April, 1860, of an additional undivided one sixth; that on the 1st day of January, 1862, defendants entered upon the land and ousted and ejected plaintiff from the possession of the same; that defendant Williamson has not and never had any title to or right of possession to the land, or any portion thereof; and that Edson Adams is the owner of, and from December 31st, 1861, has been the owner of the other undivided one half of the land.

The action was commenced October 29th, 1862. March 18th, 1863, defendants, by leave of the Court, filed an amended answer, setting up title in defendant Williamson to an undivided one half of the land acquired by Peralta's deed, dated January 31st, 1863.

The other facts are stated in the opinion of the Court.

W. W. Crane, Jr., for Appellants.

One tenant in common can only recover the possession of the whole premises as against a trespasser, or, more properly speaking, intruder, who enters without title or color of title; and the defendant Williamson, being neither a trespasser nor an intruder, but deraigning title from Cipriano Thurn, it is immaterial as between himself and plaintiff whether his claim of the title can be successfully assailed by Edson Adams or Jaynes, or not. If this position be incorrect, then the familiar maxim that in ejectment the plaintiff recovers upon the strength of his own title, and not upon the weakness of his adversary's, is reversed, because, while it appears that either Williamson, or Adams, or Jaynes, is entitled to the possession of one half of the demanded premises, and the plaintiff to the other half alone, yet the plaintiff shall have the whole, because Williamson's title is weaker than Adams' or Jaynes'. In short, the rule claimed by plaintiff's counsel permits one tenant in common in an action of ejectment to fish for his co-tenant, and, among several claimants, to ascertain by a judicial determination which is entitled to that position. (Collier v. Corbett, 15 Cal. 186; Stark v. Barrett, 15 Cal. 361; Touchard v. Crow, 20 Cal. 150.)

Fleming's mortgage created merely a lien upon the premises; the fee remained in Thurn. (Fogarty v. Sawyer, 17 Cal. 592; Lord v. Norris, 18 Cal. 487; Dutton v. Washauer, 21 Cal. 609.)

The question then is: What was the effect of Fleming's judgment upon the fee or equity of redemption of Peralta, he never having had his day in Court? It has been three times distinctly adjudicated by the former Supreme Court, that under such circumstances the fee or equity of redemption remains undisturbed. (Goodenow v. Ewer, 16 Cal. 467.)

In Boggs v. Hargrave, 16 Cal. 580, the mortgagor had parted with the fee, and the grantee was not made a party to the action.

The Court holds that the equity of redemption was not foreclosed; but the purchaser at the Sheriff's sale could not recover the purchase money, as it appeared that the deed from the mortgagor was executed before the commencement of the suit, and was recorded before the sale. (Burton v. Lies, 21 Cal. 87; Watson v. Spence, 30 Wend. 260; Whitney v. Higgins, 10 Cal. 550.)

The deed from Thurn to Peralta was acknowledged July 11th, 1860, and was delivered on that day. (Wyckoff v. Remsen, 11 Paige, 564.)

The foreclosure suit of Fleming v. Thurn and Adams, was commenced afterwards, to wit: January 22d, 1861.

The deed from Thurn to Peralta was recorded February 25th, 1861.

From that time it was notice to all subsequent purchasers. Fleming bought at the Sheriff's sale March 11th, 1861, and was a subsequent purchaser with notice; (Boggs v. Hargrave, 16 Cal. 560;) and Peralta's deed has priority over such subsequent sale. (Jackson v. Dubois, 4 John. 216; Jackson v. Terry, 13 John. 471; Jackson v. Post, 9 Cow. 120; Jackson v. Post, 15 Wend. 588; Jackson v. Chamberlain, 8 Wend. 620.)

Patterson, Wallace & Stow, for Respondent.

The Court will not consider the sufficiency of the evidence to sustain the findings. (Lower v. Knox, 10 Cal. 481.)

This seems to us to dispose of the question whether defendant Williamson had title to an undivided moiety or not.

On the trial in the Court below, when plaintiff rested, he had shown title to an undivided half, and defendants appeared to be wrongdoers, who had entered (according to the averments of the complaint and the admissions made by the amended answer) October 1st, 1859, without title and as trespassers.

Upon that state of facts the rule is well settled, that as against defendants, plaintiff is entitled to recover and be restored to the possession of the whole. (Clark v. Huber, 20 Cal. 196; Collier v. Corbett, 15 Cal. 183.)

When this action was commenced, defendants had no title; neither were they tenants in common with plaintiff at that time nor when they ousted plaintiff in October, 1859; and thus they endeavor to escape plaintiff's recovery of damages and possee-

sion, by a pretended acquisition of title pendente lite, and by amending their answer by now acknowledging that the plaintiff has title to one half, and setting up title in themselves to the other half; an attitude which, in our judgment, does not particularly commend them to the equitable consideration of this Court.

Again: the learned counsel for appellants mistakes respondent's position in saying that he (respondent) "claims the other half, not because he owns it, but because one Edson Adams does, or in the event Adams fails, then because one Jaynes is the owner." We say respondent owns one half, and it follows that he has a right to the possession of the whole, unless defendants show a right to joint possession with plaintiff. Defendants pleaded such right. Plaintiff (by force of sections forty-six and sixty-five of the Practice Act) takes issue upon the plea, and avers that Adams or Jaynes is entitled to such joint possession with plaintiff, because the title is in Adams or Jaynes to the one half not owned by plaintiff; that defendants do not show any right to the possession under Adams or Jaynes, since it does not lie in the mouths of defendants to say plaintiff cannot recover the whole, because they are trespassers and wrongdoers as between them and Adams and Jaynes. In other words, plaintiff invokes the familiar rule: Nullus commodum capere potest de injuria sua propria.

By the Court, SAWYER, J.

We can only consider the questions arising on the appeal from the judgment, for the reason that the appeal from the order denying a new trial was not taken in time. (Dooking v. Moore, 20 Cal. 141.)

There is a stipulation in the record that the statement "on motion for a new trial may be also used as the statement on appeal from the judgment." The statement, therefore, may be used, so far as it presents any question that can be reviewed on appeal from the judgment, but no further.

On such appeal, errors in the rulings of the Court below in the progress of the trial affecting the judgment are subject to review, when the exceptions are preserved by bill of exceptions, or brought up in a statement on appeal.' (Brown v. Tolles, 7 Cal. 399; Rice v. Gashirie, 13 Cal. 53.)

Plaintiff sues to recover the possession of certain lands. Defendants, by leave of the Court, filed an amended and supplemental answer, in which they allege that, since the commencement of the action, they have become the owners in fee of an undivided half of the premises in controversy, by a conveyance from one José Domingo Peralta, who, at the time of said conveyance was the owner in fee of said undivided half.

On the trial the plaintiff proved title in fee in himself to an undivided half at the time of the entry of defendants, and that one Cipriano Thurn, on the 10th day of July, 1860, before the commencement of this action, held title in fee simple to the remaining half, and then rested.

The defendants then introduced in evidence a deed from said Cipriano Thurn to José Domingo Peralta, dated the 10th, and acknowledged on the 11th of July, 1860, and recorded February 25th, 1861. Also a deed from said José Domingo Peralta and wife to defendant Williamson, dated January 31st, 1863, and then rested. Said deeds conveying three undivided eighths of the premises in question.

The plaintiff, in rebuttal, then gave in evidence a mortgage from said Cipriano Thurn to Wm. B. Fleming, dated July 6, and recorded July 7, 1860; also a judgment roll in an action (No. 8,356) in the Twelfth Judicial District for the City and County of San Francisco, to foreclose said mortgage, in which action said Wm. B. Fleming was plaintiff and Cipriano Thurn and one Edson Adams were defendants, whereby it appeared that the complaint in said cause was filed January 22, 1861, and a decree for foreclosure and sale entered February 9, 1861. Also, a notice of lis pendens in due form in said suit, filed in the Recorder's office of Alameda County, January 23, 1861. Also, an order of sale in said cause, with the Sheriff's return, showing a sale of the premises to plaintiff, Wm. B. Fleming, March 11, 1861. Also, an assignment of certificate of sale in said case by Fleming to Edson Adams, with admission that Adams paid the consideration of eight hundred dollars. Also, Sheriff's deed of premises to Adams after expiration of time for redemption. To the introduction of each of said instruments of evidence the defendants in proper time and in due form objected. The objections were severally overruled and defendants excepted.

The first ground of objection is, "that neither the defendants in this action, nor José Domingo Peralta, were parties to said action or judgment, to wit: Case No. 8,356, and are not bound by any of the proceedings therein, and said several documents and papers are not relevant to the issue." These rulings are relied on as error.

If this objection is well founded, the judgment cannot be sustained, for it is manifest from the findings that the evidence must have produced an effect unfavorable to the defendants.

The plaintiff had shown title to one undivided half in himself, and to the other in Thurn. The defendants then showed that three eighths of Thurn's half had been conveyed to defendant Williamson. To meet this phase of the case the plaintiff claimed that Williamson's chain of title had been intercepted before it reached him, and that Thurn's title had passed to Edson Adams; but if Edson Adams' title failed, that then it passed through another line to one Anselm Jaynes. The evidence just recited was introduced to maintain the proposition that Thurn's title had vested in Adams. The action was tried by the Court without a jury, and special findings were filed. The Court found that the title to one undivided half was in plaintiff, and the other half in Adams, and not in Williamson. Of course, if in Adams, it could not be either in Jaynes or Williamson. Having found that Adams, and not Williamson, was the co-tenant of plaintiff, judgment was entered in favor of the plaintiff for the whole of the premises, and not one undivided half, as it would have been had the title to a part been found to be in Williamson. Had the Court found against the title of Adams, we are not authorized by the findings to say whether it would have found in favor of Williamson or Jaynes. As the Court found the title to one half to be in Adams, we must presume that the testimony under consideration contributed to that result. If Adams acquired the title, it was through the proceedings foreclosing Fleming's mortgage, and it will be necessary to consider the effect of the foreclosure on the title of José Domingo Peralta, under which defendants claim. The order in which the several transactions occurred, as we have already seen, is as follows: Thurn's mortgage to Fleming, bearing date July 6th, was recorded on the 7th. He deeded to Peralta on the 10th of the same month. The conveyance to Peralta, therefore, was subject to the mortgage. Fleming commenced his suit to foreclose his mortgage January 22, 1861, without making Peralta a party to the suit. The decree of foreclosure was entered on the 9th of February, 1861; Peralta's deed of July 10th was recorded on the 25th of February, 1861. The sale under the decree of foreclosure was made by the Sheriff on the 11th of March following to Fleming, the plaintiff in the foreclosure suit; and Fleming conveyed his interest so purchased to Adams. At the time of the commencement of the foreclosure suit, then, the title to the land, subject to the mortgage, was in Peralta, although his deed was not on record. His title was good as to all the world except a party deriving title from Thurn for a valuable consideration without actual notice. It has been settled by repeated decisions of the late Supreme Court, that the title of the grantee of mortgaged premises is not affected by a foreclosure of the mortgage in a suit commenced after the conveyance by the mortgagor unless the grantee is made a party to the suit. (Goodenow v. Ewer, 16 Cal. 467; Boggs v. Hargrave, Ib. 560; Burton v. Lies, 21 Cal. 88; Fogarty v. Sawyer, 17 Cal. 592; Lord v. Morris, 18 Cal. 482; Dutton v. Warschauer, 21 Cal. 610.)

Peralta, not having been made a party to the foreclosure suit, his title was not affected by the foreclosure and sale, unless Fleming and his grantee, Adams, can be regarded as purchasers for a valuable consideration, without notice, under the Act relating to the record of conveyances; and we do not see how they can be so regarded. At the time of the entry of the decree, it is true, Peralta's deed was not on record; but he had acquired his title long before the suit was commenced. He got nothing after the commencement of the suit that he did not have before. He merely put his deed on record; and this was done before any sale under the decree had taken place. Fleming parted with nothing on the faith of the record. He was not a purchaser till the sale. At the moment of the sale he was no worse and no better off than when he took his first mortgage. No consideration had as yet moved from him, and when the sale took place Peralta's deed was on record and all the world had notice. Fleming purchased with his eyes open, and he got nothing. When Peralta's deed was put upon record, Fleming, if he had no knowledge of it before, should then have opened his decree and taken the proper proceedings to make Peralta a party, or should have proceeded in some other appropriate manner to foreclose the mortgage upon Peralta's interest before proceeding to a sale. Adams of course purchased from Fleming with notice, and is in no better position than he.

Under this view of the case the defendants were not barred, or in any way affected by the said several documents and proceedings introduced in evidence under objection and exception, and they were irrelevant to the issues for that reason. Their admission in evidence was therefore error, and as the finding of title in Adams must necessarily have been affected by this testimony, it follows that the judgment must be modified as hereinafter indicated, or reversed and a new trial had. We have not overlooked the fact, that, in deciding the motion for a new trial at a subsequent term, the learned Judge who tried the cause came to the conclusion that he had committed an error in finding that the title had passed to Adams by virtue of the foreclosure proceedings, but still denied a new trial on the ground that the testimony would have justified him in finding the title in Jaynes. The judgment is based on the finding as it was made at the time of the trial, and the title is affirmatively found to be in Adams and not in Jaynes. We cannot substitute for it a different state of facts appearing in the opinion of the Court, rendered at a subsequent term, in deciding the motion for a new trial.

The Court find title to an undivided half of the premises in controversy in plaintiff, and he was entitled to recover to that extent. The record furnishes the data necessary to enable the Court to modify the judgment.

It is therefore ordered that the plaintiff have fifteen days in which to file his written consent that the judgment be modified in accordance with the views expressed in this opinion, and upon filing such written consent, that an order be entered directing the Court below to so modify its judgment that the plaintiff recover an undivided half of the premises in controversy, together with the entire amount of damages found by the Court and the costs of the Court below. In default of filing such written consent, it is ordered that judgment be entered reversing the judgment and ordering a new trial. It is further ordered that the appellant recover his costs of appeal.

Mr. Justice SHAFER, having been of counsel, did not sit on the hearing of this case.

Upon petition for rehearing the Court delivered the following opinion.

By the Court, SAWYER, J.

Counsel for respondent acquiesce in "the law as declared in the opinion of the Court," but think the opinion based on a misapprehension of the facts, and ask a rehearing.

Plaintiff proved title to an undivided half in himself, and to the other half in Thurn. Thurn mortgaged his half to Fleming, and then quitclaimed three undivided eighths only to Peralta, leaving one eighth in himself. The first misapprehension is supposed to consist in overlooking the fact that one eighth remained in Thurn, and that the foreclosure as to that eighth was valid without making Peralta a party. And it is said that the record in the foreclosure suit was relevant for the purpose of showing that the title to one eighth passed to Adams under the decree and sale in that suit, and that it was offered for the purpose of deraigning title to that eighth to Adams. There is, however, no such limitation as to the purpose for which the record was introduced, shown by the record. But the fact that the one eighth remaining in Thurn had passed to Adams was itself irrelevant to any issue in the case, consequently any testimony tending to prove that fact alone was irrelevant.

The material fact to show was, that the title to the three eighths, which had prima facie been shown to have passed to Peralta, and through him to Williamson, had been intercepted before it reached Williamson and passed to Adams or somebody else—it matters not to whom—and not to show what became of the one eighth to which Williamson had shown no apparent title. It was not necessary for the plaintiff to prove that Williamson did not own one half. That was an issue presented by defendant, and it devolved upon him to make a prima facie case, and not to the plaintiff to negative it. He had only given testimony tending to prove that he had acquired three eighths. It could only be relevant to show that these three eighths had passed to some other party. It did not matter whether the other eighth remained in Thurn, or passed to Adams, or to some other person. It was just as available to the plaintiff as a weapon of offense or defense remaining in Thurn, as if it had passed to Adams. It was enough for the plaintiff's purposes that defendant had shown no title to it in himself.

All the other points arising on this appeal argued in the petition, except the eighth and tenth, are but modifications of the same point, or are disposed of upon the same principles, and, so far as they are deemed to require notice, we shall consider them together.

It is supposed that the Court gave too little weight to the eleventh and twelfth findings, to the effect that Williamson and his co-defendants had no right or title whatever, etc.; and too much prominence to the finding that the title to one half was in Adams, which last finding, it is contended, is mere surplusage, and ought not to be considered at all.

The counsel are, we think, mistaken in this supposition also. We only considered the affirmative finding in favor of Adams in its relation to the finding against defendants, and to the evidence admitted under exception tending to support those findings. And it is difficult to separate them. The Court having found title to one half in plaintiff, and to the other half in Adams, the finding that the defendants had no title necessarily followed, for the title to the same half could not by any possibility be in Adams and in defendant at the same time. But concede, as plaintiff contends, the finding as to Adams to be surplusage—that it is out of the record—that the findings against defendants only remain, and the condition of the plaintiff is no better.

The question then stands thus: The plaintiff proves title to one undivided half in himself, and to the other half in Thurn, and rests. He has made a prima facie case. The defendants then, to maintain the affirmative of the issues presented by them, introduce deeds apparently derailing title to them from Thurn to three eighths. This is sufficient to protect their possession to the extent of three undivided eighths. The plaintiff must now rebut the defendants' proofs, and the only evidence that can have any possible relevancy to the issue is testimony to show that defendants never acquired those three undivided eighths, or if they did, that they had subsequently passed from defendants to somebody else. The title to those particular three eighths is now the only issue. On this issue the plaintiff offered the mortgage of Thurn to Fleming, and the proceedings of foreclosure, sale, etc., under it. If these proceedings were binding upon Peralta, they were relevant, because in that event the title was intercepted before it reached Williamson and nothing passed to him, and his evidence of title to the three eighths would be successfully overthrown. But if Peralta was not bound by the foreclosure, then his title was not affected, and the proceedings were irrelevant to the issue, because they did not prove, or tend in the slightest degree to prove, that the title to the three eights did not pass to Williamson. The Court held them to be relevant, and as there cannot be the slightest pretense that they were relevant for any other purpose whatever, the Court must necessarily have held the proceedings to be valid and to cut off the equity of redemption in Peralta. Having admitted the testimony against the objection and exception of the defendants, we must presume that the Court considered it and gave it weight. And giving it its proper weight as relevant to the issue, the Court necessarily found the eleventh and twelfth issues against the defendants, that they did not have and never did have any title to or right of possession in the land, etc. Any other finding would have been manifestly contrary to this evidence. It is true the Court might have disregarded this evidence entirely, and there might have been other testimony about which we know nothing, amply sufficient to sustain the finding. But here is testimony erroneously admitted, which, if considered at all, was sufficient of itself to sustain the finding on that point, and we are bound to presume that it was considered, for its effect as evidence was necessarily passed upon in the ruling upon its admissibility.

We held that the foreclosure proceedings did not affect the title of Peralta, who was not a party to the suit, and in the law thus laid down the counsel for respondents "cheerfully acquiesce." This point being admitted, it is clear to our minds, from the considerations just presented, that the record of those proceedings was irrelevant and inadmissible. If this judgment can be supported with such an error in the admission of testimony in the record, it would, in our judgment, be difficult to find a case where a judgment should be reversed for error in admitting irrelevant and improper testimony. The adoption of the rule insisted on by respondent in this case would certainly relieve counsel from a great deal of labor in taking objections and exceptions in the trial of cases, and the Court from further labor and perplexity in reviewing them. There may have been, it is true, sufficient testimony to sustain the finding without the objectional evidence. We do not know what other evidence was introduced. But there was error; "and the rule is that every error is prima facie an injury to the party against whom it is made; and it rests with the other party clearly to show, not that probably no hurt was done, but that none could have been, or was done by the error." (Jackson v. Feather River Water Company, 14 Cal. 25.) There is nothing before us which shows that no injury was, or that none could have been done.

Counsel are mistaken in supposing that "unless that issue (the issue as to title) was affirmatively found in favor of the appellants the judgment was not erroneous," because a negative finding on that point, or a failure to find affirmatively, may have been based upon testimony erroneously admitted, and in such case the judgment would be erroneous for the reason that the finding which supports it rests upon improper evidence.

The respondents now insist that the Court cannot consider on this appeal the error relied on, for the reason that the appellant assigned the same error in a motion for a new trial which was decided against him, and not having appealed from the order denying a new trial, he is concluded by that ruling. We think there is no force in this objection. An error of law in admitting or rejecting testimony is subject to be reviewed on appeal from the judgment when the ruling is made a part of the record by a bill of exceptions, or by a statement on appeal. It is true the same error may also be reviewed on appeal from an order denying a new trial. But the two modes are independent of each other. The appeal from the judgment does not depend upon the motion for new trial. The latter proceeding is subsequent to the judgment. An appeal from the judgment may be taken without waiting for the determination of a motion for new trial, or the two appeals may be, and usually are, prosecuted together. As to those errors which may be reviewed on either appeal, the remedy is concurrent, and the party may pursue either appeal and abandon the other. The late Supreme Court recognized this doctrine in several instances. (Hastings v. Halleck, 13 Cal. 207; Towdy v. Ellis, 22 Cal. 659.) The cases cited go beyond the requirements of the case now under consideration, for in this case the parties stipulated that the statement in the record "may be also used as the statement on appeal from the judgment," and the statement distinctly presents the error and sufficient testimony to give it point.

The counsel are right in assuming that none of the evidence is before this Court, except so far as is necessary to point the exception taken by defendant to the ruling of the Court in admitting testimony. And we did not in the former opinion, nor have we in this, considered the testimony, except so far as the tendency of the evidence to prove the issues served to illustrate the bearing of the supposed erroneous ruling upon the finding and judgment. Nor did we, as seems to be supposed, refer in our opinion to the opinion of the District Judge on the motion for new trial to aid our decision. It was referred to simply to show that conceding it to be before us, we had not overlooked that portion of the record, and that our reasoning was not obviated by anything appearing in that opinion.

The last point made, is, that Peralto took nothing from Thurn because his deed was only a technical quitclaim deed; and as Peralto had no estate before upon which the quitclaim deed could operate, nothing passed by it. An ordinary quitclaim deed, in this State, is sufficient to pass any estate the grantor has at the time of the execution of the deed. An action to recover the land can be maintained upon it, provided the grantor could have maintained the action. (Sullivan v. Davis, 4 Cal. 291; Downer v. Smith, 24 Cal. 114; see also Northrop v. Wright, 7 Hill, 489.)

An elaborate argument and petition for rehearing has also been filed on behalf of Edson Adams. We have searched the record in vain to find any party to the suit by that name. Adams was a witness, but he has no standing in Court which entitles him to be heard. We have, however, examined the argument, to see if it contained any suggestions worthy of consideration. We find no point, which could be considered on appeal from the judgment, not presented in respondent's petition and argument. The other questions discussed in Adams' petition relate to the evidence and facts of the case, which could only be considered on appeal from the order denying a new trial, and the appeal from that order is not before us.

After a careful consideration of the petition for rehearing, we are unable to perceive that any fact was misapprehended by us in our former opinion, or any principle of law misapplied.

The further examination of the case by the light of the argument in the petition for rehearing confirms us in the opinion that our former decision is correct.

Rehearing denied, and ordered that respondent have five days after filing this opinion to file stipulation mentioned in former order.

ALLEN T. WILLSON v. WILLIAM McEVOY AND JOHN F. CONLIN.

POWER OF COURT TO SET ASIDE AN ORDER.—The Court has no power to set aside an order denying a new trial, after the adjournment of the term at which it was made.

LIABILITY ON INJUNCTION BOND.—In an action on an injunction bond, the fees of an attorney employed to resist the injunction cannot be recovered as damages unless they have been paid. The fact that the plaintiff is subject to a liability to his attorney, without showing actual payment to him, is insufficient.

APPEAL from the District Court, Twelfth Judicial District, City and County of San Francisco.

The Court below found as facts that on the 31st day of January, 1857, an order was made in the case of Knowles et al. v. Inches and Calderwood, that a preliminary injunction issue upon plaintiffs' filing an undertaking in the sum of one thousand dollars. That the undertaking was filed on the fifth day of February following, and the writ of injunction issued, which was served on defendant Inches on the 11th day of February following. That on the first day of August, 1857, the bill was dismissed and the injunction dissolved. That an answer was put in and the cause tried by an attorney and counsellor at law, acting on behalf of defendant Inches, and that for his services seven hundred dollars would be a fair compensation.

Willson v. McEvoy et al.

The other facts are stated in the opinion of the Court.

Allen T. Willson, in person, for Appellant.

W. W. Stow, for Respondent McEvoy.

Stanley & Hayes, for Respondent Conlin.

By the Court, RHODES, J.

This suit was brought on an injunction bond, executed by the present defendants, to Inches and Calderwood, the defendants in the case of Knowles v. Inches and Calderwood, 12 Cal. 212. It is described in the complaint as a "certain undertaking, whereby they undertook and promised that they would pay all damages, not exceeding the sum of one thousand dollars, that the said Inches and Calderwood should sustain by reason of said injunction, if the Court should finally decide that the said plaintiffs in that suit were not entitled thereto." Inches assigned the bond to the present plaintiff. The Court found for the defendants, and judgment for costs was entered upon the finding on the 27th of March, 1860. The plaintiff moved for a new trial and filed his statement, and on the 18th day of August, 1860, the motion was "regularly called up for argument in its order upon the calendar, on motion of defendant's counsel, no person appearing to object thereto," as appears from the minutes of the Court, and was then denied. The Court then adjourned for the term.

The plaintiff, on the 10th day of September, 1860, served the defendants with notice of a motion to set aside the order denying the motion for a new trial, and on the 22d day of September the Court set aside the order denying the motion and the defendants excepted to the decision of the Court; and thereupon the Court again denied the plaintiff's motion for a new trial. The plaintiff filed and served his notice of appeal from the judgment and from the order of the 22d of September, denying his motion for a new trial.

The defendants now insist, that the order made on the 22d day of September, setting aside the order made at the previous term on the 18th day of August, was void. The point is well taken. We so held in Castro v. Richardson, 25 Cal. 49, in affirmance of the repeated decisions of the late Supreme Court, and we are satisfied that our opinion in that case is correct on principle and authority. This disposes of the appeal from the order denying the motion for a new trial, and the statement falls with the motion.

The plaintiff contends that he is entitled to judgment on the findings. The only breach of the bond assigned by the plaintiff is that "the said Inches sustained damages to the amount of one thousand dollars, by reason of said injunction, by being compelled to retain and employ attorneys and counsellors at law, and to pay them large compensation, to wit: to the amount of one thousand dollars to prevent said injunction from being made perpetual and to procure its dissolution."

The Court found for the plaintiff all the facts set forth in his complaint, except that in relation to the payment by Inches of compensation to his attorneys and counsellors. Upon that issue the Court found "that there was no evidence of any money having been paid by said Inches, or his having given any valuable or other consideration to any person for or on account of the services rendered in said action."

The plaintiff contends that the bond is an agreement to indemnify against a liability as well as against an actual loss; and the defendants insist that it is an indemnity against the damages sustained—the actual loss alone; and that, as Inches did not pay attorney's fees, he has not sustained any damage by reason of said injunction.

Willson v. McEvoy et al.

The rule at common law was, that on a bond to indemnify against the damage the obligee might sustain, he could recover only upon evidence that he had sustained actual damage; that compensation would be awarded only for actual loss. Evidence showing that he was subject to a liability, without showing payment, was not enough. (Churchill v. Hunt, 3 Denio, 321; Jackson v. Port, 17 Johns. 482; Sedgwick on Measure of Damages, 307.) Sedgwick, in the able work last cited, says, on page 307: "Any rule by which actual damages are given, where no actual loss is sustained, is in truth nothing but an effort to engraft on the Courts of common law a species of specific performance, irregular and illegitimate, and which neither their forms of procedure nor the general arrangement of their system, enable them to exercise without great danger of injustice and abuse. The rule should be considered cardinal and absolute, that actual compensation should be given for actual loss."

The authorities generally, though not uniformly, sustain this rule. In Wilde v. Joels, 15 How. Pr. 320, Mr. Justice Hoffman held, in an action upon an injunction bond, similar in its conditions to the one in this case, that "if a client can be made responsible, and a claim is reasonable, a bond of indemnity would appear to cover such a liability as much as an actual advance." This doctrine is deduced by the learned Judge from the presumed analogy between the grounds of recovery in actions on injunction bonds, and actions for injuries to the person. But the supposed analogy does not exist. In an action upon an injunction bond the liability depends upon the express agreement of the parties—they stipulating that the obligors shall be responsible for the damages sustained; but in actions for injuries to the person, in many decisions, it is held that the defendant is answerable, not only for the damage actually sustained by the plaintiff, but also for certain liabilities the plaintiff has incurred by reason of the wrongful acts of the defendant—such as medical attendance and nursing, in a case of assault and battery, or extra costs incurred in procuring a release from an arrest made without reasonable cause; and the Courts hold that the plaintiff may recover a reasonable compensation for those liabilities, without proof of payment. The law casts the burden of these liabilities upon him as a consequence of his tortious acts; but in an injunction bond the responsibility of the obligor is ascertained and measured by the terms of his agreement, and he will be charged with a liability incurred by the obligee, if it is so stipulated in the bond.

The only authority cited by Mr. Justice Hoffman where the action was on an injunction bond, is the case of Garret v. Hogan, 19 Ala. 344. The condition in the bond in that case was to "pay all damages and costs occasioned to said defendants by the vexatious suing out of said writ." The plaintiff assigned breaches of the bond, but did not allege that the injunction was vexatiously sued out, and on demurrer the Court held the declaration bad, for that omission.

That virtually disposed of the appeal, but as the defendants made the point, that attorneys' fees could not be recovered by the obligees, unless they had been paid by them, the Court proceeded to consider the question, and regarded the action substantially as for a tort, and after speaking of the evidence that might be necessary to show that the injunction suit was instituted for the purpose of oppression and wrong — for a vexations and malicious purpose — cites with approbation Marshall v. Betner, 17 Ala. 332, in which it is said "in cases where malice is the gist of the action, and vindictive damages recoverable, fees paid to counsel in defending against the wrongful act of the defendant, if reasonable and necessary, may be proved and considered by the jury in the assessment of damages," and then proceeds to hold, on the authority of that case, that the demand for the attorneys' fees, in the injunction suit can be maintained without proof of payment.

Considering Garret v. Logan as an action sounding in tort, as the Court evidently did, the decision may be sustained, but in the case before us, the action is founded simply and only upon contract.

The ruling of the learned Judge who tried this action is fully sustained by the current of the authorities. (Sedgwick on Dam. 307.) In Aberdeen v. Blackmar, 6 Hill, 324, which was an action upon an agreement to indemnify and save harmless the plaintiffs from any claim or demand, etc., Mr. Justice Bronson, in delivering the opinion of the Court, held that the declaration, which alleged the recovery of a judgment against the plaintiff on a demand covered by the agreement, was fatally defective, because it did not allege the payment of the judgment.

We think Gilbert v. Wiman, 1 N. Y. 550, also a case precisely in point. The suit was brought by the Sheriff on the bond given to him by his deputy, conditioned among other things that "the said Sheriff shall not sustain any damage or molestation whatsoever by reason of any act from this date done, or any liability incurred by and through said deputy." It was alleged in the declaration that judgments had been recovered against him on account of the neglect of the deputy, but it was not alleged that the Sheriff had paid any part of the judgments, and it was held that no recovery could be had on the bond in respect to the judgments, unless they had been paid. (See Edwards v. Bodine, 11 Paige, 224.) A liability is not a damage, according to the signification of that term, as employed in contracts, and Courts have no authority to insert the term "liability" in a contract, and then proceed to enforce the contract as they — but not the parties — have made it.

The only remaining point necessary to be noticed is, that the Court, upon the findings, should have rendered judgment for him for at least nominal damages.

The only benefit that would have accrued to him by having the judgment entered for him for that sum was, that he would have been relieved of the payment of costs, taxed in the judgment at four dollars and a half. We think we are justified, in this respect, in invoking the maxim de minimis non curat lex. (McConihe v. New York and Erie Railroad, 20 N. Y. 495; Jenning v. Loring, 5 Ind. 250.)

Judgment affirmed.

Muller v. Boggs et al.

HERMAN MULLER v. ANGUS L. BOGGS AND, CHARLES CLARK.

FINDINGS OF FACT BY A REFEREE.—Where a cause is tried by a referee, and the testimony is conflicting, the Supreme Court will not disturb his findings of fact.

CONSTRUCTION OF A DEED.—Where a deed conveys a tract of land by name and description, and then excepts from its operation certain parcels of the tract, and the language of the exception leaves it doubtful whether it was the intention of the grantor to except a particular parcel, the deed must be construed most favorable to the grantees, and the doubt resolved in his favor.

DEPUTY — POWER OF.—Where the statute confers on an officer power to appoint a deputy, but does not prescribe the duties of the deputy, the deputy has full power to do any and all acts which his principal may perform by virtue of his office.

COUNTY RECORDER — DEPUTY OF.—A Deputy County Recorder, appointed under the provisions of the Act concerning County Recorders, of the 26th of March, 1851, had power in the name of his principal to take and certify acknowledgments of deeds.

SAME.—The ninth section of said Act, enabling the deputy to perform the duties of Recorder in case of a vacancy in the office, or the absence or inability of the Recorder to perform his duties, is an enlargement of and not an abridgment of the powers of the deputy.

COUNTY RECORDERS.—The powers conferred upon County Recorders by the Act of March 26th, 1851, to take and certify acknowledgments of deeds, is an incident of the office, and not personal to the incumbent.

DEED.—The words "grant, bargain, sell, and convey," in a deed operate not merely to release but to transfer any interest which the grantor had in the land at the date of the deed.

TENANTS IN COMMON — RENTS AND PROFITS.—Where one tenant in common obtains judgment against a stranger for the possession of the entire premises, he cannot recover all the rents and profits, but only a proportion thereof corresponding to his interest in the land.

SAME.—If, in such case, judgment is rendered for all the rents and profits, the Supreme Court will not reverse the judgment, provided the plaintiff offer to remit the excess: but, thus modified, it will be allowed to stand.

"R. H. LAWRENCE, Recorder.

"By L. N. EDMONSTON, Dep. Rec."

Salvador Vallejo, in January or February, 1850, caused a portion of the Rancho de Napa, containing about one thousand nine hundred acres, to be surveyed into lots and streets, and numbered the lots up to fifty. This plat was called the "Pueblo de Salvador," and was recorded.

This action was brought to recover the possession of lots numbered 25, 26, 31, 32, and fractional lots numbered 27 and 30, situated in said Town or Pueblo de Salvador, in the County of Napa.

The other facts are stated in the opinion of the Court.

Hoge & Wilson, for Appellants.

The deed of the 20th of December, 1851, did not, and was not intended by the parties, to include any of the lots of the Pueblo or Town of Salvador, and particularly any of the lots in controversy in this suit.

The case of Doe ex dem. Hampton v. Cowles, reported in 4th Dev. & Batt. N. C. Rep. p. 16, is remarkably similar in its details to the case before the Court. In that case the plaintiffs claimed title to the lots in question under the will of Hampton, devising to them his home plantation; previously, the Town of Hamptonville had been laid out, by the consent of Hampton, on a portion of his home plantation, and the lots sold. The heirs claimed two of these lots as part of the home plantation, and as passing under the clause of the will devising to them that plantation. The Court "were very clearly of opinion that the land so laid off for a town was thereby severed from the whole tract, or 'home plantation,' so as not to pass under that description in the devise."

In the case of Aldrich et al. v. Gaskill, 10 Cushing, 155, the devise was of "the farm on which I now live, consisting of about one hundred and fifty acres, and all the buildings thereon," and the question was whether this description included a portion which had been separated from the main portion of the farm by two small lots which had been sold for house lots; it, however, having been used and let with the other portions of the farm. On page 158, Mr. Chief Justice Shaw says: "Having been once a part of the farm, we think that there is no decisive act showing the intention either of the father or son to sever it from the farm. The word 'farm' is of large import," etc., * * * "but, as to the term, it is said to be a collective word, consisting of divers things gathered into one, as a messuage, land, meadow, pasture, wood, common," etc. * * * "In this country it is a parcel of land, used, occupied, managed, and controlled by one proprietor * * *. The letting of small portions of it for the season or for short terms did not sever it, nor did the intention to sell it for house lots, not executed."

In our case, unlike the Massachusetts case, the intention was actually executed in the most solemn form, and placed upon the records of the county. It would be easy to imagine what would have been the opinion of the learned Chief Justice, who delivered the judgment of the Court in that case, upon similar facts to those existing in the case at bar.

In further support of our position, we also refer to the following cases, the limits of a brief not permitting us to specially quote from the facts and opinions of each case: Bell v. Sawyer, 32 N. H. 72; Brendlinger v. Brendlinger, 26 Penn. 132; Allen v. Allen, 2 Jones' Equity, N. C. 235; Venable v. McDonald, 4 Dana, 337, 338; Stone v. Clark, 1 Metcalf, 378; Gerrish v. Towne, 3 Gray, 82; Sargent v. Adams, Ib. 72.

But the important question is now presented: Was the Wohler deed properly acknowledged, so as to entitle it to go upon record, and thus become legal notice to any one?

We confidently contend that it was not. A Deputy Recorder, under the law, had no power to take an acknowledgment of a deed. The law casts that duty and power upon the Recorder as one personal to himself, and having no connection with his official duties as Recorder. There is no analogy between the case of a Deputy Recorder and a Deputy Clerk or Sheriff. The statutes regulating their duties are essentially different. The provisions of the statutes in relation to Clerks, Sheriffs, County Surveyors, and Recorders, will be found in Compiled Laws, page 193, sections 3 and 5; page 713, sections 13, 14, 15, and 16; page 839, sections 8, 9, and 26; pages 367, 368, and 130.

A Deputy Clerk, by express provision of law, has the same power, in all respects, as his principal. The Act of 1850, establishing Recorder's offices and defining the duties of the Recorder, gave him no power to take an acknowledgment of a deed. It was not until the Act of 26th March, 1851, that any such power was given to the County Recorder. The twenty-sixth section of that Act first authorized and empowered the County Recorder to take an acknowledgment of a deed. In both Acts, the whole official duties of the Recorder as such are prescribed and regulated. The sections in relation to deputies and their duties are the same in both Acts. Section seven of the Act of 1850, and section nine of that of 1851, provide that: "In case of a vacancy in the office of Recorder, or his absence or inability to perform the duties of his office, the deputy shall perform the duties of Recorder during the continuance of such vacancy, absence, or inability." It will be perceived that the deputy, under the provisions cited, has no power even to perform the ordinary duties of the Recorder as such, except in the contingencies named. (McRae v. McGuire, 9 S. & M. 49, 50.)

J. McM. Shafter, for Respondents.

The question as to the acknowledgment of the deed from Vallejo to Wohler must be decided for us.

Muller v. Boggs et al.

We think there can be no doubt but that a County Recorder could take an acknowledgment by deputy.

It cannot be denied that the act of taking an acknowledgment is a mere ministerial one. (Bours v. Zachariah, 11 Cal. 281; Elliott v. Piersoll, 1 Peters, 339.)

It is equally true that every ministerial officer can make a deputy, and when so made he has all the power of his principal, and must act in his name. (5 Comyn's Digest, Officer, D. 1, 3; Rolles' Abridgment, 591; 1 Salkeld, 96; Allen on Sheriffs, 76, 8; 1 Bouvier's Law Dic. 7, 447; Lynch v. Livingston, 8 Bar. S. C. 463; 6 N. Y. 433; Hope v. Sawyer, 14 Ill. 254, 7; Moon v. Farrow, 3 A. K. Marsh. 41; Beaumont v. Yeatman, 8 Humph. 542; 20 Mo. 5 Bennett, 468; 5 Cal. 449; 2 J. 70; Toucharl v. Crow, 20 Cal. 150.)

These cases establish: First—That taking an acknowledgment is a ministerial act. Second—That it ought to be certified by a deputy, in the name of his principal. Third—That any act which is to be performed in the office or by the officer may be done, and thus certified by the deputy. Fourth—That it makes no difference that the statute in part defines the duties of either the principal or the deputy.

By the Court, SANDERSON, C. J.

This is an action for the possession of certain lots in the Pueblo de Salvador, the same being a part of four leagues of land granted by the Mexican nation to Salvador Vallejo in 1838, called the Rancho de Napa. Both parties claim to have derived title from Vallejo.

The plaintiff claims by deed from Vallejo to Wohler, dated on the 20th day of December, 1851; and by deed from Wohler to Frank, dated on the 20th day of March, 1852; and by deed from Frank to himself, dated on the 21st day of July, 1857; and by deed from Wohler to himself, (for further assurance,) dated on the 5th day of January, 1858.

The defendant claims by deed from Vallejo to Woodman, dated February 12, 1852; and by deed from Woodman to Ritchie, dated August 11, 1854; and by deed from Ritchie's executors to himself, dated on the 15th of March, 1858.

The lots in controversy were conveyed by Vallejo and wife to one Guttery, by deed dated on the 22d day of July, 1851, and reconveyed by Guttery to Vallejo and wife by deed dated on the 20th of August, 1851.

On the 19th day of November, 1858, the plaintiff conveyed an undivided fourth of the land in question to O. L. Shafter and others.

The case was tried by a referee, who found the issues in favor of the plaintiff, and assessed the rents and profits at the sum of two thousand eight hundred dollars, and reported a judgment in favor of the plaintiffs for the possession of the land and the full amount of the rents and profits as assessed by him. The defendant moved for a new trial, which was denied, and he appeals from the judgment and the order refusing a new trial.

The principal questions involved in the case arise upon the deed from Vallejo to Wohler of the 20th of December, 1851.

First—It is claimed by the defendant that the lots in question did not constitute a part of the Rancho de Napa at the date of the deed, and therefore Vallejo's title thereto did not pass under the description contained in the deed.

Second—It is further claimed that if the lots did form a part of the Rancho de Napa at the date of the deed, they belonged to that portion of the rancho which is expressly excepted from the operation of the deed by its own terms.

Third—It is further claimed that the deed was not acknowledged before a person authorized by law to take the acknowledgment of deeds, and that therefore the record of the deed did not impart constructive notice to subsequent purchasers in good faith.

1. The description contained in the deed is in the following words: "All his right, title and interest in and to all the land belonging to the Rancho de Napa, or all the land appertaining to the rancho of that name, granted to the said party of the first part by the Mexican Government, which has not been before the date of this instrument sold and conveyed by the said party of the first part by deeds which have been heretofore duly recorded in the office of the Recorder of the County of Napa."

It is not controverted but that the land in question is a part of the grant from the Mexican nation to Vallejo, under the name of the Rancho de Napa, but it is claimed that prior to the date of the Wohler deed the land in question, together with other land, had been segregated from the rancho and dedicated to town purposes, under the name of the Pueblo de Salvador, by the act and direction of Vallejo, and that it was subsequently treated by him as something distinct from the Rancho de Napa, and was so regarded in the neighborhood, and that hence it did not in fact constitute a part of the Rancho de Napa at the date of the deed to Wohler.

We are inclined to think that the qualifying words "granted by the Mexican Government," make the description broad enough to cover the entire grant from the Mexican nation to Vallejo; but it is not necessary to decide that question. The question as to whether the land in controversy constituted a part of the rancho or not, at the date of the deed, was fairly submitted to the referee upon the extrinsic testimony offered by the parties respectively. The referee found that it did. The testimony was conflicting, and, under the previous uniform rulings of this Court, we cannot disturb that finding; but, independent of this consideration, we are satisfied that the finding of the referee in this particular was right. Without particularizing the evidence, it is sufficient to say that in our judgment the finding is supported by a preponderance of testimony largely in favor of the plaintiff.

2. A portion of the Rancho de Napa is expressly excepted from the operation of the deed, and it is next contended that by a fair construction of the language in which the exception is expressed, the lots in question are embraced in the excepted portion. The lands excepted from the operation of the deed are such as had been previously sold and conveyed by deeds duly recorded in the Office of the Recorder of Napa County; and it is argued that the lots in question, having been previously sold and conveyed, by deed duly recorded, to Guttery, notwithstanding they were subsequently, and prior to the execution of the deed to Wohlor, reconveyed by Guttery to Vallejo and wife, come within the letter of the exception. This position cannot be maintained without furnishing an apt illustration of the legal maxim, Quæ hæret in litera hæret in cortice. It was manifestly the intention of Vallejo to convey all the land the title to which was still in him. But, admitting that the letter and not the spirit of the language must govern, it may be safely affirmed, from the evidence upon this point, that the lots in question, although conveyed, were never sold by Vallejo to Guttery. What was the object of the conveyance does not appear. It is characterized by one of the witnesses as "a piece of fooling with the title." No consideration was given by Guttery, as appears recited in the deed by which he reconveyed to Vallejo; and the conveyance and reconveyance were both made in less than a month—the former being dated on the 22d of July, and the latter on the 20th day of August following. In order to bring the lots in question within the letter of the exception it must appear that they were sold, as well as conveyed, and it can hardly be claimed, in view of the foregoing facts, that such was the case. The most that can be said in favor of the defendant's theory is, that the language of the exception leaves it doubtful whether it was the intention of Vallejo to except the lots in question. Where such is the case the deed must be construed most favorable to the grantee. (Jackson v. Hudson, 3 John. 375; Jackson v. Gardner, 8 John. 394.)

We attach no significance to the fact that the wife of Vallejo was joined with him as grantee in the deed from Guttery to them. They both appear as grantors in the deed to Guttery, which furnishes a probable reason why they both appear as grantees in the deed from him to them. The effect of the latter deed was to restore the land to its former condition in regard to the title, and subjected it once more to the absolute dominion of Vallejo. Admitting that by these steps the wife of Vallejo became vested with some interest in the land which she did not before possess, the same was a community interest, subject to the jus disponendi of the husband.

3. The acknowledgment was taken before the Deputy Recorder of Napa County, and certified in the name and as the act of his principal; and it is next claimed by defendant that the deputy had no authority to take the acknowledgment.

By the twenty-sixth section of the Act concerning County Recorders, of the 26th of March, 1851, (Compiled Laws, page 388,) County Recorders are empowered to take within their respective counties the acknowledgment and proof of all instruments and papers which may be by law recorded. By the eighth section of the same Act the Recorder of each county is authorized and empowered to appoint a deputy, who shall hold his office during the pleasure of the Recorder. Nothing is said in the Act concerning the duties of the deputy, except what is found in the ninth section, which provides that "in case of a vacancy in the office of Recorder, or his absence, or inability to perform the duties of his office, the deputy shall perform the duties of Recorder during the continuance of such vacancy, absence or inability;" and it is argued that the deputy has no power except what is conferred by the foregoing language, and that a vacancy in the office, or the absence or the inability of the Recorder, are conditions precedent to the exercise of any power or the performance of any act on the part of the deputy. We do not so read the statute. In our judgment the Legislature do not intend to define what shall be the duties of the deputy, except in the contingencies named in the ninth section, leaving the measure of his power under other circumstances to the common law. The ninth section should be read as an enlargement of his powers, and not as a restriction upon them. To guard against the inconvenience which might result to the public in case of a vacancy in the office of Recorder, or his absence or inability, was the design of the ninth section, and to that end it makes the deputy, in the contingencies named, Recorder de facto. Under the construction contended for, the Recorder would be unable to avail himself of the services of a deputy, except as provided in the ninth section, which might not unfrequently result in great detriment to the interests of the public, from mere inability on his part to perform the amount of labor necessitated by the business of the office. If a vacancy in the office, or the absence or inability of the Recorder, are conditions precedent to the exercise of power by the deputy, such conditions would have to be recited in every official act of the deputy in order to impart to it any validity. In the absence of language to that effect, so clear and explicit as not to admit of doubt, we cannot intend that the Legislature designed consequences so unusual and absurd.

The power to appoint a deputy is expressly conferred upon the Recorder, and the duties of the deputy not being prescribed, as we hold, except in the contingencies named in the ninth section, it follows that his official power is to be ascertained by a resort to the common law. At common law there can be no question but that the deputy, where the power to appoint one exists, has full power to do any and all acts which his principal may perform by virtue of his office.

In Parker v. Kett, 1 Salkeld, 95, this question came before the Court of King's Bench, in England, and Chief Justice Holt, who delivered the opinion of the Court, said: "Clerk, who was Mr. Keck's deputy, (and so it is of any other deputy, where a deputy may be appointed,) had full power to do any act or thing which his principal might have done. That is so essentially incident to a deputy, that a man cannot be a deputy to do any single act or thing, nor can a deputy have less power than his principal; and if his principal makes him covenant that he will not do any particular thing which the principal may do, the covenant is void and repugnant; as if the Under Sheriff covenant that he will not execute any process for more than twenty pounds without special warrant from the High Sheriff; this is void, because the Under Sheriff is his deputy, and the power of the deputy cannot be restrained to be less than that of his principal, save only that he cannot make a deputy, because it implies an assignment of his whole power, which he cannot assign over." (See also Comyn's Digest, Officer, D; Rolle's Abridgment, 501; Allen on Sheriffs, 76.)

If the taking of acknowledgments be an official act pertaining to the office of Recorder, there can be no doubt but that it may be lawfully performed by a deputy; and this brings us to the principal question involved in the point under consideration. It is claimed by the learned counsel for the appellant that the power in question is personal to the incumbent of the office of Recorder, and therefore forms no part of his official duty as Recorder. A short and conclusive answer to this theory is found in the Act of the 26th of March, 1851, before cited. The first section of that Act creates the office of Recorder, and the subsequent sections clearly define and prescribe the duties and powers of the incumbent of that office, and among them we find the power to take the acknowledgment of all instruments and papers which may be by law recorded. Were this power omitted from the Act creating the office and conferred by some other entirely separate and independent Act, there would be more plausibility in the theory advanced by the appellant; but when we find it incorporated in the Act creating the office and prescribing the duties and powers of the officer without any mark showing that it is sui generis, and standing upon a foundation distinct from that upon which the other enumerated powers are based, the force of the argument is wholly destroyed, and the conclusion is inevitable that the Legislature intended to make the power an incident of the office and not personal to the incumbent. The power in question comes from the same source at the same time and through the same channel as the other powers, the existence of which constitutes the office. Like the other powers it goes and comes with the office. The officer takes it the same as the other powers are taken, and loses it in like manner upon the expiration of his term of office.

The Act defining the duties of the County Clerk (Compiled Laws, p. 192) provides that he may appoint deputies, who shall have the same power in all respects as their principal:

Under this statute it was held in Touchard v. Crow, 20 Cal. 150, that the deputy had the power to take acknowledgments. In that case the power of the deputy was derived from and founded upon the statute; but the statute, as we have shown, is merely declaratory of the common law. The deputy derives no power from the statute which he would not have possessed by virtue of the common law, had the statute remained silent upon the subject (1 Salkeld, 95). Thus the Deputy Recorder is placed upon the same footing as the Deputy Clerk, and if the latter has the power the same is true of the former.

Whether the certificate of acknowledgment states that the grantor appeared before the principal or the deputy, or whether it be signed by the deputy in his own name only, seems to be immaterial. In Touchard v. Crow, the certificate was to the effect that the grantor appeared before the principal and was signed by the deputy without the name of his principal, and the acknowledgment was held to have been properly taken and certified. In Abrams v. Errin, 9 Iowa, 87, the certificate was the same as in the present case, and was signed in the same manner, and was held to be good. The Court said: "From the certificate in this case it may fairly be presumed that the deed was acknowledged before the Clerk and his name signed by the deputy." Thus it seems that either form is sufficient, and it is immaterial whether the certificate purport to be the act of the principal or the deputy. If it appear that the person taking the acknowledgment had the power to do so, it is sufficient. The law looks to the substance and not the form, and it is the policy of the law to uphold these certificates if possible. (Touchard v. Crow.)

We think that the acknowledgment of the deed from Vallejo to Wohler was taken before a person authorized by law to take the same, and that the certificate is in due form.

4. Several points are made by the learned counsel for appellant, founded upon the hypothesis that the several deeds under which the plaintiff claims are mere quitclaim deeds. It is not necessary to notice these points in detail, for the reason that the hypothesis upon which they are founded is erroneous. The deeds in question are not mere quitclaims. The granting or operative words in a simple quitclaim deed are "remit, release and quitclaim." The words of grant in the deed from Vallejo to Wohler, and from Wohler to Frank, and from Frank to Muller, the plaintiff, are, "grant, bargain, sell, and convey," and they operate not merely to release but to transfer any interest which the grantor had in the land at the date of the deed. In Touchard v. Crow the words of grant were "bargain, sell and quitclaim," and it was held that the deed was something more than a mere quitclaim, and was sufficient to pass and transfer any interest which the grantor had.

5. It is lastly claimed that the plaintiff, being a tenant in common with others, as appears from the testimony, and owning only a three fourths interest in the land, was entitled to recover only three fourths of the rents and profits, and that therefore the judgment, being for the full amount, is erroneous, and must be reversed. In this particular the judgment is erroneous, (Clark v. Huber, 20 Cal. 196,) but the respondent offers to remit one fourth of the judgment for rents and profits. This he has a right to do, (Doll v. Feller, 16 Cal. 432; De Costa v. The Massachusetts Flat Water and Mining Company, 17 Cal. 613,) and the judgment will therefore be modified in accordance with that offer, and thus modified it will be allowed to stand, but the respondent must pay the costs of the appeal.

Ordered accordingly.

Mr. Justice SHAFER, having been of counsel, did not sit on the trial of this case.

Mr. Justice CURREY, having been counsel in another case involving the title to the same land, has taken no part in the decision of this case.

Priest v. Bounds.

D. Q. PRIEST v. T. W. BOUNDS.

EVIDENCE OF INDORSEMENT OF NOTE.—An indorser of a promissory note is a competent witness for either plaintiff or defendant in an action by the indorsee against the maker, and his competency is wholly unaffected by sections four and three hundred and ninety-three of the Practice Act.

PROMISSORY NOTE.—A promissory note is neither an account, an unliquidated demand, nor a thing in action not arising out of contract.

APPEAL from the District Court, Eleventh Judicial District, Placer County.

This action was first brought in Justice's Court, on a promissory note for two hundred dollars, dated September 15th, 1857, due one day from date, and bearing interest at two and a half per cent per month, and executed by defendant Bounds to John Buckhart.

Buckhart, on the 16th of August, 1858, indorsed the note to Priest, who, on the 6th of January, 1859, indorsed it to Stewart, who, on the 19th of September, 1859, indorsed it to McGowan, who, on the 17th of July, 1861, indorsed it to Buckhart, by whom, on the same day, it was indorsed to plaintiff.

Plaintiff recovered judgment in the County Court and defendant appealed.

J. E. Hale, for Appellant.

Jo Hamilton, for Respondent.

By the Court, SANDERSON, C. J.

This is an action against the maker of a promissory note, of which the plaintiff was indorsee. The defense was part payment and tender as to the balance. On the trial the plaintiff offered as witnesses to rebut the case made by defendants, two persons who had been holders and indorsers of the note, having first executed and delivered to each of them a good and sufficient release. The Court, upon the objection of the defendant, excluded these witnesses, to which ruling the plaintiff duly excepted and now assigns the same as error. The case was tried in 1861.

In support of the ruling of the Court the respondent cites sections four and three hundred and ninety-three of the Practice Act. The fourth section reads as follows: "Sec. 4. Every action shall be prosecuted in the name of the real party in interest, except as otherwise provided in this Act; but in suits brought by the assignee of an account, unliquidated demand or thing in action not arising out of contract, assigned subsequently to the 1st day of July, 1854, the assignor shall not be a witness on behalf of the plaintiff." This section cannot be extended to nonenumerated causes of action, and has no application whatever to the present case, for the obvious reason that a promissory note is neither an account, nor an unliquidated demand, nor a thing in action not arising out of contract. The competency of an indorser or assignor of a promissory note as a witness on behalf of the plaintiff in an action brought thereon is wholly unaffected by the foregoing section.

The objection to their competency upon the ground of interest is equally untenable. An indorser of a promissory note is a competent witness for either party in an action against the maker. (Bryant v. Watriss et al., 13 Cal. 85; Smith v. Richmond, 19 Cal. 476.) Had they been incompetent on the ground of interest, their incompetency was removed by the release executed by the plaintiff; but no release was necessary.

The other errors assigned, if such, may not arise upon another trial, and we deem it unnecessary to pass upon them.

The judgment must be reversed and a new trial ordered.

ORION BROWN v. WILLIAM P. SCOTT.

DENIAL OF ALLEGATIONS OF SWORN COMPLAINT.—If the allegations of a verified complaint are presumptively within the knowledge of the defendant, a denial of the same in the answer, according to his best knowledge, information, and belief, is evasive of the issue tendered.

SAME.—Where a material fact stated in a verified complaint is denied upon information and belief, the answer should state how it happened that the defendant is without knowledge as to the fact averred.

ASSIGNMENT OF JUDGMENT.—The assignment of a judgment which is void because the amount for which it was rendered was beyond the jurisdiction of the Court, carries with it the debt on which it was obtained.

PURCHASER OF VOID JUDGMENT.—One who purchases a void judgment, and contracts with the assignor to pay him therefor, and afterwards uses the judgment in payment for property of the defendant, sold under executions issued on this and other judgments, cannot, when sued on his contract for the purchase money, avoid his liability on the ground that the judgment was void and of no value to him.

APPEAL from the District Court, Eleventh Judicial District, El Dorado County.

The three judgments, the assignment of which formed the consideration mentioned in the contract upon which this suit was brought, were rendered on the 30th day of January, 1854.

When this case was called for trial in the Court below, plaintiff moved the Court for judgment in conformity with the prayer of the complaint. The Court sustained the motion and gave judgment accordingly.

Defendant appealed.

The other facts are stated in the opinion of the Court.

Winans & Hyer, for Appellant.

If the answer in this case were what respondent alleges it to be, irrelevant, immaterial, and a sham, the action of the Court below in rendering the judgment was irregular. The proper course in such a case would be to move the Court, on such terms of notice as its rules prescribe, to strike out the answer for these causes and then to ask for judgment for want of an answer.

The Practice Act, section fifty, contemplates this course of action.

Respondent contends that there is a portion of the complaint that is not specifically denied by the answer.

The substance of this portion of the complaint is, that these judgments were used by the defendant in bidding at a sale, and this amount was credited by Sheriff to the defendant.

The answer alleges that the only sale by the Sheriff of which he became a purchaser was made under other and different judgments, and that there were no executions issued to the Sheriff upon the plaintiff's judgments.

This portion of the complaint requires no further denial than such as the defendant has given.

The second point made by respondent is, that the defendant has denied the allegation of the assignment of the judgments by plaintiff to him, "according to information and belief," asserting that the matter must have been within his own knowledge, or, if not, he could have found it out from examining the records; and if he had examined the records, would not its disclosures have been "information" such as that to which the defendant has sworn? Wherever he derived his knowledge, or however, that knowledge is his "information;" and if he believes it, it is also his "belief;" which is all the statute requires.

Objection is again made by respondent to the sufficiency of denials in the answer, because made upon information and belief.

The remarks heretofore made are as conclusive upon this point as the one which preceded it. But we will dwell a little on the matter. The question is, whether in a verified pleading the Court will hold an answer frivolous, or sham, because the defendant denies certain allegations on information and belief which the Court presumes to be within the personal knowledge of the defendant. In view of the plain provision of the forty-sixth section of the Practice Act, the statement of the question furnishes the answer. The section referred to says, that the special denial of a material allegation, under oath, according to information and belief, is that which "an answer shall contain," and consequently, is a good sufficient pleading.

The respondent proposes, that though the terms of the statute are complied with, there are cases in which such compliance is not sufficient, but that the party answering must assert facts as true within his own knowledge to make his answer sufficient. In other words, that pleading is not to be regulated by the statute, but by some one else.

Without this provision of the statute authorizing a party to deny allegations upon information and belief, the insertion of such words would have rendered the pleading redundant, and would have been stricken out upon motion.

Allegations and denials, before the statute, were required to be made positively. But the allegation of a fact positively, in pleading, never of itself indicated that the party was personally cognizant of it.

There was the same reason for informing that he stated it on information, that there was for supposing that it was stated upon personal knowledge. (7 How. P. R. 221.)

The effect of the statute, then, was and is intended to give to denials thus qualified the same degree of positiveness as if the fact was asserted without any limitation or condition.

Before the statute, the fact must have been asserted to exist with absolute certainty; now, its existence or denial may be put in issue where the pleader alleges it upon his information and belief.

S. W. Sanderson, for Respondent.

It is claimed that the Court below erred in giving judgment on the pleadings.

This claim is well founded if the answer contains a fair and direct denial of any of the material allegations of the complaint, and not otherwise, because it is not pretended that the answer contains new matter constituting a defense.

The execution and delivery of the contract is expressly admitted in the answer, and the terms of the contract are not disputed.

But the answer proceeds to claim that the contract was without consideration, and null and void, because the judgments assigned by plaintiff to defendant were not legal and valid.

This portion of the answer is sham and frivolous. It only states conclusions of law, whereas it ought to state the fact.

The complaint avers that "said judgments were used by defendant in bidding upon said canals at the Sheriff's sale, and the full amount thereof was credited to him by said Sheriff as so much money, and thereby he received and used the full amount of said judgments to his own benefit in the purchase of said canals, etc."

This allegation is nowhere denied or attempted to be denied in the answer. Whether, therefore, the judgments were void or not, cannot be material, since the defendant received the full amount for which they called; and it does not lay in the mouth of the defendant to say the judgments were void, they having been paid and satisfied by the sale of the property of the persons against whom they stood, and he having received their full value.

The answer next attempts to deny that the judgments were ever assigned to him. This denial is made upon "information and belief." We say first, that the defendant was bound to know the fact, and a denial upon information or belief is therefore insufficient.

The denial must be positive, because the fact must have been within his own knowledge, or if it had escaped his memory, the fact could have been readily ascertained by a brief examination of the records, and the answer does not pretend to have any such examination.

The answer next denies, according to information and belief, that the canals, etc., were sold under executions issued upon the judgments in question, but that the same were sold under an execution in favor of L. S. Sims. This denial is subject to the same objections as the preceding. It is predicated upon information and belief, whereas it should have been positive, because the records in the clerk's office, if they had been examined, would have shown exactly how the sale was made, and under what process. But the issue attempted to be made is a side issue, and wholly immaterial. The denial is no answer to the main question — "Did you receive the amount of said judgments?"

There were several judgments against Jones, Turman &
VOL. XXV.—12

Brown v. Scott.

Co., and it was wholly immaterial under which the sale was made, because they were all held by the defendant Scott who bid the amount of all and received a full credit for all on his bid.

The answer next denies upon information and belief that there were any executions on the judgments in question in the hands of the officer who made the sale.

This is another side and immaterial issue. It is not responsive to the main question: "Did you bid these judgments, and did you receive the amount of them as a credit upon your bid?"

There was no application to amend the answer in the Court below. Defendants stood upon their answer then, and must do it here.

By the Court, CURREY, J.

This action was brought to recover a sum of money alleged to be due on a contract executed by the defendant, by which he agreed to pay to the plaintiff one thousand four hundred and forty-four dollars and sixty-six cents, with interest thereon from the 1st of January, 1854, until the same should be paid, at the rate of three per cent per month, upon conditions mentioned and referred to in such contract. The complaint counts upon this contract, and avers in positive terms the happening of circumstances by which the debt became due, and that the defendant refused to perform his contract. The consideration for the contract of the defendant, which is alleged in the complaint, was the assignment of three judgments belonging to the plaintiff, which he had obtained in a Justice's Court, amounting in the aggregate to the sum of one thousand four hundred and forty-four dollars and sixty-six cents, and which the defendant used in the purchase of property of the debtors against whom such judgments were obtained at a sale thereof, made under and by virtue of divers judgments and executions. Each of the judgments so assigned by the plaintiff exceeded two hundred dollars.

To the complaint, which was duly verified, the defendant filed an answer, in which he says that after stating to counsel learned in the law all the facts attending the making of the contract, he is informed by counsel, and verily believes, and so charges the truth to be, that the promise in the contract contained to pay the plaintiff the sum of money named therein, or any part of it, was wholly without consideration and null and void, and that therefore he was not liable on his promise; and then in the same connection he alleges that the judgments, the assignment of which to the defendant is mentioned in the contract as the consideration for defendant's promise, were entirely null and void; and further on in the answer the defendant denies, "according to his best knowledge, information and belief," that said judgments, or either of them, were ever transferred or assigned by the plaintiff to the defendant or to any other person for his use.

This mode of denial is argumentative. In the first place the defendant avers, upon information derived from his counsel, and upon his belief founded on that information, that his promise, contained in the contract, was without consideration; and the reason assigned for this is that the three judgments, the transfer of which to the defendant is set forth in the contract as the consideration for the defendant's promise, were null and void; and then it is denied, according to the defendant's best knowledge, information and belief, that said judgments—that is, the judgments which the defendant had been advised were null and void, and which, because they were so, were no judgments—had been assigned to him or to his use. This will not do. A denial of this sort is evasive of the issue tendered, and must be treated as failing to traverse the allegation of the complaint.

The defendant also denies, according to the best of his knowledge, information and belief, that the property of the judgment debtors referred to in the contract and in the complaint was sold at Sheriff's sale on executions issued on said three judgments, but avers that the same was sold under an execution issued on another judgment.

Brown v. Scott.

The plaintiff alleged in his complaint that the Sheriff's sale mentioned was made on executions issued upon these three judgments, as well as on executions issued upon other judgments, and that at such sale the defendant became the purchaser of the property sold, and used the said three judgments so assigned to him in payment of the amount by him bid. The defendant ought to have known, and will be held to have known, whether he purchased under executions issued on these judgments or otherwise, and whether or not he used the same judgments in paying the amount bid by him. The law does not sanction this mode of pleading. The defendant should have admitted or denied the facts alleged by the plaintiff, or should have shown how it happened that he was without knowledge as to such facts. (Fales v. Hicks, 12 How. Pr. R. 154; Richardson v. Wilton, 4 Sand. 708; Hance v. Rumming, 2 E. D. Smith, 48; Mott v. Burnett, Id. 50; Shearman v. New York Central Mills, 1 Abbott, 187.) To the same effect is the case of Curtis v. Richards, 9 Cal. 37, and San Francisco Gas Co. v. City of San Francisco, Id. 453. It matters not that the judgments assigned were invalid as judgments, within the authority of Zander v. Coe, 5 Cal. 230, because by the assignment thereof the debts for which they were obtained were assigned to the defendant; besides this he used these judgments in paying the amount due on his bid, in which the debtors whose property was sold were concerned; and it does not appear but they were satisfied to receive these judgments or the debts represented by them in payment on the amount due from the defendant on his purchase. It is to be presumed they were satisfied with this mode of payment, for it is alleged in the complaint that the judgments were used by the defendant in paying the sum at which he purchased the property. He certainly is not in a position to object that these judgments were of no value to him, when, as a fact, they were received in payment of a sum due from him on his purchase, equal to the amount they represented.

The answer fails to put in issue or to confess and avoid the material allegations of the complaint; and therefore there was no issue to be tried by a jury. The complaint in such cases is to be taken as true. (Practice Act, section 65.)

We think the plaintiff was entitled to the judgment which was rendered on the pleadings.

Judgment affirmed.

Mr. Chief Justice SANDERSON, having been of counsel, did not sit on the trial of this case.

BENJAMIN CAHOON v. SYLVESTER MARSHALL, GEO. W. STEWART, AND CHAUNCEY STEWART.

POSSESSION OF PERSONAL PROPERTY.—An actual change of the possession of personal property, as distinguished from that which by mere intendment of law follows the transfer of title, is an open visible change, manifested by such outward signs as render it evident that the possession of the vendor has wholly ceased.

INSTRUCTIONS TO A JURY.—The jury are the exclusive judges of the facts, and it is erroneous for the Court to assume, in its instructions to the jury, that a certain fact exists, and then submit to them the question whether or not it does exist.

POSSESSION OF LAND.—The possession of real property is of two kinds: the one constructive, depending upon the title and the right to the actual possession, and the other subsisting in the actual occupation.

DELIVERY OF PERSONAL PROPERTY.—Where one purchases land and receives a conveyance therefor, and at the same time buys personal property on the land, the question whether the vendee had actual possession of the land is an important one in determining whether there was an actual delivery of possession of the personal property.

APPEAL from the District Court, Sixth Judicial District, Sacramento County.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the Court.

Harrison & Estee, for Appellants.

We will call the attention of the Court to the first instruction excepted to: "Being in possession of the real estate, that he was also in possession of the personal property."

"Being in possession of the real estate" was an absolute assertion on the part of the Court that Cahoon had such possession, and left nothing to the jury. For the proposition that having exclusive possession of the ranch, carried with it possession of the personal property located on it, is purely a question of law, and not of fact, and the jury have nothing to do with it.

Robert Robinson, for Respondent.

Take the charge together, it is entirely proper. The first exception of defendants, commencing "Being in possession," etc., is only part of a proposition, if he was so in possession, then such would be the result; and there is no doubt of the correctness of the proposition. The law is, that possession of the land does carry with it the possession of personal property. (Montgomery et al. v. Hunt, 6 Cal. 366.)

By the Court, CURREY, J.

The plaintiff, who was a creditor of the firm of Miller & Miller in the sum of about seven thousand and six hundred dollars, purchased of them on the 7th of August, 1861, two parcels of real property, one of which was in the City of Sacramento, and the other (a farm) was about eight miles therefrom. The price at which he so purchased was six thousand dollars, and the payment was made by a credit of the Millers with that sum on their debt. A deed of conveyance was executed by them to the plaintiff and duly recorded on that day. To satisfy the balance still due, the Millers on the same day sold to plaintiff certain personal property which was upon the farm and delivered the same to him. The plaintiff at the time employed one Minott, who was then in the service of the Millers on the farm, to take the charge and care of this personal property for him. Minott accepted the employment and remained in charge of the property until it was taken from him by the defendants; and one of the Millers also remained upon the farm, though it does not distinctly appear that he was there to the plaintiff's knowledge or by his consent.

Three days after these sales were made, George W. Stewart and Chauncey Stewart, who were also creditors of the Millers, commenced actions against them in the District Court for the recovery of the sums of money due the Stewarts, and sued out writs of attachment, by virtue of which the defendant Marshall, who was the Sheriff of the County of Sacramento, attached the personal property sold to the plaintiff. The Stewarts afterward obtained judgments, upon which executions were issued and by virtue thereof the same property was sold by the Sheriff. Immediately after the execution of the attachments, the plaintiff gave the defendants notice of his purchase of and claim to the property. For the taking away and disposing of this personal property the plaintiff brought this action.

The defense interposed was that the sale was made to hinder, delay and defraud the creditors of the Millers, and also that such sale was not accompanied by an immediate delivery of the property sold, nor followed by an actual and continued change of the possession thereof from the vendors to the vendee.

At the trial of the issues joined much evidence was introduced and submitted to the jury respecting the bona fides of the sale, and also touching the delivery and actual and continued change of possession. The case was submitted, under instructions of the Court, to the jury, who rendered a verdict for fifteen hundred dollars in favor of the plaintiff against the defendants, on which judgment was entered.

The defendants having appealed from the judgment and an order denying their motion for a new trial, have presented a bill of exceptions to portions of the charge of the Court, and now insist that the judgment ought to be reversed for the causes arising upon their bill of exceptions.

At the request of the defendant's counsel the Court instructed the jury that, "To make a sale valid the delivery must be made of the property sold; the vendee must take the actual possession; that possession must be open and unequivocal, carrying with it the usual marks and indications of ownership by the vendee. It must be such as to give evidence to the world of the claim of the new owner; he must, in other words, be in the usual relation to the property which owners of goods occupy to their property. This possession must be continuous; not taken to be surrendered back again; not formal, but substantial." In connection with this instruction the Court, in substance, charged the jury that there was no dispute about the validity of the sale and conveyance of the real property, and that thereby the right to its immediate possession passed from the vendors to the purchaser; that the property in dispute was at the time it was seized under the attachments, upon the farm which had been recently sold by the Millers to the plaintiff, and that plaintiff, being the owner of the real estate, and having purchased the personal property described, the question of fact for the jury to determine was, whether the plaintiff was so in possession of the personal property as to give notice to the world that (assuming he was in possession of the real estate) he was also in possession of the personal property. This is the obvious import of the instruction.

The defendants' counsel excepted to so much of the instruction as is in this language: "Being in possession of the real estate, he was also in possession of the personal property." To understand the point it is necessary to look to what preceded the words particularized by the exception; and when the whole instruction is considered, it appears to have been left to the jury to decide, after assuming it as a fact that the plaintiff was the owner and in the possession of the farm, whether or not he was, at the time the property was attached, in its possession.

There are two kinds of possession of real property — the one constructive, the other actual — the one depending upon the title and the present right to the actual possession, and the other subsisting in the actual occupation or the possessio pedis. The question as to the plaintiff's actual possession of the farm, was a point involved in the trial before the jury, so far as the possession of the personal property in controversy was made to depend upon the possession of the farm.

The fifteenth section of the Statute of Frauds declares that every sale made by the vendor of goods and chattels in his possession or under his control, unless the same be accompanied by an immediate delivery and be followed by an actual and continued change of possession of the things sold, shall be conclusive evidence of fraud as against the creditors of the vendor. (Wood's Dig. 107.) A sale which is not followed by the change of the possession of the property sold which the statute has prescribed is, as to the creditors of the vendor, to be deemed fraudulent and void, and the want of such change of possession when established admits of no excuse nor explanation. The wisdom of this law commends it to the favorable consideration of Courts of justice, and reasons of public policy demand its faithful execution.

What constitutes an actual change of the possession of personal property, as distinguished from that which by mere intendment of law follows the transfer of title, is not of difficult solution. It is an open, visible change, manifested by such outward signs as render it evident that the possession of the vendor has wholly ceased. (Randall v. Parker, 3 Sand. 73.) Then if the possession of the property by the vendors, in the case under consideration, had not wholly ceased when it was attached, it was liable to the attachments, notwithstanding, as between the vendors and vendee, the sale was complete and the title to the property had become vested in the plaintiff as the purchaser.

The possession by the plaintiff of the farm upon which the personal property was when it was purchased by him, provided it was an actual and exclusive possession, would be strong evidence of the like possession of such personal property; but so long as the vendors, or either of them, remained upon the farm, if with the plaintiff's knowledge or consent, the Court could not properly exclude from the jury the determination of the question as to whether the vendors or vendee was in the actual possession of the farm, or whether the possession was not jointly held by them. If the actual and exclusive possession of the farm by the plaintiff would be strong evidence of his like possession of the personal property, then the possession of the farm by the vendors, or the concurrent possession of it by the vendors and vendee, would at least tend very strongly to show that the plaintiff had not that actual possession of the personal property necessary to place it beyond the reach of the creditors of the vendors. Hence it was erroneous for the Court to assume and thereby decide the fact to be that the plaintiff was in the possession of the farm when the personal property thereon was attached.

The other objections assigned by the appellants we deem untenable when the instructions given to the jury at the request of the plaintiff are considered in connection with the qualifying instructions of the Court.

As the case must be remanded for a new trial, it is proper to express our opinion in reference to proving the declarations of the vendors concerning the transaction after the sale was made and the property delivered so as to pass it to the purchaser. This species of evidence is, as a general rule, inadmissible, and is never to be received unless it appears that the vendors' declarations were made while in possession of the property, with the knowledge or consent, express or implied, of the vendee, in which case their declarations made while in possession of the property attached might be considered as of the res gestæ.

The judgment is reversed and the cause remanded for a new trial.

JAMES LICK v. JEROME MADDEN.

WRITS OF ATTACHMENT.—It is the duty of the Clerks of the District Courts to issue and deliver to the parties respectively, or to their attorneys, writs of attachment in the order in which the preliminary papers are presented to them, and the writs demanded.

PREPAYMENT OF CLERK'S FEES.—When the preliminary papers to authorize a writ of attachment have been presented to the Clerk, and the writ has been demanded, it is his duty to make out and deliver to the plaintiff, with reasonable diligence, the writ applied for, without prepayment of his fees, or a tender of the same, provided the Clerk fails to call for prepayment.

Lick v. Madden.

PREPAYMENT OF OFFICER'S FEES.—The statute which declares that "any officer may refuse to perform any services in a civil action or proceeding, until the fee for such service is paid," is not to be construed as prohibiting the officer from performing the service without prepayment of fees, but as permissive merely; leaving the alternatives of cash in advance or credit to his own election.

SAME.—If, when services are demanded of an officer in a civil case, he fails to demand his fees in advance, his obligation to perform the duty required is the same as it would be if the fees were prepaid or tendered in advance.

APPEAL from the District Court, Sixth Judicial District, Sacramento County.

The Court below sustained the demurrer to the complaint, plaintiff declined to amend, judgment was rendered for defendant, and plaintiff appealed.

The other facts are stated in the opinion of the Court.

William S. Wood, and Winans & Hyer, for Appellant.

Under sections one hundred and twenty and one hundred and twenty-one of the Practice Act, the plaintiff is entitled to the immediate issuance of a writ of attachment on complying with the requirements of the law in this particular, and the Clerk is required to issue the writ immediately, and by omitting so to do the law renders him liable for all damage sustained by his omission, whether it was caused by negligence or fraud on his part. The statute is clear, providing that upon the compliance by the plaintiffs with its requirements the writ shall issue. The Act authorizing writs of attachment was passed for the purpose of enabling the vigilant and active creditor to obtain the advantage due to his vigilance and activity.

The second point raised by the demurrer is thus stated: If a Clerk is required to issue attachments in the order in which they are demanded, must his fees be tendered at the time the demand is made?

Is a tender of the fees necessary? We most earnestly contend that it is not. From what source originated the idea that it is, we are wholly unable to determine. It surely is not made so by statute. That of 1857 was in force at the time of acts complained of by plaintiff, and it is therein provided that such fees are allowed to the officers therein named, for their services rendered in discharging the duties imposed by law, as therein authorized, and such officers "may lawfully charge, demand and receive the same." (Parker and Wife v. McGaha, 13 Ala. 344; McRae v. Inzan, 4 Ala. 286; Rutherford v. Jones, 12 Geo. 618.)

E. B. Crocker, for Respondent.

The law does not make it obligatory upon the Clerk to issue writs in the order in which the actions are commenced.

The sections of the statute referred to by appellant in his brief, do not touch the point. To be sure, the Clerk is liable for every "wrongful act or omission" on his part, but the very point here is — Was he guilty of any wrongful act?

Suppose A. commences his action against C., and applies for an attachment, with a complaint which takes half a day to copy. The Clerk does his duty by immediately handing his papers to a deputy to prepare the proper copy and writs, with orders to deliver the writs as soon as the proper papers are completed. Suppose, the next minute, B. commences his action against C., with a short complaint which takes only a few minutes to copy, or with the proper copy already made out, and only requiring the signature of the Clerk to be issued, as many accurate lawyers do; the Clerk hands the papers to a deputy without delay, and they are immediately ready to be issued, and that, too, before A.'s papers are ready. Now, is there any law or reason why B. should wait half a day until A.'s papers are prepared? If the Legislature had intended that such should be the rule, they would undoubtedly have provided for it by statute. As they have laid down such a rule for the County Recorder, and have omitted it in the case of the County Clerk, it shows that it was intentionally omitted as to the latter.

Before the Clerk can be put in default, it must be averred that his legal fees were tendered him for his services required, and there being no such averment, the complaint is fatally defective.

Lick v. Madden.

"Any officer may refuse to perform any services in a civil action or proceeding until the fee for such service is paid by the party requiring the service." (Wood's Dig. 448, sec. 40.)

The Clerk is only bound to furnish copies, or writs, or papers in his office, upon the tender of his legal fees. (Edmondson v. Mason, 16 Cal. 388; People v. Harris, 9 Cal. 571.)

By the Court, SHAFER, J.

This is an appeal from a judgment rendered by the District Court on a demurrer to the complaint.

The complaint shows that the defendant Madden was County Clerk of Sacramento County, and acting as such on the 10th day of January, 1861; that on that day the plaintiff commenced suit in the District Court of the Sixth Judicial District in and for the City and County of Sacramento, of which Madden was Clerk, against C. Ihmels, G. Reinecke and C. Stockfleth, to recover the sum of one thousand six hundred and twenty-eight dollars. The complaint as amended then continues: "And thereupon he duly prepared, executed and filed in the office of the Clerk of this Court, to wit: of the said defendant Madden, County Clerk as aforesaid, the necessary and proper affidavit and undertaking prescribed by the statute in such case made and provided, to authorize the issuance of an attachment, and likewise delivered the same to said Clerk, to wit: the said defendant Madden; and further, duly and fully complied with all the requirements of law and of the statute in such case made and provided, which entitled him to require from the said Clerk the immediate issuance of a writ of attachment by said defendant Madden, as Clerk aforesaid, in said suit, for said amount of one thousand six hundred and twenty-eight dollars, against the property of said Ihmels et al., directed," etc. And that he did then and there demand the immediate issuance of such attachment.

The complaint further avers, "that said defendant, notwithstanding the facts aforesaid, did wrongfully and unlawfully issue unto Eggers & Co. a writ of attachment against the property of said Ihmels et al., in a suit began by them subsequently to the beginning of plaintiff's action and the filing of his affidavit and undertaking, and after his demand for an attachment as above stated. That by reason thereof plaintiff was delayed in delivering his writ of attachment to the Sheriff, and said Eggers & Co. obtained priority over him, and that sufficient was realized from the property of Ihmels, at that time already attached, to have satisfied plaintiff's claim, but that he never received anything on account thereof except about two hundred and eighty-seven dollars."

Two questions arise upon this record: First — Is a Clerk required to issue attachments in the order in which the preliminary papers are presented and the writs demanded? Second — If he is, then can the demand be considered as having been made, and can the Clerk be compelled to deliver such writ of attachment, until the fees have been tendered therefor, though the Clerk fails to call for prepayment?

1. Is a Clerk required to issue attachments in the order in which the preliminary papers are presented, and the writs demanded?

Section nine of the statute defining the duties of County Clerks (Wood's Dig. 88) provides "that for any wrongful act, or any omission to perform any duties imposed upon him by law, the Clerk shall be liable on his bond to any person injured."

The one hundred and twenty-first section of the Practice Act provides that "the Clerk shall issue the writ of attachment upon receiving an affidavit by or on behalf of the plaintiff, which shall be filed," showing certain facts thereafter stated in the section.

As we construe this section, it requires the Clerk, after the proper papers have been presented, to proceed with reasonable diligence to make out and deliver to the plaintiff the process applied for. The section does not regulate the time within which the writ must be made out, as between the

Lick v. Madden.

Clerk and the first applicant merely, but as between himself and all applicants; and the rule of reasonable time established by the section enures to the benefit of one applicant as much as to the benefit of another.

But the gravamen of this action is not that the defendant violated the rule of official duty, established by this section, by nonfeasance—that is, by simple neglect to make out the process applied for in reasonable time. The complaint, on the other hand, makes, or undertakes to make, a case of official malfeasance—the wrongful act consisting in the defendant's issuing an attachment to Eggers & Co., under the circumstances which the complaint details, and in derogation of the plaintiff's better right.

This action was brought upon the theory that the Clerk is bound to issue attachments in a certain order—that is to say, in the order in which they are applied for. Into this theory reasonable diligence does not enter as a condition; and as section one hundred and twenty-one of the Practice Act is confined to reasonable diligence as a topic, then if the order claimed by the plaintiff exists as a rule of law, it must exist independent of that section regarded as an isolated provision.

In determining, however, whether the rule contended for by plaintiff is established in this State by statute regulation, all the legislation bearing upon the question should be considered, and particularly the whole of that portion of the Practice Act which bears upon attachments as a subject matter.

The portion of the Practice Act referred to contains twenty-one sections; they are all in pari materia, and are to be construed together in order to ascertain the intention of the Legislature on the point in controversy. It is apparent, in the first place, that the Legislature intended that the creditor upon whose process any property, whether real or personal, was first attached, should thereby acquire the right, as against all subsequent attachments, to insist that the avails of the property should be appropriated to the satisfaction of his judgment in the first instance. This is the result that the Legislature had in mind; and the priority thus conceded and secured to the first attachment, proceeds upon the policy that the laws should subserve those who subserve themselves.

Assuming that we have not mistaken the end to which the legislation upon the subject of attachments is directed, the sections referred to are to be so construed, that the legislative purpose may be accomplished.

If Clerks are not subject to the rule insisted upon by the plaintiff, then they are restrained by no rule; and if unrestrained, then they are left free to issue attachments as their caprice, favoritism or interested views may dictate. The purpose of the Legislature was that the first should be first, and that the last should be last; but under the view presented for the respondent, a mere ministerial officer, in a most responsible, but still subordinate position, could at his pleasure defeat the legislative design and still be held to have done no wrong. The cases in which Legislatures have ordained particular ends, and appointed and salaried ministerial agents to secure them, and have at the same time exempted those agents by intention from all liability both criminal and civil on account of studied and successful efforts to defeat those ends, must have been of very rare occurrence. If such an instance should occur in fact, a well understood rule of construction would forbid the Courts from recognizing the felo de se, unless, indeed, its existence should be established to the highest degree of moral certainty.

But there is another consideration connected with the question with which we are dealing.

When attachments have been issued they are delivered to the Sheriff. Is he bound to serve the writs in the order in which they come to his hands, or has he the right to shuffle and serve them as he may choose? On the reasoning of the respondent the immunities of the Sheriff in the matter of serving the writs must be co-extensive with those of the Clerk in the matter of issuing them, for no particular order of service is directed by any positive provision.

We close the discussion of the case, in so far as it relates to this question of construction, by remarking, that though the respondent is right in saying that there is nothing in the statutes which denies to him, in terms, the irresponsible power which he claims, still it is equally true that no statute provision expressly confers the power upon him. The thing, then, stands upon implication, and we must imply that which will uphold, rather than that which must defeat the principal purpose of the Act.

Should it be assumed, however, that the order in which attachments are to issue is not established in this State by statute regulation, the question, before being finally disposed of, should be examined in the light of the common law.

It may be admitted that the office of County Clerk as it exists in California is a statute creation, but it would not follow that any incumbent of that office held it free of the maxims and pervasive analogies of the common law. The incumbent of the office stands in a public relation, and that relation, how new soever in the circumstance, is not new to the common law in its principle. The defendant as a public officer was bound, amongst other things, to respect the preemptive right which the plaintiff had acquired to the people's process as against Eggers & Co. and all others, under the common law maxim, "qui prior est in tempore potior est in jure." All the facts of the plaintiff's prior right were fully known to the Clerk, and he could have had no right to do a wrong by defeating it. It was on these common law views that the cases reported in 1 Bibb, 311, 6 B. Mon. 415, 7 B. Mon. 544, and 2 J. J. Mar. 422, were decided. Under this aspect of the matter, the duty of County Clerks to attend to attaching creditors in the order in which their applications for process are presented, is in no sense a mere regulation of office, but a legal obligation, binding alike upon all men, whether in public or private stations, to refrain from violating the rights of others, and when specifically charged with the duty, then to aid actively in promoting and fulfilling them. And that duty they may very well be called upon to perform without legislative suggestion, when, as here, it lies embedded in the ethics of the common law.

Lick v. Madden.

It is suggested, on behalf of the respondent, that if applicants for attachments are to be served in the order of their applications, then, if the complaint of the first applicants should happen to be of great length, subsequent applicants would be delayed, and perhaps to their serious detriment.

The answers to this objection are multiplied and apparent.

First — The objection is, that the rule is not absolutely faultless; but there is no rule of man's making that is.

Second — A long complaint in an attachment suit must be of very rare occurrence, and under the Practice Act, as it now stands, it is not altogether certain that a copy of the complaint should go with the summons, in order that the attachment may be valid.

Third — The objection is founded upon considerations of convenience, and they are of but little argumentative weight, except in the last resort. However, were long complaints in attachment suits of much more frequent occurrence than they are, or are likely to be, the mind can readily reconcile itself to all the inconveniences resulting therefrom, in view of the general unsteadiness of movement in the workings of the rule for which the respondent contends — steady, as it would be, in nothing, except in its tendency to corruption.

2. Assuming, then, the rule claimed by the appellant, is the Clerk under obligation to make out and deliver the writ to the first of two successive appellants, in a case where the Clerk is silent upon the subject of the prepayment of fees, and no tender of fees is made?

The only statute provision to which we have been referred having any bearing upon the question is as follows: "Any officer may refuse to perform any services in a civil action or proceeding until the fee for such service is paid by the party requiring the service." (Wood's Digest, 446, sec. 40.)

In the understanding of the respondent the filing of the preliminary papers, coupled with a request that a writ of attachment may issue, imposes no obligation upon the Clerk, unless the request is accompanied with a present tender of fees — while in the understanding of the appellant, the obligation of the Clerk is perfect without a tender, if prepayment is not demanded.

The controlling words are "may refuse." The intention was not to prohibit the Clerk, in a matter of mere personal concern, from rendering official aid on credit. The word "may," in the connection in which it stands, is not to be construed as mandatory to the Clerk, but permissive, leaving the alternatives of cash or credit to his own election. Again, the word "refuse" is used in contradistinction to silence, or mere omission, or neglect. The distinction is one lying between action on the one hand and non-action on the other. If the Clerk, in view of the alternatives presented to him, makes up his mind to stand upon prepayment, the mental state is not in itself a refusal of credit. The conclusion of the mind antecedates the refusal, and leads to it; but it is neither identical with it nor is it any part of it. It is only in the event of an announced refusal of credit that the applicant, under the adjustments of the section, is required to tender. To hold that the silence of the Clerk is an equivalent antecedent to the duty to tender, would be to interpolate into the section a new and substantive provision. The section, in short, confers upon the Clerk a personal privilege, which he may claim or waive, as he chooses. If he claims it he should announce it; and if he does not so announce he must be understood to have waived it. The statute nowhere provides that the Clerk shall not be obliged to move until his fees, whether asked for or not, have been tendered. Doubtless, under a provision like that, the role of the Clerk would be a passive one altogether. But under the law as it stands, after application for process has been made in due form, something is to be done before any exhibition of money is contemplated. The character of the initial act is clearly defined, and the function of performing it is as clearly devolved upon the Clerk.

The case of People v. Harris, 9 Cal. 571, turned upon the six hundred and twenty-seventh section of the Practice Act. By the very terms of that section, the duty of the Justice to transmit a certified copy of his docket, etc., to the County Aitken et al. v. Mendenhall.

Court, in cases of appeal, does not attach, except upon payment of his fees. This section is expressed in language differing widely from that used in the section we have been considering.

The case of Edmondson v. Mason, 16 Cal. 386, cited by the respondent, has no appreciable bearing upon the point in controversy.

The judgment is reversed and the cause remanded, with leave to the defendant to answer in ten days after notice of filing remittitur.

B. AITKEN AND J. PRESCOTT v. E. T. MENDENHALL

CROSS-EXAMINATION OF WITNESS.—A witness on cross-examination can only be interrogated in regard to such matters as he testified about on his examination in chief, if objection is made on that ground.

DAMAGES.—If plaintiff in his complaint claims more damages than he is entitled to, this will form no ground for reversing the judgment. If, on the trial, plaintiff offers testimony to prove damages he is not entitled to, and defendant objects to its introduction, and there is a ruling against him, the question can be reviewed on appeal.

APPEAL from the District Court, Eleventh Judicial District, Placer County.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the Court.

Chas. A. Tuttle, for Appellant.

Jo Hamilton, for Respondents.

By the Court, SHAFER, J.

The complaint alleges that the defendant was the owner of a sawmill, and that on the 16th of January, 1861, he leased it to the plaintiffs for one year, on terms, that he, the defendant, would keep the mill constantly supplied with logs, to be sawed by the plaintiffs for the defendant at the rate of four dollars and fifty cents per thousand feet. It is further alleged that the plaintiffs "were to run the mill one year, with the refusal on their part of running it two years on the same terms; that is to say until the 16th of January, 1863." There are other provisions in the contract, as set forth, but it is unnecessary to notice them for the purposes of this appeal. The breach assigned is, "that since the month of November, 1861, the defendant has wholly failed to furnish any logs at all to said mill, so that plaintiffs were compelled to be idle and dismiss the hands in their employ."

Trial by jury — verdict and judgment for plaintiffs.

The appeal is from the judgment and from the order denying defendant's motion for a new trial.

It appears from the statement, that the plaintiffs in the course of the trial called on one Hawkins as a witness, and from the record of his testimony, given in chief, it appears to have been confined to points in the plaintiff's case, distinct from the breach complained of.

The counsel of the defendant, in the course of his cross-examination, proposed to prove by the witness that during the summer and fall of 1861, "plaintiffs went away and left the mill idle, when there was a plenty of logs." The plaintiffs objected to the introduction of this testimony; the objection was sustained, and the defendant excepted.

The ruling of the Court was correct. The witness not having testified in chief upon the subject of the alleged breach, the defendant had, in strictness, no right to interrogate the witness upon that subject at that time. (Thornburg v. Hand, 7 Cal. 561; Jackson v. F. R. and G. Water Co., 14 Cal. 23.)

Objection is taken to the judgment for the reason "that the complaint claims damages for more than six months after the contract expired."

If the counsel of the appellant are right in their construction of the complaint, still the fact that the plaintiffs have claimed damages beyond the just measure of their right, would not in itself be a ground for reversing the judgment. If the plaintiffs at the trial offered testimony to prove damages which they had no right to claim, the defendant should have objected to its introduction, and in the event of an adverse ruling they could have brought the question here for review.

Judgment affirmed.

JARED IRWIN, ADMINISTRATOR, ETC. v. G. BACKUS, D. O. MILLS, L. B. HARRIS, J. H. GASS, AND R. C.
CLARK.

SURETIES ON AN ADMINISTRATOR'S BOND.—In an action against the sureties on an administrator's bond for a breach of the bond by the principal, the proceedings taken in the Probate Court in passing on an account rendered by the administrator, and a decree rendered therein directing the administrator to pay over a sum found remaining in his hands, are admissible in evidence against the sureties, although the sureties were not parties to the same.

SAME.—Such decree is equally conclusive upon the administrator and his sureties; and upon the refusal of the administrator to obey the same, the liability of the sureties attaches, and they cannot go behind the decree to inquire into the merits of the matter therein passed on.

WHAT SURETIES MAY SHOW IN DEFENSE.—The sureties may show in defense either that the bond was not made, or that the decree was not made, or that the same has been obeyed, or that the same was obtained by fraud or collusion.

SURETIES ON OFFICIAL BONDS.—As a general rule, sureties upon official bonds are not concluded by a decree or judgment against their principal, unless they have had their day in Court, or an opportunity to be heard in their defense; but administration bonds form an exception to this general rule.

APPEAL from the District Court, Sixth Judicial District, Sacramento County.

Backus, the principal in the bond, was not served with process.

The sureties appealed from the judgment.

The other facts are stated in the opinion of the Court.

J. W. Winans, for Appellants.

Administrators are not liable on their official bonds for an established debt of their intestate until they are fined with a devastavit. (Commonwealth v. Molty, 10 Penn. St. 527.)

In an action on an administering bond, the breach assigned being the failure of the administrator to account for assets of the estate and the conversion of them to his own use, where the plea was the statutory plea of the general issue; held, that "proof that the assets have come into the administrator's hands, does not make a prima facie case for the plaintiff." (The State v. Price, 17 Miss. 431; Commonwealth v. Evans, 1 Watts, 37; Myers v. Fritz, 4 Penn. St. 347; Williams v. Hinkle, 15 Ala. 713.)

Irwin v. Backus et al.

The order of the Probate Court is not admissible in evidence against the defendants and appellants in this case, who are the sureties of Backus.

It is not denied that, as against Backus, the principal, any order of the Probate Court, to the proceedings resulting, in which he was a party, would be admissible. But as this is a proceeding against the sureties, it comes directly within the rule of Pico v. Webster, 14 Cal. 202, that "In the case of official bonds the sureties undertake, in general terms, that the principal will perform his official duties, and a judgment against the officer in a suit to which they were not parties, is not evidence against them."

It is true, this Court alludes to the fact that a distinction has been taken as to administration bonds founded on the terms of the obligation, but it overrules that distinction by making its decision in Pico v. Webster general and unexceptional. Besides, that distinction in the leading case where it is taken, (Simkins v. Cobb, 2 Bailey, 60,) is founded on the principle that the letter of the surety bond made the administrator's accounting, or being required to account, an essential prerequisite to a suit on the bond, which is not the case in the bond here sued on.

So again it is held, in Williams v. Hinkle, 15 Ala. 713, that "in an action on the administration bond against the administrator and his sureties, suggesting a devastavit, a judgment against the administrator de bonis intestatoris, is not conclusive against the sureties, but it devolves on the plaintiff to show an actual devastavit in order to fix their liability."

Harrison & Estes, for Respondent.

A devastavit is defined to be "a mismanagement of the estate and effects of the deceased, in squandering, wasting, and misapplying the assets, contrary to the duty imposed on him, for which the executor or administrator shall answer out of his own pocket." (See 2 Williams on Executors, 1529; Bac. Ab. Executors, L. 1.)

By the Act of March 27, 1858, (Statutes 1858, p. 95,) it is provided that "the proceedings of the Courts of Probate within the jurisdiction conferred on them by the laws, shall be construed in the same manner and with like intendment as proceedings of Courts of general jurisdiction, and that the records, orders, judgments, and decrees of the said Probate Courts shall have accorded to them like force and effect and legal presumptions as the records, orders, judgments, and decrees of the District Courts." (See, also, Irwin v. Schriber, 18 Cal. 504.)

It is also provided in section two hundred and forty-five, (Estates of Deceased Persons, Wood's Digest,) "that decree shall be made for payment of creditors, and that the executor or administrator shall be personally liable to each creditor for his claim. That execution may issue and same proceedings be had under such execution as if it had been issued from the District Court; that the executor or administrator shall be liable on his bond to each creditor."

Sections two hundred and thirty-seven and two hundred and thirty-eight of the same Act provide further, "That settlement of accounts and allowances by the Courts shall be conclusive against all persons in any way interested in the estate, except those laboring under a legal disability. Their rights to proceed, either individually or upon his bond, after two years, shall cease, and in any action brought by any such person the allowance and settlement of the account shall be deemed presumptive evidence of its correctness, and that after proof of proper notice the decree shall be conclusive evidence of the fact."

And section two hundred and forty-nine of the Act referred to provides still further, "That if the administrator neglects to render his account, the same proceedings may be had as prescribed in this chapter in regard to the first account to be rendered by him, and all the provisions relative to the last mentioned account, and the notice and settlement thereof, shall apply to his account presented for final settlement."

Our proposition, then, is:

First—That the order and findings introduced in evidence in this cause is not only presumptive, but conclusive proof of the facts therein contained.

And this decree is as conclusive against the sureties on the administrator's official bond as against creditors, heirs, or any other parties in interest.

This proposition, however much it may "surprise" the attorneys of appellants, is sustained not only by the statutes of this State and decisions of this Court, but by nearly every reliable authority in the land.

In the case of Pico v. Webster, 14 Cal. 202, it is held: "A distinction is taken as to administrators' bonds founded upon the terms of the obligation, as used in South Carolina and other States; those being that the administrators should account—meaning account before the Probate Court—which was held equivalent to an obligation by the surety to pay such decree as that Court might render."

But the attorneys for appellants say "that such distinction" is overruled by making it general, "which certainly cannot be the case," for why refer to the "distinction" unless to create an exception to the rule the Court was then establishing.

There is a wide difference between the two classes of cases, where sureties bind themselves to the effect that their principal shall faithfully perform the duties of an office in general terms, and that class of cases where sureties bind themselves to the effect that their principal shall not only perform all the duties enjoined by law, as such Public Administrator, and particularly that he will account for and pay over all moneys that may come to his hands as such administrator. As authority on this proposition we refer to appellants' brief, page 18; Simkins v. Cobb, 2 Bailey, 60.

Now, the question arises, did the administrator "account for and pay over the money that came into his hands?" The Probate Court, the only tribunal which can try that question, decided that he had not accounted; "that money was in his hands," and that he had not administered according to law, and had not accounted for money in his hands, etc. An issue had been previously joined, due notice had been given, not to the heirs and creditors only, but to all parties interested in the estate. The sureties then, on that hearing, and under that notice, had their "day in Court," and could have then, in common with all the world, shown that the administrator had accounted and had paid over the amounts which came into his hands as such officer. And it was those acts, "more particularly," that they bound themselves that he should perform. When they signed his bond they said to the world: first—this officer shall faithfully perform all the duties enjoined on him by law; and second, and particularly, he shall account for and pay over all money and property that shall come into his hands—both of which Backus has failed to do. And what evidence have we of that fact? The highest evidence attainable; namely, the solemn judgment of a Court of record having jurisdiction of the subject matter. (See Part II, Cowen & Hill's Notes, p. 57; Bogardus v. Clark, 4 Paige, 623.) It was there held: "The decision of the Surrogate is conclusive against all the world, as being in the nature of a proceeding in rem., to which any one can make himself a party." (Part II, Cowen & Hill's Notes, p. 58; Loughton v. Atkins, 1 Pick. 535, 541, 547.)

A decree settling an account is conclusive. (Part II, Cowen & Hill's Notes, p. 58; Sexton v. Shombleson, 6 Pick. 422; Jenison v. Hopewood, 7 Pick. 1; Field v. Hitchcock, 14 Pick. 405; Downing Estate, 5 Watt, 90.)

"It cannot therefore be impeached in an action on the probate bond." (Goodrich v. Thompson, 4 Day, 215; 14 Sergeant & Rawle, 184, note; Barton v. Morris, 1 Green. 18.)

"In a suit against sureties the decree against the administrator made by the Ordinary cannot be impeached for error and irregularity." (Lylor v. Brown, 1 Harp. 31; Tyler v.

Irwia v. Backus et al.

Caldwell, 3 McCord, 225; see Cowen & Hill's Notes, Part II, p. 68.)

By the Court, SANDERSON, C. J.

This is an action upon the official bond of the defendant Backus as Public Administrator of the City and County of Sacramento, against him as principal and his co-defendants as sureties. The suit is brought by his successor in office to recover the amount of a certain estate which came into the hands of Backus in the course of official business, and which he refused to pay over to his successor, the plaintiff, pursuant to the order and decree of the Probate Court. The plaintiff had judgment in the Court below, and the defendant, having moved for a new trial, which was denied, appeals. The facts, as disclosed by the record, are substantially as follows:

In 1857, Backus obtained letters of administration upon the estate of one J. T. M. Cooper and took charge of the same through one J. C. Barr, who for a long time previous and subsequent thereto acted as the clerk or agent, or attorney in fact of Backus, in connection with the business of his office of Public Administrator. The business in the Probate Court seems to have been transacted by Backus, and the collection of the assets belonging to the estate seems to have been made by Barr. After keeping the estate in his hands without rendering an account until May, 1859, Backus, upon petition of the heirs, was cited by the Probate Court to render his account pursuant to law. In reply to the citation, Backus alleged that the deceased was not a resident or inhabitant of the county at the time of his death, but that he was a resident of — County, (name not stated,) and denied the jurisdiction of the Court, charging that the letters of administration which had been issued to him were therefore null and void. At the same time he filed his final account, and a day was appointed for the hearing, of which due notice was given according to law. Upon the issues thus formed a trial was had in the Probate Court, resulting in the following finding of facts and decree: "Sometime in the spring of 1857, J. T. M. Cooper departed this life in the City and County of Sacramento, where he resided prior to and at the time of his death. It does not appear that he ever had any residence in the State of California elsewhere than in Sacramento County. After the death of said Cooper, to wit: on the 21st day of April, 1857, Gordon Backus, then Public Administrator of Sacramento County, petitioned to be appointed administrator of said estate, and on the said 21st day of April, 1857, the Probate Court of said County of Sacramento made an order appointing said Gordon Backus administrator of said estate as aforesaid of said J. T. M. Cooper, and that he take charge of and administer upon the same according to law. That said Probate Court also appointed John C. Barr, L. Farmer and M. McIntyre appraisers of said estate, who went on and appraised the same, and found the said estate to consist of the following items, to wit: Cash, one hundred and fifty-two dollars and thirty-eight cents; W. H. Bullard's certificate of deposit, five hundred and fifty dollars; W. L. Pritchard's note, six hundred and fifty dollars; T. A. Goodell's note, two hundred dollars; A. P. Carter's note, two hundred and eighty dollars; making a total sum of one thousand eight hundred and thirty-two dollars and thirty-eight cents. The whole of which estate, according to the items aforesaid, was paid over by Morrison McIntyre to John C. Barr, who received the same as the agent or clerk of the said Gordon Backus, and who was authorized by the said Backus to receive the same by his authority. Afterwards said Barr collected all the notes outstanding, save the note on A. P. Carter. That said Barr, acting as the agent or clerk of Backus, collected in cash the sum of one thousand five hundred and sixty dollars; that out of this some small bills were paid, such as funeral expenses, affidavits of appraisers, etc. That said Barr paid over to said Backus, in cash, the sum of one thousand three hundred and thirty-eight dollars, in addition to the sum of two hundred and two dollars and thirty-eight cents, which Barr collected, which he informed the said Backus was subject to his order. But the said Barr asked the said Backus to use the said amount of two hundred and two dollars and thirty-eight cents on account of what Backus was owing him, which Backus allowed him to do. That Backus never filed any appraisal of said estate, never gave any notice to creditors as required by law, or rendered any exhibit whatsoever of the condition of said estate."

Upon the foregoing facts the Court decreed that Backus should be removed from the office of administrator of the estate in question, and that he should pay over to his successor the sum of one thousand five hundred and forty dollars and thirty-eight cents, and deliver to him the Carter note for two hundred and eighty dollars. The plaintiff was appointed such successor and Backus was ordered to pay over to him as aforesaid. The plaintiff demanded the estate from Backus, who refused to pay over the same.

On the trial, in connection with other evidence of like tendency, the foregoing proceedings in the Probate Court were offered in evidence by the plaintiff for the purpose of proving a devastavit against Backus and fixing the amount of their liability against his sureties. The evidence was objected to upon the ground that the sureties were not parties to the proceedings and therefore unaffected thereby, and that as against them the devastavit, and the amount thereof, must be established by other evidence. The Court admitted the evidence, but before the case was finally submitted to the jury the opinion of the Court seems to have changed, for the jury were instructed in effect to disregard the evidence and base their verdict entirely upon the other evidence in the case. With the proceedings of the Probate Court discarded, appellant claims that the other evidence in the case fails to sustain the verdict, and that some portion of it was improperly admitted. All the points made by appellant are founded upon the theory that the proceedings in the Probate Court were inadmissible for any purpose as against the sureties, and hence become immaterial if that theory proves fallacious. As we are of the opinion that the proceedings were admissible, we shall therefore confine ourselves to the consideration of that question. If the proceedings were admissible, there being no pretense of fraud or collusion, another trial would result in a like verdict, and hence if error was committed in admitting other evidence bearing upon the same point such error (in the absence of any conflict of testimony, which is the case here) becomes inconsequential.

There is some conflict of authority as to the admissibility of this kind of evidence in an action upon an administrator's bond against his sureties for a breach of the bond by the principal, and as to its effect when admitted. The Supreme Court of North Carolina decided that a recovery against a guardian was no evidence against his sureties in an action upon his bond for non-payment of the judgment. (McKellar v. Howell et al., 4 Hawks, 37.) The same Court held that a judgment obtained by a creditor of an intestate against his administrator could not be used as evidence by the creditor in an action against the sureties upon the administrator's bond. (McBride v. Choate, 2 Ired. Eq. 610.) In several of the other States a contrary doctrine has prevailed. The Supreme Court of Massachusetts has decided that in an action upon an administrator's bond against the administrator and his sureties, for a refusal on his part to pay a judgment recovered against him, such judgment, if not obtained by fraud and collusion, is conclusive upon the sureties in regard to all matters of defense affecting the merits of the claim as between the parties to such judgment. (Heard v. Lodge et al., 20 Pick. 53.) In New York it has been held that whatever binds and concludes the administrator equally binds and concludes his sureties. (Baggott v. Boulger, 2 Duer, 160; The People on the relation of Demarest v. Laws, 3 Abbott's Practice Reports, 450.) So in Pennsylvania it has been held that a decree of the Orphans' Court against an administrator is conclusive upon his sureties. (Garber v. The Commonwealth, 7 Penn. St. 265.) In Indiana an administrator was convicted by the finding and decree of the Probate Court of having committed waste. His settlement was opened up and the Court found that he had in his hands, unaccounted for, the sum of one thousand seven hundred and thirty-two dollars belonging to the decedent's estate. This finding was held to be conclusive upon his sureties both as to the waste and the amount thereof. (Salzer v. The State, 5 Porter, Ind. 202.) The same doctrine prevails in Kentucky, Missouri, and South Carolina. (Hobbs et al. v. Middleton, 1 J. J. Marsh, 177; State v. Holt, 27 Missouri, 340; Lyles v. Caldwell et al., 8 McCord, 225.) In South Carolina it seems to be doubted whether the decree of the Ordinary is conclusive of anything more than the fact that the administrator has been legally cited to account, and of the different items composing his account, so as to relieve a Court of law from an investigation into their merits. (Simkins v. Cobb, 2 Bailey, 60.)

As a general rule, sureties upon official bonds are not concluded by a decree or judgment against their principal, unless they have had their day in Court or an opportunity to be heard in their defense; but administration bonds seem to form an exception to this general rule, and the sureties thereon, in respect to their liability for the default of the principal, seem to be classed with such sureties as covenant that their principal shall do a particular act. To this class belong sureties upon bail and appeal bonds whose liability is fixed by the judgment against their principal. This distinction seems to be founded upon the terms of the obligation into which the sureties upon an administration bond enter, which are that their principal shall faithfully perform all the duties imposed upon him by the nature of his trust, and will account for and pay over all money which may come into his hands pursuant to the orders and decrees of the Probate Court. The account must be rendered to and settled by the Court, and the money must be paid out and distributed by and pursuant to the orders and decrees of the Court, and the undertaking of the sureties is that their principal will do all this. "The Ordinary agrees to place in the hands of the administrator the goods, chattels, etc., of the deceased person, to be by him well and faithfully administered, and the administrator and his sureties undertake that the administrator shall make a just and true account, etc.,

Irwin v. Backus et als.

whenever required by the Ordinary, and pay over, etc. Now the administrator is the person who is cognizant of all the affairs of the estate. The surety is not supposed to know anything about the accounts. The surety is not required to go before the Ordinary. He knows that he cannot be made liable until his principal has been called to account, to pay over, and a decree to that effect has been made by the Ordinary. His contract, then, is made with reference to all this." (Lyles v. Caldwell et al., supra.)

The condition of the bond in the present case is to the effect "that the said Backus shall faithfully perform all the duties enjoined upon him by law as such Public Administrator, and particularly that he will account for and pay over all moneys and property that may come to his hands as such administrator." This means that he will account to the Probate Court and will pay over, to such persons as such Court may direct, all moneys and property of which he may become possessed in his official capacity; or, in other words, he will obey the orders and decrees of such Court. Such are the terms of the contract, and, upon the refusal of the administrator to obey such order or decree, the liability of the sureties attaches, and they are bound to make good the default of their principal, and cannot go behind the decree to inquire into the merits. They may show in defense either that the bond was not made, or that the decree was not made; or, if made, that the same has been obeyed; or that the same was obtained by fraud or collusion; but they cannot show that the Court has erred in making the decree, or that no assets ever came into the possession of the administrator, although the Court has so found and adjudged. If any error has been committed a remedy is afforded by appeal. Until the order or decree is reversed it is equally conclusive upon the administrator and his sureties. (The People on the relation of Demarest v. Laws, supra.) We think the proceedings of the Probate Court were admissible, and, in the absence of any fraud or collusion, were conclusive upon the sureties both as to the devastavit and the amount thereof.

Hurlburt v. Jones.

It follows from what has been said that the verdict of the jury was right, although errors may have been committed by the Court; and there being no pretense that the decree was the result of fraud or collusion, a new trial would not result in any advantage to the appellants.

Judgment affirmed.

FOSTINA E. HURLBURT v. GEORGE F. JONES.

EVIDENCE.—It is not error for the Court to reject testimony offered by the plaintiff to prove allegations of the complaint which are admitted by the answer.

SOLE TRADER.—If a husband arranges with his wife that she engage in business as a sole trader for the more purpose of shielding their joint earnings against the existing and subsequent creditors of the husband, and with the understanding between them that the property used in or acquired by the business shall belong to both, and the husband have power to dispose of it, this is a fraud upon the creditors, and the property is liable for the husband's debts.

SAME.—If a husband embarrassed with debt makes a settlement upon or conveys to his wife, as sole trader, property, for the purpose of delaying or defrauding his creditors, the conveyance is void.

FINDINGS OF FACT.—If the findings of fact of the Court below are defective, and no objection is taken to them on that ground in the Court below, the objection cannot be raised in the Supreme Court.

APPEAL from the District Court, Fifteenth Judicial District, Colusa County.

On the trial in the Court below, when plaintiff offered the lease from Ord to her in evidence, defendant objected to the same because there was a subscribing witness.

The Court sustained the objection.

The other facts are stated in the opinion of the Court.

George Cadavalader, for Appellant.

The lease should have been admitted in evidence.

The rule in regard to error is correctly stated in the case of Jackson v. Feather River Co., 14 Cal. 25, viz:

"Every error in the Court below in the rejection of evidence is prima facie an injury, and it rests with the other party clearly to show that no hurt would have been done, or was done by the error."

The Court will see that it is not possible that the Court below should have considered the execution of the lease proved when it expressly held that our evidence was insufficient. (See Verzan v. McGregor, 23 Cal. 339.)

It is urged by respondent's counsel in substance, that the finding of the Court below to the effect that we had shown no item of property used in our business but what came from the husband, must be considered as conclusive, because we failed to except thereto in the manner pointed out by the statute of 1861.

The Act of May 20th, 1861, has no application to this case, as it has special reference to cases in which appeals have been or are taken directly from the judgment, and where parties rely for a reversal upon the fact that the Court below had failed to file any finding, or that the finding filed was defective. In such cases the object of the statute was to oblige parties to first challenge the correctness of the findings in the Court below, or to demand of the Court that it file a finding.

This statute was passed to meet the views of this Court in Duff v. Fisher, 15 Cal. 375, and since then the rule has been held that on an appeal from the judgment (without the intervention of an application for a new trial) this Court would not reverse because there was no finding, or a defective finding, without the attention of the Court below was specially directed to the defect, and it refused after such request to make the necessary correction. This is the statute of 1861, and as will be seen, it refers alone to the correction of judgments on appeal in cases where there has been no finding, or a defective finding.

It has nothing to do with the practice of challenging the correctness of findings of fact upon motions for a new trial, which is this case.

Robinson & McConnell, for Respondent.

Hurlburt v. Jones.

By the Court, SHAFER, J.

This is an action brought by a married woman, to recover the possession of a certain quantity of wheat levied on by the defendant, as Sheriff of Colusa County, as the property of her husband. The plaintiff claims to own the wheat as sole trader, under the Act of 1852.

The answer first denies the principal allegations of the complaint. Second, justifies the seizure complained of, on the ground that the plaintiff became a sole trader, or operator, in "a general ranching business" in 1857, for the purpose of hindering, delaying and defrauding the creditors of her husband, and it is further alleged that the seizure in question was made by virtue of a writ of attachment, issued in an action brought against the husband by one of his creditors, in 1862; and that the wheat was in fact the property of the husband.

The trial was by the Court, and the judgment rendered was in favor of the defendant. The appeal is taken from the judgment, and from the order overruling plaintiff's motion for a new trial.

1. On the trial the plaintiff offered in evidence a lease to the plaintiff from one Robert Ord, executed October 20, 1858, and offered to prove by Ord the execution of the lease. On objection taken by the defendant, the lease was excluded, and the plaintiff excepted.

The execution of the lease was charged in the complaint, and it was further averred that the lease was of the land upon which the wheat in question was raised; and neither of the allegations was denied in the answer.

The execution of the lease was not in issue, and we do not consider that the Court erred in excluding evidence that had no bearing upon any of the points in controversy. Had the answer not admitted that the wheat was raised upon the land included in the lease, it might have been proper for the plaintiff to give her lease in evidence for the purpose of applying the lease by proper proof to that land. But in view of the fact that the authenticity of the lease and its application to the land on which the crop was raised were both admitted, the ruling of the Court cannot be considered as erroneous.

But it is insisted for the appellant, that it is apparent from the findings that the Court, in deciding the case, failed to notice the state of the pleadings in relation to the execution of the lease.

To this objection it is sufficient to say, that if the ruling of the Court excluding proof of the lease was not erroneous at the time it was made, it could not have become so thereafter by the inattention alleged.

2. It is further insisted by the appellant that the findings of the Court are not supported by the evidence, and that the decision is against law.

The findings, the correctness of which is questioned by the plaintiff, are those relating to the special defense set up in the answer.

If a husband, embarrassed with debt, should make a voluntary settlement upon his wife; or should he in like manner convey to her, as sole trader, any considerable portion of his estate, the conveyance would, or at least might be, void as to the existing and subsequent creditors of the husband. But that case is not this. Here the wife was not endowed by the husband at the time when her declaration was filed, nor was there any evidence introduced at the trial tending to prove that he ever transferred to her any property of his thereafter.

If, however, the husband of the plaintiff, being embarrassed with debts, arranged with his wife in 1857 that she should engage nominally in the business of ranching, as a sole trader under the Act of 1852, for the mere purpose of shielding their several and joint earnings against existing and subsequent creditors of the husband, it being further understood between them that all crops, as well as all issues and profits, should belong to him as between the two, and that the absolute power of disposing of them should remain with him, we consider that such agreement would be not only foreign to the object contemplated by the Act of 1852, but a manifest fraud upon it.

Assuming that the arrangement between the plaintiff and her husband was of the character suggested, then when the wife took her lease from Ord, in 1858, she held it in trust for her husband or as common property; and when the wheat was harvested thereafter, in 1862, she held that in like manner. The Act of 1852 is not fulfilled by a married woman making, recording and advertising a declaration of intention to carry on business in her own name, nor by her so carrying it on in fact. These formal requirements can be very easily complied with. The substantive provision of the Act is, that, these forms having been duly observed, the woman shall, in good faith, actually carry on the business thereafter "on her own account." But if she prosecutes the business on her husband's account in fact, and with a view to shield his or the joint earnings, against the rights of existing or subsequent creditors as a principal purpose, she is entitled to no protection.

From an examination of the testimony and findings we are satisfied that the case was tried and determined upon the theory last suggested. There was evidence in the case tending to prove all the facts upon which that theory proceeds, and though opposed, to some extent, by other facts proved by the plaintiff, still we cannot grant a new trial where the evidence is in conflict.

The findings are objected to as defective. They are so, and perhaps to a greater extent than the appellant claims. The facts as found are, with some exceptions, secondary and not final—mere matters of circumstantial evidence rather than facts entering as terms into propositions of law. But no exception was taken to the findings as defective, as required by the Act of 1861. Strictly, the case should, perhaps, be treated as a case without a finding, and without exception taken for the want of it, and under that aspect we must presume that the Court found from the testimony all the facts essential to the defense.

Judgment affirmed.

Wiseman v. McNulty et al.

JAMES WISEMAN v. THOMAS McNULTY, JAMES BRADY, JOHN FURLONG, MOSES FURLONG, JOHN DOOLY, PATRICK CODY, MICHAEL CODY, H. F. NICHOLS, LAWRENCE NOLAN, JOHN SHARP, JOHN KIRK, MAT SAFFIN, AND MARTIN SAFFIN.

CONSTABLE'S SALE OF PROPERTY OF TENANTS IN COMMON.—If several persons are the owners of a tract of mining claims as tenants in common, and are known by a company name, and an action is commenced against all of them as individuals composing the company on a money demand, and a judgment is rendered against all as the persons composing the company, and the claims are sold by virtue of an execution issued on the judgment, and a deed executed to the purchaser, and if one or more of the defendants were not served with process and did not appear in the action, the purchaser does not acquire any title as against the persons not served with process and who did not appear.

CONSTABLE'S DEED.—A Sheriff or constable's deed, executed under an execution sale which does not recite the judgment on which the execution was issued, is void.

VERDICT WHERE SEVERAL DEFENSES ARE PLEADED.—Where several defenses are pleaded, either of which is good in law, and the verdict is for the defendants, and the Court errs in its instructions to the jury as to one of the defenses, the judgment will be reversed, unless it is made to appear that the verdict was rendered on one of the defenses in relation to which no error was committed.

FORFEITURE OF A MINING CLAIM.—Where a forfeiture of an interest in a mining claim for non-payment of assessments is claimed under an agreement entered into by all the tenants in common owning the same, the parties claiming the benefit of the forfeiture must show an exact compliance on their part with all the conditions in the agreement, or they will not be entitled to the forfeiture.

FORFEITURE.—In order to have a forfeiture take place, there must be some person, natural or artificial, who is entitled to receive the benefit of the forfeiture when it accrues.

FORFEITURE—TENANTS IN COMMON.—Several persons owning a tract of mining claims as tenants in common, and acting under a company name, have not the capacity to take or hold, in the name of the company, the interest of any one or more of the tenants in common, by forfeiture.

REAL ESTATE—TENANTS IN COMMON.—Tenants in common of a tract of mining claims, acting under a company name, are incapable, in the company name, of taking and holding mining claims by grant, or by any other means by which title to real estate would pass.

FORFEITURE OF REAL ESTATE.—No forfeiture of real estate can take for non-performance of conditions precedent or subsequent, unless there are two contracting parties who have, at the same time or successively, an interest in the estate upon which the condition is reserved, for the non-performance of which the forfeiture is claimed.

SAME.—One owning land, and who continues to hold all the interest he ever had in it, cannot annex a condition to his estate of such a character that, upon its breach, the estate shall vest by forfeiture in a person who never held any interest in the land.

Wiseman v. McNulty et als.

APPEAL from the District Court, Seventeenth Judicial District, Sierra County.

The following is the contract entered into between the members of the Richardson Company and those composing the Buffalo Company:

“GOODYEAR’S BAR, Nov. 16, 1856.

“Know all men by these presents, that we the undersigned, do bargain with each other as follows, viz: We of the first part, known as the Richardson Company, do agree with those of the second part, known as the Buffalo Company, to run a bed rock tunnel on the ground of the first mentioned company, on Fir Cap Hill, until they reach the channel; then the Buffalo are to strike off a tunnel through the grounds of the first mentioned company until they reach their own ground; said tunnel to be no wider than six feet, and the Buffalo Company to keep all the gold taken out of the side tunnel, and the main tunnel to be forever undivided property of both companies, unless said Buffalo Company wish to run a new tunnel for their own use; in that case the Richardson Company are to pay back their portion of what the first tunnel cost.”

Signed by the members of the two companies, respectively.

The following is the judgment upon which the execution issued, by virtue of which the mining claims were sold:

“E. Gifford v. J. Donahue et als. Action for the recovery of the sum of one hundred and eighty-three dollars and thirty-seven cents, alleged to be due the plaintiff on book account. Copy of account filed October 14th, 1861, and summons issued returnable on the 16th inst., at 1 o’clock P. M.; summons returned served personally upon M. Donahue, Larry Nolan, P. Cody, and H. F. Nichols, in Township No. 6. On the 16th day of October, 1861, at the hour of two o’clock of that day, the plaintiff appeared by his attorney, A. A. Cooper. The defendants came not, but made default.

"Whereupon, on motion of plaintiff's attorney, it is ordered and adjudged by the Court, that E. Gifford, the plaintiff, do have and recover judgment of, from, and against John Donahue, M. Donahue, Larry Nolan, B. Kenneif, D. O. Keefe, P. Cody, H. F. Nichols, Pat. Haley, James Wiseman, R. Anderson, John Doe, R. Roe, and H. Hoe, composing the Richardson and Buffalo Company, on the verified complaint of the plaintiff setting forth a copy of the book of original entries, for the sum of one hundred and eighty-three dollars and thirty-seven cents, together with costs, taxed at fourteen dollars and fifty cents, and accruing costs. On motion of plaintiff's attorney, execution issued.

'T. B. PARKS, J. P.'

The following is the agreement entered into by the members of the Hibernia Company after the Constable's sale, and the formation of that company:

"At a meeting of the Hibernia Mining Company, held at Goodyear's Bar, the following resolution and agreement was adopted:

"Resolved, That for the purpose of running a tunnel upon the mining claims of said company, in the Fir Cap District, an assessment shall be levied on the members thereof once in four weeks, until the said tunnel is completed; and if any member of said company shall neglect or refuse to pay any assessment, until after three of the same shall be levied, he shall forfeit his claim or share to said company; and the company is authorized in the event aforesaid, to enter upon and take full, complete, and absolute possession of said claims so forfeited, without suit or other proceeding. Dated May 26th, 1862.

"John Kirk, James Wiseman, John Furlong, three claims; Dennis O'Keefe, Lawrence Nolan, two claims; Moses Furlong, three claims; Patrick Cody, Matthew Saffin, two claims; Martin Saffin, two claims; John Dooly, half claim; H. F. Nichols, Joseph Killbride, Jas. E. Nolan, Patrick Daley."

It was under the foregoing agreement that the defendants claimed a forfeiture.

Wiseman v. McNulty et als.

Defendants recovered judgment, and plaintiff appealed.
The other facts are stated in the opinion of the Court.

Creed Haymond, and Williams & Johnson, for Appellant.

In Bingham & Colvin's Treatise on Rents, Covenants, and Conditions, page 146, it is said that:

"While a party lives there are only three ways whereby the absolute property of real estate, once vested, can pass out of him: by his own deed, by sale under the judgment of some competent judicial tribunal, and by the exercise of the right of eminent domain. There is no such thing known as a forfeiture that can deprive a party of the absolute ownership of property. The commission of crime was formerly made to work such a result, but it is now provided that no conviction of any person, etc." And again, page 147: "There is an obvious difference in depriving a party of the use of another's property for the violation of certain conditions which have been affixed by contract or the laws of the State, and depriving him of his own property for default or dereliction." Again, same page: "Will any one contend, that if the owner should covenant to pay a certain sum at a certain time, and in case of default, forfeit his land to the covenantee, with provision of entry, that it would be operative to vest title in the covenantee, so that he could maintain an action of ejectment to get possession, or if he were in possession that he could not be removed?" There can be no dispute among lawyers as to such a question. No such mode of passing title to property is known. And again, pages 147 and 148: "But conditions cannot be imposed upon one's own property by covenant or agreement to be complied with by the owner, the non-compliance with which shall pass his title to another."

"It is a general principle of the common law, that whoever seeks redress for the violation of a contract resting upon mutual and dependent covenants, to obtain success, must himself have performed the obligations on his part." (Conant v. Conant, 10 Cal. 254.)

And that "The condition of an obligation is considered as the language of the obligee, and is so construed in favor of the obligor." (Note B, page 22, 2 Parsons on Contracts.)

Wiseman v. McNulty et al.

Contracts by reason of which a forfeiture is claimed, must be strictly construed. (Von Schmidt v. Huntington, 1 Cal. 71; Ruiz v. Norton, 4 Cal. 357; Sec. 60, Cal. Pr. Act; Askew v. Ebbertz et al., 23 Cal. 263; Colman v. Clements et al., 23 Cal. 245.)

Vanclief & Bowers, for Respondent.

Of course, the mere failure to pay assessments could not work a forfeiture without the assistance of a contract or law.

The passages cited from the Treatise of Bingham & Colvin, goes the length of saying, that an absolute title to property cannot be forfeited. This, we think, is not law. But the estate of miners, in their claims on the public land, is certainly not greater than an estate for life or years.

In construing contracts, Courts are not to depart from what appears to be the intention of the party to prevent a forfeiture.

In Woodson v. Skinner, Missouri R. vol. 22, p. 23, the Court say: "Whilst Courts will not incline to forfeitures, yet where a right to exact forfeiture is given, they should not withhold a reasonable construction from the written instrument by which they are designed to be enforced."

To the same effect is Jackson v. Topping, 1 Wend. 394, where the literal and grammatical meaning of the language was departed from to support a forfeiture.

By the Court, RHODES, J.

The plaintiff sues in ejectment, to recover the possession of three undivided seventeenths of a tract of mining ground, known as the mining claims of the Buffalo Mining Company, in Fir Cap Mining District, in Sierra County. It appears that the plaintiff, Dennis O'Keefe, Patrick Daley and twenty others took up and worked these claims in 1856; that subsequently the number of claimants was reduced to seventeen, the said plaintiff, O'Keefe and Daley each owning the one undivided seventeenth of the Buffalo Company's mining claims; that in 1858 the members of that company united with the members of the Richardson Company, whose claims adjoined those of the Buffalo Company, in running a tunnel in the Richardson Company's claims for the benefit of both companies; that the plaintiff, O'Keefe and Daley worked upon the tunnel and paid assessments to some time in 1861. In October, 1861, three judgments were rendered by a Justice of the Peace against certain persons mentioned as "composing the Richardson and Buffalo Company," and in November following a constable sold and conveyed to L. Nolan, the mining grounds "known as the Richardson and Buffalo Company claims," under an execution against the same persons named as defendants in each of the three judgments.

The purchase was made by Nolan, for the benefit of himself, the plaintiff, O'Keefe and Daley, and a number of others, who were members of those two companies and who contributed their proportion of the purchase money; but it does not appear that Nolan conveyed to them any interest in the claims purchased by him at the constable's sale. Shortly after the execution of the constable's deed to Nolan, he and those for whom he made the purchase formed a company, known as the Hibernia Company, to prosecute the working of the claims of the two former companies. At a meeting of the Hibernia Company in May, 1862, a resolution was adopted by those representing a certain number of claims, among others the plaintiff and his grantors, to levy an assessment once in four weeks, for the purpose of running the tunnel; and the company took possession of the claims and continued to work them until the commencement of this suit. An assessment was levied on the 20th or 24th of July, 1862, which was paid by the plaintiff, O'Keefe and Daley; and subsequently six other assessments were levied, but neither the plaintiff, O'Keefe nor Daley paid either of them. The plaintiff said in October, 1862, that he would not pay any more assessments, and he did not work upon, and was not on, the claim after some time in 1861.

In May, 1863, "a rich prospect was struck" by the Hibernia Company for the first time, and on the 27th of June, 1863, O'Keefe and Daley conveyed to the plaintiff, their right, title and interest in the Buffalo Company's claims. Neither of the three companies seems to have been incorporated, but the persons composing them appear to have formed a voluntary association without any agreement in writing. Such are some of the facts that we have gleaned from a record almost devoid of an alphabetical index, and without the assistance of a statement of facts, which should have formed a portion of the briefs in the case.

The defendants rely upon three defenses:

First—The sale by the constable to Nolan.

Second—Abandonment by the plaintiff and his grantors; and,

Third—A forfeiture of the claims of the plaintiff and his grantors for the non-payment of assessments.

The sale under either of the three judgments rendered by Park, J. P., and the constable's deed, were void, so far as the plaintiff, O'Keefe and Daley were concerned, because it does not appear that the summons in either action was served upon either of them, and no appearance in the actions was made by them or in their behalf, the defendants not being joint owners, but being tenants in common of the mining claims.

The constable's deed, as to them, was void for that reason, and for the further reason that it does not recite any judgment upon which the execution issued. (Donahue v. McNulty et als., 24 Cal. 411.)

Second—If the jury had found for the defendants on the ground of abandonment, we would not be inclined to disturb the verdict, for we could not say that there was not sufficient evidence from which the jury would be authorized in finding that the plaintiff had abandoned his claim, and that O'Keefe and Daley had also abandoned their claims, but we cannot undertake to say that the jury rendered their verdict for the defendants on that ground, for the question of forfeiture seemed to be pressed more than any other point, and the plaintiff complains of instructions given by the Court on that point, and of the refusal of the Court to give other instructions asked for by him, and the jury may have found for the defendants upon that question alone.

Third—As to the forfeiture of the claims of the plaintiff and his grantors to the Hibernia Company. The agreement, in the form of a resolution, signed by the plaintiff and his grantors, and a part of the defendants, provides that the assessment shall be levied upon the members of the company “once in four weeks until the tunnel is completed.” No provision is made for levying assessments at any other time or for any other purpose. In order that a forfeiture might be produced it would be necessary to prove that the assessments had been levied once in four weeks, and not at other times, for by stipulating for a levy at those intervals of time they have excluded the right of levying assessments at other times. The assessments must have been made for the purpose of running the tunnel, and not to meet other expenses incurred in respect to the enterprise. The evidence shows that the assessments were not levied every four weeks, and it is not proven that the assessments were made solely for the running of the tunnel. Such strict proof is required, because the law does not favor forfeitures. When, by the contract, any covenant or agreement is to be kept or performed, as a condition precedent, by the party claiming the benefit of a forfeiture, he must show an exact compliance, or he will not be entitled to the forfeiture. (Von Schmidt v. Huntington, 1 Cal. 71.)

It is unnecessary to determine the question that the counsel have very earnestly pressed, whether the party claiming a forfeiture should have the same declared by a judgment of a competent Court, for it will be doubtless found that each class of cases would, in that respect, depend upon its own peculiar circumstances.

But there are questions which we think lie back of the question just mentioned, and which should be first disposed of. (2 Black. Com. 267,) defines forfeiture as follows: “Forfeiture is a punishment annexed by law to some illegal act or negligence in the owner of lands, tenements, or hereditaments, whereby he loses all his interest therein, and they become vested in the party injured, as a recompense which he alone or the public together with himself hath sustained." This definition, which we consider quite accurate, necessarily implies that there must be some person, natural or artificial, who is entitled to receive the benefit of the forfeiture when it accrues. The resolution adopted by the Hibernia Company provides that, in case of non-payment of assessments, etc., "he shall forfeit his claim to the company," and the company is authorized to enter upon and take possession of the forfeited claim. It is not agreed that it shall be forfeited to the persons composing, or those that might thereafter compose, the company, nor to any individual by name. The company does not appear to be a corporation nor even a partnership, holding the claims as partnership property, but simply a voluntary association not formed by articles in writing and without legal existence—a body unknown to the law. As such, the company would be incapable of taking and holding mining claims, by grant, or by any other means, by which title to real estate would pass. As far as appears upon the record, the persons owning claims, who associated together in the formation of the Hibernia Company, were tenants in common of those claims; at least the members of the Buffalo Company, and of the Richardson Company, were tenants in common with each other in their respective companies, and neither party contends that they were partners, or held the claims as partnership property.

The members of the Hibernia Company did not agree, that those who paid the assessments, should receive the forfeiture of the claims of those who failed to pay, and they could not agree with the company that it should enter upon and possess the forfeited claims, because the company was a legal nonentity.

Further: it is, to say the least, very doubtful if the term forfeiture, according to its common law signification, has any application to the rights, interests, or remedies of the several persons composing a mining association, such as we find in this case; and we think it has none.

“Lands, tenements and hereditaments may be forfeited by various means: 1. By the commission of crimes and misdemeanors. 2. By alienation contrary to law. 3. By the non-performance of conditions. 4. By waste. (Bac. Abridg., Forfeitures; Bouv. Law Dict.) Clearly, none of these modes of forfeiture are applicable to estates held as in this case, unless it be the third—the non-performance of conditions.

For the creation of a condition, for the annexing or reserving of a condition, precedent or subsequent, to or upon an estate—whether it is created directly by covenant or agreement, or arises by implication in any manner known to the law, except in the case of a will—two contracting parties are necessary, who have at the same time, or successively, an interest in the estate upon which the condition is reserved.

Bouvier says, in defining a condition: “In its most extended signification, a condition is a clause in a contract or agreement which has for its object to suspend, rescind, or to modify the principal obligation; or in the case of a will, to suspend, revoke, or modify the devise or bequest.” This definition (except when applied to a will) necessarily requires the execution of a contract. It is also said of conditions annexed to an estate in lands: “Conditions can only be reserved to the feoffer, donor or lessor and their heirs; but not to a stranger.” (Bac. Abridg., Forfeitures, O.) It may be asked, then, how can a condition be annexed to an estate in land by a party owning it, and who continues to hold all the interest he ever had in it, which condition is of such a character that upon its breach the estate shall vest by forfeiture in a person who never held any interest in the land, and has not attempted to convey it; and much more, in an association of persons who, in their collective capacity, are incapable of taking an estate in lands? “He who enters for condition broken shall be in of the same estate he was before.” (Bac. Abridg., Forfeiture.)

In Waring v. Crow, 11 Cal. 366, Mr. Justice Baldwin, in employing the term forfeiture, uses it as synonymous with abandonment, and holds that the mere failure to pay assessments does not produce a forfeiture of the claim of the delinquent owner; and he says that "the mere temporary absence of one partner" would not, under the mining regulations of the vicinity, create "a forfeiture of his interest," so that "a stranger could then come in and appropriate his share." There was no issue of a forfeiture in the case, and the learned Judge employed the term in the sense in which it is used among miners, as expressing a loss of the claim by the former owner by abandonment, or by what they considered as amounting to the same thing, by ceasing to work it or refusing to pay assessments, so that any other person might take it up, not the vesting of the title in the grantor for condition broken. And he says that, "in order to the enforcement of the claim, (not forfeiture, as quoted in the appellant's brief,) some appropriate action by suit must be taken to liquidate the demand and sell the property," etc. A lien upon the property, or a claim against the owner, may be enforced in that manner, but a forfeiture cannot; and the opinion of the Court does not give the most distant intimation that it could be worked out in that mode.

It is easy to understand the rights and remedies of the parties where one has contracted with his associates who are jointly interested with him in a mining enterprise, that his share or claim shall stand as security for the payment of his proportion of the expenses that may be incurred in the prosecution of the enterprise, or that they shall have a lien on his claim in the nature of a mortgage, with the power of sale, to collect his share of such expenses, or that upon his failure to do certain things his claim shall be deemed to be abandoned; but no one of these covenants amount to a condition subject to which the claim is taken or held, and the breach of any of all of these covenants will not produce a forfeiture, as recognized at common law.

The authorities cited by the counsel for the defendants upon the point of forfeiture are all clear cases of forfeiture at common law. Woodson v. Skinner, 22 Mo. 23, was a case of a lease for years by the City of St. Louis, the lessee covenanting to pay rent, and that if the rent should be in arrear beyond a certain time he should forfeit his term. He made default in the payment of rent, and the Court held that the lease was forfeited to his grantor, the city. In Jackson v. Topping, 1 Wend. 394, a father granted his lands to one of his sons upon the condition that he should support his father and pay his father's debts, with a clause of re-entry in case of default. The son failed to pay one of the debts. The Court held that it was a case of an estate upon condition, and that the heirs of the deceased father had a right of entry for the forfeiture, arising upon the breach of the condition.

The cases cited by the defendants from 11 John. 299; 14 Id. 120; 15 Id. 24, were cases where by law the penalty for the violation of the Non-Intercourse Act was a forfeiture of the goods, and the case in 5 T. R. 120, was a forfeiture for a violation of the revenue laws. Forfeitures for crimes and misdemeanors proceed upon different principles from those arising upon contract. Those cases show what are the rights of the parties in certain classes of cases, where a forfeiture has taken place as a penalty for crime, but they do not assist us in solving the question whether the defendants here had the right to claim a forfeiture.

Again, if the result contended for by the defendants can be worked out in the manner they claim, and the title of the delinquent claimholder can be thus transferred to his associates or to the company, we will then find that we have a new mode of transferring titles—a mode in which neither the owner nor any one acting under his authority, or under or in pursuance of a judgment of a Court, conveys the title—a mode in which the new holder of the title comes in, neither by forfeiture for crime or for breach of condition annexed to the grant made by him, his ancestors or grantors, nor by purchase in its most enlarged sense, nor by descent, nor by title accruing to him by operation of law. An intended purchaser would look in vain to the records in the Recorder's office or in the Courts, for the evidences of the transmission of a title in that mode.

People v. Stratton.

The term "forfeiture" is often employed by miners as synonymous with abandonment, but the term we have considered is used in the objectionable instructions, not as denoting abandonment, but as a mode of transferring title.'

What we have already said sufficiently manifests our opinion in relation to the instructions complained of, without noticing them in detail.

Judgment reversed and the cause remanded for a new trial.

THE PEOPLE OF THE STATE OF CALIFORNIA ex rel. FRANK M. PIXLEY, ATTORNEY-GENERAL, v. JAS. T. STRATTON.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL—FILING INFORMATION.—The Attorney-General may file an information in the nature of a bill in chancery, to annul a patent for lands granted by this State to an individual, in a case where the matter involved in the suit immediately concerns the rights and interests of the State.

INFORMATIONS BY ATTORNEY-GENERAL.—An information is, in its substantive characteristics, a bill in equity, and when it concerns only the rights of the Government, or those whose rights are under the particular protection of the Government, is exhibited in the name of the Attorney-General as the informant; and in the former case a relator is sometimes, and in the latter case always, named who in reality sustains and directs the suit.

INFORMATION TO ANNUL PATENT.—If the State has no interest in the subject matter, an information on the relation of the Attorney-General, on behalf of the State, to annul a patent cannot be sustained.

SAME.—If private citizens have an interest in the lands granted by the patent, and are threatened with injury by the patent, the information should be filed in the name of one or more of such persons, provided they are without adequate remedy at law; and in such case the relator's personal complaint should be joined to and incorporated with the information.

SAME.—An information on the relation of the Attorney-General, on behalf of the State, to annul a patent which avers that the State has no interest in the lands patented, does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action.

SWAMP AND OVERFLOWED LANDS.—If a State issues a patent for lands as swamp and overflowed lands, and the same are high lands as contradistinguished from swamp and overflowed, no title passes to the patentee by the patent; and any person having an interest in the lands may show that fact in his defense in an action at law by the patentee to recover possession.

PATENT AS EVIDENCE.—Though a patent be in fact issued without authority of law, because the State had no title to grant, the presumption in an action of ejectment is, in the first instance, that the patent is valid and passes the title, and the burden of proof is cast on the one who undertakes to impeach the patent to establish the facts necessary for its overthrow.

People v. Stratton.

WHO MAY ATTACK PATENT.— If a patent is issued without authority of law, or the State had no title to grant, a person who owns the lands patented may invoke a Court of equity to restrain by perpetual injunction its use as evidence, or may maintain an action in his own name to annul it.

APPEAL from the District Court, Third Judicial District, Alameda County.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the Court.

W. W. Crane, Jr., for Appellant.

All prosecutions on behalf of the State must be in the name of The People of the State. (Constitution, Art. VI, sec. 18.)

The Attorney-General is the Attorney of the State, and in an action on behalf of the people, his authority to prosecute the suit must be presumed until the contrary be shown. He is not called upon to plead or show his authority. (State of Louisiana v. Smith, 13 Louisiana Annual Rep. 424; Commonwealth v. Fowler, 10 Mass. 290; Commonwealth v. Union Fire and Marine Ins. Co., 5 Mass. 230.)

A patent can only be set aside by scire facias, information, or bill in chancery. (Jackson v. Lawton, 10 John. 23; Bagswell v. Broderick, 13 Peters, 436; 8 Bacon's Abridg. 608.)

An information and bill are substantially the same, and when the people of the State are interested, the complaint is either by information or bill. (Mitford's Equity Pleadings, 22, 23; Story's Equity Pleadings, secs. 7-9.)

Patterson, Wallace & Stow, for Respondent.

If the land was (is) swamp and overflowed, the State has no interest to set aside the patent, because the sale was authorized by the statutes.

If not swamp and overflowed land, the State has no interest, but has received respondent's money without any consideration, and the patent was void for want of power to issue it. (Summers v. Dickinson, 9 Cal. 555; Den v. Hill, McAllister's R. 480; People v. State, 3 Barb. 556; Burleson v. McGee, 15 Texas, 375.)

If third persons have any title to, and they can show in an action of ejectment, or by filing a bill quia timet (Practice Act, sec. 8) that the patent is void for want of power to issue it. (9 Cal. 555.)

By the Court, CURREY, J.

The Attorney-General filed his Information on the 6th of July, 1863, in the District Court of the Third Judicial District, in and for the County of Alameda, against the defendant, for the purpose of having the Court declare void and annul a patent for lands granted by the Governor of the State of California to the defendant, in April, 1862. The defendant was brought into Court by proper process and filed his answer to the information.

From the information it appears that in November, 1861, the defendant commenced proceedings, under the Acts of the Legislature providing for the sale and reclamation of the swamp and overflowed lands of this State, with a view of obtaining a title from the State to certain lands described in the information; and it is charged that he falsely represented the lands as of the character and quality mentioned in those Acts, and also that he so represented that he did not know of any legal or equitable claim, other than his own, to such lands; and it is alleged that by means of such false representations he obtained a patent for the lands described therein, when, in fact, they were not swamp or overflowed, salt marsh or tide lands, but were high lands, and that he well knew they were in the possession of divers persons, named in the information, who had a legal and equitable claim thereto; and the information further sets forth, that immediately after defendant obtained his patent he commenced an action against the persons named as having a legal and equitable claim to the lands, for the recovery of the possession thereof.

The answer of the defendant meets the several allegations and charges contained in the information; some by denials, and others by confession and avoidance, by which an issue on every material matter of the information was joined.

At a term of the Court held in November, 1863, the defendant made a motion to dismiss the information and all the proceedings in the action on the grounds:

First—That the Attorney-General had no authority or power to institute or prosecute the proceedings in this action in the name or on behalf of the people of the State of California.

Second—That the proceeding by information is unknown to the laws of the State of California, and is not the proper proceeding to obtain the relief prayed for in the information filed.

After having heard counsel for the respective parties, the Court granted the motion upon the ground first set forth, and ordered and adjudged that all the proceedings in the action be dismissed and held for naught, and that the defendant go thereof without day. From this judgment the appellant has taken this appeal.

As the case stands upon the respondent's motion to dismiss the information, it must be considered that the allegations contained in it were true; and then the points to be determined are, in the first place, whether the action could be instituted and maintained in the name of the people of the State upon the information of the Attorney-General; and if it could, then, in the second place, whether the facts alleged constitute a case upon which the plaintiff is entitled to the decree thereby sought. We shall consider these propositions in their order as propounded.

1. The Third Article of the Constitution of this State is in the following language: "The powers of the Government of the State of California shall be divided into three separate departments—the Legislative, the Executive and Judicial—and no person charged with the exercise of powers properly belonging to one of these departments shall exercise any functions appertaining to either of the others, except in the cases hereinafter expressly directed or permitted." The Fifth Article of the Constitution relates to the Executive Department of the State, and enumerates the officers who belong to it, and defines in general terms the powers and duties of some of such officers, while in respect to the powers and duties of others it is silent. The Attorney-General is of the number whose powers and duties are not in any manner specified in this Article or elsewhere in the Constitution.

In 1850 an Act was passed by the Legislature entitled "An Act concerning the office of Attorney-General," prescribing the duties of that officer. Among the duties which by that Act he was required to perform was to attend each of the terms of the Supreme Court, and there prosecute or defend all causes to which the State might be a party. Nowhere in the Act is it made the duty of the Attorney-General to institute any action in a Court of original jurisdiction on behalf of the State or otherwise; but it is declared that it shall be his duty to assist in all impeachments which may be tried before the Senate, and also whenever in his opinion required by the public service, or when directed by the Governor to repair to any district in the State and assist the District Attorney in the discharge of his duties. It is also made his duty, when required, to give his opinion in writing to the Legislature, or either House thereof, upon questions of law, and to the Governor and other officers mentioned upon any questions of law relating to their respective offices. (Laws 1850, p. 55.)

The Act, as already observed, does not make it the duty of the Attorney-General to institute any action on behalf of the State in any Court of original jurisdiction, and from this silence, it is argued on behalf of the respondent, he can have no such power without the aid of legislative enactment. But can this be so, when the nature and objects of the office are considered?

The Attorney-General is the law officer of the State, and he is classed as belonging to the Executive Department of the Government. The Governor is the chief executive of that department, and by the Constitution it is made his duty to see that the laws are faithfully executed, and to this end he must have the authority, in order to execute the powers belonging to his high office, to call to his aid, when necessary, the services of this law officer. In England the Attorney-General was from an early period denominated an officer of State. He was elevated to this high position by letters patent granted by the King, and he was the legal representative of the Crown in the Courts of law and equity; he exhibited informations and prosecuted for the Crown in criminal causes; he filed bills in the exchequer in revenue cases, and informations in chancery respecting matters in which the Crown was interested. (Fortesque, Ch. 50.)

In Commonwealth v. Fowler, 10 Mass. 293, it was held that the Solicitor-General had the right ex officio to file an information against a person for usurping a public office; and in that case Mr. Chief Justice Parsons said: "An information for the purpose of dissolving a corporation, whether created by charter, under the seal of the Commonwealth, or by statute of the Legislature, may be prosecuted, either under the authority of the Legislature, to be exercised in each particular case, or by the Attorney or Solicitor-General acting ex officio in behalf of the Commonwealth." (See also State of Louisiana v. Smith, 13 Lou. Ann. R. 424.) The question as to the right of the Attorney-General of this State ex officio to file an information in the nature of a bill in chancery, to annul a patent for lands granted by the State to an individual, is one perhaps of difficult solution, but by analogy to the powers exercised by officers of like character in England, and in most, if not all of the States of the American Union, we think he may do so in a case where the matter involved in the suit immediately concerns the rights and interests of the State.

2. The disposition made of the first question we have considered does not necessarily determine this case, for whether or not the Court erred in dismissing and holding for naught the action and proceeding instituted, though as the ground for the decision a wrong reason may have been assigned, depends upon the remaining question: Did the facts and circumstances set forth in the information constitute a cause authorizing a decree in accordance with the prayer of the appellant?

The information filed must be regarded and treated in its substantive characteristics as a bill in equity. (Mitford's Ch. Pl. 21 and 120; Cooper Eq. Pl. 101 and 107; Story's Eq. Pl. section 8.) Informations in every respect follow the nature of bills except in their style. When they concern only the rights of the Government, or those whose rights are under the particular protection of the Government, they are exhibited in the name of the Attorney-General as the informant, and in the latter case always, and in the former sometimes, a relator is named, who in reality sustains and directs the suit. (Ibid.)

When the suit immediately concerns the rights and interests of the State alone, the Attorney-General proceeds by information, as was done in the case of the Attorney-General v. Vernon and others, where the defendants had, by surprise and false representation, obtained a grant by letters patent of crown lands. (1 Vern. 277 and 370.) In such case the object of the suit is to annul the patent that the State may re-invest itself with the title to the lands improperly granted. (4 Steph. Com. 48.) So, also, in Attorney-General v. Richards, in the Exchequer, (2 Anstruther, 603,) where a nuisance and purpessure, by the erection of a wharf or quay, docks and other buildings, had been committed between high and low water mark in Portsmouth harbor, it was held, upon the authority of many cases, that an information would lie to abate it, as the Crown had the right to all ports and arms of the sea, and to the soil thereof.

It will be observed by these cases that it was a matter of prominent importance that the Government was immediately concerned, as having a proprietary right in the subject matter sought to be affected by the suit.

In England, when the suit does not immediately concern the rights of the Government, as where the rights of those under its particular protection are concerned, as in the case of charities, having no charter to regulate them, or where there has been a trust conferred which has been abused, an information may be filed in behalf of the Crown to have the charity properly established, or the grievance redressed. But where informations of this kind were filed, the Attorney-General depended upon the relation of some person, whose name was inserted in the information as the relator, and the suit was carried on under his direction, and he was held responsible to the Court and to the parties for the propriety of the suit and the conduct of it, (Mitford's Ch. Pl. 23,) and also for the costs, in case the information was dismissed. (Newland's Ch. Pr. 55; Cooper's Eq. Pl. 104; 1 Vesey, Sen. 72; 2 Vesey, Sen. 330.) It has been held, however, that a relator in such cases is not indispensable; that the Attorney-General, if he pleases, may proceed without one. (2 Swanst. 520; Story's Eq. Pl. sec. 8.) But the propriety of naming a relator, who should be held responsible for the bringing of the suit, and the oppression arising from a contrary practice, was particularly noticed in the case of The Attorney-General v. Fox, (cited in a note to page 24 of Mitford's Equity Pleading.) In that case no relator was named, and though the defendants finally prevailed, they were put to an expense almost equal to the value of the property in dispute, and were entirely without remedy for their costs. (1 Vesey, Sen. 72.)

If the State had no interest in the subject matter of the proceeding commenced to set aside the patent granted to the defendant, it is difficult to understand upon what principle the information, as an information purely on behalf of the State, could be sustained. It is like a complaint that fails to state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, for the reason that it does not appear that the plaintiff has any interest in the subject matter of the action.

If the information in this case was filed for the purpose of annulling the patent because of its threatened injury to citizens of the State having interests in the lands described therein, then it should have been filed upon the relation of one or more of such persons, provided such persons were without adequate remedy at law. And in such case the relator's personal complaint would be joined to and incorporated with the information given to the Court, forming together an information and bill in equity. (Mitford's Pl. 23; Cooper's Pl. 107.)

People v. Stratton.

An information and bill cannot be supported unless the relator has some individual interest in the subject matter of the suit, (11 Sim. 380; 1 Vesey, Jr. 244,) and if the relator dies pending the action, no further proceedings can be had therein until a new relator is made a party to the record; for in a suit instituted by information and bill combined, the relator sustains both the character of plaintiff and relator. (Mitford's Pl. 120; Cooper's Pl. 107.)

The fact that the information in this case represents to the Court that the respondent had commenced an action of ejectment against divers persons in possession, and who had long been in possession of the lands described in the patent, by virtue of a legal and equitable claim, does not aid the appellant's case; for it does not appear that the State had anything to grant by the patent, but the contrary thereof is alleged; hence upon the appellant's own showing the patent could not operate to conclude any third persons as to rights and interests they might have in the lands described; and if the truth as to the character and quality of the lands be as stated by the information, it would be competent for any person having a legal right and interest in the lands to establish the fact in his defense at law to an action on behalf of the patentee to recover the possession. (Patterson v. Winn, 11 Wheat. 380; Pol-lard's Lessee v. Hagan, 3 How. 212; Goodtitle v. Kibbe, 9 How. 471.)

What may have been the origin or what may be the nature of the interests of the persons alleged to have a legal and equitable claim to the lands described in the patent, we are not advised by the information, nor do we deem it a matter of any particular importance to know. If such claim subsisted as a perfect title when California became ceded to the United States, then upon the happening of that event its character did not become changed for the worse by the treaty of cession. If the premises were high lands as contradistinguished from the lands the nature of which is described in the Acts of the Legislature referred to, and were a part of the public domain at the time of the passage of the Act of the Congress of the United States by which California became one of the States of the Union, then it must follow that no title thereto could pass to the patentee by the patent issued, for by the Act for the admission of the State of California into the Union it was enacted "that the said State of California is admitted into the Union upon the express condition that the people of said State, through their Legislature or otherwise, shall never interfere with the primary disposal of the public lands within its limits, and shall pass no law and do no act whereby the title of the United States to and right to dispose of the same shall be impaired or questioned."

In Patterson v. Winn, 11 Wheat. 380, it is laid down as the settled doctrine of the Supreme Court of the United States, that if a patent granted by a State is absolutely void upon its face, or the issuing thereof was without authority, or was prohibited by statute, or the State had no title, it may be impeached collaterally in a Court of law in an action of ejectment. But notwithstanding the patent may have been issued without authority, or the State may have had no title to grant, the patent would, in the first instance, be presumed, in an action of ejectment, to be valid, and to pass to the patentee a title to the lands described, and the burden of proof would be upon the party who might undertake its impeachment to establish the facts necessary for its overthrow; because it is not to be presumed in limine that the State has granted by patent lands which it did not own or have the right to grant. The party who may be permitted thus to impeach a patent issued by the State must himself possess a status authorizing him so to do. He must show that he has title to the premises, or such an interest therein in subordination to the title, wherever it may reside, as will authorize him to call the true title to his aid. (Terry v. Megerle, 24 Cal. 609; Doll v. Meador, 16 Cal. 324, 325.)

If the persons who are represented by the information to have a legal and equitable claim to the lands described in the patent have rights and interests therein of the character alleged they are not entirely without remedy at law, though it may not be adequate for every purpose. The remedy at law may be sufficient for their present protection, though by reason of the patent the burden of proof may be cast upon them to show that the lands in question were not of the description and quality that could be granted by the State. But as the burden of proof rests upon those who may rightfully claim the lands in hostility to the patent, which, as we hold, is prima facie evidence for the uses of the patentee, they may invoke the equitable interposition of the Court to restrain by perpetual injunction its use as evidence of title in the patentee; or perhaps the Court might go further and in the exercise of its plenary power set it aside. (2 Story's Eq. Jur. Ch. 17.)

But the party in interest in such cases may maintain an action in his own name, as thereby he can attain to the same end in effect that could be accomplished by a proceeding in the name of the people of the State upon his relation; and this course better accords with the system of procedure provided by statute in this State. (Practice Act, secs. 4 and 254.)

Judgment affirmed.

F. B. HIGGINS v. J. F. HOUGHTON, SURVEYOR-GENERAL OF THE STATE OF CALIFORNIA.

MINERAL LANDS.—Mineral lands are not excepted from the operation of the grant of the sixteenth and thirty-sixth sections in each township, made to California for school purposes by the Act of Congress of March 3, 1853.

SIXTEENTH AND THIRTY-SIXTH SECTIONS.—By the Act of Congress granting to California the sixteenth and thirty-sixth sections in each township, the State became the owner of said sections, with the right reserved in the General Government of locating the same; and as fast as townships are surveyed and sectionized the State becomes the owner of said sections absolutely, not only as to quantity but as to position also.

SAME.—The title of the State to said sections does not depend in any manner upon the action or non-action of the officers of the General Government, in approving of selections or sales of the same made by the State.

PATENTS FOR SIXTEENTH AND THIRTY-SIXTH SECTIONS.—The fact that sections sixteen and thirty-six contain mines of the precious metals does not prevent the State from selling the same and issuing patents therefor to the purchaser. The State may, however, by the passage of laws to that effect, prohibit the sale of such lands or the issuance of patents for the same.

CERTIFICATES OF PURCHASE OF SCHOOL LANDS.—Persons who hold certificates of purchase from the State for the sixteenth or thirty-sixth sections, or portions thereof, hold the land as the State held it before the certificate was issued, subject to the right of miners to enter upon and work it for mining purposes.

PATENTS FOR SCHOOL LANDS.—Query: Does the Patentee of the State, for any part of the sixteenth or thirty-sixth sections, hold the same subject to the right of miners to enter upon and work the same for mining purposes?

APPEAL from the District Court, Sixth Judicial District, Sacramento County.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the Court.

J. G. McCullough, Attorney-General, for Appellant.

Upon both these points—that this being mineral land the State cannot sell, and that having no approval of the selection by the Secretary of the Interior the State cannot give any title—the Court is referred to Lester's Land Laws, p. 643; Summers v. Dickinson, 9 Cal. 554; Doll v. Meador, 16 Cal. 296; Kyle v. Tubbs, 23 Cal. 431.

A. S. Higgins, for Respondent.

By the Court, SHAFER, J.

The complaint alleges, substantially, that the United States, by virtue of an Act of Congress, approved March 3, 1853, granted to the State of California the sixteenth and thirty-sixth sections in every township for the benefit of public schools therein; and that all and singular the conditions precedent required by the Act of the Legislature of this State, passed April 27, 1863, and entitled "An Act to provide for the sale of certain lands belonging to this State," having been fulfilled by the action of the proper State officer, and by a performance on the part of the plaintiff of all the requirements of said Act to be complied with by him, he, the said plaintiff has become and now is entitled to a patent from the Higgins & Houghton.

State of California of the north half of Section Sixteen, in Township Number Thirteen north, Range Seven east, Mount Diablo base and meridian, containing three hundred and twenty acres of land; and that it has become and is the duty of the defendant, as Register ex officio of the State Land Office, to prepare the patent aforesaid and to certify the same to the Governor for his signature; which duty the defendant neglects and refuses to perform, though specially requested so to do on the 24th of December, 1863. The complaint concludes with a prayer for a mandamus.

The answer of the defendant denies that the lands in question were ever granted to the State by the United States, and the reason assigned is that they are mineral lands; and it is further alleged as a reason why the patent should not issue, that "the plaintiff has not procured the approval of the Secretary of the Interior or the proper officer of the United States Government of his said location and selection."

It is further stated in the answer, that a written protest has been filed in the office of the defendant, signed by many persons, claiming said lands as mineral lands; and the answer further alleges that they are mineral lands in fact.

The Court below found that all the allegations of the complaint were true; that the answer stated no defense as a matter of law, and adjudged that the alternative mandamus first issued be made peremptory.

1. We shall in the first place consider whether the title to the lands in question, assuming them to be mineral lands, passed to the State by virtue of the grant contained in the Act of Congress of March 3, 1853.

The grant occurs in the sixth section of the Act referred to, and is as follows: "That all public lands in the State of California, whether surveyed or unsurveyed, with the exception of sections sixteen and thirty-six, which shall be and hereby are granted to the State for the purposes of schools in each township, and with the exception of lands appropriated under the authority of this Act or reserved by competent authority; and excepting, also, the lands claimed under any foreign grant or title, and the mineral lands, shall be subject to the pre-emption laws of the 4th of September, 1841."

The language of the grant is too exact and luminous to require or admit of any resort to construction. There is no statement of any condition, exception, reservation or limitation; and in our judgment the grant vested in the State a quantity of land equal to one thousand two hundred and eighty acres, multiplied by the number of townships into which the public lands in California were capable of being divided, the moment the Act received the signature of the President. Mineral lands are excepted from the operation of the pre-emption laws, but they are not withdrawn by the Act from the operation of the grant.

Further, there is no reason to believe that the failure of the Government to reserve the mineral lands was the result of inadvertence, for in the grant of seventy-two sections for the use of a seminary of learning, and in the grant of ten sections for the purpose of erecting public buildings, both of which grants are contained in the Act of March 3, 1853, the mineral lands are exempted from the operation of the grants respectively by express proviso.

But the question now under discussion cannot be regarded as an open one. In the case of Doll v. Meador, 16 Cal. 296, it was held that California, upon her admission into the Union, acquired, under the eighth section of the Act of Congress of September 4, 1841, entitled "An Act to appropriate the proceeds of the sales of public lands," a vested and present interest in five hundred thousand acres of land, to be selected out of any public lands of the United States within her limits, except such as were expressly excepted in the grant. This decision was affirmed in Van Valkenburg v. McCloud, 21 Cal. 380, and is, furthermore, well sustained by the decision in Foley v. Harrison, 15 How. 447.

It appears from the pleadings in the case at bar that Township Number Thirteen was surveyed and sectionized by the Surveyor-General of the United States prior to the 20th day of March, 1861, and, as we understand, subsequent to the grant.

2. As to the objection that the respondent has not procured the acceptance of his selection by the proper officers of the United States Government.

The appellant, assuming that there has been no such acceptance in fact, draws from it this conclusion: "And therefore the State cannot grant a title until she procures certified lists of the approval of selections (including respondent's) by the Secretary of the Interior."

The reasoning goes altogether upon the hypothesis that the State's title to Sections Sixteen and Thirty-Six in Township Number Thirteen, is inchoate, and that it would therefore be improper to issue a patent.

Whether the title of the State is perfect or imperfect, depends upon the legal effect of the grant contained in the Act of Congress of March 3, 1853, coupled with the subsequent survey and sectionizing of Township Number Thirteen.

Admitting that the title of the State was inchoate, in a certain sense, at the date of the grant; that is to say, that it did not determine, with then present precision, the exact localities upon which it was to attach finally, (Leisseur v. Price, 12 How. 77,) still, that is certain which may be rendered certain.

We consider that in the grant to California of March 3d, 1853, the power of locating the quantity granted — one thousand two hundred and eighty acres in effect, in two parcels in every township — was reserved to the Government, and as fast as townships thereafter were surveyed and sectionized, that the State became the owner of the sixteenth and thirty-sixth sections absolutely, not only as to quantity, but as to position also.

Township Number Thirteen was surveyed and properly subdivided subsequent to the grant and prior to May 20th, 1861; and since the date of that occurrence the State, by the effect of the grant and by the law of the event, has been and is now the absolute and several owner of the sixteenth and thirty-sixth sections of that township, as against the Government.

If there is any legislation by Congress, prior to the grant, which would interfere with the conclusion, as the objection in effect supposes, it has not been brought to our notice; and if there has been any legislation since the grant that conflicts with the conclusion, it must be null and void unless, indeed, it has been acceded to by the grantee. But we are not advised by the brief filed for the appellant that any such hostile legislation has been attempted.

3. But it does not follow necessarily that the State, because it is the owner of the sixteenth section in question, is bound to patent the north half of it to the respondent, or to anybody else.

The State, as owner of the sixteenth and thirty-sixth sections of every township within its limits, in the clear exercise of the jus disponendi, first entered the market in search of purchasers in 1858; and in a series of Acts found in the session laws of that year, the State dictated or prescribed the terms upon which it would patent those sections, in whole or in part, as well as other public lands, to individuals. In 1859-'60-'61, there was further legislation upon the general subject; and in 1863 the whole of the previous legislation was revised, and to a great extent supplanted by an Act found in the published statutes of that year at page five hundred and ninety-one.

By one of the provisions of this Act any citizen who shall have complied with all the terms and conditions set forth therein in relation to the particular land which he wishes to purchase, shall be entitled to a patent therefor.

As previously stated, it is alleged in the complaint that all the requirements of the Act, as connected with his claim to the north half of Section Sixteen of Township Number Thirteen, have been complied with by the respondent and the concurrent action of the proper public functionaries. The answer denies the averment in one particular only. The denial is as follows: "Defendant avers that plaintiff has not at any time procured the approval of the Secretary of the Interior or of the proper officer of the United States Government to plaintiff's location or selection."

We have already passed upon the question whether the title of the State to the sixteenth and thirty-sixth sections was by the terms of the grant of March 3, 1853, made to depend in any manner upon the action or non-action of the Secretary of the Interior, and the question now presented is, first, whether by the Act of the Legislature of California passed in 1863 the approval of the Secretary of the Interior of the plaintiff's selection of the north half of Section Sixteen, Township Number Thirteen, is made a condition precedent to the plaintiff's right to a patent therefor from the State.

On this point it is sufficient to say, that in the brief of counsel no reference is made to any such provision in the Act of 1863, or in any of the Acts that preceded it. We have diligently examined the whole series of Acts for ourselves, and can find no traces of any such provision.

But the averment in the answer is in the alternative: "Nor has the plaintiff procured the approval of the proper officer of the Government to said selection or location."

The Act of 1863 (page 594, section 8) is as follows: "Whenever the amount of three hundred and twenty or more acres has been applied for under any one grant, he (the State Locating Agent) shall in behalf of the State make application to the Register of the United States Land Office for the district, for such lands, in part satisfaction of the grant under which they are located, and obtain his acceptance of the selections, which acceptance, together with the corresponding certificates of location according to the form prescribed by the Surveyor-General, he shall forward with the proper affidavits to the office of the Surveyor-General for approval, and when approved and returned to him, he shall record the approval and forward the approved certificate of location to the applicant."

Assuming that the approval of the United States Register, spoken of in this section, is a condition upon which the right to a patent is made to depend, still the issue taken by the answer upon the question of fact, was determined against the appellant by the Court. There is no statement of the evidence, nor was there any motion made for new trial. The appeal is from the judgment alone.

There is a stipulation in the case that the parties mutually waive "all observance of form and regularity in time, pleadings and orders," still we are limited by the stipulation to "the questions of law presented by the case," and they are limited to questions of error arising upon the judgment roll.

4. As to the protest filed in the office of the appellant.

The protest states that the parties to it are citizens "dwelling" on the north half of Section Sixteen, Township Number Thirteen; that a large number of copper and gold and silver ledges were discovered and located in February, 1863, on the same, and a mining district formed embracing said tract of land, and that over fifty thousand dollars worth of work has been done on said ledges; and if said tract of land should be patented to Higgins, property of the value of more than one hundred thousand dollars will be taken from the present owners.

It is not stated that the signers of the protest have any interest in the land, ledges or mining improvements, or that they or any of them will be subjected to any loss should the patent issue. On the face of the protest the parties to it have no relations to the land except as "dwellers" upon it at the point of time when the protest was signed—December 10th, 1863. Nor does it appear from the protest or otherwise, that down to the date of the respondent's certificate of purchase—November 16th, 1863—there were any improvements upon the land not put there by him, nor that any one had, anterior to that date, any valid claim, or even preferred an invalid one, to the land as such. Still, we consider the protesters as competent parties under the Act of 1863, to contest the plaintiff's right to a patent. (Tyler v. Houghton, 25 Cal. 26.)

Assuming, then, that all the averments and recitals set forth in the protest are true, the question is presented, whether, on the ground of any or all of them, or on the ground of any other fact which the case discloses, the plaintiff is barred of a patent.

If barred, it cannot be on the ground that a pre-emption right to the land is or may be outstanding in some one claiming under the laws of the United States; for by the grant of the sixteenth and thirty-sixth sections to the State in full property, they were effectually withdrawn from the operation of the Acts relating to pre-emptions; and further, if they had never been so granted, no one, by virtue of those Acts, could have ever acquired any title to or interest in them if they are mineral lands, as both the protest and answer allege them to be.

Neither can it be said that the plaintiff's right fails on the ground of any claim to the land, at such, superior to his own, for the case shows no such claim either real or pretended.

It results, then, that if a patent is not due to the plaintiff it must be on the ground that the mining claims taken up in February, 1863, on the lines of the ledges named in the protest, would pass to the plaintiff by force of the patent, and that, the ledges having been thus reduced to private ownership, mining claims could not thereafter be located upon them under the rules and regulations of miners.

If this were all true, still the State has both the right and the power to do as it chooses, with its own. If the State owns mineral lands, its right to sell and convey them cannot be disputed. By so doing it might prejudice its own interests, and even violate its faith pledged to those who may have taken up and worked mining claims on mineral lands belonging to it, by its implied license; but as a question of power, the matter admits of but one solution.

The apprehension, however, that a patent to the plaintiff of the north half of the section in question would interfere with the mining claims and improvements now upon it, or that it would prevent the taking up and working of like claims hereafter, may be wholly groundless—a point, however, which we do not intend to decide.

The Act of 1863, section seventeen, is as follows: "Where a certificate of purchase has been issued by the Register, the same shall be deemed prima facie evidence of legal title to the land for which the certificate of purchase issued; provided, such certificates of purchase shall not be so construed as to affect the working of mineral lands for mining purposes."

Three things at least are demonstrated by this provision: First, that the State by the Act of 1863 assumed that it was the owner of mineral lands, and that as such owner it had the right to sell and convey them; Second, that it was the purpose of the Act to put these lands upon the market for sale upon the terms and under the methods prescribed in the Act for the sale of the public lands at large; Third, that it was, however, the intention of the Act that the parties by whom such mineral lands should be purchased, and to whom they should be certified, should hold them under the certificate as the State held them before the certificate was issued—subject to be entered upon and worked for mining purposes.

Should a patent then be issued to the plaintiff of the north half of section sixteen, he might, perhaps, hold the patent, notwithstanding the absoluteness of its terms, subject to the rule of construction provided for in the Act under which he purchased, and under which his title paper issued. True, by the mere words of the statute, the rule of construction referred to is applied to the certificate of purchase alone; but the point may at least be made, that the Legislature intended that the patent, as a title paper, should be affected by the rule of construction to which the document that precedes it in the order of events, is expressly subjected. If it should be held that the main purpose of section seventeen was to conserve the policy of the State in the matter of mines and mining as settled at the beginning of its political history, then section seventeen should undoubtedly be so construed that that result may be secured.

We have, in this opinion, passed upon all the questions raised and discussed by counsel—though to a disposition of the case a decision of one point only was essential—and we

Treble damages were not claimed in the complaint. The rule is, that when treble damages are given by a statute, the plaintiff must expressly claim such damages, and also count upon the statute. (Chipman v. Emeric, 5 Cal. 239.) This case has never been reversed. The subsequent cases of O'Callaghan v. Booth, 6 Cal. 63, and Hart v. Moore, 6 Cal. 161, only hold that in actions of forcible entry, the plaintiff need not in his complaint refer to the statute. The amendment to the twelfth section of the Forcible Entry Act requires that the treble damages shall be claimed in the complaint.

M. S. Chase, for Respondent.

The error assigned is, that trebled damages were not claimed in the complaint; and

1. Upon this point it may be remarked that the twelfth section, until the amendment thereof, made May 20, 1861, (Laws 1861, p. 582,) and now repealed (Laws 1863, p. 655) by Act of April 27, 1863, never provided for any "claim" (eo nomine) for damages, and that this amendment in nowise provides that the claim shall be for treble damages, but only that "damages shall be assessed if claimed in the complaint," * * * "and when so assessed shall be trebled by the Justice and entered as a judgment," etc. In other words, by the amendment the landlord was held only to claim and prove damages; and then when assessed, it became the magistrate's duty, not by reason of the claim therefor, but in the enjoined exercise of penal authority to treble them.

"This section (twelfth) is added, not merely to indemnify the complainant for the injuries suffered from loss of rents and profits, and for waste committed, but to punish the offending party." (Mr. Chief Justice Field, in Hicks v. Herring, 17 Cal. 568.)

2. As to the rule contended for by appellant, that when treble damages are given by the statute the plaintiff must expressly claim such damages and count upon the statute, it is deemed sufficient to say that both the rule and the sole case cited in its support, (Chipman v. Emeric, 5 Cal. 239,) have no application to the case at bar.

By the Court, CURREY, J.

This is an action arising under the Act concerning forcible entries and unlawful detainers as that Act stood in 1862 and 1863. The Court, before which the cause was tried without a jury, found that the premises were unlawfully held and detained from the plaintiff by the defendant, and that by reason thereof the plaintiff had sustained damage in the sum of one hundred and forty dollars; and in that sum the damages were assessed, and immediately thereupon trebled by the Court. Judgment was then entered for the restitution of the premises and for the damages as trebled.

The only point made by the appellant on the appeal is, that the Court erred in giving judgment for treble the damages assessed, because, he says, the damages were not claimed in the complaint.

The complaint, after setting forth the facts constituting the plaintiff's cause of action, concludes as follows: "Whereby the said plaintiff hath sustained damages by reason of the said unlawful and wrongful detention and holding over to the amount of one hundred dollars. Plaintiff further alleges that the monthly rents and profits of said premises, dwelling house, outhouses and improvements is reasonably worth twelve dollars a month," and then follows the appropriate prayer for judgment.

The twelfth section of the Act referred to provides that "the damages shall be assessed, if claimed in the complaint as well for waste and injury committed upon the premises as for the rents and profits during the detainer, and the verdict shall also find the monthly value of the rents and profits of the premises; and the complainant shall be entitled to recover treble damages against the person against whom the judgment has been rendered; which damages shall be assessed by the Justice or jury, and when assessed shall be trebled by said Justice, and entered as a judgment in the cause, upon which execution may issue."

It will be observed the statute provides that the damages shall be assessed, if claimed in the complaint, as well for waste and injury committed as for the rents and profits during the detainer. The damages are not necessarily confined to compensation for waste and injury only, as these terms are understood in their proper technical sense, but the value of the rents and profits may enter into the estimate of damages, as the language of the statute clearly imports. If no waste or other injury be committed, the loss of the use and occupation of the premises may be the only damage sustained by the complainant, and that value when ascertained is the proper measure of damages in such case. These damages are to be ascertained, or in other words, assessed, by the jury or by the Court acting without a jury, according to the truth of the case; and when this is done, it is made the duty of the Court to treble them.

The statute does not contemplate by the words, "the damages shall be assessed, if claimed in the complaint," that the complaint shall contain a claim for treble damages, but rather a claim for the damages which a jury is competent to assess. The office of trebling the damages belongs to the Court.

The "Act relating to the rights and duties of landlords and tenants," passed in 1861, (Laws 1861, p. 514,) we are of opinion has no application to this case.

The complaint contained the necessary claim for damages, and the amount thereof having been assessed, the Court was bound to treble the sum so ascertained.

Judgment affirmed.

MATILDA C. GRAY AND FRANKLINA C. GRAY, BY PHILIP G. GALPIN, HER GUARDIAN, v. JAMES W.
DOUGHERTY AND SAMUEL B. MARTIN.

FORMER SUIT AND JUDGMENT IN BAR.—The former judgment of a Court, having jurisdiction over the subject matter and the parties, is a bar to a second suit upon the same cause of action between the same parties or their privies, and is conclusive, not only upon every question involved therein and thereby determined, but also as to every other matter which the parties might have litigated in the cause and which they might have decided.

SAME.—In order to render the former judgment effectual as a bar, it must appear that the matters litigated were submitted on their merits, and annually passed on by the Court; for if the trial went off on a technical defect, or because the cause of action had not yet accrued, or because of the temporary disability of the plaintiff to sue, or the like, the judgment will be no bar to a future action.

PROOF OF WHAT WAS PASSED ON IN A SUIT.—The issues passed on in a former suit may be ascertained by an inspection of the judgment roll; and if that fails to disclose all the facts necessary to a complete determination of the question, a resort may be had to extrinsic evidence.

AN ERRONEOUS JUDGMENT A BAR.—The question whether a former judgment is erroneous is not material; for an erroneous judgment, until reversed, is as binding and conclusive upon parties and privies as one in which no error is found.

PREMATURE SUIT NO BAR.—If a demand by the vendee for a deed from the vendor is necessary before suit can be brought for a specific performance of a contract to convey land, and a suit is brought to enforce such performance before a demand is made, and judgment is rendered in favor of the defendant by reason of a failure to make such demand, the judgment is no bar to a future action by the vendee, or his successor in interest.

JOINDER OF ACTIONS.—Where a party is entitled to both legal and equitable relief, in a matter arising out of the same transaction and founded on the same instrument in writing, the whole matter may be litigated and finally settled in the same action.

DEMAND OF DEED BY VENDEE.—Before the vendee can maintain an action to recover damages for the breach of a covenant to convey land, he must demand his deed from the vendor; otherwise, where he brings an action for specific performance, in which case a demand is important only in respect to costs, and does not affect the merits of the case or the rights of the parties.

SAME.—If, however, the vendor, by any act of his, prevents the vendee from performing his part of the agreement, or makes it known that he does not intend to perform his covenant, except upon compulsion, the vendee is not required to demand a deed from the vendor, or perform his part of the agreement before commencing suit; and in such case a Court of equity will award a decree, compelling specific performance within a certain time, provided the vendee shall have before that time performed on his part.

COSTS IN EQUITY.—Costs in equity are always in the discretion of the Court, and whether granted or withheld are but as incidents to and no part of the relief sought.

APPEAL from the District Court, Third Judicial District, Alameda County.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the Court.

E. W. F. Sloan, for Appellants, on the question of the former judgment in bar, cited: Gregory v. Burrall, 3 Edw. Ch. C. 417; Hughes v. Blake, 1 Mason, 518; Penrie v. Dunn, 4 John. Ch. 142; Hunt v. Terrill's Heirs, 7 J. J. Marsh, 68; Wilcox v. Balger, 6 Ham. Ohio, 409.

Where the plaintiff discovers, on the trial of his cause, that he cannot safely rest upon the proof introduced, he should take a nonsuit or an order dismissing his bill without prejudice, otherwise the judgment or decree will conclude him in any subsequent suit on the same cause of action. (Jenkins v. Johnson, 4 Jones' Eq., N. C. 149; Hall v. Dodge, 38 New Hamp. 346; Colburn v. Woodworth, 31 Barb. 382.)

If the judgment of the Court did not afford Amador all the relief he thought himself entitled to, he should have moved for a new trial, applied for a rehearing, or taken and prosecuted an appeal. (Hall v. Dodge, 38 N. Hamp. 346; Jenkins v. Johnson, 4 Jones' Eq. 149; Wainwright v. Rowland, 25 Miss. (4 Jones) 53; Coggins v. Bulwinkle, 1 E. D. Smith, 484; Castle v. Noyes, 4 Kernan, 329; Doty v. Brown, 4 Comst. 71.)

Wm. W. Crane, Jr., for Respondents.

It becomes necessary to examine the judgment and proceedings in Amador v. Norris, to see if they estop us from obtaining our just rights in the present action.

Clearly they will not, unless we find that in them the matters here presented have once been, not argued nor pleaded, but determined. (1 Greenleaf Ev. p. 529; Swett v. Tuttle, 4 Kernan, 465.)

Were they so determined?

The rule upon which the defendants rely is, that there must be an end to litigation; and public policy will not admit that the same cause of action be re-tried after the solemn determination of a Court upon it.

We acknowledge the rule, but we say that the question here presented was not determined in Amador v. Norris. To purpose. (Burkhead v. Brown, 5 Sandf. 151; Wood v. Jackson, 8 Wendell, 1-49.)

Unless the matter of estoppel appears from the record to have been determined, the defendant must supply defect by parol. (1 Kern. 426.)

But there is no need of parol proof where the pleadings demand two species of relief wholly distinct in kind, the one thing asked for being a sum of money, and the other being the performance of a certain act. Is it not pushing this principle of intendment to an absurdity, to say that the money judgment includes within it that cause of action whose remedy is a conveyance, unless parol proof be introduced to show the contrary?

The judgment can surely determine only such causes of action as are homogeneous with itself.

If I join an action of damages for a broken leg with an action of replevin for a horse, and have a money judgment only, how does that judgment determine the horse is or is not mine, and how could such a judgment be a bar to a second suit in replevin?

But the action of Amador v. Norris was not an action at law, but in equity; and the decree should always find the facts which warrant it. (Abbe v. Goodwin, 7 Conn. 377.)

There is nothing in the decree which refers in the remotest manner to the question of specific performance.

It is immaterial whether these two causes of action could have been joined or not. It is pretty certain that we could not have a money judgment on one cause of action, and a decree in equity on the other, in the same bill.

Now, Amador did have the money judgment. If he could not have had the decree also, he must have waived it. If he did, the whole question is still open. (Larue v. Davis, 13 Johns. 227.)

The whole argument of the defendant must come down to this: "The Court did not find in favor of Amador for the specific performance, therefore, by implication, they found against him."

No judgment or decree can be thus extended by or implication.

The point decided is the thing fixed by the judge v. Table Mt. Water Co., 12 Cal. 409; Heusto 13 Cal. 27; Earl v. Bull, 15 Cal. 421; Kidd v 182; Fulton v. Hanlow, 20 Cal. 450; Colton 496; Hobbs v. Duff, 23 Cal. 596.)

Yates v. Fassett, 5 Denio, 21, is a case in replevin failed to ask for a restoration had judgment for costs only. He then took the property, which, pending the litigation, was over to the plaintiff.

Held — that the partial judgment prevented him from maintaining a second action.

By the Court, SANDERSON, C.

On the 25th of October, 1851, the plaintiff seized of certain land in Colorado, and conveyed the same to Leo Noyes, who remained unpaid. On the 1st of November, 1851, the plaintiff brought suit against Noyes for the money and enforce his judgment of February, 1852, the same was between them by an agreement that all existing claims were annulled and rendered void, and his suit, and that Noyes should pay the plaintiff ten thousand dollars, and that Noyes should relinquish by quitclaim deed the land conveyed to him, and the corner of the same, and that he made a formal conveyance of a portion of the same to the plaintiff. On the 1st of May, 1852, McAllister brought suit against the same.

and child are plaintiffs and respondents. On the 15th of December, 1852, Amador sold and conveyed the whole of said tract to the defendant and appellant, Dougherty, at the price of twenty thousand dollars. On the 24th of June, 1854, Leo Norris sold and conveyed to Dougherty the same tract of land, excepting one square league in the northwest corner; since which time Dougherty has sold and conveyed an undivided third thereof to his co-defendant, Martin. Norris never did quitclaim or otherwise convey the legal title to Amador as to any part of the land; so that neither Jones nor Dougherty acquired, by their respective deeds from Amador, a legal estate in any part of the land. By deed from Norris, however, of the 24th of June, 1854, Dougherty obtained the legal title to the land therein described, including so much of the Sycamore Valley as lies in the limits of the Amador Ranch.

The present action is brought for the purpose of procuring a conveyance of the legal title to the Sycamore Valley; or, in other words, for the purpose of enforcing, as against Dougherty and Martin, specific performance of the agreement between Amador and Norris to the extent of that valley.

On the 20th of March, 1852, Amador brought suit upon the same contract against Norris to obtain judgment for the balance of the six thousand dollars due him under the contract, and for the further sum of thirty thousand dollars, as damages for the breach of other covenants contained therein, including the covenant to convey, and also to obtain a decree for the specific performance of the last named covenant by quitclaim deed to the entire ranch, except one league in the northwest corner, including said Sycamore Valley. In said action there was rendered, on the 4th day of November, 1854, a final judgment in favor of Amador for the sum of one thousand six hundred dollars and costs of suit. This one thousand six hundred dollars was the balance of the six thousand dollars which the jury found was due and unpaid. No judgment was rendered or denied, except by implication, for damages on account of the breach of the covenant to convey, nor was a decree for specific performance granted or refused in mination of the question, a resort may be had to extrinsic evidence. (Dunckel v. Wiles, 1 Kernan, 420.) If it appear that the parties are the same, or that those in the second suit respectively claim under those in the first; that the cause of action in question is the same, and that in the former suit it was submitted and tried on its merits, and a judgment thereon rendered by a Court of competent jurisdiction, such judgment is conclusive and a bar to the further prosecution of the second action. Nor is it material whether such judgment is erroneous or not, for, until reversed, an erroneous judgment is as binding and conclusive upon parties and privies as one in which no error is found. (Reynolds v. Harris, 14 Cal. 678.)

To support the plea in bar, defendants rely upon the judgment roll in Amador v. Norris, unaccompanied by any other evidence. By an inspection of the record in that case it appears that the written contract upon which the plaintiffs in the present case base their right to relief is the same upon which Amador sued, and upon which he relied for a recovery against Norris.

It further appears that the same relief was sought by Amador which is sought by the plaintiffs in the present case, and, so far as the particular cause of action in question is concerned, that the averments and proofs in Amador's case were substantially the same as that in the case at bar, except in the following particulars: In the present case there is an averment of a special demand for a deed, and a refusal, but in Amador's case no such averment was made, there being only the general allegation that Norris had wholly failed, neglected and refused to make the deed in question within one month from the date of the contract as required by its terms. In all other respects the two cases are the same. This difference, in our judgment, is the pivot upon which the question under consideration must turn. If a demand for the deed, before suit, was necessary in order to enable Amador to maintain his action and entitle him to a decree for a deed or a judgment for damages, and no such demand was averred or proved, or, in fact, existed, his cause of action had not accrued at the time the suit was brought,

Fourth — By the Court when upon the trial, and before the final judgment of the case, the plaintiff abandons it. Fifth — By the Court upon motion of the defendant, when upon the trial the plaintiff fails to prove a sufficient case for the jury. The hundred and forty-ninth section provides that in every case other than those mentioned in the one hundred and forty-ninth section the judgments shall be rendered on the merits.

There was no nonsuit taken by the plaintiff before the verdict, nor was the particular cause of action withdrawn in any manner from the consideration of the Court at any stage of the proceedings, nor was there any prejudice. Such being the case, the question is that the Court, pursuant to the provisions of the hundred and forty-ninth section of the Practice Act, rendered a judgment on the merits, having all the facts before it, considered and passed upon them all, and granted to the plaintiff all the relief to which, in the opinion of the Court, he was entitled. Under such circumstances the judgment of the Court must be held to be a denial of further relief.

The fact that both legal and equitable causes of action were joined in the complaint was no impediment in the way of the Court's granting full relief upon both, if warranted by the facts. Both arose out of the same transaction, and were found in the same written instrument, and there seems to be no reason why, in such cases, the whole matter should not be litigated, and finally settled and determined in the same proceeding. Admitting that a ground of demurrer existed, it was waived, and may be waived under the statute by not demurring. If a demurrer was interposed, it does not seem to have been sustained, and to a judgment, and the presumption is that it was waived or abandoned.

Thus, the sufficiency of the plea in bar is made to depend entirely upon the question of demand. If a demand was necessary, the Court was right in not giving perform his covenant except upon compulsion, thus in effect refusing in advance of a demand, neither law nor equity imposes upon the vendee the observance of a ceremony thus made idle and fruitless. Under such circumstances a Court of equity will go so far as to interpose and compel specific performance before the vendee has complied with the contract on his part, when it would be inequitable and unconscientious to allow the vendor to evade his covenant, and will award a decree compelling specific performance within a certain time, provided the vendee shall have before that time performed on his part. (Davis et al. v. Hone, 2 Schoales and Lefroy, 341; Bourke v. Bocquet, 1 Desausser, 142; and Washburn and Wife v. Dewy, 17 Vermont, 92.)

Thus it appears there are circumstances which excuse the absence of a demand, and it only remains to determine whether the case of Amador v. Norris comes within the general rule or forms one of the exceptional cases. It appears that under the contract of the 19th of February, 1852, Amador and Norris agreed, among other things, to annul all existing contracts between them and submit all matters in difference to two arbitrators, one of whom was to be selected by each. These arbitrators were to be chosen and to act within a certain time. Each party selected his arbitrator pursuant to the agreement, but they never met. Amador appeared at the time and place appointed, but, as the jury find, Norris revoked the power of his arbitrator before the time of meeting. Amador, in perfect good faith, had dismissed his action against Norris for the recovery of the purchase money for the land and the enforcement of his vendor's lien. But Norris, when called upon and after due notice, as found by the jury, refused to perform the first act required of him under the agreement, and without any apparent reason retraced the steps which he had taken to that end. This was an act of bad faith on the part of Norris, and was an open violation of the terms of his contract. From his conduct, it was apparent that he did not intend to abide by his covenants, notwithstanding Amador had in good faith performed on his part. By the terms of the contract, Norris was to perform within one month from its date; yet he not only did not perform, but, when notified, in the manner pointed out by the contract, he refused to take the first step in the path of obedience to his covenant. We think this was such an act of bad faith, and such an open disavowal of his obligation on the part of Norris, as to warrant the conclusion that an express demand for further performance would have been fruitless. This view is fully sustained by the answer filed in the case. It contains no complaint on the ground that no demand had been made, nor does it aver a willingness to perform, but defends upon entirely different grounds.

From all the circumstances, we are of the opinion that no demand was necessary in order to enable Amador to maintain an action for damages for a breach of the covenant to convey. So far as his right to maintain an action for specific performance is concerned, it seems no demand was necessary except so far as the right to recover costs was involved. In Bruce v. Tilson, 25 N. Y. 197, the Court of Appeals of New York said: "The distinction between an action for a specific performance in equity and a suit at law for damages for non-performance is this—that in the latter the right of action grows out of a breach of the contract, and a breach must exist before the commencement of the action, while in the former the contract itself, and not a breach of it, gives the action. A demand of performance before suit is brought is only important in reference to the costs of the action, and has no bearing upon the merits or the rights of the parties. But by a demand and refusal the party liable to perform is put in the wrong and in the situation of unreasonably resisting his adversary, and is therefore chargeable with costs. Costs in equity are always in the discretion of the Court, and whether they are granted or withheld, they are but as incidents to and no part of the relief sought. A party getting the relief asked may be compelled to pay costs, but nevertheless his cause of action had accrued upon the filing of the bill or the commencement of the suit."

Thus in every point of view it is apparent that the judgment roll in Amador v. Norris shows that Amador had performed the contract in question on his part before he commenced his action; that he sought in that action all the relief both at law and in equity to which under the facts of the case he was entitled; that his whole case, without any part of it being withdrawn, was submitted to the jury and he obtained a verdict upon which he was entitled to a judgment for damages, or a decree for specific performance at the hands of the Court, as he might elect, or as the Court might determine. Hence the whole case was tried and submitted upon its merits and a judgment rendered thereon. That the judgment was erroneous there is no doubt; but, whether so or not, is wholly immaterial so far as the question under consideration is concerned. Until reversed it is conclusive upon parties and privies.

The conclusion to which we have arrived on the plea in bar renders it unnecessary to pass upon the question as to whether the defendants acquired the legal title to the land in question with notice of the plaintiff's equity.

Judgment reversed and the Court below directed to render a judgment in conformity with this opinion.

W. BARTRAM v. THE CENTRAL TURNPIKE COMPANY, AND W. BARTRAM v. R. C. OGILBY, R. A. PEARIS, AND JAMES McDONALD.

ACT AUTHORIZING EL DORADO AND SACRAMENTO COUNTIES TO BUILD A ROAD.

— There is nothing contained in the Act of 1857, submitting to the people of Sacramento and El Dorado Counties a proposition to appropriate money for the construction of a wagon road from Sacramento County, through El Dorado County, to Carson Valley, or in the Acts amendatory thereof, which gives to the two counties, or either of them, the exclusive right to construct or maintain a road along the intended route; nor does the Act of 1862, authorizing the Board of Supervisors of El Dorado County to lease said road, grant to El Dorado County or the lessee such exclusive right.

LEGISLATIVE GRANTS.— Public grants are to be strictly construed, and nothing passes to the grantee by implication.

GRANT OF FRANCHISE.— The grant of a franchise is not exclusive, unless it is expressly made so by the grant itself.

RIGHT TO MAKE ROADS.—The State does not possess the exclusive authority to construct a road over the public domain, or over any land within the State: but any person who can procure from the landholder a right of way, may construct and maintain a road.

COLLECTION OF TOLLS ON ROADS.—The right to collect tolls on a road when constructed is a franchise, and cannot be exercised except it be granted by the Legislature, or some branch of the Government vested by the Legislature with the power to grant the franchise.

SAME.—The grant of a franchise to collect tolls on a particular road does not, by implication, prohibit the construction of roads parallel to the one vested with the franchise.

APPEAL from the District Court, Eleventh Judicial District, El Dorado County.

Defendants recovered judgments in the Court below, and plaintiff appealed.

The other facts are stated in the opinion of the Court.

H. O. Beatty, for Appellant.

George E. Williams, for Respondents.

By the Court, RHODES, J.

The two causes are contained in one record, and have been argued and submitted together. The questions involved in each are in most respects identical, and their separate consideration will not be required.

The plaintiff is the lessee of that portion of the Sacramento and El Dorado Wagon Road, commencing at or near Bartram's Sawmill, about eighteen miles east of Placerville, and running thence eastward to Strawberry Station, a distance of about thirty miles. The County of El Dorado, under the authority of the Act approved April 9, 1862, leased the road to the plaintiff for the term of five years giving the lessee the right to collect certain stipulated tolls, and the lessee covenanting to put and keep the road in repair, and to pay the county fifty dollars per month, after the first three months. The road was constructed by the Counties of Sacramento and El Dorado, under the provisions of the Sacramento and El Doradio Wagon Road Act of 1857, and the Acts a thereof, and was intended as a free public road.

At the date of the lease, the Central Turnpike Co corporation organized under the general laws of the the owner and had the control, of a turnpike road from Strawberry Station, westerly to Dick's Station with and near the Sacramento and El Dorado road the same time Ogilby and his co-defendants (who, commencement of the action, have, with others, org incorporation, under the general Incorporation Act, name and style of the Teamsters' Turnpike Compan and had the possession of another road, running from not far distant from Bartram's Sawmill easterly to Webster's Station. Webster's Station and Dick's Station on the Sacramento and El Dorado road and are dis each other about one mile, and the plaintiffs claim Ogilby road terminated about half a mile west of Station, at Carpenter's house. At the commencement of the actions, there was no road parallel to the Sacramento and El Dorado roads between Webster's and Dick's and the plaintiff then had his toll-gate between the actions.

The plaintiff instituted these actions in equity to enjoin the defendants from constructing a road, parallel with the Central Turnpike Company's road with the eastern terminus of the Ogilby road, alleging that the defendants were about to construct the road; that thereby he would be deprived of a large amount of tolls, and that the injury he would thus sustain was irreparable. He alleges also that he has sustained damage by the defendants having constructed their road across the land and by their having taken possession of, and constructed a road, over a short space, where he had surveyed a road, as a portion of his road, and he has not pressed those points, and it is sufficient to show that if he has sustained damage by those acts, or been fully ousted from the possession of any land that he session of in connection with his road, he has an adequate remedy at law.

The main question in the cases has been argued with great ability and zeal by the counsel of the respective parties, but we do not apprehend that it is difficult of solution. The plaintiff, in order to maintain his position, is bound to show that he has the exclusive right, during his term, to construct a road through what the parties have denominated the Placerville Pass; at least, that he alone has the right to collect tolls from persons travelling that route. We understand the plaintiff to disclaim the right to collect tolls from persons travelling over the roads of defendants, who have not passed over some portion of his road, but he insists that the defendants shall not be allowed to build a road between the termini of their roads; and if they shall be enjoined, the consequence will be that those who intend passing over the two roads of the defendants, must of necessity, pass for a short distance, over the plaintiff's road and pay toll at his gate, the result of which would be to make all who pass over the road pay the plaintiff toll. He complains that the object of the defendants in building the connecting link in their roads is to prevent the plaintiff from collecting tolls, by permitting persons to pass around his toll gate, but this position cannot be maintained, except so far as that result incidentally accrues. The apparent object of the defendants is to induce travellers to take their roads, for if persons who passed over their roads were required to pay tolls to them and also tolls to plaintiff, for passing over a mile and a half of the plaintiff's road, they would travel the plaintiff's road to save a double charge.

It will be observed that there is nothing in the Act authorizing the road to be leased, nor in the lease, which establishes a place for the collection of tolls, or restricts the lessee to any one place for the erection of his toll gate; and such being the case, he may resort to any means in his power, that would be justified by law, to collect toll from those who make use of his road.

As the result that would ensue from the construction of the proposed road by the defendants, would be that a portion of the travel would be diverted from the plaintiff's road to the defendants' roads, the propositions of the parties is reduced to the simple question whether the lease executed to the plaintiff by the County of El Dorado, in conformity with the Act of 1862, granted to the lessee during his term the exclusive right to maintain a road along that portion of the route where, at the date of the lease, there was no parallel road.

As already observed, the construction of the road was provided for by law, as a public highway, and no tolls were authorized to be collected, and no other or greater power over the road was conferred upon either of the counties than is given by the general road law over county roads.

Subsequently, tolls were required to be collected at Brockliis' Bridge, on the line of the road, the rates to be fixed by the Board of Supervisors of El Dorado County. But there is nothing in any of the Acts relating to the road which expressly gives the two counties, or either of them, the exclusive right to construct or maintain a road along the intended route, or that even confers upon either county the exclusive right to maintain a toll or other bridge on the proposed route at or near the Brockliis Bridge. Nor does the Act authorizing the making of the lease purport to grant to the county, nor to the lessee, such exclusive right, and no clause or covenant in the lease grants to the lessee the right claimed by him.

If the exclusive right set up by the plaintiff exists, it must arise, by implication, from the Acts of the Legislature. It is not derived from the lease alone, for under it the lessee took only such rights as the county was authorized to grant, and did grant, by virtue of the Act conferring the power.

The plaintiff, in support of the proposition, cites as conclusive authority the case of Charles River Bridge v. Warren Bridge, 11 Peters, 420, and the defendants rely with equal confidence upon the same case to maintain the negative of the question.

That case, which was so elaborately argued and fully considered, has been for years regarded as the leading authority,

If the doctrine of that case could be considered doubtful, or its authority questioned, the Court, in ascertaining whether in a given case the granting power had intended to confer, or had conferred, by a grant of the franchise, an exclusive right by implication, would be justified in looking at all the surrounding circumstances, and placing itself as near as may be in the position of the granting power at the time of the making of the grant. At the time the two counties were authorized by the Legislature to construct the road, the general law regulating the construction of turnpike roads was in force, and has so remained to the present time; and under its provisions, and subject to the conditions therein expressed, persons were permitted to construct turnpike roads and collect tolls thereon. No reason has been assigned, why the grant to the county, of the right to lease the road, and regulate the tolls to be paid to the lessee, shall be considered as of any other higher order, or as conferring a franchise of a more exclusive nature than the general grant contained in the Turnpike Act. Nor is it pretended and it could not be maintained, that the general law was in any respect repealed by the special Act. The grant of power to the county, to execute the lease, and the lease when made, was subject not only to all rights that had accrued to other persons, but also to such as might be legally acquired under the general law. In fact, the granting power recognized the existence of parallel roads, and by prohibiting the owners of such roads from becoming the lessees of the county road, the Legislature seemed to contemplate, that parallel roads would be constructed and maintained, and manifested a policy well calculated to prevent all the roads over that route from being controlled by the same person or corporation.

Justices Story and McLean, in their dissenting opinions in Charles River Bridge v. Warren Bridge seem to put much stress upon the fact that Charles River was a navigable arm of the sea, that the Legislature of Massachusetts had the exclusive control of it, and that no one could of common right erect a bridge over the river, but that authority must first be had for that purpose from the Legislature. In that respect, that case is much stronger than the one before us, for the exclusive authority cannot be claimed in behalf of the State to authorize the construction of a road over the public domain, or indeed over any land within the State; but, on the contrary, any person who can procure from the landholder the right of way may construct and maintain a road. It is only in respect to the right to collect tolls on his road when constructed, that he must make application to the Legislature or some branch of the Government vested by the Legislature with the power to grant the franchise.

The Legislature had, previous to the Act of 1862, vested this franchise, in respect to the road in question, in the County of El Dorado, in trust that the proceeds should be expended in maintaining the road. Upon the passage of the Act of 1862 no new franchise was granted, nor was the existing franchise granted away from the county, but the county was empowered to lease the existing franchise, that is to say, the right to collect tolls, but not the bed of the road, for neither the county nor the State owned that—and during the term, the lessee was authorized to enjoy the franchise in the same manner and to the same extent, that the county before that time had held it. Before the Act of 1862 neither the county nor private persons were directly nor by implication prohibited from constructing roads, that might take a portion of the travel that had been accustomed to pass over the Sacramento and El Dorado Wagon Road; and we see nothing in the fact that the county was empowered to make a lease, and did execute it, that creates the prohibition by implication against the construction of parallel roads by either the county or private persons.

If this question was involved in great doubt, we would be justified in looking at the consequences of the assertion of the right claimed by the plaintiff to ascertain what was the intention of the granting power. It is the unquestioned policy of the Government to encourage the construction of roads wherever public convenience may require them, and in pursuance of that purpose private rights are made to yield to the wants of the public. For that purpose, private property may be taken for public use upon just compensation being made therefor. If the doctrine contended for by the plaintiff could be maintained, each road, bridge or ferry franchise would become a monopoly, as odious in many respects as those formerly claimed by royal grant or by prescription in England for the buying, selling, making or using of those things which were considered among the necessities of life, retarding and impeding the progress of business and improvement, and inflicting an unnecessary inconvenience and expense upon the many, with but slight corresponding gain to the few.

We are of the opinion, in any view of the case, that neither the Legislature nor the County of El Dorado, has granted to the plaintiff the exclusive right claimed by him.

The judgments for the defendants in each of the cases must be affirmed.

WILLIAM D. PORTER v. ROBERT H. ELAM.

COMPLAINT.—A complaint upon a promissory note, the collection of which is barred by the Statute of Limitations, contains a cause of action if it alleges that the defendant has, some time within four years of the day the suit was commenced, "in writing, acknowledged and promised to pay the note." Such allegation imports that the defendant signed his name to the writing.

APPEAL from the District Court, Fourth Judicial District, City and County of San Francisco.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the Court.

John Reynolds, for Appellant.

N. Bennett, for Respondent.

By the Court, SHAFER, J.

The complaint in this case contains three counts, framed upon three several promissory notes executed by the defendant to one Gray, and by him indorsed to the plaintiff.

The defendant demurred to the first count, on the ground that it appeared that the note described therein was barred by the Statute of Limitations. The demurrer was overruled.

The defendant answered the last two counts, and, on motion, the answer was stricken out by the Court, on the ground that the complaint was sworn to and the answer was not.

Judgment was entered for the plaintiff on all the counts, and the defendant appeals.

1. As to the demurrer. The note described in the first count fell due on the 19th of November, 1858, and the complaint was filed on the 19th of March, 1863. The count contains the following averment: "The said defendant has, since the 4th day of October, 1859, in writing acknowledged and promised to pay the same (the note) but has wholly neglected so to do." It is insisted for the appellant that the averment does not amount to an avoidance of the statute, for the reason that it is not stated in terms that the written promise alleged "was signed by the defendant."

No case is cited in support of the objection, except Pena v. Vance, 21 Cal. 142; but that case merely decides that there can be no written promise or acknowledgment without a signature. All that may be admitted, but it would have no effect to determine the question of pleading raised by the demurrer in favor of the appellant. We accept the view of the defendant's counsel as correct, that all the facts essential to the avoidance should be stated; and there can be no doubt, under the decision, that the signature of the party to the written promise or acknowledgment is essential. But we consider the allegation that the "defendant has in writing acknowledged and promised to pay, etc.," involves the very fact which counsel assumes to have been omitted. A man may promise verbally to fulfill certain stipulations previously in written memorandum, but he cannot "promise in without affixing his signature to the written promise case of Pena v. Vance, cited for the appellant, favoring rectness of this conclusion.

2. It is further insisted that the Court erred in stating the defendant's answer to the last two counts; and assigned is, that the complaint was not sworn to effect.

We have examined the affidavit and find it to be in conformity to the requirements of the Practice Act.

The judgment is affirmed; and it appearing to us that the appeal must have been taken for delay, on respondent, ten per cent of the judgment below is the costs by way of damages.

Mr. Justice CURREY, having been of counsel, did not take part in the hearing of this case.

HENRY W. SEALE v. SILAS B. EMERSON

THE VERDICT MUST BE ON ISSUES JOINED.—Plaintiff declared a contract to pasture one hundred and forty-seven head of cattle, at the rate of three dollars per head per month, for a given time, amounting to three hundred and thirty-three dollars. Defendant, in his answer, admitted the contract, but alleged that the number of cattle pastured and rate per head per month were as alleged, but that they were to be pastured in a particular field, and did not pasture them in that field, but in another, where the pasture was poor, and that by this breach of the contract he sustained three hundred and thirty-three dollars damage, which he claimed to recoup. The evidence was taken on the breach of the contract as alleged. The jury found for the plaintiff three hundred and thirty-three dollars damages; Held, that the verdict was not supported by the evidence, and that if plaintiff obtained a verdict, he was entitled to the amount claimed in his complaint.

APPEAL from the District Court, Third Judicial District, Santa Clara County.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the Court.

S. O. Houghton, for Appellant.

Thomas Bodley, for Respondent.

By the Court, SAWYER, J.

This is an action to recover money alleged to be due for the pasturage of cattle. The complaint alleges the pasturage of one hundred and forty-seven head of cattle for a specified time; that defendant promised to pay for said pasturage at the rate of one dollar per head per month; and that at that rate, for the number of cattle and time alleged, the sum due amounts to three hundred and forty-three dollars, for which sum judgment is claimed. There is no count to recover as much as the pasturage is worth, and no value is alleged. The plaintiff counts only upon a special agreement as to price.

The answer denies the request, or agreement to pasture generally; and alleges an agreement to pasture in a particular field, containing good pasturage, for which defendant was to pay one dollar per month per head, and then alleges that plaintiff did not pasture the cattle in the particular field agreed upon, but in another field where the feed was poor.

After setting up this special agreement and breach as a defense, by way of denial of the contract alleged in the complaint, the defendant alleges affirmatively the same special agreement to pasture in a particular field, and the breach by pasturing in another field in which the feed was poor, and alleges that his cattle, in consequence of the poor feed, did not thrive, but lost flesh, and that by reason thereof he had sustained five hundred dollars damages; which amount he prays to have allowed as a counter claim.

On the trial the jury found a verdict in favor of the plaintiff, and assessed the damages at one dollar. The plaintiff moved for a new trial, on the ground that the verdict is contrary to the evidence, and is contrary to law. The Court denied the motion, and plaintiff appeals from the order denying the motion for a new trial, and from the judgment.

Although the Court appears to have given instructions to the jury, they are not in the record, and we must presume that the case was fairly submitted as to the law.

There was no issue in the pleadings as to the value of the pasturage, and the testimony upon that point, under a proper charge from the Court, must have been disregarded as irrelevant. The question was whether the agreement was to pasture generally, as alleged by the plaintiff; or to pasture in a particular field, as alleged by defendant. There was no dispute between the parties as to the fact, or place, or time of pasturage, the number of cattle pastured, or the rate per head per month agreed on, and no conflict of testimony on those points. The only evidence as to where the cattle were to be pastured under the agreement, came from the parties themselves, either given by them respectively in person on the stand, or in the form of declarations of the defendant, testified to by other witnesses. The defendant testified that the agreement was to pasture in the field, called "The Uncle Jim Field," and not in the "Willow Pond Field," or "Mill Pond Field," where they were pastured, and where the feed was not as good as in the "Uncle Jim Field." The plaintiff denies this in his testimony, and says that he refused to pasture the cattle in the "Uncle Jim Field," stating as a reason, that he intended to cut hay on that field in case the grass should prove to be sufficient for that purpose. This was the vital and only real issue in the case. Had this issue been found for defendant, the verdict must necessarily have been for him, because on his theory it was for pasturing in the "Uncle Jim Field," that the defendant agreed to pay the specific price alleged, and plaintiff must recover at this specific rate or not at all, for he did not count on a quantum valebat, and he must recover according to his allegations, or fail. The jury, therefore, must have found this issue in favor of the plaintiff, otherwise the verdict would necessarily have been for defendant. Having found this issue in favor of the plaintiff—that is to say, that there was no agreement to pasture the cattle in the "Uncle Jim Field," as claimed by defendant, the only measure of damages was the price agreed upon, about which there is no conflict in either the pleadings or evidence, and the price is one dollar per head per month. They did not find in accordance with the price agreed upon, and the verdict as to the amount of damages is not supported by any evidence at all.

Had there been a quantum valebat count, this result would not necessarily have followed, for in that case, had the jury been satisfied that the agreement was to pasture in the "Uncle Jim Field," yet if plaintiff pastured the cattle on other grounds, with the knowledge and acquiescence of the defendant, a promise to pay what the pasturage was reasonably worth would be implied, and the plaintiff would have been entitled to recover on that count; and it could not be known but that the issue as to where the cattle were to be pastured had been found in favor of the defendant, and that the small amount of damages resulted from an allowance on the counter claim for breach of the contract to pasture in the "Uncle Jim Field." But the issues in the case do not admit of any such solution.

The judgment must therefore be reversed and a new trial granted, and it is so ordered.

WILLIAM BOSWORTH v. CHARLES DANZIEN.

DESCRIPTION OF PROPERTY IN TAX PROCEEDINGS.—Neither an assessment for taxes nor a tax deed are necessarily void because, in describing the land assessed, a false call has been inserted in the description in the assessment roll or tax deed.

DESCRIPTION OF LAND IN ASSESSMENT ROLL.—An assessment of land is not void by reason of mistake in description, unless it contains such a falsity in the designation or description of the land assessed as might probably mislead the owner and prevent him from ascertaining that his land had been assessed.

NORTHERLY MEANS NORTH.—The term "northerly," when used in a grant or conveyance, unless controlled by monuments mentioned in the description, means due north.

tion with the description given in the complaint of the premises demanded we find them to agree in every particular.

The deed also recites the description of the larger tract as given in the assessment roll and advertisement. The point of beginning and the first course and distance therefrom, are described as follows: "Lot commencing on the northeasterly corner of Center and Guerrero streets, thence easterly on Corbett street, two hundred feet, thence at right angles northerly," etc.

It will be observed that the description in the assessment roll begins at the northeasterly corner of Center and Guerrero streets and runs thence easterly on Corbett street two hundred feet, and that in the description of the land sold and conveyed, the same line is described as beginning at the same point, running easterly therefrom on Center street.

The Court has found in effect that a line drawn easterly, that is, due east, (1 John. 156; 3 Caines, 293,) from the corner named, would run along Center street in fact, and furthermore it is impossible that it should be otherwise — the corner, the direction of the streets toward the cardinal points, and their subsequent intersection at right angles being given.

We here assume the true point of the respondent's objection to the validity of the deed to be, that the description of the south line of the tract assessed is contradictory in fact, and, not being true to the whole extent of the terms used, that the assessment is utterly void as matter of law. The counsel of the appellant, meeting the case in this aspect of it, seeks to defeat this consequence on the ground that the false call in the description of the property as listed, may be rejected as surplusage.

1. Where, in case of a deed voluntarily executed by the owner of land, it appears upon applying the instrument to its subject matter, the description in it is true in part, but not true in every particular, so much of the description as is false will be rejected, and the instrument will take effect if a sufficient description remains to ascertain its application. Falsa demonstratio non nocet cum de corpore constat. (Smith v. Gal- loway, 5 B. & Ald. 43, 51.) In such case evidence of res gestæ will be received for the purpose of ascertaining the intention of the parties, and giving to it a complete effect and operation.

But tax proceedings are in invitum. The land owner intends nothing. The Government, acting after its own methods and through its own agents, seeks to enforce the collection of a tax which it has imposed upon the citizens; and it follows that if a false description in a tax deed or assessment roll can be rejected as surplusage, it cannot be for the reason that it is necessary that it should be so dealt with in order that the intention of parties may be fulfilled. It does not, however, follow that a false call occurring in an assessment roll is to be retained to the entire overthrow of the tax title, because it cannot be rejected for the particular reason above stated.

It not unfrequently happens that a case arises, not in all respects within the beneficial operation of one rule of law, but which may be manifestly within the saving operation of another, going upon broader conditions. The maxim, "Ut res magis valeat quam pereat," is a canon, with reference to which, not only contracts and wills are to be construed, but statutes also—passed, as they are, without any direct co-operation or assent on the part of the citizen. The spirit of the maxim is that nothing should be destroyed merely for the sake of destruction. We have not, by our own examination, been able to find any adjudged case in which it has been held that a false call in an assessment roll, advertisement or tax deed, necessarily vitiates a tax title. The rule as given in Tallman v. White, 2 Comst. 66, is as follows: "An assessment of land is fatally defective and void, if it contains such a falsity in the designation or description of the parcel assessed, as might probably mislead the owner and prevent him from ascertaining by the notices, that his land was to be sold or redeemed. Such mistake, or falsity, defeats one of the obvious and just purposes of the statute—that of giving to the owner an opportunity of preventing the sale by paying the tax." We accept the above decision, not more on the authority of the Court by which it was pronounced, than on our entire conviction that it is correct in principle.

The test, then, to which every false call occurring in the course of tax proceedings is to be subjected, is this: Has it probably had the effect to mislead the landowner in relation to the land assessed, advertised and sold?

In the case at bar, the description in the assessment roll begins at a point fixed with entire precision, and runs therefrom due east two hundred feet. The superadded description of that line—"along Corbett street"—was not, in our judgment, calculated to mislead the landowner, and for the manifest reason that it was impossible that the call should be true. The call was not only false, but absurd, and that, too, in the light of facts appearing on the face of the general description of the corner and line.

Judgment reversed and new trial ordered.

THE PEOPLE v. BENJAMIN HOLLADAY AND JESSE HOLLADAY.

COMPLAINT IN ACTION TO RECOVER TAXES.—In an action brought by the people to recover judgment for delinquent taxes assessed during the three years preceding March 1st, 1861, the complaint is fatally defective if it does not aver that the Tax Collector has failed to collect the taxes in question by reason of his inability to find, seize, or sell property belonging to the delinquent.

POWER OF LEGISLATURE.—The Legislature possesses full power to legalize defective and invalid assessments of delinquent taxes, and to provide for their collection.

ACT OF MAY 17TH, 1861, TO LEGALIZE ASSESSMENTS.—The first section of the Act of May 17th, 1861, entitled "An Act to legalize and provide for the collection of delinquent taxes in the counties of this State," legalizes every assessment for taxes made during the three years preceding March 1st, 1861, however defectively and imperfectly it may have been made in any respect.

COMPLAINT WHERE DESCRIPTION DEFECTIVE IN ASSESSMENT.—If an assessment of a tax made during the three years preceding March 1st, 1861, is defective in not stating the kind and quantity of property assessed, whether real or personal, or if real, in not giving its description, the pleader, in an action brought to recover judgment for such tax, may, if the same can be ascertained, insert in his complaint the necessary averments as to kind and quantity or description.

ASSESSMENT OF PERSONAL PROPERTY.—A complaint, under the Act of May 17th, 1861, which avers that the tax "was levied upon and assessed against personal property," contains no cause of action. The complaint should not only aver that the tax was levied upon and assessed against personal property, but also the kind or kinds of personal property.

IN WHAT COUNTY ASSESSMENT TO BE MADE.—All personal property within a county on the first Monday of March, is assessable in that county if not removed from that county before the assessment is actually made, and if assessed in that county before it is removed from it, the tax is payable in that county; but if removed from that county to another before actually assessed, the Assessor of that county may make the assessment, and transmit the same to the Assessor of the county to which the property is removed.

WHERE TAX PAYABLE.—Taxes are due and payable in the county where the property is first assessed; and if the property, after it has been assessed, be removed into another county, and there assessed, the first assessment is unaffected thereby, and payment of the latter assessment is not a discharge of the former.

By CURREY, J.—RHODES, J., concurring:

CONSTRUCTION OF ACT OF MAY 17TH, 1861.—The Act of May 17th, 1861, was only designed to legalize assessments in some respects formally defective, though substantially good, and was not intended to make good an assessment which was totally invalid for not stating either the kind or quantity of property assessed, or not describing it, when real estate.

POWER OF LEGISLATURE.—When an assessment is so defective as to be totally void, the Legislature cannot cure it by legislative enactment having a retrospective operation, so as to create an obligation where none existed before.

APPEAL from the Seventh Judicial District, Solano County.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the Court.

Haight & Pierson, for Appellants.

J. G. McCullough, Attorney-General, for Respondent.

By the Court, SANDERSON, C. J.

This is an action to recover delinquent taxes on certain personal property, brought under the provisions of the Act of the Legislature of the 17th of May, 1861. (Statutes of 1861, p. 471.) After stating the title of the action the complaint proceeds as follows:

The plaintiff above named comes, by J. C. Hinckley, District Attorney for said county, and in pursuance of an Act of the Legislature of the State of California, entitled "An Act to legalize and provide for the collection of delinquent taxes in the counties of this State," approved May 17, 1861, complains against the defendants Benjamin Holladay and Jesse Holladay, known by the firm name of "Holladay & Brother," and for cause of action alleges that the said defendants are indebted to plaintiff in the full sum of three hundred and seventy-one dollars and twenty-one cents, which sum is due, owing and payable from defendants to plaintiff for public revenue and taxes levied as follows: Tax for State purposes, one hundred and sixty-five dollars; tax for county purposes, two hundred and six dollars and twenty-one cents. Said taxes were levied upon and assessed against personal property valued at twenty-seven thousand five hundred dollars, belonging to said defendants, in the County of Solano, for the year 1858, etc.

It is claimed by the appellants that the foregoing complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, and in support of this objection to the complaint they assign the following grounds: First—Because it does not allege that the Tax Collector has failed to collect the taxes in question by reason of his inability to find, seize or sell property belonging to the delinquents, as required by the second section of the Act under which the suit is brought. Second—Because it does not designate the "kind and quantity" of the personal property upon which the taxes were levied and assessed, as required by the second section of said Act.

1. The first point seems to have been determined in favor of the appellants by the case of The People v. Pico, 20 Cal. 595. That action, like the present, was brought under the provisions of the Act of the 17th of May, 1861. In that case the taxes sued for had been assessed against real property, which constitutes the only difference between the two cases. The same points were made by the appellant in that case which are made in this, except so far as the second point may be affected by the character of the property against which the taxes were assessed. Both points were there decided in favor of the appellants.

Upon this point the Court held, in effect, that the inability of the Tax Collector to find, seize and sell property belonging to the delinquent, was made by the statute a condition precedent to the right of action therein conferred upon the State; and that the District Attorney had no authority to commence an action to recover unpaid taxes, except in cases in which the Tax Collector had failed to collect them for the reasons specified in the Act; and that without an averment of such failure on the part of the Tax Collector, the complaint fails to state a cause of action. The same principle was announced by us in the case of The People ex rel. Hastings v. Jackson, 24 Cal. 630, where it was held that conditions precedent must be pleaded in all cases, except those arising out of contract, in which latter cases, the pleading of conditions precedent is excused by the sixtieth section of the Practice Act, and a general averment of performance made sufficient.

2. We do not consider the case of The People v. Pico as conclusive of the present case upon the second point made by appellants. The taxes sought to be recovered in that case had been assessed against real property, which was described in the complaint as "the unsold portion of eleven square leagues of land known as Los Mokelamos." The second section of the Act of the 17th of May, 1861, provides that the property, if real estate, shall be described in the complaint; and the Court held that the description was insufficient, and thus far the decision in that case is undoubtedly correct; and further than this it was unnecessary for the Court to go for the purpose of deciding that case, and hence so far as that case seems to hold that the assessment must contain a description sufficient for the purposes of the complaint, and that if the assessment is fatally defective in that respect no cause of action can exist under the Act in question, it may be regarded as obiter dictum.

The object of the Act, as declared in the title, is to legalize and provide for the collection of delinquent taxes in the counties of this State. The question as to the power of the Legislature to pass such Acts has been decided in favor of the power too often to admit of doubt at the present time. The first section of the Act provides as follows:

"SECTION 1. The assessments of taxes upon all property, real and personal, in the several counties in this State, whether

Thomas Bodley, for Respondent.

By the Court, SAWYER, J.

This is an action to recover money alleged to be due for the pasturage of cattle. The complaint alleges the pasturage of one hundred and forty-seven head of cattle for a specified time; that defendant promised to pay for said pasturage at the rate of one dollar per head per month; and that at that rate, for the number of cattle and time alleged, the sum due amounts to three hundred and forty-three dollars, for which sum judgment is claimed. There is no count to recover as much as the pasturage is worth, and no value is alleged. The plaintiff counts only upon a special agreement as to price.

The answer denies the request, or agreement to pasture generally; and alleges an agreement to pasture in a particular field, containing good pasturage, for which defendant was to pay one dollar per month per head, and then alleges that plaintiff did not pasture the cattle in the particular field agreed upon, but in another field where the feed was poor.

After setting up this special agreement and breach as a defense, by way of denial of the contract alleged in the complaint, the defendant alleges affirmatively the same special agreement to pasture in a particular field, and the breach by pasturing in another field in which the feed was poor, and alleges that his cattle, in consequence of the poor feed, did not thrive, but lost flesh, and that by reason thereof he had sustained five hundred dollars damages; which amount he prays to have allowed as a counter claim.

On the trial the jury found a verdict in favor of the plaintiff, and assessed the damages at one dollar. The plaintiff moved for a new trial, on the ground that the verdict is contrary to the evidence, and is contrary to law. The Court denied the motion, and plaintiff appeals from the order denying the motion for a new trial, and from the judgment.

Although the Court appears to have given instructions to the jury, they are not in the record, and we must presume that the case was fairly submitted as to the law.

There was no issue in the pleadings as to the value of the pasturage, and the testimony upon that point, under a proper charge from the Court, must have been disregarded as irrelevant. The question was whether the agreement was to pasture generally, as alleged by the plaintiff; or to pasture in a particular field, as alleged by defendant. There was no dispute between the parties as to the fact, or place, or time of pasturage, the number of cattle pastured, or the rate per head per month agreed on, and no conflict of testimony on those points. The only evidence as to where the cattle were to be pastured under the agreement, came from the parties themselves, either given by them respectively in person on the stand, or in the form of declarations of the defendant, testified to by other witnesses. The defendant testified that the agreement was to pasture in the field, called "The Uncle Jim Field," and not in the "Willow Pond Field," or "Mill Pond Field," where they were pastured, and where the feed was not as good as in the "Uncle Jim Field." The plaintiff denies this in his testimony, and says that he refused to pasture the cattle in the "Uncle Jim Field," stating as a reason, that he intended to cut hay on that field in case the grass should prove to be sufficient for that purpose. This was the vital and only real issue in the case. Had this issue been found for defendant, the verdict must necessarily have been for him, because on his theory it was for pasturing in the "Uncle Jim Field," that the defendant agreed to pay the specific price alleged, and plaintiff must recover at this specific rate or not at all, for he did not count on a quantum valebat, and he must recover according to his allegations, or fail. The jury, therefore, must have found this issue in favor of the plaintiff, otherwise the verdict would necessarily have been for defendant. Having found this issue in favor of the plaintiff—that is to say, that there was no agreement to pasture the cattle in the "Uncle Jim Field," as claimed by defendant, the only measure of damages was the price agreed upon, about which there is no conflict in either the pleadings or lars." It is presumed that this description is taken from the assessment, and, if so, the assessment, but for the Act of the 17th of May, 1861, would be fatally defective; but that Act cures the defect, and the assessment, which was previously worthless, has become legal and binding, and may be enforced by suit, provided the complaint supplies a proper description. The statute requires that the kind and quantity of the property, both real and personal, shall be designated in the complaint—that is to say, the kind and quantity of real property shall be designated, and the kind and quantity of personal property shall be designated. The use of the word "both" in the connection in which it is used makes this reading imperative. The word "kind" does not distinguish between and refer solely to the terms real and personal, but the latter terms are used generically, and the word "kind" refers to the species of each as defined in the Revenue Act. The statute divides personal property into various classes, and a lumping assessment under the general head of personal property is insufficient. It would be impossible to fix a valuation upon property so assessed, nor could the valuation be corrected by the Board of Equalization. The different classes must be stated—as, for example, goods, solvent debts, horses, cattle, etc. The complaint in this respect is deficient and obnoxious to the objection made by the appellants.

3. Another point is made upon which we deem it proper to express an opinion, for the purpose of furnishing a rule of decision upon a second trial, should one be had. It appears from the evidence that the property against which the taxes in controversy were assessed consists of cattle. On the first Monday in March of the year for which the taxes were assessed, these cattle were in Solano County. Between that time and the month of May following they were removed to the County of Alameda, and it is claimed that they were there assessed and the taxes paid, and that therefore the appellants ought not to be made to pay the taxes which were assessed in Solano County, for if so he will be made to pay taxes upon the same property twice. Of course the law does not exact double taxes.

It is the duty of the Assessor to assess all taxable property in his county between the first Mondays of March and August in each year. All property which is within his county on the first Monday in March is assessable in his county, provided it is in his county at the time the assessment is made; and the taxes thereon are payable in his county. But, if the property is removed from his county to another before the assessment is actually made, he cannot make an assessment which will be payable in his own county; but he may make the assessment in the manner prescribed in the twenty-sixth section of the Revenue Act (Wood's Digest, p. 622) and transmit the same to the Assessor of the proper county. The taxes are due and payable in the county where the property was first assessed, and if the property, after it has been assessed, be removed into another county and there assessed, the first assessment is unaffected thereby, and a payment of the latter assessment is not a discharge of the former. In other words, the first assessment, if the property was in the county at its date, is the lawful one as between the two, if the taxes be paid upon the latter assessment it is a mere voluntary payment, and is no answer to a demand for payment upon the first. Hence, if the cattle in question were in Solano County at the date of the assessment made by the Assessor of that county, the taxes were legally due in that county, and a payment of taxes subsequently assessed upon them in Alameda County was no discharge of the debt, but a mere voluntary payment. It was the business of the appellants to know whether their cattle had been assessed in Solano County before their removal; and if so, such assessment and payment thereon would have been a complete answer to the claim of Alameda County.

The judgment is reversed and a new trial ordered, with leave to the respondent to amend the complaint.

tion with the description given in the complaint of the premises demanded we find them to agree in every particular.

The deed also recites the description of the larger tract as given in the assessment roll and advertisement. The point of beginning and the first course and distance therefrom, are described as follows: "Lot commencing on the northeasterly corner of Center and Guerrero streets, thence easterly on Corbett street, two hundred feet, thence at right angles northerly," etc.

It will be observed that the description in the assessment roll begins at the northeasterly corner of Center and Guerrero streets and runs thence easterly on Corbett street two hundred feet, and that in the description of the land sold and conveyed, the same line is described as beginning at the same point, running easterly therefrom on Center street.

The Court has found in effect that a line drawn easterly, that is, due east, (1 John. 156; 3 Caines, 293,) from the corner named, would run along Center street in fact, and furthermore it is impossible that it should be otherwise—the corner, the direction of the streets toward the cardinal points, and their subsequent intersection at right angles being given.

We here assume the true point of the respondent's objection to the validity of the deed to be, that the description of the south line of the tract assessed is contradictory in fact, and, not being true to the whole extent of the terms used, that the assessment is utterly void as matter of law. The counsel of the appellant, meeting the case in this aspect of it, seeks to defeat this consequence on the ground that the false call in the description of the property as listed, may be rejected as surplusage.

1. Where, in case of a deed voluntarily executed by the owner of land, it appears upon applying the instrument to its subject matter, the description in it is true in part, but not true in every particular, so much of the description as is false will be rejected, and the instrument will take effect if a sufficient description remains to ascertain its application. Falsa demonstratio non nocet cum de corpore constat. (Smith v. Gal- loway, 5 B. & Ald. 43, 51.) In such case evidence of res gestæ will be received for the purpose of ascertaining the intention of the parties, and giving to it a complete effect and operation.

But tax proceedings are in invitum. The land owner intends nothing. The Government, acting after its own methods and through its own agents, seeks to enforce the collection of a tax which it has imposed upon the citizens; and it follows that if a false description in a tax deed or assessment roll can be rejected as surplusage, it cannot be for the reason that it is necessary that it should be so dealt with in order that the intention of parties may be fulfilled. It does not, however, follow that a false call occurring in an assessment roll is to be retained to the entire overthrow of the tax title, because it cannot be rejected for the particular reason above stated.

It not unfrequently happens that a case arises, not in all respects within the beneficial operation of one rule of law, but which may be manifestly within the saving operation of another, going upon broader conditions. The maxim, "Ut res magis valeat quam pereat," is a canon, with reference to which, not only contracts and wills are to be construed, but statutes also—passed, as they are, without any direct co-operation or assent on the part of the citizen. The spirit of the maxim is that nothing should be destroyed merely for the sake of destruction. We have not, by our own examination, been able to find any adjudged case in which it has been held that a false call in an assessment roll, advertisement or tax deed, necessarily vitiates a tax title. The rule as given in Tallman v. White, 2 Comst. 66, is as follows: "An assessment of land is fatally defective and void, if it contains such a falsity in the designation or description of the parcel assessed, as might probably mislead the owner and prevent him from ascertaining by the notices, that his land was to be sold or redeemed. Such mistake, or falsity, defeats one of the obvious and just purposes of the statute—that of giving to the owner an opportunity of preventing the sale by paying the tax." We accept the above decision, not more on the authority of those existing for want of a proper observance of formalities of subordinate importance, but not those vitally affecting the levy and assessment. This conclusion seems to me to be necessary in order to give any effect to this Act, for the reason that the Legislature had not the power to render an assessment valid and binding which was originally invalid in substance, and which was therefore void. It may be asked, what are the informalities which may be cured, and what are the matters of substance to which the healing power of the Legislature cannot extend? The statute requires the Assessor to do certain things to make an assessment, and to accomplish this end the things required must be performed in some manner. The manner or mode of performance may in some particulars be of the essence of the assessment, and in others not so. Where the act to be done is essential to or constitutive of the things to be accomplished, its omission cannot be cured by legislative enactment having a retrospective and retroactive operation, so far as to impair rights already existing, or to create a new obligation or impose a new duty or attach a new disability in respect to transactions or considerations already past. (The Society, etc. v. Wheeler, 2 Gallison, 139.)

To hold that the Legislature is competent to render valid and binding from the beginning that which by the law was at the time invalid and void seems to me to be involved in an inextricable absurdity. As well might the Legislature undertake to create rights unknown to the laws of the land and give them a retrospective existence, and therewith furnish to those who, by a fiction, possessed such rights, remedies for injuries affecting them before they had existence. It would, I apprehend, be equally in the power of the Legislature to legalize and render valid and binding in law an abortive proceeding instituted in past years against a citizen to divest him of his property, without affording him an opportunity to be heard in his defense, as to declare a radically and invalid assessment valid and binding ab initio.

A statute which in its scope and spirit has for its object to make valid and binding the acts of Courts or officers, which when performed were null and void, is to my mind in violation of the rights of the citizens affected by it; and measured by a moral standard should be condemned by every Court of justice which may be called on to deal with it.

Statutes which are retrospective in their character and to which is given a retroactive effect, have generally been considered in violation of common right and common reason, and ipso facto void, independently of any constitutional restrictions against their passage. (Bowman v. Middleton, 1 Bay's R. 252; Bonaparte v. C. and A. R. R. Co. 1 Bald. C. C. R. 223.) The law is a rule of civil conduct, and from its very nature must be prospective. In Smith's Commentaries, section one hundred and fifty-three, it is said, "Retrospective laws are not only inconsistent with the idea of a law, as a rule of civil conduct, but they are in many instances only the exercise of powers which are in their nature strictly judicial, instead of legislative. Such laws, when only such, look not to the future, but upon the past; or, in other words, pronounce judgment upon acts done antecedent to their adoption; and in this respect they assume a judicial power, as contradistinguished from what is strictly legislative power. They assume to give character to facts which they did not possess at the time they took place, and then to judge of them in the new character thus legislatively created for them; to settle, in some instances, old rights, depending on laws as they existed before the Act was passed, by new principles created and applied by the retrospective Act, having no existence antecedent to the time of its passage, which then, and not till then, sprang into being."

I do not object that the Legislature cannot pass remedial statutes, affording the means to enforce rights on the one hand, and the performance of obligations on the other, which had existence before the remedy was provided; but my objection opposes any construction of the Act of 1861 which has the effect to give to an assessment a character which it did not possess at the time it passed from the officers whose duty it was to see that it was made.

The language of the Act is that certain assessments "are hereby legalized and confirmed and are rendered valid and binding, both at law and equity, against the persons and property assessed." If the Act was designed to do more than to remedy defects of a mere formal character, and which ordinarily would be remedied by the principles which are the basis of the maxim, De minimis non curat lex, then it must be held to have assumed to give a character to the assessment which it did not have, and then further to judge of it in the habiliments of its new creation, and that, too, without affording to the party affected by it any chance whatever to obtain a reduction of the amount thus constructively assessed, however excessive and unjust it might be. If the Act goes to this extent it should be restrained. It should be limited to the cure of infirmities of minor importance, which, according to the rules of construction applied in the consideration of the proceedings of Courts and officers of inferior jurisdictions, would render ineffectual the assessment for any efficient purpose.

While I admit that the Legislature has the power to heal infirmities arising from a failure to pursue with exact precision the course prescribed in matters of a formal character, I deny its power to cure evils affecting the substance of the assessment; because in the one case the law is remedial and operates prospectively, and in the other it is curative and retrospective and in its practical working deprives the citizen of his property without due course of law. Give to the Act the effect that is claimed for it on behalf of the State and it furnishes to the public prosecutor a case, in its living essence of legislative creation, falsely antedated, which the citizen who is made the victim is not permitted to gainsay by a statement of the truth, that no valid assessment was made; but he is permitted, after first assuming that a valid and binding assessment was made at the time alleged in the complaint, to answer that he has paid the taxes not necessarily on the property set down and described in the assessment roll, but on the property described in the complaint.

I cannot believe that the legislative omnipotence, with all its creative energies, can perform the miracle of creating a thing whose origin shall be of years that have passed; nor do I believe the Legislature has the power to deny to the citizen the right to be heard in defense of his person or property.

RHODES, J., also concurring in the judgment, but dissenting from the opinion in part.

I concur with the majority of the Court in reversing the judgment of the Court below, but I agree with Mr. Justice CURREY in his dissenting opinion; and I would further add, that if it can be held that all the acts—be they apparently of the most formal character—of the Assessor and the other officers charged by law with the performance of the series of acts that are required to be done before the taxes are payable, are essential and constitute a part of the substance of the assessment, without which the assessment is invalid, then, in my opinion, the Legislature cannot dispense with the performance of any of those acts in past transactions, and thus create a cause of action where none existed at the time of the performance of the last official act.

WILLIAM H. CROWELL v. SONOMA COUNTY.

LIABILITY OF COUNTY FOR DAMAGES.—A county is not liable for damages for injuries sustained by individuals caused by a road overseer placing the abutment of a bridge in the bed of a stream in such manner as to cause the waters of the stream to flow out of their usual channel, and wash away land or the improvements thereon.

ROAD OVERSEER.—The relation between a county and its road overseer bears no resemblance to that of master and servant, nor to that of employer and employé.

LIABILITY FOR ACT OF ROAD OVERSEER.—If an abutment to a bridge is wrongfully built in the channel of a stream, the remedy, if any exists, is against him by whom the injury was committed.

APPEAL from the District Court, Seventh Judicial District, Sonoma County.

Crowell v. Sonoma County.

Plaintiff recovered judgment, and defendant appealed.
The other facts are stated in the opinion of the Court.

J. G. McCullough, Attorney-General, for Appellant, cited Sherbourne v. Yuba County, 21 Cal. 113, and Hoffman v. San Joaquin Co. 21 Cal. 426.

A. Thomas, for Respondent.

There is no question from authority that cities and counties are municipal corporations, and are equally liable, in an action for any injury which results to an individual from ministerial acts which they or their agents perform within their powers. (16 N. Y., 2 Smith, 159, and note; 17 N. Y., 3 Smith, 104; 15 N. Y., 1 Smith, 519.)

A municipal corporation is liable, if by the want of care and skill in its agents a public work is constructed which causes damage to individuals. (3 N. Y., 3 Comst., 463; 5 N. Y., 1 Selden, 369; 2 Denio, 433.)

The cases cited by the appellant are not apposite to the case before the Court. Those cited were actions for injuries sustained in consequence of a failure to do a duty enjoined by law. "This is an action brought for an act done by the county." The building of the bridge was a corporate act performed by its agents and servants; the defendant is responsible upon settled principles illustrated by several adjudged cases. (16 N. Y. 162, 173; 1 Selden, 375; 3 Hill, 612; 3 Comst. 464; 5 Selden, 163.)

By the Court, SHAFER, J.

The complaint states that the plaintiff, before and at the time of the grievances complained of, was lawfully possessed of certain lands in said county, describing them; that "the defendant, contriving to injure the plaintiff, on the 1st of October, 1859, at said county, built a bridge across the Santa Rosa Creek at the southern end of "O" street, in the Town of Santa Rosa, and in building said bridge, wrongfully and unlawfully erected an abutment at the north end of said bridge, extending into the channel of said creek, and has kept and continued the abutment in the channel of said creek for a long space of time, to wit: thence, hitherto; and thereby during all the time aforesaid unlawfully and wrongfully diverted and turned the water in said creek out of its regular channel, and prevented and hindered the water in said stream from flowing along its usual course; and that in consequence of said diversion of the water in said creek by the erection of the abutment of said bridge in the channel of said stream by the defendant, the water of said creek flowed with all its force and weight against the said land of which the plaintiff was and is possessed as aforesaid, and said water of said creek washed off large quantities of said land and a large amount of fencing thereon, together with houses and fruit trees, to the damage of plaintiff, one thousand five hundred dollars." The defendant appeals from the judgment.

Crowell v. Sonoma County.

It was held in Sherbourne v. Yuba Co., 21 Cal. 113, that a county is not liable in damages to one, who, while an inmate of a county hospital, sustains injuries from unskilful treatment by the resident physician, or from the failure on the part of the officers of the hospital to supply sufficient and wholesome food.

In Hoffman v. San Joaquin County, 21 Cal. 426, the Court held that a county is not liable for damages at the suit of an individual, sustained by him in consequence of a want of proper repairs to a bridge on a public highway of the county.

The case at bar is clearly within the principle upon which the foregoing judgments proceed.

Counties are mere instruments created by the Government for the purposes of internal administration. They have no rights as against the Government, and owe no duties to the public, nor to individuals, except such as are imposed by law.

By the Act of 1855, (Wood's Dig. p. 650) it is made the duty of the Board of Supervisors of each county "to divide the county into a suitable number of road districts, and to appoint annually, or whenever vacancies may occur, an overseer for each district, whom they shall have power to remove at pleasure. The road overseers are required to keep all the public highways in their respective districts clear from obstructions and in good repair—causing banks to be graded, bridges and causeways to be made when the same may be necessary, to keep the same in good repair, and to renew them whenever destroyed.”

From these provisions it is apparent that the relation between a county and its road overseer, bears no available resemblance to that of master and servant, nor to that of employer and employé. The office of road overseer in the defendant county, was not created by that county, but by public law instead, and all the duties connected with the office were created in like manner. The county had no power even to designate the incumbent of the office, for by the Act referred to, the power of appointing road overseers is conferred upon the Board of Supervisors; and in exercising that power the Board acts not under the county, but under the law.

It is also apparent that the Act does not cast the duty of building bridges upon the counties. True, counties are subjected to the pecuniary burdens connected with the building and repair of bridges, but the duty of building them when and where there is a necessity for them, and of keeping them in repair thereafter, is devolved primarily upon the overseer; and to that intent road overseers are the agents and servants of the law rather than of the counties within and for which they are appointed.

In this case, if the abutment “was wrongfully and unlawfully built in the channel of the creek,” as the complaint alleges, then it must have been so placed and built by the overseer or by a volunteer. If by a volunteer, the county confessedly cannot be charged; and if unlawfully placed in the channel by the overseer, if the plaintiff has any remedy, it must be against him by whom the injury was committed.

Judgment reversed, and the Court below directed to dismiss the action.

Robles v. Clarke.

JOSE TEODORO ROBLES v. JEREMIAH CLARKE.

RESULTING TRUST.—R. was the owner of promissory notes overdue, and desired to have the same collected. Having no means to pay attorney's fees and costs, he arranged with C., an attorney, to take the notes for collection. By the arrangement C. was to furnish money to pay costs and disbursements, and have the notes indorsed to him, and bring suit in his own name, and be reimbursed, both for his fees as attorney and for advances by him made, out of the proceeds when collected. R. then indorsed the notes to C., who gave him a receipt as attorney, stating that he received the notes for collection. C. brought suit in his own name, obtained judgment, and had an execution issued, but the same was returned unsatisfied. C. then made an arrangement with a brother of one of the defendants in the judgment, by which the brother conveyed to C. a tract of land, and C. assigned him the judgment, and paid him a sum of money beside. C. was solvent and willing to pay R. whatever was due him on a settlement. Held, that there was no resulting trust in favor of R., and that C. did not hold the land conveyed to him in trust for R., and that R. was only entitled to recover the money due him on a fair settlement.

RESULTING TRUST.—It seems that when the portion of the purchase money furnished by the party claiming the benefit of a resulting trust, is not an aliquot portion of the whole, there is no resulting trust corresponding with the portion of the purchase money so furnished.

DECREE COMPELLING CESTUI QUE TO CONVEY TO TRUSTEE.—A decree establishing a trust in favor of the cestui que, and making allowances to the trustee for moneys by him advanced in and about the trust estate, and directing the trustee to execute a conveyance of the trust estate to the cestui que before payment of the moneys advanced by the trustee, is erroneous. The payment of the money should be made a condition precedent to the conveyance.

APPEAL from the District Court, Third Judicial District, Santa Clara County.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the Court.

J. Clarke, Appellant in pro. per.

The defendant having paid the cash consideration of eight hundred dollars of his own money, (as found by the Court) — even conceding that the judgment was held wholly in trust for the plaintiff — the right of the defendant in equity would be to follow the land, not for the purpose of getting a share of it corresponding to the amount of the judgment, relative to the eight hundred dollars; nor, secondly, to get the whole of it by paying defendant the eight hundred dollars (as the Judge below, in effect, decides) — but simply to have the amount of the judgment declared a lien upon the land, and to realize it, if necessary, by a judicial sale of the latter.

This remedy the plaintiff has no occasion to pursue; for it is not pretended that the defendant has not, at all times, been willing to account to plaintiff for the amount of the judgment as so much cash.

Greenleaf's Cruise on Real Property, 391: "Lord Hardwick has said that when the whole consideration moved from one, and the conveyance is made to another, there is a resulting trust for the person who paid the consideration; but he never knew it when the consideration moved from several persons."

In Drop v. Norton, 2 Atkins, 74, the Court say: "When the purchase money is paid by one, and the legal estate is in another, this, by operation of law, is a resulting trust for the person who paid the money; and the doctrine is very right, when the whole purchase money is paid by one person. But then the whole value of the purchase is not paid by Colonel Norton, for the fifteen hundred pounds is only part of the consideration. I am of opinion that there is no resulting trust."

Hovenden on Frauds, Vol. I, p. 471, states that "although personalty misapplied by a trustee may be traced into the purchase of land, it does not follow that in all cases the land purchased must belong to the cestui que trust of the money with which it was purchased. The personal estate may be chargeable upon and demandable out of the real estate so bought, but it may only constitute a lien upon, not give title to the estate itself. To this limited extent the equity of a case must plainly be confined when an estate shall appear to have been purchased partly with his own and partly with trust moneys," and he cites Lewis v. Maddox, 17 Ves. 58; Savage v. Carroll, 1 Ba. & Beat. 285; see Myers v. Myers, 2 McCord's Ch. R. 265.

S. O. Houghton, for Respondent.

From the time Clarke obtained the conveyance from Vallejo, he claimed to be the sole owner of the premises, and denied that Robles had any rights therein. This dispenses with the necessity for a demand. The rule in chancery is, if the defendant denies the right of the plaintiff, he cannot insist in his defense that there was no demand. (Ayer v. Ayer, 16 Pick. 335.)

The appellant contends that because only a part of the consideration of the conveyance from Vallejo to Clarke was paid with property of Robles, no trust could result to him, and that the remedy of Robles is limited to having the amount of the judgment declared a lien on the land conveyed by Vallejo to Clarke.

In support of this position he cites the case of Wallace v. Duffield, 2 Sergt. & Rawle, 521, and quotes from the opinion of Mr. Justice Gibson. There are three opinions in that case, and the point there decided does not sustain appellant's views, but is an authority against him.

The rule as declared by Mr. Justice Gibson in that case, has never been followed, and the same Judge, then Chief Justice, in delivering the opinion of the Court in Kissler v. Kissler, 2 Watts, 324, after discussing the question, and expressing some doubt of the correctness of the rule, declares it settled by our Courts "that a purchase with trust money in whole or in part, gives the owner of the money a correspondent ownership of the land," and cites as authorities Duffield v. Wallace, (one of the cases relied upon by appellant as supporting his position,) and Gregory v. Setter, 1 Dall, 139, and German v. Gabbald, 3 Binn. 302.

The quotation made from Hovenden on Frauds, is not sustained by the cases cited in support of the rule as there stated.

Lewis v. Maddox is a case of a marriage contract, providing that all the personal estate acquired or possessed by the husband, should at his death, in case she survived him, go to his wife. During the marriage he purchased an estate, partly with his own funds and partly with funds borrowed by him, and it was held that the amount of his own money used in that purchase could be followed into the land. It was not sought to take the land instead of the money.

Myers v. Myers, 2 McCord's Ch. R. 265, also cited as supporting the same principle, is a case where an executor had mingled trust funds with his own in the purchase of property.

In the opinion of the Court occurs the following language: "And there is no rule of equity better settled than that a trustee shall not be permitted to employ the trust fund for his own benefit; all purchases, therefore, made with the funds of the trust estate, will be considered for the benefit of the cestui que trust. That principle is exemplified in numerous cases where it has been held that executors, attorneys, and trustees, shall not purchase at their own sales, nor of their cestui que trusts, clients, etc. All persons acting in such representative capacities are considered in equity as trustees, and are governed by the same rules; and it is no answer on the part of the defendant that he has so mixed up the two funds together that he cannot distinguish one from the other. A person may, sometimes, by mixing the estate of another with his own, subject himself to the loss of both, for it is his own fault that they have not been kept separate."

It is submitted that the principle contended for by the appellant is not supported by any authority cited by him, or indeed by any other.

The right of Robles is not limited to following his property into the land. He has his election to hold his trustee personally liable, or he may follow the fund belonging to him into the land, and have it raised out of it by a sale thereof, or he may claim the land itself.

This rule is well settled, and is supported by numerous authorities.

"In all cases where trust funds have been misemployed or moneys placed in the hands of others in a fiduciary capacity have been invested in property without the consent of the beneficiary, a trust results, unless the cestui que trust elects to take the money instead thereof." (Tiffany & Bullard on Trusts and Trustees, 33, 34, 480; Seaman v. Cook, 14 Ill. 505; Torry v. Bank of Orleans, 9 Paige, 663; Van Epps v. Van Epps, Idem, 237, 241; Hawley v. Cramer, 4 Cowen, 736; Quackenbush v. Seaman, 9 Paige, 334.)

Robles v. Clarke.

Appellant in reply.

Plaintiff's counsel makes a mistake as to the nature of the trust with which defendant was invested. It was not a trust of land, to be rented, used, or managed. It was a trust of a judgment, (strictly, of part of a judgment, but the principle is the same,) to be turned into money, and nothing else, and this whether by acknowledging satisfaction of it if paid by the judgment debtors, or by assigning it if assumed by one liable, or supposing himself liable, as surety. Surely, the judgment was not intended to be kept, to be held as an investment, as so much desirable property, which it would be a fraud, a breach of trust, to part with for money!

By the Court, SAWYER, J.

There is no conflict in the testimony bearing upon most of the controlling issues presented by the pleadings in this case, and the findings must depend mainly upon the construction put upon the evidence. Some of the findings are, in our judgment, clearly not in accordance with the evidence; some embrace only a part of the facts, and require qualification, and some issues presented by the answer, having an important bearing on the rights of the parties, should, under the evidence, have been found for the defendant, but do not appear to have been passed upon by the Court.

The following are the leading facts found by the Court, or when not found by the Court, as herein stated, or not passed upon at all, to our minds clearly established by uncontradicted evidence.

On the second of April, 1858, the plaintiff executed to Antonio Larrain a conveyance, purporting to convey an undivided half of a tract of land called Santa Rita, or Rincon de San Francisquito, excepting a designated tract of fifty acres, reserved to the grantor, for the consideration of two thousand dollars, receiving in payment six hundred dollars in cash and two notes of Larrain, guaranteed by Salvator Vallejo—one for four hundred dollars, payable in thirty days, and one for one thousand dollars, payable in six months. There are covenants of warranty in the deed, and although the granting part purports to convey an undivided half, there is a provision that "the covenants of this deed shall not extend to deeds which from time to time have been made of several and separate parcels of said land to purchasers thereof, but only to said entire interest and the residue or remainder thereof after such sales," etc., thereby showing that lands had been conveyed, and that a full undivided half did not pass, as purported in the granting clause; and other evidence, in regard to which, however, there is some question as to its admissibility, shows that a very considerable portion of said rancho had been thus conveyed. According to the testimony of Mrs. Larrain, widow of Antonio, which is uncontradicted, Robles first made the agreement with Mariano G. Vallejo to sell to him; then Vallejo requested Larrain to buy it and take the deed in his name, but for the benefit of said M. G. Vallejo, the real party in interest. M. G. Vallejo was present at the time and furnished the money to make the cash payment, and the notes were given for the balance. At the time the deed was made, M. G. Vallejo handed the money to the witness, Mrs. Larrain, and she gave it to Robles. On the same day Larrain conveyed it to said M. G. Vallejo. The notes were executed by Antonio Larrain and guaranteed by Salvador Vallejo, a brother of M. G. Vallejo, the real purchaser, whose name does not appear on the notes. The notes were not paid when due, and plaintiff, Robles, being without funds to pay costs of suit, and requiring some small advances for personal expenses, desired defendant, Clarke, to make the advance of cash and the costs, and collect the notes, taking his advances and fees for services in collecting out of the proceeds. Defendant consented to do so, on condition that plaintiff would assign the notes to him, to enable him to control them, and thereby secure his advances and compensation. Thereupon plaintiff indorsed the notes to defendant for this purpose, defendant, giving him an acknowledgment in writing that the notes were received for collection. The defendant at the same time advanced plaintiff thirty-five dollars cash, for his personal use, taking a written acknowledgment for the money so advanced. Suit was immediately brought by defendant in his own name against the maker and guarantor, defendant advancing the necessary costs. The suit was defended by able counsel, on the ground that there was a breach of covenants of warranty in Roble's conveyance; but judgment was finally entered in favor of plaintiff for one thousand three hundred and eighty-two dollars and sixty-nine cents debt, and thirteen dollars and fifty cents costs — a small payment having been made before the notes came into the defendant's possession. For his services in prosecuting this suit under the circumstances, the Court found, and the testimony justified the finding, that defendant was entitled to a fee of five hundred dollars, which, added to his cash advances under the arrangement with plaintiff, entitled him to the sum of five hundred and forty-eight dollars and fifty cents out of the judgment. Execution was taken out upon the judgment and sent to Napa County, where it was supposed that Salvador Vallejo's property, if he had any subject to execution, was situated; but it was returned unsatisfied. Larrain was totally insolvent, and the testimony renders it highly probable, if not entirely certain, that nothing could be made out of Salvador Vallejo. The prospect of making the money out of the judgment debtors appearing desperate, as it manifestly was, and having reason to suppose that the purchase was made for M. G. Vallejo, the defendant obtained an interview with him, and sought to induce him to assume and pay the judgment, at the same time insisting that he (M. G. Vallejo) was personally liable as principal and the land subject to a vendor's lien. Vallejo alleged that he had paid Larrain the full value of the property in cash, and denied that there was any personal liability or any lien on the land. There was a mortgage on the premises originally for five thousand five hundred dollars, drawing interest at four per cent per month, to be compounded monthly if not paid, given to one Goodman, but then held by S. O. Hastings, but what amount was unpaid at this time does not appear. The title was still unconfirmed by the authorities of the United States Government, but a proceeding for confirmation was pending, the claimants being represented by the defendant as attorney. The boundaries were still indefinite and undetermined, and the title and condition of the land in these respects were unsettled and unsatisfactory. After a great deal of negotiation with M. G. Vallejo, the latter, expressing regrets that he had purchased in the present condition of things and a desire to protect his brother Salvador in respect to the judgment, proposed to sell and convey his interest in the premises to defendant for the said judgment and eight hundred dollars cash. The defendant, acting upon his own judgment and responsibility, and without consulting plaintiff, concluded to make the purchase on his own account, and assume himself the liability to pay plaintiff the amount of the judgment coming to him, and to account to him for it as so much cash collected. The proposition was accepted, the defendant paid out of his own funds the eight hundred dollars cash, and assigned to Vallejo the judgment; and Vallejo, in consideration thereof, on the 29th of March, 1859, conveyed the premises to defendant. There is no pretense that the defendant was not at the time, or that he has not been at all times since, a man of ample means and abundantly able to pay in cash, without resorting to the property purchased, any amount that may be due to plaintiff on this judgment, nor is there any evidence tending to show that he has not been at all times ready and willing to account with plaintiff and pay him any sum of money that may have been due him; on the contrary, the defendant testifies that he has at all times been, and that he now is ready and willing to account for and pay any sum that may be due to plaintiff. From the time of this conveyance the defendant has claimed to be the owner of the whole of said premises.

Robles v. Clarke.

The defendant had before this time acquired large interests in said rancho through mesne conveyances from plaintiff, executed prior to the conveyance to Larrain; and subsequent to said purchase he acquired other interests therein. On the 8th of October, 1859, long subsequent to said conveyance of Vallejo to defendant, S. C. Hastings, then the holder of said mortgage to Goodman, covering said premises and other lands, commenced a suit to foreclose the same, claiming in his complaint some nine thousand dollars to be due thereon. On the 25th of May, 1860, more than a year after said conveyance from Vallejo to defendant, and at a time when said plaintiff had ceased to have any interest in said premises in dispute, unless he had an interest under said conveyance from Vallejo to defendant, said defendant, for the purpose of protecting his interests, procured from said Hastings an assignment to himself of said mortgage, for which he paid, out of his own funds, the sum of five hundred dollars. Said defendant then amended the complaint and brought in other parties defendants, purchasers subsequent to said mortgage, and prosecuted said suit to a decree for his own benefit in the name of the said Hastings. Said plaintiff appeared in said suit by other counsel, and litigated said action, setting up in said suit that defendant Clarke held as trustee for him. Said defendant also filed a petition of intervention in said suit on his own behalf, and his interest in said suit appeared upon the record of said cause. After a long litigation, a decree was finally entered on the 4th of September, 1862, for a large sum of money. An order of sale issued, and the interest of said Robles in said premises was sold to said defendant, and the amount of his bid credited on said judgment.

Since the sale from Vallejo to Clarke, a final confirmation of the said grant has been obtained, and several contests have occurred between the claimants under this grant, and the grantees of adjoining grants, as to the boundaries, in which said defendant intervened, claiming to act for his own interest, and by his efforts sought to enlarge the boundaries of said rancho by moving back the lines, as insisted upon by the adjoining claimants. In resisting the encroachments of neighboring claimants, he incurred considerable expense in costs and disbursements, which were paid out of his own funds, and he performed a large amount of professional labor. After most of these results were accomplished, the plaintiff, for the first time, set up a claim that he was entitled to the sole benefit of the purchase made by defendant from Vallejo, and of all the increased value given to the property by the subsequent labor bestowed, and expenses incurred by the defendant in that behalf; but, so far as anything to the contrary is shown by the record, without ever offering to refund to defendant his advances, or compensate him for his various services. To enforce this claim he brought the present action, wherein he asks a judgment to the effect that said premises are held by said defendant in trust for said plaintiff, and that defendant be adjudged to convey to said plaintiff said undivided half of said rancho conveyed to said defendant by said Vallejo.

The decree was for plaintiff, and defendant appeals.

The foregoing statement of facts is sufficient, and perhaps more than sufficient, to explain the grounds of our decision.

It is claimed by the plaintiff that there is on these facts a resulting trust in his favor. The principle, supported by a number of authorities (2 Paige, 238; 13 Ill. 233; 30 Maine, 127; 14 Gray, 121; 15 Wend. 650; 1 Hov. Frauds, 471; 1 Ball and Beat. 284) that where the portion of the purchase money furnished by the party claiming the benefit of a trust is not an aliquot part of the whole, there is no resulting trust corresponding with the portion of the purchase money so paid, seems to be admitted by respondent; for it is insisted that where the party taking the deed in his own name wrongfully mingles the money of another with his own, in making the purchase, in such manner that it cannot be distinguished, or does not constitute an aliquot part of the whole amount paid, then he must suffer the inconvenience, if any, and a trust results to the other party to the extent of the whole property purchased; and upon this principle the present judgment seems to be founded.

If there is a resulting trust to any extent in favor of the plaintiff in this case, it must depend upon the principle of that class of cases, where a party wrongfully purchases property in his own name, with funds in his hands held in a fiduciary capacity. The usual cases found in the books under this class are, such as where funds are placed in the hands of an agent for the purchase of property, or the purposes of trade, and he invests them in his own name; or where executors, guardians, and the like, who are charged with the management of funds belonging to others, invest them in their own name, and for objects not contemplated. In all such cases, the funds placed in the hands of the trustee have been misapplied, in violation of the duties of the trustee, and when the party in such cases violates the trust, and wrongfully purchases property for his own benefit, with the funds in his hands in a fiduciary character, he will not be permitted to enjoy the profits of a successful operation, wrongfully made at the risk of his cestui que trust. The principle is, that where funds are placed in the hands of a party for safe keeping, or to be employed for the advantage of the owner, it is the duty of the party accepting the confidence to do every reasonable thing in his power to accomplish in the most advantageous manner the object of the trust reposed in him. The general rule upon the subject is founded upon the moral obligation resting upon a party to refrain from placing himself in relations, which ordinarily excite a conflict between self-interest and integrity. In the class of cases referred to, where there is a breach of good faith, and a misapplication of the trust fund, a Court of equity will convert the party violating the confidence reposed in him into a trustee, whenever necessary to protect the interest of the confiding party, and do justice between them.

The question is, does the case under consideration fall within the principle? We think not. We have examined a large number of cases, and we do not find one that goes far enough, when carefully considered, to sustain the judgment in this case. The plaintiff has two notes which the maker and guarantor refuse to pay. Being without means to pay the costs of litigation, and in want of a small sum for his own purposes, he agrees with the defendant, an attorney pecuniarily responsible, to take the notes for collection, advance him a small sum for his immediate wants, also the disbursements in the suit, and take his compensation and advances out of the money when collected; and to give the attorney the control of the notes he indorses them to him, thereby placing the legal title in him. The only object the plaintiff has, and the only purpose of the trust, so far as his own interest is concerned, is to convert the notes into money. The object of the trust was to realize the money, not to invest the proceeds in other property of any description whatever. The attorney, by making the advances and prosecuting the suit, also acquired an equitable interest in the proceeds of the note by the express understanding between them. The attorney prosecutes the suit, advancing the disbursements in addition to the small advances made for the personal convenience of the plaintiff. Judgment is finally obtained, execution issued and returned unsatisfied—the judgment debtors proving to be insolvent. The only hope remaining is that a vendor's lien may be enforced against the land which formed the consideration of the notes, said land being then in the hands of a third party. But the proof shows that the land was purchased not for the party taking the deed and making the notes, but for another party who advanced the cash payment and to whom it was conveyed the same day—that the plaintiff was present at the transaction and must have understood the facts—that he took the note of one party guaranteed by another, neither of whom was in fact interested in the purchase, instead of the notes of the real purchaser—and no fraud was alleged or claimed in the transaction. It is not at all certain that a vendor's lien could be maintained under such circumstances. A security is taken from parties known not to be interested in the purchase, and this is usually deemed to be a waiver of a vendor's lien. (Baum v. Grigsby, 21 Cal. 175.) But at best the question was doubtful, and to pursue the land would involve further expense and harassing litigation. At this stage, Vallejo offers to convey the premises to the defendant in consideration of an assignment of the judgment and the further sum of eight hundred dollars in cash, being two hundred dollars more than was originally paid. The object of the trust, so far as the plaintiff was concerned, was to realize his money, and the defendant having ample means of his own aside from the property in question to pay the amount, and having a large equitable interest in the judgment, concludes to take the risk, make the purchase on his own account, and account to plaintiff for his share of the judgment as so much cash collected, and closes the transaction in this way by advancing the eight hundred dollars out of his own funds, assigning the judgment, and taking a conveyance of the property. The Judge finds that the defendant was entitled to have out of the judgment for his services and advances, five hundred and thirty-eight dollars and fifty cents, which, deducted from the amount of the judgment, one thousand three hundred and eighty-two dollars and sixty-four cents, leaves eight hundred and forty-four dollars and thirteen cents to be accounted for to plaintiff. The defendant paid cash, eight hundred dollars, making his amount put in, besides the sum due plaintiff, one thousand three hundred and thirty-eight dollars and fifty cents. And subsequently defendant expended other sums and performed other labors in perfecting and protecting a title both embarrassed and encumbered in various ways.

What is there on the part of the defendant in this transaction that is objectionable on the score of the strictest principles of good morals, or in any respect inconsistent with his duty to his client? Had he immediately tendered plaintiff in cash the balance credited to him, the most rigid causist could find nothing in the transaction of which he could complain. The defendant would have performed to its fullest extent the object of the trust. Had the judgment been a lien on the property, and had he purchased it at a sale on the execution for a sum less than the amount coming to his client on the judgment, and sought to retain the benefit of the purchase for himself, his interest and his duty would have conflicted: for in that case it would have been his interest to obtain the land at as low a rate as possible, while it would have been his duty to get as much as possible out of the land, until sufficient should be realized to liquidate the amount due to the client. But this was not his position. The chance for making the money on the judgment was desperate. An opportunity occurred wherein, by advancing a considerable sum of money himself and taking upon his own shoulders all the risks of a purchase of the lands, in the condition stated, upon which he had no judgment lien, he could secure his own interest in the judgment, and at the same time fulfil both the letter and spirit of his trust, and he embraced it. In this we can see no breach of duty, or misapplication of trust funds within the principle of any case that has been brought to our notice, unless the fact that the amount due plaintiff was not immediately tendered to him in cash by defendant changes the aspect of the case.

There is not the slightest evidence in the record that the defendant has ever to this day been called upon to account, or that he has not been both able and willing to pay over the entire amount due. On the contrary, the testimony shows that the defendant has been at all times, and that he now is ready and willing and able to account and pay over any sum that may be due.

The defendant claims, in his answer, that at the time this purchase was made, and at all times since, there were other sums of money due from plaintiff to defendant greater than the amount due on said judgment, and that upon a just accounting there would have been at all times a balance due from plaintiff to defendant. And there is enough in the record to render it highly probable, that at the time of the purchase of the land in question, plaintiff was indebted to defendant in other sums sufficient to absorb nearly all, if not all of the said balance: as, for instance, the defendant alleges, among other things, as a counter claim in this action, that he holds a note executed by plaintiff to defendant for the sum of five hundred and seventy-six dollars, borrowed money, dated July 22, 1856, several years before the conveyance of said land, and that the whole of said sum and interest thereon still remains due and unpaid. The plaintiff demurred to this counter claim, on the ground that the cause of action appears to be barred by the Statute of

Robles v. Clarke.

Limitations and had judgment on the demurrer. If such was the condition of account between the parties at the time of the purchase from Vallejo, there can be no equitable ground for the claim set up by plaintiff in this action,

But, however this may be, we do not think the mere fact that no settlement of the matters between the parties, when defendant does not appear to have been called upon to account, is sufficient to show a breach of trust, and convert defendant into a trustee under the state of facts shown in this record.

The Court below found that defendant purchased the land and assigned the judgment referred to in fraud of the rights of plaintiff. There is, to our minds, no testimony showing a fraud in fact, and we must therefore conclude that the learned Judge who tried the case considered the transaction, in view of the existing relations of the parties, as fraudulent in law. The question as to whether a transaction honest in itself, is or not, nevertheless, to be regarded as fraudulent in law, often depends upon nice distinctions; and when we consider the great mass of authorities upon the subject, not always consistent with each other, it is not surprising that errors frequently occur in the rulings of the Courts in the hurry of trials of cases like this at nisi prius. We think the facts appearing in the record in this case do not show the transaction under consideration to be fraudulent in law, and that the Court erred in this finding.

In the purchase of the land we think the defendant acted in good faith, and not in violation of a trust.

Upon a careful consideration of all the circumstances under which this purchase was made, we are fully satisfied that it would not only not be equitable, but on the contrary grossly inequitable, to charge the defendant as trustee for the benefit of the plaintiff and compel a conveyance of the land.

The plaintiff, however, if there is anything due him, is entitled to a judgment for such amount, and to have it charged as a lien upon the land in controversy. The state of the accounts between the parties was not ascertained on the former trial. For the purpose of ascertaining what amount, if any, is due from defendant to plaintiff, a new trial must be had. The views we have expressed are sufficient for the purposes of the decision, and to guide the Court below in its further proceedings.

There are several other questions, to some of which we will allude without discussing them.

Admitting that defendant is chargeable as a trustee and liable to be called upon to convey, it is evident that the decree, if its terms are complied with, would compel defendant to convey a much larger interest in the land than he acquired under the purchase from Vallejo.

The questions growing out of the proceedings under the assignment of the mortgage from Hastings to defendant we shall not discuss, for under the view we have taken, it is not necessary to determine whether a party charged as trustee in invitum can purchase for his own benefit an interest in the property adverse to that of the cestui que trust. The judgment, however, is erroneous in annulling the decree of foreclosure in the suit of Hastings v. Robles et al., and directing that satisfaction of said judgment be entered of record. Such a judgment is entirely without the scope of the facts alleged in the complaint in this action. True, the defendant in his answer set up a title to the land in question, derived under those proceedings; but admitting that the proceedings were proven to be void or voidable on the ground of fraud or otherwise, the Court was not authorized to grant such affirmative relief in favor of the plaintiff. It may be questioned how far those proceedings can be attacked collaterally, even by way of rebutting a title set up under them, without filing a complaint to impeach directly and vacate the judgment on the ground of fraud. But there can be no doubt that the decree is erroneous in granting to the plaintiff affirmative relief in this action by annulling the judgment and ordering satisfaction to be entered. Such relief is entirely foreign to any case made by the allegations of the complaint.

Admitting the judgment to be right in other respects, it is erroneous in giving the plaintiff sixty days after defendant Clarke should make the conveyance under the judgment to pay the several sums found due to Clarke from plaintiff for the advances made by him on account of the lands in controversy. The payment of the money at some early day ought to have been made a condition precedent to the conveyance.

It follows from the views we have expressed that the judgment must be reversed and a new trial ordered.

Judgment reversed, and cause remanded for further proceedings, in accordance with the views expressed in this opinion.

Mr. Justice RHODES expressed no opinion.

JULY TERM, 1864.

REPORTS OF CASES

DETERMINED IN

THE SUPREME COURT

JULY TERM, 1864.

HERMAN ENGLUND v. JOSEPH E. N. LEWIS, AND HERNDON BARRETT.

LIEN OF JUDGMENT PENDING APPEAL.—Where an appeal has been taken, and a bond sufficient to stay proceedings upon the judgment pending the appeal has been given, the lien of the judgment upon the real estate of the judgment debtor in the county where the same was docketed, owned by him at the date of the docketing of the judgment, or subsequently acquired, until the lien expires, remains a valid and subsisting lien until the end of two years from and after the date of the remittitur from the Supreme Court.

JUDGMENT IN FORECLOSURE CASES.—In foreclosure cases, a formal judgment in personam may be rendered against the defendant for the amount found due, with a provision for its enforcement against the property upon which the lien is established, or a judgment may be rendered in accordance with the old chancery practice, enforcing the lien and directing a sale of the property upon which it is established.

STAY OF PROCEEDINGS ON APPEAL.—If, in foreclosure cases, a judgment in personam is rendered against the defendants, and also one enforcing the lien, and an appeal is taken from the whole judgment in order to stay proceedings upon the whole judgment, the appellant must give an undertaking for costs, one in double the amount of the personal judgment, and one for the payment of waste and such deficiency as may remain due after the sale of the property, and all these undertakings may be in one instrument, or several, at the option of the appellant.

England v. Lewis et al.

SAME.—In such cases, if the undertaking is given only for costs, and waste and deficiency, an execution on the personal judgment is not stayed pending the appeal; and if the undertaking is given only for costs and double the amount of the personal judgment, an execution for the sale of the property upon which the lien is foreclosed is not stayed pending the appeal.

FORM OF UNDERTAKING ON APPEAL.—When the judgment is for the enforcement of a lien and a sale of the property, the undertaking to stay a sale of the property pending the appeal need not provide for the payment of the value of the use and occupation of the premises.

SAME.—In a case where the judgment directs a sale of real property, the undertaking on appeal, in order to stay a sale, need only provide security against waste, unless there is a provision in the judgment for the payment of a deficiency, in which case it must provide for the payment of such deficiency.

SAME.—When the judgment directs a sale for the purpose of satisfying any lien other than a mortgage lien, the undertaking on appeal, to stay a sale, need not provide for the payment of any deficiency which the judgment may direct to be paid.

WHEN LIEN OF JUDGMENT EXPIRES.—In foreclosure cases, where there is a judgment in personam, and also a judgment enforcing a lien and directing a sale of the property, and the undertaking on appeal only stays the sale and provides for costs, the lien of the personal judgment on the judgment debtor's property, in the county where it is docketed, attaches at the time it is docketed, and expires at the end of two years from the time the personal judgment is docketed.

CLOUD ON TITLE.—A sale by a Sheriff of real estate upon an execution against the grantor will, even if not effectual to pass the title to the purchaser, create a doubt as to the validity of the grantee's title, and cast a cloud upon it, and the grantee can maintain an action to enjoin the sale.

DECREE FOR SALE OF PROPERTY NOT A JUDGMENT LIEN.—In foreclosure cases, if the plaintiff does not obtain a personal judgment against the defendant, but contents himself with a decree enforcing the lien, and directing a sale of the property, such decree does not become a judgment lien on the other property of the judgment debtor until after a sale has been had and the deficiency, if there be one, ascertained and docketed, and then only for the amount of such deficiency.

EXECUTION ON PERSONAL JUDGMENT AND SALE UNDER DECREE.—In foreclosure cases, where there is a personal judgment rendered against the defendant, and also a decree in equity awarded, the plaintiff may either issue an execution upon his personal judgment or enforce his decree by a sale of the property, but he cannot do both at the same time, and if he issue execution on the personal judgment first, the money realized on it must apply on the judgment and a sale of the property under the decree afterwards made for the balance, and so vice versa.

APPEAL from the District Court, Tenth Judicial District, Yuba County.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the Court.

Hatch & McQuaid, for Appellant.

The lien of the Lewis judgment expired on the 14th of May,

1863, two years from the date of its being docketed, and could not be extended by appeal. The case of Dewey v. Latson, 6 Cal. 130, is not law. (Practice Act, sec. 204; Isaacs v. Swift, 10 Cal. 82; Chapin v. Broder, 16 Cal. 404; Castro v. Ellis, 13 Texas, 229.)

The appeal taken by Covillaud and Nye to the Supreme Court from the judgment recovered by Lewis against them in the District Court, did not stay the execution of the money judgment. The undertaking on appeal was insufficient for such a purpose, and only had the effect to stay the decree of the Court directing a sale of the particular property mentioned therein. (Practice Act, secs. 209, 349, 352.)

The money judgment of Lewis alone became a lien upon the real property of the judgment debtors, Covillaud and Nye. The undertaking on appeal being insufficient in amount, under section three hundred and fifty-two, Practice Act, to stay execution thereupon, the lien of the judgment was not extended by the appeal beyond two years from the time of its docketing; and more than two years having elapsed after the docketing of the judgment and before issuance of execution, the judgment ceased to be a lien upon the real property of the judgment debtors, Covillaud and Nye. (Practice Act, sec. 204; Chapin v. Broder, 16 Cal. 404; Isaacs v. Swift, 10 Cal. 71.)

W. C. Belcher and Charles E. Filkins, also for Appellant.

The case of Dewey v. Latson, 6 Cal. 130, is not law, and cannot be sustained by reason or authority.

The authority of that case has been directly or indirectly questioned in several later cases, and has never, in any case, been affirmed.

In Isaacs v. Swift, 10 Cal. 71, which was a closely contested and well considered case, decided by a full bench, the Court say: "As the question does not arise in this case, we express no opinion as to whether, in case the sale be prevented by injunction, or other legal impediment, the lien of the judgment must expire at the end of the two years." The case of Dewey

v. Latson had been specially called to the attention of the Court by counsel, yet it is apparent that the Court did not approve, and if the question had been before them, would have overruled it. All the Judges joined in the decision of this case, Mr. Justice Burnett delivering the opinion, and Mr. Justice Field and Mr. Chief Justice Terry, (who had concurred in Dewey v. Latson,) concurring.

In Chapin v. Broder, 16 Cal. 403, the authority of Dewey v. Latson was still further limited. It was there decided that execution is not stayed and the lien not extended, where the appeal bond is not in double the amount of the money judgment, including costs; and that it does not matter that the defendant intended the bond given to operate a stay, and both parties supposed it did so operate.

The language of the statute is plain and apparently unambiguous. It declares that "from the time the judgment is docketed, it shall become a lien upon all the real property of the judgment debtor, not exempt from execution, in the county, owned by him at the time, or which he may afterwards acquire, until the said lien expires. The lien shall continue for two years, unless the judgment be previously satisfied." Certainly there is no patent ambiguity about the language used. It is true that the rule is well established that the intention of the Legislature must always control in the construction and interpretation of statutes, but it is equally well settled that when the language of a law is plain and unambiguous, whether expressed in general or more limited terms, there is no room left for construction, and a resort to extrinsic circumstances is not permitted.

Expressio unius est exclusio alterius. The fixing the time during which the lien shall continue is the exclusion of all other times, and is just as distinct and clear a limitation as if the words of the statute had been: The lien shall cease and determine in two years from the date of its docketing, or shall continue two years from the date of its docketing, and no longer.

If the decision in Dewey v. Latson, as limited and controlled by Chapin v. Broder and Isaacs v. Swift, is a correct exposition of the law, still, we say, the case presented by the respondent is not within that decision.

Respondent had a money demand against Covillaud and Nye, and, as he supposed, a vendor's lien upon certain real property to secure its payment, and he sued to recover a judgment for the money, and a decree foreclosing his lien and subjecting the real property to sale for its payment. The District Court gave him just what he asked, a complete money judgment for the sum of four thousand one hundred and sixty dollars and fifty cents, besides costs, and a decree foreclosing his supposed lien and directing a sale of the property, in the event that the money judgment was not paid within twenty days from the date of its rendition. The judgment and the decree were each complete in itself, and were just as separate and distinct as though they had been rendered in distinct Courts as under the old practice. Under that practice, it is well settled that the mortgagee may, at his election, sue at law upon his bond or note, or in ejectment for possession of the property, or in equity, to foreclose his mortgage and sell the property; and his remedies being concurrent, that he may pursue them all at the same time. Lord Mansfield said, in Burnell v. Martin, Doug. 417, that it had been "settled over and over again, that a person in such a case is at liberty to pursue all his remedies at once." (2 Hilliard on Mortgages, 83-5.)

Under our system, law and equity jurisdiction are in the same Court, and it is well settled here that under the law as it stood when the judgment in controversy was rendered, the mortgagee might have, in the same action, his judgment in personam at law and his decree in rem. in equity; and it would follow, as a matter of course, under section two hundred and nine of the Practice Act, that he could have execution for the enforcement of his judgment at any time within its life, unless the same were stayed by operation of law or the commands of a Court having competent jurisdiction. He could, also unless restrained, at any time after the entry of his decree proceed to enforce it by a sale of the specific property, and though he could collect his debt but once, he might have his execution and his order of sale at the same time. (Rollins v. Forbes, 10 Cal. 299; Rowland v. Leiby, 14 Cal. 156; Chapin v. Broder, 16 Cal. 422.) And, it would seem that under section two hundred and forty-five of the Practice Act, as amended in eighteen hundred and sixty and eighteen hundred and sixty-one, (Statutes of 1861, p. 306,) the plaintiff is still entitled to have his judgment as well as his decree, though by that amendment he must exhaust the mortgaged property before his judgment can become a lien or he can have execution thereon. (Cormerais v. Genella, 22 Cal. 116.)

The statute regulating appeals defines with great particularity what he must do. He must give an undertaking for costs in all cases, to render his appeal effectual for any purpose. (Sec. 348.) If his appeal be from a money judgment, he must give an undertaking in double the amount of the judgment and costs, or it will not stay execution. (Sec. 349.) If his appeal be from a decree directing the sale of mortgaged property, he must give an undertaking in a sum to be fixed by the Judge, that he will not commit waste, for the use and occupation, and for the payment of any deficiency, or the sale will not be stayed. (Sec. 352.) The language of the statute is plain and imperative, and its requirements must be strictly complied with. Intention to comply will not avail. In the case of a money judgment, if the amount of the undertaking be insufficient, though the party giving it may intend to make it sufficient, and both parties may believe it to be so, and act upon their belief, it will not operate a stay and cannot prolong the life of a judgment lien. (Chapin v. Broder, 16 Cal. 403.)

Jos. E. N. Lewis and J. O. Goodwin, for Respondents.

The appellants, as to the fourth point, say: "The lien of the Lewis judgment expired on the 14th of May, 1862, two years from the date of its being docketed, and could not be extended by appeal. The case of Dewey v. Latson, 6 Cal.

England v. Lewis et al.

130, is not law. (Practice Act, Sec. 204; Chapin v. Broder, 16 Cal. 104; Isaacs v. Swift, 10 Cal. 82; Castro v. Ellis, 13 Texas, 229.)" In this State there is "but one form of civil action for the enforcement or protection of private rights, and the redress or prevention of private wrongs." (Practice Act, Sec. 1.) "A judgment is the final determination of the rights of the parties to that action or proceeding, and may be entered in term or vacation." (Practice Act, Sec. 144.) Under the two hundred and forty-sixth section of the Practice Act as it stood before the Act was amended in eighteen hundred and sixty, "in an action for the foreclosure or satisfaction of a mortgage of real property, or the satisfaction of a lien or incumbrance upon property real or personal," the Court could render judgment for the amount found due upon the personal obligation, and by its judgment direct a sale of the property, or any part of it, and the application of the proceeds to the payment of the amount due on the mortgage, lien, or incumbrance, with costs and execution for the balance. (Rollins v. Forbes and Wife, 10 Cal. 299; Rowe v. Table Mountain Water Co., 10 Cal. 44; Rowland v. Leiby, 14 Cal. 156; Cormerais v. Genella, 22 Cal. 116; Chapin v. Broder, 16 Cal. 422.) In all such actions, a judgment so rendered, when docketed, becomes a lien upon all real property owned at that time by defendants, or either of them, in the county, or that may be acquired by them in the county where such judgment is docketed. (See authorities last quoted.)

It is conceded by appellants, on agreement, that it is a judgment of such a character as, when docketed, would be a lien on real property in the county. We therefore submit, that the judgment in the case of Lewis v. Covillaud and Nye became and was, on the 14th day of May, 1860, the day it was docketed, a lien upon all real property then owned by them or either of them, or that they or either of them might acquire thereafter, within the lifetime of the judgment, in that county. The appellants contend that that judgment lien had expired by limitation; and to reach that conclusion, have argued at great length two propositions:

1st. Can the lien of a judgment be extended by appeal?

2d. If it can, was the lien of the judgment in Lewis v. Covillaud and Nye extended by the appeal in that case, or otherwise?

In discussing the first proposition, we shall assume that the appeal in the case of Lewis v. Covillaud and Nye stayed execution. If the execution was stayed, the Supreme Court of this State, in the case of Dewey v. Latson, 6 Cal. 130, has answered the appellants' proposition in the affirmative. The appellants contend that if the judgment by the appeal was stayed as to property ordered to be sold, it did not stay execution for the moneyed demand. That the undertaking not being in double the amount of the moneyed demand, Lewis could have ignored the order of sale and proceeded by execution. If to stay execution in such a case it be necessary to give an undertaking in double the amount of the moneyed demand, as contradistinguished from the undertaking required by section five hundred and fifty-two, it would equally require the giving of a second three hundred dollar undertaking for costs. To carry out appellant's proposition, predicated upon his theory that Lewis had two separate and distinct judgments that were in nowise dependent upon each other, it would require four undertakings on appeal to stay execution. There would be the three hundred dollar undertaking for costs on the foreclosure judgment, and the undertaking required by section five hundred and fifty-two to stay the decretal order. There would then have to be a second three hundred dollar undertaking for costs on the moneyed judgment, and then one in double the amount of the moneyed demand. A construction followed to its logical conclusion, that leads to such a complex system of bonds, cannot be the true one as against a more simple and equally effective one. The appellants seem to have forgotten that in this State we have but "one form of action," and that in that action the Court by its final judgment can grant legal and equitable relief as the facts in that action warrant. As there is but one action, whether it be for legal or equitable relief, or both, there can be but one final judgment in favor of any one party as against the other. In the language of the Act, "a judgment is the final determination of the rights of the parties in the action or proceeding." It includes equitable as well as legal rights; and the Court may grant, except in case of default, "any relief consistent with the case made by the complaint and embraced within the issue." (Practice Act, section 117.)

Section two hundred and forty-six of the Practice Act, under which the Court rendered judgment in the case of Lewis v. Covillaud and Nye, reads: "In all actions for the foreclosure of or satisfaction of a mortgage of real property, or the satisfaction of a lien or incumbrance upon property real or personal, the Court shall have power by its judgment to direct the sale of the property or any part of it, the application of the proceeds to the payment of the amount due on the mortgage, lien or incumbrance, with costs, and execution for the balance." (Wood's Dig. p. 200, Art. 980.) Under that section we submit, that a judgment creditor could not proceed to enforce his judgment by execution upon an action indicated by that section, until the encumbered premises had been sold. In all such cases it matters not whether the judgment was as in Rollins v. Forbes, or as in Moss v. Flint et als., upon which the Freaner claim was predicated in the Chapin v. Broder case. Execution, by the terms of that Act, would be stayed until the sale of the property upon which the lien was established. The statute states when an execution may issue on such a judgment, and by implication denies the right to enforce the judgment by execution at any other time. Expressio unius est exclusio alterius. (Zander v. Coe, 5 Cal.) Appellants admit that the appeal stayed the sale of the premises; and if our construction of the Act be correct, it follows that execution for the moneyed demand was stayed until the legal impediment was removed by sale or otherwise.

By the Court, SANDERSON, C. J.

This action was brought to enjoin a Sheriff's sale of a certain house and lot upon which the defendant Lewis claimed a judgment lien by virtue of the two hundred and fourth section of the Practice Act. The facts disclosed by the record are substantially as follows: Lewis commenced an action in the District Court of Yuba County against Covillaud and Nye in 1859 to recover judgment against them for an amount of money claimed to be due to him, and also to enforce a vendor's lien upon certain real estate in the City of Marysville belonging to Covillaud, and to obtain an order of sale thereof to satisfy the judgment that he might recover. On the 9th of May, 1860, he recovered judgment for four thousand three hundred and twenty-three dollars and five cents, and also obtained a decree foreclosing his vendor's lien and directing the sale of the real estate for the satisfaction of the judgment. This judgment was docketed on the 14th of May, 1860. Within the statute time Covillaud and Nye filed and gave notice of motion, and filed their statement, for a new trial. Afterwards, on the 17th of November, 1860, their motion for a new trial was overruled by the Court. Covillaud and Nye, within the statute time, gave notice of appeal to the Supreme Court from the judgment against them, and from the order overruling their motion for a new trial. They also, in proper time, executed and filed their undertaking on appeal, having first applied to the Judge of the Court for and obtained an order, under section three hundred and fifty-two of the Practice Act, fixing the amount of the undertaking at two thousand dollars, to stay waste and secure the value of the use and occupation of the premises ordered to be sold, and to pay any deficiency remaining unpaid upon said judgment, etc. The appeal thus perfected was passed upon by the Supreme Court on the 20th of December, 1862. The Court affirmed the money judgment, but reversed the order of sale or so much of the judgment as established a vendor's lien and directed a sale of the real estate. (Lewis v. Covillaud, 21 Cal. 178.)

The remittitur from the Supreme Court was filed in the Court below by Lewis on the 9th of January, 1863, when the judgment in that Court was modified so as to conform to the judgment of the Supreme Court. On the 20th of February, 1863, execution was issued upon the judgment so modified, and was afterwards levied upon the house and lot described in the complaint and belonging to the plaintiff, England.

At the time of the docketing of the Lewis judgment, on the 14th of May, 1860, neither Covillaud nor Nye, the judgment debtors, had any interest in this house and lot. One Levy was the owner of the premises. Nye purchased them of Levy on the 11th of June, 1861, more than a year after the docketing of Lewis' judgment. At the time he purchased, Nye was a married man and the head of a family. He had no residence of his own; he took possession of the premises, with his family, some ten or twelve days after he purchased, and as soon as he could get possession. Nye continued to reside upon the premises until the 23d of August, 1861, when he and his wife filed their declaration claiming the premises as a homestead. From that time Nye and family continued to reside upon the premises until the 19th of July, 1862, when, for a consideration of two thousand dollars, they conveyed the same to plaintiff, who took the possession thereof.

At the time this action was commenced a temporary injunction was granted, which was dissolved on the final trial, the Court below holding that the judgment in Lewis v. Covillaud and Nye was a valid and subsisting lien under the two hundred and fourth section of the Practice Act, upon the house and lot of the plaintiff at the time of the issuing and levy of the execution thereon, and that the defendant Lewis had a right to sell the premises to satisfy his judgment. From that judgment the plaintiff appeals.

Before entering upon the discussion of the various questions involved in this case it is important that the nature and character of the judgment which was rendered in Lewis v. Covillaud and Nye should be definitely settled. That judgment was rendered and docketed prior to the amendments of the two hundred and forty-sixth section of the Practice Act in 1860 and 1861, and its character and legal effect in all respects must be determined by the law as it stood prior to that time. The judgment, after the usual recitals, provides as follows: "The Court, being sufficiently advised in the premises, orders, adjudges and decrees that said plaintiff do have and recover from said defendants the sum of three thousand two hundred and five dollars, with interest thereon from the 12th day of February, 1859, amounting in the aggregate to the sum of four thousand one hundred and sixty dollars and fifty cents, and that said sum draw interest from the date thereof at the rate of two per cent per month until paid; and also for the sum of one hundred and fifty-two dollars and twenty-five cents costs, to be taxed in this action, including the sum of ten dollars and thirty cents costs taxed in the Burlingame suit.

"It is therefore ordered, adjudged and decreed that judgment be and the same is hereby rendered and entered up in favor of the plaintiff, Joseph E. N. Lewis, and against the defendants, Charles Covillaud and M. C. Nye, for the sum of four thousand one hundred and sixty dollars and fifty cents, and that said sum draw interest from the date thereof until paid at the rate of two per cent per month, and for the further sum of one hundred and sixty-two dollars and twenty-five cents, costs of suit," etc. The judgment then proceeds in the form of a decree in equity, under the old chancery practice, establishing a vendor's lien and providing for its enforcement in the usual manner.

Under our system of practice there is but one form of action "for the enforcement or protection of private rights, and the redress or prevention of private wrongs," and in a proper case legal and equitable relief may be had in the same action. The result in such cases is a judgment with a twofold aspect, one looking to the legal and the other to the equitable relief. Hence it has been held that in foreclosure cases a formal judgment in personam may be rendered against the defendants for the amount found due, with a provision for its enforcement against the property upon which the lien is established.

(Rollins v. Forbes, 10 Cal. 299; Rowland v. Leiby, 14 Cal. 156; Chapin v. Broder, 16 Cal. 422.) In Rowland v. Leiby, Mr. Chief Justice Field said: "In this State parties are at liberty to adopt in the foreclosure of mortgages the course pursued under the old chancery system, and take a decree adjudging the amount due upon the personal obligation of the mortgagor, and directing a sale of the premises and the application of the proceeds to its payment, and apply, after the sale, for the ascertainment of any deficiency, and execution for the same; or they may take a formal judgment for the amount due in the first instance. In the latter case the proceeds can be applied by the officer making the sale immediately upon the judgment, and no further proceedings will be necessary on the part of the Court to ascertain the deficiency."

The appellant contends that the judgment under consideration is in accordance with the latter form above described, and the respondents contend that it is in accordance with the former. Counsel for respondents seem to overlook one of the consequences of their theory, which would, if their theory is to prevail, prove fatal to their case.

The respondents seek to establish a lien under the judgment in question. If the judgment has the form which they claim for it, the docketing thereof created no lien, according to the rule in Chapin v. Broder. In that case the Court said: "We have held in reference to this section (246 of the Practice Act) that in actions of foreclosure its effect was to authorize a personal judgment against the mortgagor, in addition to the relief usually granted in such cases. Where such a judgment is rendered, there is no doubt that when docketed it becomes a lien in accordance with the statute. It is obvious, however, that nothing but a judgment establishing a definite personal liability can have this effect. A mere contingent provision, referring to no particular amount, and in abeyance until the contingency is determined, is not within the meaning of the statute. It may become a valid and perfect judgment, but until the amount to be recovered is ascertained and fixed no effect can be given to it as a lien."

England v. Lewis et al.

"In the present case, the provisions in question were of this character, and no general lien was acquired by the docketing of the judgment. It is no answer to say that the judgments contained a statement of the amount due. There was no personal judgment for this amount, nor was there anything in the nature of a personal judgment beyond the mere direction for the issuance of an execution in the event of the insufficiency of the mortgage property to pay the debt. The whole matter was contingent, indefinite and uncertain, and so long as this continued to be the case no effect whatever could be given to it." Under the doctrine in that case, the respondent Lewis never acquired a lien upon the premises in question, if his judgment is nothing more than the old chancery judgment in foreclosure cases; but, in our opinion, the judgment is a personal judgment for the amount of the debt, with the usual relief in equity superadded. Such being the case, it became a lien when docketed, as provided in the two hundred and fourth section of the Practice Act.

The first point made by counsel for appellant is as to the effect of an appeal upon a judgment lien, and it is claimed that the two years during which the lien is allowed to continue commences from the docketing of the judgment, notwithstanding an appeal may have been taken, and notwithstanding an undertaking on appeal may have been given sufficient to stay all proceedings upon the judgment in the Court below, pending the appeal.

And, in the second place, it is claimed that if an appeal, with a sufficient stay-bond, operates to postpone or suspend and continue the lien, so that the two years do not commence to run until after the date of the remittitur from this Court, no stay-bond sufficient for that purpose was given in the case of Lewis v. Covillaud and Nye.

1. The first proposition has been argued with much learning and ability by counsel upon both sides, but under the view which we have taken of the question, it becomes unnecessary to follow the line of argument which has been adopted.

Englund v. Lewis et al.

As long as eight years ago this question came before the late Supreme Court, in the case of Dewey v. Latson, 6 Cal. 130, and after mature consideration was there decided adversely to the appellants. In that case the only point made was the same as that now under consideration, and the Court said: "The first reading of the Act would seem to be conclusive in favor of the appellant, but when we come to examine the legal solecism of allowing a party by his own motion thus to defeat the remedy which the law has given the creditor, and to destroy the security furnished, which must inevitably result if the construction contended for be sustained, we are necessarily put upon inquiry as to the intention of the Legislature and the possibility of escape from such absurd consequences.

"The obvious intention was to charge the estate of the judgment debtor, and to give the creditor two years to make his money. The statute intended that this time should run from the date of the judgment or period at which the plaintiff was in a situation to take out execution and pursue his remedy to final satisfaction. By the defendant's own act the force of that judgment has been suspended, and the lien, which is merely an incident, must share a like fate. It would be absurd to say that a lien attached upon a judgment and expired by its own limitation while the judgment was still in fieri, and could not be prosecuted to full fruition.

"The defendant would thus be able to abridge, if not destroy the lien, and in all cases where a period of more than two years intervened between the date of the judgment in the Court below and the final judgment in this Court, to substitute personal for that security which the law gives the successful party. It was never intended that a party, by prosecuting a frivolous appeal, should thus be allowed to take advantage of his own wrong."

The case of Dewey v. Latson, has never been overruled. On the contrary, the construction of the two hundred and fourth section of the Practice Act came before that Court again only two years later, in the case of Isaac v. Swift, 10 Cal. 71, and again, two years thereafter, in the case of Chapin v. Broder, 16 Cal. 403.

In the former case, Dewey v. Latson was cited by counsel and brought directly to the attention of the Court. Had the Court become dissatisfied with the rule established in Dewey v. Latson, an opportunity thus early was afforded in Isaac v. Swift to overrule that case, yet in the opinion of the Court no word of dissatisfaction is found. In Chapin v. Broder, the case of Dewey v. Latson is expressly mentioned, commented upon and explained by Mr. Justice Cope, who delivered the opinion of the Court, without expressing any dissent from the rule there established. On the contrary, in his opinion delivered on the petition for a rehearing, he clearly shows that the doctrine in Chapin v. Broder does not conflict with that announced in Dewey v. Latson, but on the contrary is in harmony therewith. Thus, whether correct or not, the construction of the section of the Practice Act in question, as given in Dewey v. Latson, has remained undisturbed for more than eight years, during which time it has been the rule of decision in the Courts and of conduct with the people. Great interests may have been acquired under the law thus expounded which might be prejudiced by a contrary exposition at this late day. Where such is the case no change should be made by the Courts, but if a change be demanded a resort to the Legislature should be had. Ruinous consequences might follow a change resulting from judicial tergiversation by reason of its retroactive effect, but none such can result from legislative interposition. Without, therefore, discussing the merits of the question, we rest our decision solely upon the doctrine of stare decisis, holding the present to be a case to which that doctrine ought to be applied.

It follows that where an appeal has been taken and a bond sufficient to stay proceedings upon the judgment pending the appeal has been given, the lien created by the two hundred and fourth section of the Practice Act remains a valid and subsisting lien upon all the real property of the judgment debtor, not exempt from execution in the county where the judgment is docketed, owned by him at the date of the docketing of the judgment, or subsequently acquired, until such lien expires, and that the same does not expire until the end of two years from and after the date of the remittitur from this Court.

2. The next point made by counsel for appellant is to the effect (assuming the law to be as we have declared) that no appeal bond was given in Lewis v. Covillaud and Nye sufficient to stay proceedings on the personal judgment during the pendency of the appeal, and that as a consequence Lewis was not prevented by the appeal from proceeding at any time to enforce his money judgment by execution, and if so, that the lien expired at the end of two years from the time the judgment was docketed. If it be true, as contended, that the bond given on appeal was not sufficient to stay proceedings on the personal judgment, it follows, under the rule laid down in Chapin v. Broder, that the lien was not extended by the appeal beyond two years from the docketing of the judgment.

The three hundred and fifty-second section of the Practice Act, under which the undertaking was given, provides that, "If the judgment or order appealed from direct the sale or delivery of possession of real property, the execution of the same shall not be stayed unless a written undertaking be executed on the part of the appellant, with two or more sureties, to the effect that during the possession of such property by the appellant he will not commit, or suffer to be committed, any waste thereon, and that if the judgment be affirmed he will pay the value of the use and occupation of the property from the time of the appeal until the delivery of possession thereof, pursuant to the judgment or order, not exceeding a sum to be fixed by the Judge of the Court by which the judgment was rendered or order made, and which shall be specified in the undertaking. When the judgment is for the sale of mortgage premises and the payment of a deficiency arising upon the sale, the undertaking shall also provide for the payment of such deficiency."

This section is double, and provides for two distinct undertakings upon two distinct kinds of judgments, one directing a sale of real property, and the other directing a delivery of the possession of real property. In a case where the judgment directs a sale, the undertaking need only provide security against waste, unless such sale is of mortgaged premises and the judgment provides for the payment of a deficiency, in which case it must provide for the payment of such deficiency. In such a case no provision need be inserted in the undertaking for the payment of the value of the use and occupation of the premises pending the appeal, for the obvious reason that the judgment creditor does not become entitled to the value of the use and occupation until after a sale has been made. (Practice Act, Sec. 236.) Where the judgment directs a delivery of the possession of real property the undertaking must provide against waste and for the payment of the value of the use and occupation, and for those two only, for there can be, in such a case, no question as to deficiency. (Whitney v. Allen, 21 Cal. 233.) Where the sale is directed for the purpose of satisfying any lien other than a mortgage lien, the undertaking need not provide for the payment of any deficiency which the judgment may direct. To this extent the statute discriminates in favor of mortgage and against all other liens. The lien in Lewis v. Covillaud and Nye was not a mortgage, but a vendor's lien. Hence, the undertaking in question is good only as an undertaking for costs and waste; beyond that it was not required by law, and was utterly void. Was such an undertaking sufficient to stay all proceedings upon the judgment in question?

We are aware that an impression has prevailed to a considerable extent among the members of the profession to the effect that in foreclosure cases, regardless of the character of the lien, no undertaking on appeal is required except for costs, as provided in section three hundred and forty-eight, and for waste, use and occupation and deficiency, as provided in section three hundred and fifty-two; but from a careful examination of the several sections of the Practice Act touching undertakings on appeal it is manifest that this impression is without a substantial foundation. The impression proceeds upon the theory that the lien remains a subsisting security for the payment of the money demand, but this is true only where there is no contest as to the validity of the lien; for if the contest be as to the validity of the lien, and the appellate Court finally decide against its validity, the security which it is supposed to have afforded is gone, or rather it has never had an existence. The only color which the statute gives to this theory is found in the three hundred and fifty-second section. By providing for an undertaking against waste and for the payment of any deficiency arising upon the sale, that section seems to proceed upon the theory that the land, if no waste be committed, is security for the debt to the extent of its value, and that no further security is needed except as to a deficiency, should one arise upon the sale. Such would undoubtedly be the case where the appeal makes no attack upon the validity of the lien, but the contrary is the result where the contest is as to the validity of the lien if the appellate Court decides against it.

But to this seeming theory of the three hundred and fifty-second section, the three hundred and fifty-fourth section is opposed. That section provides that "the undertakings prescribed by sections three hundred and forty-eight, three hundred and forty-nine, three hundred and fifty, and three hundred and fifty-two, may be in one instrument or several, at the option of the appellant." Thus the Legislature seems to have contemplated that a case might arise where the appellant would be required to give several or all of the undertakings provided for in cases of appeal, according to the character of the judgment and the extent of the appeal. This view is in harmony with that provision of the statute which enables a party to appeal from the whole or any specific part of the judgment, (Practice Act, sec. 337,) and with that which limits the stay of proceedings to the judgment or order appealed from, and allows the Court to proceed upon any other matter included in the action and not affected by the judgment or order appealed from. (Sec. 353.)

Our conclusions are, that where there is a money judgment only, the undertaking, in order to stay proceedings, must be in double the amount of the judgment; and if in addition to a money judgment there be a judgment for the delivery of documents, or the execution of a conveyance, or a sale of real property, or for the delivery of real property, an additional bond or bonds, as the case may be, must be given in order to stay proceedings upon each branch or part of the judgment, and that if there be a part or branch of the judgment as to which no bond is given, proceedings upon such branch or part are not stayed.

In the case of a judgment which directs the execution of a conveyance or other instrument, of course no bond, except for the money branch of the judgment, if such there be, is required, the appellant being required to execute and deposit with the clerk the conveyance or other instrument instead of the bond exacted in other cases.

In foreclosure cases, where there is no judgment in personam, but only a judgment in accordance with the old chancery practice, a bond for costs and a bond for waste and deficiency would be sufficient; but where the judgment is in the form authorized by our practice, as decided in Rollins v. Forbes, Rowland v. Leiby, and Chapin v. Broder, and it is desired to stay proceedings as to the whole judgment, there must be a bond for costs, a bond in double the amount of the personal judgment and a bond for waste and deficiency, all of which may be included in one instrument or several, at the option of the appellant. In the present instance the appeal was from the whole judgment, but no bonds were given except for costs, waste and deficiency. The first was sufficient for the purpose of perfecting the appeal, and the second was sufficient for the purpose of staying proceedings upon that branch of the judgment which directs a sale of the premises in question, but was not sufficient to stay proceedings upon that branch which gives a personal judgment against the defendants, and Lewis might at any time have proceeded by execution to enforce the collection of the money.

England v. Lewis et al.

This disposes of the case and makes it unnecessary to consider the homestead question presented by the record.

As to the point made by the respondents to the effect that a sale of the premises, if no lien exists, would not create a cloud upon the plaintiff's title, we think the facts of the case bring it within the rule announced in Shattuck v. Carson, 2 Cal. 588; in Guy v. Hermance, 5 Cal. 73; in Alverson v. Jones, 10 Cal. 11; and in Pixley v. Huggins, 15 Cal. 127.

The judgment is reversed and the Court below directed to render a judgment in favor of the plaintiff, in conformity with the prayer of the complaint.

By the Court, SANDERSON, C. J., on petition for rehearing.

So far as the character and legal effect of the judgment in Lewis v. Covilland and Nye are concerned we have announced no new principle, but have merely applied to the facts of this case principles which were established in Rollins v. Forbes, Rowland v. Leiby, and in Chapin v. Broder, cited in our former opinion. The following principles are established by those cases: In a foreclosure case the plaintiff may recover a personal money judgment and a decree foreclosing the mortgage and directing the land to be sold for the purpose of satisfying that personal judgment; and secondly, if he does not obtain a personal judgment, but contents himself with the decree in use under the old chancery practice, such decree does not become a lien, under the two hundred and fourth section of the Practice Act. On the contrary, no lien attaches under such a judgment until after a sale has been had and the deficiency, if there be one, is ascertained and docketed, and then only for the amount of such deficiency. This twofold judgment is the fruit of our system of practice and beautifully exemplifies its superiority. Under the old system two suits would have been necessary in order to accomplish the same result. The result being accomplished the plaintiff might, under the old system, proceed by fi. fa. upon his judgment at law, or he might proceed under his decree in equity, but he could not proceed upon both at the same time. The same is true under our system. Where a personal judgment is rendered at law, so to speak, and also a decree in equity is awarded, the plaintiff may proceed to enforce either, at his election, but he cannot proceed upon both at the same time. Such is the result when the principle announced in those cases is carried to its logical conclusion. When it is said that a personal judgment may be rendered in foreclosure cases the right to enforce the same by fi. fa. is necessarily implied. A judgment which cannot be enforced is no judgment at all, and we know of no way by which a mere money judgment can be enforced except by fi. fa. The decree in such a case is enforced by the Sheriff or Commissioner under a certified copy. The hypothesis from which counsel argue that in such a case there is but one judgment with different members merely, bearing a dependent relation to each other, is unwarranted. The true theory upon which the question under consideration proceeds is to the effect that there are two judgments, either of which may be enforced regardless of the other, with the qualification that they cannot both be enforced at the same time, and that the satisfaction of one is the satisfaction of the other. When the late Supreme Court said that a personal judgment might be rendered "against the mortgagor in addition to the relief usually granted in such cases," they meant a judgment which could be enforced by fi. fa., or they meant nothing. Hence we held in our former opinion, and still hold, that where the plaintiff takes this double judgment he may, at his election, proceeded by fi. fa. upon his money judgment or he may proceed to make his money by a sale of the mortgaged premises under his decree.

In this connection it is proper to remark that counsel have fallen into this fundamental error. They assume and argue that if A. gives B. his promissory note, and mortgages his land to secure its payment, B. thereby agrees to look to the land as a primary fund for the payment of his debt, and A. has the right to insist that he shall do so. We know of no such rule either at law or in equity. The mortgage is made for B.'s security and not for A.'s protection. By taking security B. does not waive A.'s personal liability either in toto or pro tanto. B. may waive the security at any stage and proceed upon the personal liability created by the contract. (Of course, we limit this doctrine to cases where the rights of third persons are not involved.) This error seems to have become an ignis fatuus by which counsel have been misled through their whole argument. By its light they have sought to construe the judgment in Lewis v. Covilland and Nye, and the result is such as might have been expected—a nondescript judgment with a single head, but Janus-faced, characterized by counsel as “in personam et rem.” Counsel will not admit that there was no personal judgment, but claim that, although there was a personal judgment, it could not be enforced except through the decree of foreclosure. This is blowing hot and cold. It is tantamount to saying that there is a personal judgment and there is not.

The cause of this tergiversation is apparent. In Chapin v. Broder it was held that where there was no personal judgment there could be no lien, under the two hundred and fourth section of the Practice Act, until after a sale of the mortgaged premises and the docketing of the deficiency. To admit, therefore, that there is not a personal judgment is to admit that there is no lien, which is the sole question in controversy in the present case. Hence, in order to maintain their standing in Court, counsel are compelled to insist that there was a personal judgment. Then, having fortified themselves against Scylla upon the one hand, they are forced to guard against Charybdis on the other; but in order to do the latter they cannot admit that the personal judgment carries with it the right of a fi. fa., for there is no appeal bond which stays its execution, and more than two years have elapsed since the judgment was docketed, and the lien is therefore lost. Hence they claim a personal judgment which cannot be executed until after a sale under the decree, and then only to the extent of a deficiency, should there be one—a judgment, when considered as a personal one, confessedly felo de se in part, and perhaps in toto. It is a misnomer to call a judgment which has such incidents annexed to it a personal judgment. It is nothing more than the old chancery decree.

In support of the theory that the personal judgment is not full fledged, counsel call attention to the fact that it does not terminate with the ordinary phrase "for which let execution issue," and that nothing is said about the issuing of an execution until we come to the end of the decree, where the issuing of an execution, for any deficiency which may be found to exist, is authorized, and that therefore the judgment, by its own terms, is made to prescribe the order of its own execution, and that the order thus prescribed cannot be departed from except by special license of the Court. Admitting this to be so, it is not a little surprising that counsel do not perceive that a consequence must follow which is fatal to their case, by destroying entirely the judgment lien, upon which alone they rely. By this construction the money part of the judgment is made dependent upon the decree for its enforcement, and the mortgaged premises are made a primary fund, which must be exhausted before a fi. fa. can issue. Thus the judgment is provided with a special lien, resulting from its own terms. To such cases the two hundred and fourth section does not apply. That section creates no additional lien where one already exists, until after the special lien has been exhausted, and then only to the extent of the deficiency. It was so held in Chapin v. Broder. That section was intended to secure a lien only for such judgments as are purely money judgments, without any lien resting in contract, or in other words judgments which are to be enforced by fi. fa. Thus, only theory upon which it can be claimed that the judgment in Lewis v. Covillaud and Nye became a lien under that section is the one which we have adopted, to the effect that there was a personal money judgment, so far independent of the decree that it could, at the election of the plaintiff, be first enforced by a fi. fa. That there was such a judgment we have no doubt. The mere fact that it did not conclude with the phrase "for which let execution issue," has no significance. That phrase is unnecessary.

People v. Foren.

It is of the form and not the substance. The judgment being pronounced by the Court, the law, ex proprio vigore, directs the final process to issue. That there was such a judgment, in the opinion of the late Supreme Court also, is apparent from the judgment which they rendered on the appeal, which is in these words: "Our conclusion is, that as to the lien, the judgment should be reversed, but that in other respects it should be affirmed." That is, so far as the decree is concerned the judgment is reversed, but as to the personal judgment it is affirmed. Under this personal judgment, as we held in our former opinion, the respondent acquired a lien, but he failed to enforce it within the two years through which it extended. It was not suspended during the appeal, for the obvious reason that no undertaking on appeal from the personal judgment was given, as required by the three hundred and forty-ninth section of the Practice Act.

Rehearing denied.

THE PEOPLE v. JOHN FOREN.

MURDER.—One who slays his fellow being with that degree of malice which is implied when no considerable provocation appears to have existed, or which is implied when all the circumstances show an abandoned and malignant heart, is guilty of murder; but the degree of the crime must be determined by the jury from all the circumstances of the case.

MURDER IN FIRST DEGREE, AND MURDER IN THE SECOND DEGREE.—The classification of murder of different degrees into two kinds, does not render the offense of the minor degree less than murder. It is for the jury to say, under instructions of the Court as to the law, of which degree it is; and if they find that the slayer deliberately resolved before the homicide was committed to kill the deceased, it is murder in the first degree; but if, on the other hand, they find that there was no deliberate, preconceived intention to kill, except that which is implied from the circumstances showing no considerable provocation to have existed, or an abandoned and malignant heart, or that the defendant did not intend the fatal blow to produce death, yet intended the blow, then it is murder in the second degree.

APPEAL from the District Court, Fifteenth Judicial District, Butte County.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the Court.

L. C. Granger, for Appellant.

J. G. McCullough, Attorney-General, for Respondent.

By the Court, CURREY, J.

The defendant was indicted for the murder of Tim Malony. Both the defendant and the deceased were drunk when the homicide was committed. Under our law drunkenness is no excuse for crime, unless it be occasioned by the fraud, contrivance or force of some other person or persons for the purpose of causing the perpetration of an offense. The homicide was caused by the defendant, who used a knife from the "cup-board," as one witness testified, with which he stabbed the deceased in a vital part of his body, so that he died within a very short time afterward. At the trial the defendant was found guilty of murder in the second degree, and was sentenced by the Court to be imprisoned in the State Prison for the term of fifteen years. The defendant has appealed to this Court from the judgment.

The Court below, in charging the jury, said: "In murder of the second degree, malice may be shown, and the law, in case a killing has been proved, will imply malice, unless extenuating circumstances are shown; but although the law implies malice from the killing alone, yet there must be no mixture of deliberation or premeditation in the act of killing, and there must be no intent to kill in giving the fatal blow, otherwise the crime would be murder in the first degree."

The counsel for the defendant requested the Court to instruct the jury in the following words: "That the difference under our statute between murder in the first and second degrees does not consist in the degree of malice necessary to effect the killing, since in each case malice accomplishes its wicked purpose; but the difference consists in the amount or degree of deliberation beforehand with which the malice effects its fell purpose. The same kind or quality of malice is requisite in each case; but the less degree or amount of cool deliberation beforehand constitutes the lesser degree of murder. Therefore the jury must find, beyond a reasonable doubt, that of his malice, and not of any mere passion, defendant resolved beforehand to kill and murder the deceased, and influenced by such motive and not by mere passion, defendant carried the same into execution, in order to find defendant guilty of murder in the second degree."

The Court refused to so instruct the jury, and the defendant excepted; and the defendant also excepted to the instruction given by the Court above set forth, and now seeks to reverse the judgment because of these alleged errors of the Court below.

The statute defines murder to be the unlawful killing of a human being, with malice aforethought, either express or implied. Express malice is that deliberate intention unlawfully to take away the life of a fellow creature, which is manifested by external circumstances capable of proof. Malice shall be implied when no considerable provocation appears, or when all the circumstances of the killing show an abandoned and malignant heart. These are statutory definitions. (Wood's Digest, 330, 331, Secs. 19, 20, 21.) The twenty-first section of the Act concerning crimes and punishments has divided the crime of murder into two classes—murder in the first degree and murder in the second degree. The statute declares that "all murder which shall be perpetrated by means of poison, or lying in wait, torture, or by any other kind of wilful, deliberate, and premeditated killing, or which shall be committed in the perpetration, or attempt to perpetrate, any arson, rape, robbery or burglary, shall be deemed murder in the first degree; and all other kinds of murder shall be deemed murder in the second degree."

The statutory definition of murder is substantially in the language of the common law defining that term, and the classification of murders of different degrees of atrocity, into two kinds, does not render the lesser crime any other than murder; and if the homicide committed be murder, it is for the jury, under the instructions of the Court as to the law, to say of which degree it is, and to render their verdict accordingly.

There is no complaint that the Court incorrectly charged the jury as to what constitutes murder in the first degree, or when a homicide amounts to manslaughter, or is justifiable or excusable; but the chief ground on which the counsel for the defendant places his objection to the charge is that the jury were instructed in substance that premeditation, deliberation, or intention to kill in giving the fatal blow, were not essential to constitute the homicide murder in the second degree, and that, therefore, the jury may have found the defendant guilty of murder in the second degree, when they would not have done so had they been correctly instructed as to the law on the subject.

It is a cardinal doctrine of criminal law, founded in natural justice, that it is the intention with which an act was done that constitutes its criminality. The intent and act must both concur to constitute the crime. (3 Greenleaf's Evidence, Sec. 13; 1 Bish. Crim. Law, Secs. 80 and 253.) The felonious intent may be proved directly, or it may be presumed from the proved existence of other facts. (3 Greenleaf's Evidence, Sec. 14.) Nothing short of an intent to do a forbidden thing will make a person a criminal in law; but it is not necessary that the interdicted thing actually done, should have been designed, but it must appear that such result was attained in the attempt to do on unlawful act.

The common law measures an act which is malum in se substantially by the result produced, though not contemplated, holding the doer of the act guilty of the thing done in the same manner as if it were specially intended, though not always guilty of the crime committed in the same degree. (Rutherford's Institutes, B. 1, O. 18, sec. 11.) On this principle, if one intending to murder a particular person attempts to shoot him, but, missing his mark, shoots another; or in an attempt to poison one, another accidentally loses his life by means of it, it is murder in the first degree. (1 Bishop on Crim. Law, sections 255-257.)

In The People v. Bealoba, 17 Cal. 395, the Court quote from the decision of the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania in the case of Commonwealth v. Green, 1 Ashmead, 296, in which is the following language: "To constitute murder in the first degree, the unlawful killing must be accompanied with a clear intent to take life. This is the great and distinguishing feature between murder in the first, and murder in the second degree." Our statute creating and defining the degrees of murder was transcribed from the Pennsylvania Act on the subject, under which the Commonwealth v. Green was decided. That decision seems to have been carefully considered, and was followed and approved by other decisions of the same Court, and we see no reason for disapproving of the construction of the statute given by that Court, and adopted in the case of The People v. Bealoba, when properly understood. (See The People v. Vincente Sanchez, 24 Cal. 17.)

It does not follow, from the language which we have quoted from the decision in Commonwealth v. Green, and adopted in The People v. Bealoba, that criminal intent is not an element in the crime of murder in the second degree. In those cases, "the clear intent to take life constituting the killing, murder in the first degree" was evidently intended to mean the deliberate and fixed purpose existing in the mind of the slayer to kill the object of his malice, as contradistinguished from that minor quality of intention which lacks the marked and distinguishing characteristic of deliberation or cold premeditation, and such was the manifest sense of the charge of the Court to which the defendant objects; for, immediately following the language of the charge to which the exception is taken, the Judge illustrates his meaning by an example, saying; "A man actuated by malice may attack another with the intention of not killing, but of committing some bodily injury; here, though death ensued, the crime would be murder in the second degree; because, although there was malice in the act, the killing was not premeditated, nor done with deliberation, nor was there any intent to kill in giving the mortal blow."

The commission of murder, as we have already seen, necessarily involves the intent, either actual or by imputation, to kill the person slain. Where the intent is actual it is manifested by circumstances that show the immediate and direct design of the author of the crime. When, by imputation, the intent is presumed from the proved or admitted existence of acts or conduct of the criminal, which are malum in se. Thus when the death of one person ensues from the felonious acts of another, the law imputes to the perpetrator the intention to produce the result which was the natural consequence of the primary act, and in such cases the circumstances must determine the degree of the crime. Though the charge was not entirely accurate, we think it manifest that the jury were not misled by it to the defendant's prejudice, when considered as a whole. Murder in the first degree was correctly defined and explained by the Court to the jury, and so was manslaughter, both voluntary and involuntary, as also the law respecting justifiable and excusable homicide. The effect of the verdict was that the defendant was not guilty of murder in the first degree, nor of manslaughter only, as defined by the statute, nor was the homicide justifiable or excusable, but still the defendant was guilty of slaying his fellow being with that degree of malice at least, which is implied when no considerable provocation appears to have existed or which is implied when all the circumstances connected with the act done show an abandoned and malignant heart, and that though the defendant did not directly and expressly intend that the fatal blow which he gave, should produce death, yet that the act of stabbing was expressly intended, and that from such act the law imputed to the perpetrator of it the intent to produce its natural effect and consequence, which was the death of the person slain.

Then viewing the charge in its plain meaning, as it must have been understood by a sensible jury, we are of the opinion the defendant had no ground to complain of it as erroneous. If we had any doubt upon the subject we should not hesitate to reverse the judgment.

In respect to the defendant's second assignment of error, we think the Court properly refused the instruction requested. If the defendant resolved before the homicide was committed to kill and murder the deceased, he was guilty of murder in the first degree. A resolve implies deliberation. Resolving to kill and murder a human being falls directly among the descriptive elements constituting murder in the first degree. Hence the Court could not with propriety have instructed the jury as requested.

We are of the opinion the judgment should be affirmed.

Judgment affirmed.

CHARLES MACLAY v. HARRY LOVE AND MARY LOVE.

SEPARATE PROPERTY OF MARRIED WOMEN.—The rights of married women, as to their separate property and their power over it in California, do not depend alone on the principles of the common law, or upon the doctrines of Courts of equity, but mainly upon the Constitution and statutes of the State.

PERSONAL LIABILITY OF MARRIED WOMEN.—Except in special cases, as under the Sole Trader's Act, a married woman cannot, by contract, create a personal liability against herself in any form.

MARRIED WOMEN'S SEPARATE ESTATE.—Under the laws of California a married woman, by the mere execution of a promissory note in the ordinary form in consideration of services rendered, or moneys furnished for her benefit or the benefit of her separate estate, or by the purchase of goods in the ordinary mode for her separate use, with the intent and understanding that the demand thus arising shall be satisfied out of her separate estate, cannot create a charge or incumbrance upon such separate estate; nor can a Court of equity impose and enforce such claim or demand as a charge or incumbrance upon such separate estate.

SAME.—A Court of equity in this State has no power to enforce any claim or demand as a charge or incumbrance on the separate estate of a married woman, unless such claim or demand has become a charge, lien, or incumbrance thereon by virtue of a contract evidenced by an instrument in writing, signed and acknowledged by the wife, in accordance with the sixth section of the Act defining the rights and duties of husband and wife, passed April 17, 1850.

SEPARATE ESTATE OF MARRIED WOMEN.—A married woman in this State has no power to create any charge, or lien, or incumbrance, upon her separate estate, except by an instrument in writing, signed and acknowledged by the wife, in accordance with the sixth section of the Act defining the rights and duties of husband and wife, passed April 17, 1850.

SIXTH SECTION OF THE ACT CONCERNING HUSBAND AND WIFE.—The sixth section of the Act defining the rights and duties of husband and wife, passed April 17, 1850, is not unconstitutional. Even if that part of said section which requires the husband's signature to the instrument is unconstitutional, it can be stricken out without vitiating the remainder of the section.

MacIay v. Love et al.

CONSTRUCTION OF ACT OF APRIL 17, 1850.—The Act of April 17, 1850, defining the rights and duties of husband and wife, applies to property held as separate by women married in this State after the passage of the Act, without reference to the time when the property was acquired.

APPEAL from the District Court, Third Judicial District, Santa Clara County.

In 1845 the Mexican Government granted to the defendant, Mary Love, (then Mary Bennett,) a tract of land lying in the present County of Santa Clara. The land was confirmed to her by the United States District Court, and she afterwards married defendant, Harry Love. In 1857 both defendants executed to H. S. Washburne their note for two hundred dollars for surveying said tract of land. In 1860 plaintiff sold defendant, Mary Love, goods of the value of twenty-seven dollars and forty cents, and about the same time the note was assigned to him. For the sum due on the note, and for the goods, the action was commenced.

The Court sustained a demurrer to the complaint, and plaintiff declining to amend, gave judgment for defendants. Plaintiff appealed.

The other facts are stated in the opinion of the Court.

C. T. Ryland, for Appellant.

Plaintiff says that property acquired previous to the Act of April 17, 1850, (Wood's Dig. 487,) is not affected by it.

The Mexican law prevailing in California, at and before its cession to the United States, declared this the separate estate and property of Mrs. Mary Love, and the quality of her estate was such that she might, by her own act, alienate it without the necessity of procuring the signature of her husband, or without being compelled any more than a feme sole, or a man, to procure the consent of others to a deed or contract concerning her property; but the husband's bare assent, or his previous license, or his subsequent express or implied ratification, or rather his mere failure to make objection, would be sufficient; and his subsequent ratification would make her sale, or lien, or contract, definitely valid, etc.

The case of Harvey v. Hill, 7 Texas, 595, is illustrative of this view, and was an action of ejectment. The instrument of conveyance (which was a conveyance of the wife's separate estate) under which the defendant derived title was made in the year 1837, and was governed by the Mexican law, and not by the statute of Texas. (See opinion in that case.)

In Ingoldsby v. Juan, it is said that the wife could, before the statute, dispose of her property with the bare assent of her husband as she chose, by any informal instrument, or possibly without writing. (12 Cal. 575.)

The husband could ratify what the wife had done. In the case at bar both husband and wife sign the note for the work done on her separate premises. (Law of Toro, 58; Novissima Recopilacion, p. 4, book 10; Title Law 14, vol. 5; 8 Texas, 397; 10 Texas, 123, 286; 21 Barb. S. C. 286.)

The above authorities show that a married woman could dispose of her property, and could bind it for her debts.

It is not disputed that a married woman's separate estate would be bound for debts contracted on the faith of it, or for the betterment or enhancement of such separate property. (8 Texas, 897; 10 Texas, 123; 5 Texas, 195, 152; 21 Barb. S. C. 286; 3 John. Ch. 77; 17 John. 548; 6 Wend. 13; 4 Coms. 9.)

The estate and right of Mrs. Love, formerly Mrs. Bennett, was the same under the Act of 1850 as under the Spanish law, and right of alienation was not restricted by that statute. If her right of alienation was not restricted, her contracts for the benefit of her separate property must be valid. (Edrington v. Mayfield, 5 Texas, 365. See authorities last above cited.)

Such as her estate was, such as her rights were, and such as her power of disposition was, became unalterably fixed by the sixteenth section of Article first of the Constitution of California. No bill of attainder, ex post facto law, or law impairing the obligation of a contract, shall be passed.

Her right was secured by that clause in the Constitution, "because property consists as well in the jus disponendi as in the jus proprietatis, for of what real value is the latter if the former may be practically defeated." (7 Iredell's Equity R.)

By the fourteenth section, eleventh Article, and the eighth section, first Article, of the Constitution of California:

Property consists in the right to enjoy and dispose of certain things, etc. (Bouv. Law Dictionary, Vol. II, Title—Property; Jacob's Law Dictionary, Title—Property.) Property means the highest right a man can have for anything—being used for that right which one hath to lands or tenements, goods or chattels, which no way depend on another man's courtesy.

It is a rule of common law that the power of alienation is an inseparable incident to the right of property. (10 Barb. 597.)

If the position of the defendants be sustained this right is impaired. The "jus disponendi" is virtually taken away, making her power of disposition depend upon the arbitrary will of another, and even the obtaining the assent of that other in a particular way and before a particular officer. Indeed, it is made subject not only to the arbitrary will of her husband, but upon the writing of a particular certificate of acknowledgment by a certain officer, for it is decided that the certificate of acknowledgment by a Notary Public, etc., to a conveyance made by a married woman of her separate property, is and must be a part of the conveyance itself.

This is in fact giving the property to the husband and clogging it not only with his will but with acts of others; because we have seen that the right to dispose of property is a part of the jus proprietatis, and by the Act of eighteen hundred and fifty, the husband is made the owner that far of his wife's separate property, and the wife is rendered powerless in relation to her separate property—just as powerless as she is over the separate property of her husband. In the case at bar, Mrs. Love owned the real estate in her own right, with the power of using and disposing of the same before the Act of eighteen hundred and fifty. After that Act, according to the theory of the defendants, she could not protect it without the assent of her husband. She could not dispose of it without his assent in writing first had, and without some Notary would write a proper certificate of her and her husband's acknowledgment. This makes the wife's disposition of her separate property depend upon the will of one who is not the owner.

The effect of the statute, if made to apply to property acquired before the making of the Constitution, and before the making of the Act of April seventeenth, eighteen hundred and fifty, is unconstitutional because it impairs the obligation of contracts. (Ingoldsby v. Juan, 12 Cal. 576.)

Appellant contends that the Act of eighteen hundred and fifty does not apply to the past but to the future, and that it does not affect the position of property acquired before its passage.

The Legislature had no power to affect or change marital rights or regulations fixed by law previously, and if they had, the Court will not presume, in the absence of an express declaration to that effect, that they so intended. (Ingoldsby v. Juan, 12 Cal. 580.)

No retrospective operation was intended, or perhaps could have been given to such an Act. (Ingoldsby v. Juan, 12 Cal. 580; Morrison v. Wilson, 13 Cal. 497.)

For the rule of interpretation of statutes see Grimes v. Norris, 6 Cal. 622, and brief of Judge Baldwin in that case.

The Act of eighteen hundred and fifty positively shows the intention of the lawmakers was to exclude estates and rights already vested.

See sections fourteen and fifteen, Wood's Digest, page 489. "Expressio unius est exclusio alterius."

A legislative enactment must be express to convince the Court that it is to have any other than a prospective operation. (Diwart v. Purdy, 29 Penn. 113; U. S. Digest, Anno 1858, p. 681, Sec. 5; Sanders v. Carrol, 12 La. 793; U. S. Digest, Anno 1858, p. 681, Sec. 7.)

If the Act of eighteen hundred and fifty gives the control and management of the separate property of wife to the husband and requires his mind to act before she can make any disposition of it, it is clearly an abridgment of her rights, and unconstitutional. (George v. Ransom, 15 Cal. 322.)

The term "separate property" in the fourteenth section, eleventh Article, of the Constitution, is used in its common law sense, and by that law "separate property" means an estate held both in its use and in its title, for the exclusive benefit of the wife. Hence, a law taking away the right of the wife to dispose of her property must be unconstitutional, particularly as to property the rights to which were absolutely hers before the passage of the Act of April seventeenth, eighteen hundred and fifty. (12 Cal. 322.)

If the Legislature can deprive a married woman of the disposition of her separate property, a right which she had under Mexican or Spanish law, why cannot they deprive her of its use or its profits?

To deprive a feme covert of the right to dispose of her property, or to transfer that right to another—for example, her husband—is obnoxious to the eighth section of Article first of the Constitution, which says, among other things, that no persons * * * shall be deprived of life, liberty or property, without due process of law, etc. (Westervelt Exec. v. Gregg, 2 Kernan, 202.)

T. H. Laine, for Respondents.

It appears from appellant's bill that the separate estate of the wife sought to be charged with the payment of this account for goods, wares, etc., consists in real estate—land. Now, upon the most liberal construction of the doctrine of appointment, the property sought to be charged being real estate, there must be some allegation in the bill showing a clear intention to charge that estate, and that intent must be evidenced by some written agreement or instrument, and not a verbal contract, as this most clearly is. The execution of a note, or the indorsement of a bill of exchange, has been regarded as manifesting an intention by a feme covert owning a separate estate to charge that estate; but the doctrine of appointment has never been held to go so far to make verbal contracts an evidence of such intention. In the case of Burch and Wife v. Breckinridge, etc., reported in 16 B. Monroe, Kentucky Reports, pages 482 to 492, holds the doctrine here contended for. On page 487, the Court in that case say:

“The extent to which her separate property (speaking of a married woman) may be subjected to the demands of creditors claiming under parol agreements, has not been determined by this Court. So far as the separate property consists of land, it cannot be made liable by a verbal contract. The wife cannot alien or dispose of her real estate except by a written agreement, and as a charge upon it for the payment of debts operates as a disposition of it pro tanto, it can only be created by a contract in writing.” (See the opinion and authorities therein cited.)

This we take to be the correct doctrine, and it fully sustains the position we have taken upon the case at bar. If the appellant's position be true, there can be no protection thrown around the separate estate of a feme covert, the husband and his creditors may easily evade the whole law as regards the alienation of the wife's separate estate; the Courts, however, cannot lend themselves to the perpetration of such frauds upon married women.

By the Court, SAWYER, J.

Plaintiff seeks to charge the separate property of Mary Love, the wife of defendant, Harry Love, with the payment of a note executed by both defendants, for services alleged to have been rendered for the benefit of the separate estate of the wife, and at her request, with an alleged intent on the part of the wife to make the same a charge upon her separate estate. Also, for goods sold and delivered during coverture to the wife for her own use, and at her request, with a like alleged intent.

Section six of the Act of April 17, 1850, “defining the rights and duties of husband and wife,” provides, with respect to the separate property of the wife, that, “no sale or other alienation of any part of such property can be made, nor any lien or incumbrance created thereon, unless by an instrument in writing, signed by the husband and wife, and acknowledged by her upon examination separate and apart from her husband," etc. (Wood's Digest, 488.)

It was repeatedly held by our predecessors, that no title to the separate property of the wife, either real or personal, could be conveyed, except by an instrument in writing, executed and acknowledged by her in the mode prescribed by this Act. (Selover v. Am. Rus. Co., 7 Cal. 266; Barrett v. Tewksbury, 9 Cal. 13; 13 Cal. 501; and other cases.) The statute is as emphatic in its provisions against creating "any lien or incumbrance thereon" as against conveyances. The rights of married women as to their separate property, and their power over it in California, do not depend alone upon the principles of the common law, or upon the doctrines of Courts of equity; but mainly upon the Constitution and statutes of this State. It is not pretended that the defendant, Mary Love, is personally liable upon the contracts sued on; but it is insisted that being the owner of separate property, as a necessary incident to such ownership, and to the jus disponendi, she has a right by contracts not imposing liabilities against her personally, to create a charge upon such property, which the Courts will enforce. Admit this to be so, yet such charge must be created in some mode not prohibited by statute.

If a demand can be enforced as a charge against the separate property of the wife, it must in some form ultimately become a lien upon it, and result in a sale and conveyance of the property. The lien or incumbrance must originate in some action on the part of the wife, to be perfected and enforced by the Courts by means of a sale. But the statute says that no sale or other alienation shall be made, nor any lien or incumbrance created thereon, except in a certain prescribed form. It is prohibitory in its terms. Aside from exceptional cases — as under the Act relating to sole traders — the wife has no power by contract to create a personal liability against herself in any form. If she can create a charge upon her separate property, to be satisfied out of the separate property alone, independent of any personal liability, the charge must be to that extent a disposition or alienation of, or an incumbrance upon such separate property. That she has the power to create such a charge there is no doubt, but she has no power to create it in any other mode than the one prescribed by the express provisions of the statute. And in this consists the difference between the case under consideration, and those found in the Chancery reports of England and the older States. In the latter cases, there was no statutory limitations as to the mode of contracting, while here there is. The wife, under our statute, can create no right against her separate property except in the mode prescribed. The prohibitory provisions of the Act would be of little avail if the wife, by simply contracting a debt to be paid out of her separate estate, could create a valid and binding charge upon it. But she has no such power, and an attempt to create a charge by her contract in the form alleged would be simply void. Nor can a Court of law or equity, in the face of the statute, create a right where none exists independent of its action. The office of a Court is limited to the enforcement of rights already existing by applying the appropriate remedy. The statute prescribes the only mode by which debts can be created, and made a charge, or incumbrance upon the separate estate of a married woman; and they must become a charge before a Court of equity, in the language of Lord Cottenham, can "take upon itself to give effect to them, not as personal liabilities, but by laying hold of the separate property as the only means by which they can be satisfied."

A claim for which no person is individually liable, and which cannot by the simple act of any person be charged as an incumbrance upon property, is simply a nullity, and cannot serve as the foundation of a right upon which a Court can build a superstructure for divesting a married woman of the ownership of her separate property.

In the case of Miller v. Newton, 23 Cal. 554, a majority of the Justices — Mr. Chief Justice Cope dissenting — took a different view of the question, holding that the provisions of the statute under discussion had no application to cases of this kind.

The prevailing opinion says: "The respondent refers to the cases of Selover v. The American Russian Com. Co., 7 Cal. 266, Barrett v. Tewksbury, 9 Cal. 13, and other decisions of this Court, founded upon the statute relating to conveyances of property by a married woman. Those cases relate to the power of a married woman to execute instruments conveying or incumbering her separate property, and the mode in which such conveyance or incumbrance must be executed and acknowledged to be binding upon her, and they therefore differ entirely from the case now before us, in which no such question is directly involved. The statutes upon this subject, and upon which these decisions were founded, do not in any way abrogate or impair the powers of a Court of equity over the rights and property of married women, or the long established rules of those Courts upon this subject upon which this case depends. While these statutes confer upon married women a power to dispose of their property which they did not before possess, yet there is no expression of any legislative intention to thereby divest Courts of equity of their long established powers and jurisdiction. To effect such an object would require a clear expression of legislative will. These statutes are a substitute for the ancient common law proceeding by fine and recovery, which was the only mode by which, at common law, a married woman could convey her real estate."

With due deference to the learned Justice who delivered the opinion, we are unable to perceive any principle upon which the class of cases he was considering, so far as he refers to that part of the demand accruing during coverture, can be distinguished from the cases cited.

The terms of the statute are very broad. It uses among others the precise term "incumbrance," which the learned Judge in this very opinion (unconsciously, perhaps, but naturally enough) employs to characterize demands charged upon separate estates. The opinion says: "In accordance with this principle, her separate estate will in equity be held liable for all the debts, charges, incumbrances and other engagements which she expressly or by implication charges thereon."

So also in the passage from the decision of Lord Chancellor Brougham in Murray v. Barlee, cited in the prevailing opinion, it is said: "In all these cases I take the foundation of the doctrine to be this: the wife has a separate estate, subject to her own control and exempt from all other interference or authority. If she cannot affect it no one can, and the very object of the settlement which vests it in her exclusively is to enable her to deal with it as if she were discovert. The power to affect it being unquestionable, the only doubt that can arise is whether or not she has validly incumbered it."

So appropriate is the word "incumbrance," or "incumbered," to express the idea of a charge upon property without any personal liability against the owner, that Judges naturally, and almost necessarily, hit upon that very term to convey the idea in discussing the question. The last clause of the passage just cited is especially applicable to the case in hand. "The power to affect it (the separate property) being unquestionable," the only question "that can arise is, whether she (in this instance Mary Love) has validly incumbered it." The statute says that no incumbrance can be created thereon unless by an instrument in writing executed and acknowledged in a certain way, and the method designated was not pursued. There never was a time when a Court of equity was authorized to enforce an incumbrance, until an incumbrance existed. And now, as before, a right must be created before the Courts can be called upon to apply a remedy. It is not claimed, as seems to be supposed, that the statutes under consideration in any respect abrogate or impair the powers of the Court to afford a proper remedy where the right exists. The Act containing the prohibitory clause relates to the powers of the wife, not of the Courts, and the statute was not intended to relate to conveyances merely, as seems to be intimated. Its purpose was not to provide a substitute for fine and recovery and enable the wife to convey her property.

This Act was passed on the 17th of April, 1850. On the day before—the 16th—the Legislature had passed “An Act concerning conveyances,” which was a substitute for the mode of conveyance under the Mexican law, and not in any sense, as applied to California, for conveyance by fine and recovery, a mode of conveyance never in use in this State. That Act was a general Act relating to conveyances, and it made full provisions for the conveyance of the property of married women, as well of other parties. There was no necessity for any other provision on that head. The object and scope of the Act under consideration was entirely different from that of the “Act concerning conveyances.” Its object, as its title briefly indicates, and an examination of its various provisions will demonstrate, was, to “define the rights and duties of husband and wife,” and particularly to prescribe the powers of both husband and wife with reference to their property, separate and common. And it is this Act relating to the precise subject matter under consideration, and not the Act concerning conveyances, that contains the prohibitory clause. The minds of the legislators were particularly directed to the question. The whole object of the statute was to define the rights pertaining to the marriage relation, and particularly the rights and powers of the wife with respect to her separate property; and these rights were placed upon a basis entirely different from that which prevails under the common law. This Act did not, in our view, “confer upon married women a power to dispose of their property which they did not before possess,” as also seems to be supposed in the prevailing opinion in Miller v. Newton, but it was a limitation of a power which already existed to a particular mode of conveyance and charging or incumbering their separate estates; and in the language of Mr. Chief Justice Cope, “the object of the statute (in thus limiting the power to the mode) was to protect the wife, not only as against her husband, but as against her own improvident acts, and persons dealing with her must see that the forms necessary to give validity to their contracts are complied with."

It is not to be supposed that the legislators, with their minds especially directed to the subject and having these objects in view, used the comprehensive terms in the prohibitory clause of the statute in the restricted sense supposed in the prevailing opinion in Miller v. Newton—a sense that would defeat the only purpose and render nugatory that important provision of the Act. We think the case within the purview of the prohibition.

The prevailing opinion in Miller v. Newton appears to us to concede too much to the powers of Courts of equity, and too little to the statutory modifications of the power of the wife.

It was a well settled doctrine in England, and the older States, that a married woman in equity could deal with her separate estate as though she were a feme sole. Originally, it is true, the establishment of separate estates in a married woman was an innovation upon the principles of the common law created by the Courts of equity. These estates originated in trusts for the separate use of married women. When Courts of equity sustained the validity of these trusts and recognized the wife's estate under them, it seemed to be a necessary result that she should have the power of disposition, and the power was accordingly conceded. (Yale v. Dederer, 18 N. Y. 269, and 22 N. Y. 451, where the subject is fully and ably discussed.)

"The right to charge her separate estate in equity resulted from the jus disponendi which Courts of equity regarded her as having, and it was a necessary incident of the full enjoyment of her property." (18 N. Y. Rep. 272.) The power of the wife to dispose of her separate estate is very generally made the basis of its liability to be charged with the debts incurred for her benefit, by the English Chancellors, even including Lord Cottenham, (who comes the nearest to repudiating the doctrine,) though hardly any two of them agree in their reasoning by which the liability is worked out or deduced from the jus disponendi, as will be seen from an examination of the elaborate review of the cases in Yale v. Dederer, 22 N. Y. Rep. 451. Mr. Justice Selde, in concluding his comments on the cases, and particularly referring to the reasoning of Lord Cottenham, says (page 459): "the truth would seem to be that, this mode of dealing with the estates of married women, to the extent to which it has been carried by the English Courts, could not be sustained by any process of legal reasoning, and hence the grounds upon which it was made to rest have been repeatedly changed, and the rule itself has been fluctuating and uncertain." * * * "The views of Lord Cottenham are no more likely to be permanent than those of his predecessors. Some future Lord Chancellor may detect the fallacy of his reasoning, as he detected that of Lord Brougham. No rule can ever be stable the reasons for which are constantly changing. If we desire precision and certainty in this branch of the law, we must recur to the foundation of the power of a feme covert to charge her separate estate; and this has heretofore arisen solely from her incidental power to dispose of that estate."

"Starting with this point, it is plain that no debt can be a charge which is not connected by agreement, either express or implied, with the estate. If contracted for the direct benefit of the estate itself, it would of course become a lien, upon a well founded presumption that the parties so intended, and in analogy to the doctrine of equitable mortgages for purchase money. But no other kind of debt can, as it seems to me, be thus charged without some affirmative act of the wife evincing that intention."

But these remarks refer to countries where there is no express limitation upon the power or mode of making the contract with reference to incumbering the estate, as under the equity system of England, and under the statute of New York, which, unlike ours, contained no restriction in this particular.

Thus, it will be seen, that, though separate estates and their incidents were originally the creations of Courts of equity, established, perhaps, by a usurpation of powers, yet the liability of the separate estate is based upon the recognized ownership of the property; a power of disposition as an incident to the ownership; and a contract actually made by the owner, by which a charge upon the estate is created, thereby making to the extent of the charge an inchoate disposition of the property. A right is thus created, for the enforcement of which — a Court of law being inadequate — a Court of equity affords the remedy.

But in our State, the rights of the parties are fixed by statute, and the only duty or power of the Court is to enforce those rights in accordance with the spirit of the statute, as plainly indicated by the letter. Had we never been educated under the double system of common and equity law, as they prevail in England and the older States, we should have little difficulty with the statute before us, as we apprehend, in determining the rights of the parties in respect to the questions under consideration.

The following remarks of Mr. Justice Selden in the case last cited, (page 460,) are not inappropriate on the present occasion:

“But there is a strong additional reason why this Court should decline, at this time, to adopt the fictitious theories on this subject, which have so long prevailed in the English Courts. Married women are not hereafter to be indebted to equity merely for protection or the enjoyment of their separate estates. They hold them by a legal title, and have a legal right to dispose of them. The Acts of 1849 and 1860, [in this State the Act of 1850,] are henceforth, if not repealed, to be the source of their power over such estates. There is no longer any foundation for the argument, that as equity creates and protects these estates, equity has a right to control them. Rules, therefore, which have grown up under this idea, which I regard as to some extent illusory, will be hereafter inappropriate.”

Under our statute, as we read it, the wife is endowed with a capacity to hold separate property as fully, at least, as she could under the principles recognized by Courts of equity. She also has the power to dispose of or incumber it, as she had in equity; but in this she is restricted as to the manner of effecting the disposition or incumbrance by the prohibitory clauses of our statute, whereas in equity there was no such restriction. When a charge or incumbrance has been created in the mode recognized by law, the Courts will afford the remedy by enforcing it, as Courts of equity would have done. But until such charge or incumbrance is legally created, there is no right to enforce, and of course no remedy can be afforded; neither could there have been under the principles of a Court of equity. The whole question is narrowed to the form in which the incumbrance is to be created, and not to the power to create it.

But if the case is held to be within the prohibitory clause of the sixth section of the "Act defining the rights and duties of husband and wife," it is insisted that the provision is unconstitutional. Conceding, for the purposes of the argument, that portion of the section requiring the instrument to be signed by the husband to be unconstitutional—a question we do not now intend to decide—this will not vitiate the remainder of the section, if valid in other respects. Requiring the signature of the husband is only an additional safeguard, and it is not so vitally connected with the object and scope of the Act, that it cannot be stricken out without vitiating the whole section. It will, therefore, only be necessary to consider the constitutionality of that part of the section which prohibits the wife from alienating or incumbering her separate property in any other manner than by an instrument in writing manifesting her intention, signed by her and acknowledged in the mode prescribed. We do not think this portion contravenes any constitutional provision. It does not prohibit her from disposing of, or incumbering all, or any part of her separate estate upon such terms as to her may seem proper. It does not in the slightest degree interfere with her free will. It only prescribes the mode in which she shall manifest that will. It was undoubtedly the object of the statute to provide a mode of alienation and of incumbering her estate, uniform, simple, and conclusive, which should protect both the wife and the purchaser; one that should secure entire freedom of will and

- action to the wife, and afford the least possible opportunity for subverting her interest through the medium of undue influence, threats, or fraud. It is a beneficent provision intended for her benefit, and not as an encroachment upon her rights. And we think its obvious tendency is, to throw a safeguard around, without in any degree impairing, the jus disponendi.

But it is further insisted, that the statute was not intended to apply to cases where the property was acquired before the passage of the Act, and for this reason the provision is inapplicable, and Ingoldsby v. Juan, 12 Cal. is cited to sustain this position. But if this case can be said to decide the question at all, it recognized the applicability of the provision "to property held as separate by women married after the passage of the Act," (page 580,) without reference to the time when it was acquired, and such seems to be the express provision of the statute. Section fourteen provides, that, "in every marriage hereafter contracted in this State, the rights of the husband and wife shall be governed by this Act, unless there is a marriage contract containing stipulations contrary thereto." There is no allegation that the marriage took place before the passage of the Act, or that there is a marriage contract containing stipulations in any respect contrary thereto. As the allegations of the complaint must be construed most strongly against the plaintiff, we cannot presume that any fact exists taking the case out of the operation of the statute, and none is alleged.

It follows that the facts stated do not constitute any cause of action against Mary Love, and there is a misjoinder of parties. As to the second cause of action for the goods alleged to have been sold to the wife, no cause of action is shown against the wife, for the reasons already stated — and none is pretended to be shown against the husband. No sale to him, or to his wife on his credit or account, and no promise by him, is alleged. The contract alleged is entirely upon the theory that plaintiff contracted with the wife alone, as the owner of separate property, on the basis and credit of her separate property, the debt to be charged upon that alone.

No contract with the husband is averred. No cause of action, therefore, is shown against either. This leaves the action as against the husband to rest upon the note, which is only for two hundred dollars.

We think the demurrer was properly sustained.

Judgment affirmed.

Mr. Justice CURREY dissented.

Mr. Justice RHODES expressed no opinion.

JOHN A. MCGLYNN AND ANDREW J. BUTLER, EXECUTORS OF THE LAST WILL AND TESTAMENT OF DAVID C. BRODERICK, DECEASED v. GEORGE H. MOORE AND FRANCIS B. FOLGER.

FORFEITURE OF TERM IN A LEASE.—Previous to the passage of the Act of April 25, 1862, amending the Act "concerning forcible entries and unlawful detainers," in order to work a forfeiture of the term of a lease for non-payment of rent under the thirteenth section of said Act, the landlord was required to make a demand for rent with all the strictness required at common law.

CONSTRUCTION OF LEASE.—Where, in the habendum clause in a lease, it is provided that the lessee is to have and hold the premises demised from a certain day of the month for a period named, and the rent is also made payable monthly on the last day of each and every month during said term, the word "from" will be construed as exclusive or inclusive of the day named in the habendum clause as will best express the intention of the parties, to be gathered from the whole instrument, and if construed as exclusive of that day, the rent will be payable on that day; but if construed as inclusive of that day, the rent will be payable on the day previous.

DEMAND FOR RENT.—In order to work a forfeiture of the term in a lease under the common law, it was necessary for the landlord to make a demand for the precise sum due for rent on the day it fell due, at the most notorious place on the demised premises; and if there was a dwelling house on the demised premises, the demand was required to be made at the front door of the same.

PLEADINGS IN ACTION TO REMOVE LESSEE.—If the complaint in an action to remove the lessee from the demised premises on the ground of a forfeiture of the term for non-payment of rent, alleges generally that a demand for rent was duly made of the defendants on the premises, an answer, denying that the plaintiffs demanded of defendants the payment of the rent, is sufficient as a denial.

WAIVER OF FORFEITURE OF THE TERM BY LESSOR.—If rent is received by the lessor after a forfeiture of the term by the lessee by reason of a breach of a covenant in a lease, the receipt of the rent is a waiver of the forfeiture, unless the covenant which has been violated by the lessee is a continuing covenant, or the lessor was ignorant that a forfeiture had been incurred.

COVENANT IN LEASE.—If the lessee covenants in the lease to build within a given time on the demised premises, the covenant is not a continuing covenant; and if the lessee fails to build, the receipt of rent by the lessor, accruing after the end of the time given, is a waiver of the forfeiture.

APPEAL from the County Court of the City and County of San Francisco.

Defendants recovered judgment in the Court below, and plaintiffs appealed.

The other facts are stated in the opinion of the Court.

Ralph C. Harrison, and Hoge & Wilson, for Appellants.

Leases, with a term commencing at a time preceding the date, are not without precedent, but on the contrary, are well known to the law and have a fixed construction. "A lease, dated one day, habendum from a day preceding, commences in point of computation from the time marked in the habendum; in point of interest, from the date." (2 Platt on Leases, 50, 53, and cases cited.)

"By appointment of law, the rent is payable on the demised premises, if no other place be appointed by the parties for the purpose,"—in the lease. (See 2 Platt on Leases, 100, and cases cited, where he is treating of the contents and parts of a lease; Ib. 333-4, and cases cited.)

The breach of such a covenant, and the consequent forfeiture, is not waived by the subsequent receipt of rent. It is a continuing covenant, and therefore the continuance of the failure to observe it works a continual right to a forfeiture. (See Taylor's Landlord and Tenant, Sec. 500, and cases cited; 2 Platt on Leases, 471-2; Fryett ex dem. Harris v. Jeffrey, 1 Esp. 393; Beach v. Crain, 2 N. Y. 86.)

"Where there is a continuing cause of forfeiture, the landlord will not be precluded from taking advantage of it by receiving rent which accrued after the breach was originally committed." (Taylor's Landlord and Tenant, Section 500; Bleecker v. Smith, 13 Wend. 530; Sheppard v. Allen, 3 Taunton, 78; Fryett v. Jeffries, 1 Esp. 393; Doe v. Rancks, 4 B. & Ald. 401.)

S. F. & J. Reynolds, for Respondents.

The demand was made one day too soon. The last day of each month of the term of this lease occurs on the first day of each calendar month.

When time is to be computed from or after a certain day, that day is excluded, even though it be the date of the instrument, unless it appears from the instrument itself that a different computation was intended.

“Touching the time of the beginning of a lease for years, it is to be observed that if a lease be made by indenture, bearing date the twenty-sixth of May, etc., to have and to hold for twenty-one years from the date or from the day of the date, it shall begin on the twenty-seventh of May. If the lease bear date the twenty-first of May, to have and to hold from the making thereof, or from henceforth, it shall begin on the day on which it is delivered, for the words of the indenture are not of any effect till the delivery, and thereby from the making, or from henceforth, take their first effect. But if it be ‘a die confectionis,’ then it shall begin the next day after the delivery.” (Coke on Litt. p. 46, Chap. 7, Sec. 58.)

In Dyer, 218, (b,) it is held that the words “next after the date of the deed” were exclusive of the day of the date.

In Clayton’s Case; 3 Coke’s Rep. 1, it is held that “from the day of the making” was exclusive. (Cornish v. Cawsey, Style, 118; Bacon v. Waller, Bulstrode, 204; Llewellyn v. Williams, 1 Roll. Rep. 387.)

In Bigelow v. Willson, 1 Pick. 494, the Court say, “that the words ‘from the date,’ and ‘from the day of the date,’ when used in a lease to designate the commencement of a term, have precisely the same meaning. This has been denied in some old cases, but these cases have been overruled, and the principle has been long established.”

The Court then refers to Coke on Littleton, and also reviews the case of Pugh v. The Duke of Leeds, Cowper, 714, and shows that the principles laid down by Lord Mansfield in that case are not at all in conflict with the cases above referred to. But that when from other parts of the lease it clearly appears that a different computation of time was intended, then such intention shall not be defeated. We refer the Court also to Henry v. Jones, 8 Mass. 453; Higgins v. Peters, 1 Metcalf, 127; Cornell v. Moulton, 3 Denio, 13.

When "the demand is only in order for a distress, there it is sufficient if it be made on any notorious part of the land, because this is only to entitle him to his remedy for his rent, and therefore the whole land being equally the debtor, and chargeable with the rent, a demand upon it, without going to any particular part of it, is sufficient." (Bacon's Abridg., Ed. of 1854, p. 487, title Rent, I, 3.)

The distinction between a demand for purpose of forfeiture and re-entry, and a demand for the purpose of distress, are marked and well defined.

The right to re-enter, for breach of this covenant to build, was waived by the acceptance of rent for seven months after the alleged breach. The lessors erected a large warehouse, but not of the dimensions required by the covenant. And, by the acceptance of rent after it was so built, it was accepted by the landlord, and its variance from that provided for was waived, so far at least as the question of re-entry was concerned.

Hoge & Wilson, in reply.

The demand in front of the warehouse was sufficient.

The cases cited by the respondents' counsel are numerous, but upon examination they will be found either to have no relevancy to the question or not to sustain his position.

Of the cases cited in the respondents' brief the following have no reference to the place or manner of demand, but refer exclusively to the proper day or time of making demand: Chipman v. Emeric, 3 Cal. 283; Gaskill v. Trainer, 3 Cal. 339; Smith's Landlord and Tenant, 119, 120; Taylor's Landlord and Tenant, sec. 297; those cited in the note to sec. 493 of Taylor's Landlord and Tenant, to wit: Chen's Case, 10 Rep. 129 a; 1 Leonard, 141; Cro. Eliz. 209.

In Connor v. Bradley, 1 Howard, 216, cited in note to section 493 of Taylor's Landlord and Tenant, the Court upon this subject merely say: "The demand must be made in the most notorious place of the land, even though there be no person on the land to pay," citing several authorities. Taylor himself, in section 493, says: "The demand must be made at the most notorious place upon the land, which, if there be a dwelling house, is the front door."

So, also, 1 Saunders, 287, also cited in above note.

Coke on Littleton, 202 a, cited in the note to the above section, says: "If one place be as notorious as another, the lessor has his election to demand it at either, and although the lessee be in some other part ready to pay the rent, yet that will not avail him."

The same language is found in 2 Platt on Leases, pp. 333, 334, cited by respondents' counsel.

In 2 Platt on Leases, pp. 333, 334, cited by respondents' counsel, the following is the language used: "If a house or a house and lands form the subject of demise, the lessor must appear at the front door, being the most notorious part of the house, and there demand the rent, whether the lessee or any one on his behalf be there or not; a demand at the back door is not sufficient."

Coke on Littleton, 153 a, cited in the notes to the above authority, has the following language: "If there be a house and land, a demand on the land is sufficient." These are all the authorities cited by the respondents' counsel, and from them it will be seen that his position cannot be sustained. It is further to be observed that not one of them is an opinion in a case adjudicated upon the point, but that they are all either propositions laid down by elementary writers, or loose dicta uttered by Judges in determining some other question.

The rule to be deduced from all the cases is, that the demand must be made in the most notorious place.

By the Court, RHODES, J.

David C. Broderick, the appellant's testator, on the fourteenth of July, 1859, executed to the respondents a lease of certain real estate in the City of San Francisco, for the term of nine years and three months. The habendum clause is as follows: "To have and to hold said premises unto said parties of the second part, from the first day of July, 1859, for and during and until the end and term of nine years and three months thence next ensuing." The time for the payment of the monthly instalments of rent is specified in these words, "payable monthly on the last day of each and every month during said term." The lease contains a covenant on the part of the lessees, to construct on the demised premises, within two years from the date of the lease, a warehouse of a specified description and dimensions.

In April, 1862, the appellants, as Broderick's executors, commenced an action against the respondents, under the thirteenth section of the Forcible Entry Act, to remove them from the possession of the premises, on the ground that the term was forfeited. They alleged that on the thirty-first day of March, 1862, four hundred dollars became due for rent; that on that day they demanded the same on the premises, and that the lessees did not then, and have not since paid the rent then falling due. They allege that a forfeiture was also incurred, in consequence of the neglect of the lessees to construct a warehouse, according to the covenants in the lease.

The case has been presented by both parties on the theory that the lessor, in seeking to avail himself of the benefits of a forfeiture for the non-payment of rent, must pursue the strict rules of the common law in all respects; that the statute (Sec. 13, Forcible Entry Act) worked no change of those rules in any manner. We shall therefore consider the case in that view. The first point for consideration is to determine the time for the payment of the rent. The time stipulated in the lease for the commencement of the term, has some tendency to determine this point, though it may not be conclusive. The parties to the lease, provided for the commencement of the term at a time anterior to the time of the execution of the lease. We have no means of ascertaining precisely the object of the parties, in thus having the term begin at a time before the execution of the lease, and in the absence of all proof or explanation upon the matter we will be justified in presuming that they resorted to this mode for the purpose of making the months of the term accord with the calendar months.

They said in the lease, that the rent should be paid on the "last day of each and every month during said term." If they had said the last day of each and every month of said term, instead of during said term, there would be less difficulty in upholding the construction claimed by the respondents. They insist that the parties, having provided that the lessees should hold from the first day of July, intended to exclude that day, and that therefore the month of the term would begin on the second day of each calendar month. The old rule doubtless was to exclude the day of the date in all cases where the holding was from a given date, but since the decision of Pugh v. Duke of Leeds, Cowper, 714, the word from has been construed as exclusive or inclusive, as would best express the intention of the parties, to be gathered from the whole instrument, the Court holding that the word 'from' may, in vulgar use, and even in strict propriety of language, mean either inclusive or exclusive."

In Deyo v. Blakely, 24 Barb. 9, the lease was executed on the twenty-fifth of January, to hold from the first day of April, the rent payable quarterly, on the first day of April, etc., and the Court in ascertaining whether the rent was payable in advance held the first day of April to be included. No present interest passed upon the execution of the lease, and the construction was not given to prevent a penalty, forfeiture or estoppel, nor to uphold the validity of the instrument, but merely to afford the lessor a better security for the payment of the rent, according to the intention of the parties, as collected from the whole instrument. Mr. Justice Birdseye in that case says: "No transposition is resorted to. There is, in fact, no construction, in the primary signification of that word, for the parties have made a complete and intelligible work in the contract as they executed it, and it needs not the reforming hand of the Court to make it clear and unambiguous. There is no room for construction, and nothing for construction to do." The parties here having covenanted for the lessees holding from the first day of July—a day then past—and for their payment of rent on the last day of each and every month, could not have made their intention plainer, if they had said that the rent should be paid on the last day of July and of each month thereafter. If the parties could give a construction to the lease by their subsequent acts, and it should be said that they had done so, by the fact that no rent was paid on the last day of the calendar month, it may be answered that the rent does not become due until the last minute of the natural day. (1 Williams' Saunders, 287, b, note.)

We see no reason for adopting the respondents' construction, except the fact that such was the rule until the decision in Pugh v. Duke of Leeds; but the terms of the lease are harmonized by adopting the appellants' construction, and holding that the months mentioned in the lease, were intended as calendar months.

The next point of controversy is whether the demand was made at the proper place. The agent of the appellants demanded the rent at each door of the warehouse, but did not make demand at any other place. He states in his testimony, that he made the demand with his "face turned in all directions—toward the frame building as well as toward the warehouse." There was on the premises, besides the warehouse, a frame building, standing fifteen to twenty feet east of the warehouse, its northern side being about ten feet south of the northern line of the warehouse, and the front door being on the northern side. The office door of the warehouse is on its eastern side, near the northeast corner. In making the demand at the office door, the agent stood only a few feet distant from the frame building, but he made no demand except as above stated, at that building or at its front door. We do not understand that it is pretended by the appellants, that a demand was made elsewhere than at the doors of the warehouse. At the time of the demand the frame building was, and for four years previously had been, occupied by a man with his family, by the license of the lessees, and he and his family were in the building at the time the agent says he made the demand, but the occupant of the building did not hear the demand.

The respondents contend that the demand should have been made at the dwelling house on the premises—that in order to work a forfeiture, if there is a dwelling house on the demised premises, the demand must be made there. When it was required by the common law rule, that the lessor should demand the rent upon the leased premises, it was not intended that he should perform a mere idle ceremony, but that he should thereby apprise the lessee of the fact that the rent was then demanded. He was required to go to the premises, because the rent issued out of them, and to make the demand at the most notorious place thereon, because the lessee, or some one who might inform him, would be more apt to be at that place and hear the demand, than elsewhere on the land. It is said in the notes to Duppa v. Mayo, Williams' Saunders, 287, in treating of the demand of rent: "It must be made upon the land, and at the most notorious place of it. Therefore, if there be a dwelling house upon the land, the demand must be made at the front or fore door, etc." Sergeant Williams' notes to that case have long been regarded as the leading authority upon the subject of the demand of rent to create a forfeiture. (Van Rensselaer v. Jewett, 2 Coms. 147.) The demand not having been made at the front door of the dwelling house, was not sufficient as a demand of rent, at common law, to work a forfeiture of the term.

The appellants, however, contend that the place of demand is not in issue, and say that the respondents "merely denied that any demand had been made." The appellants aver in their complaint that a demand for the payment of the rent "was duly made of the said defendants on the premises on the said 31st day of March, etc.;" and the respondents in their answer deny "that on the 31st day of March, 1862, or at any other time, the said plaintiffs demanded of the said defendants the payment" of the rent. The appellants have not alleged that they made the demand at the most notorious place, or at any certain place, on the premises, and the respondents were not required to deny the demand at the most notorious place or any place on the premises, in advance of the allegation of the demand at such place."

The denial is as broad as the allegation. If under the allegation that the demand was duly made on the premises—which amounts to no more than that the demand was made on the premises—the appellants were authorized to prove that the demand was made at a particular place on the premises, then under the denial in the answer the respondents might prove that such place was not the most notorious place on the premises. A demand, to be of any avail to work a forfeiture at common law, must be made at the proper time and place, and for the precise sum then falling due, and a denial of the demand puts the lessor upon proof of all the essentials of the demand; and if the lessor is authorized to allege generally, in any respect, the fact of the demand, the lessee would be authorized to make his denial in as general terms. No specific objection seems to have been made on this ground in the Court below; but on the contrary, a large part of the oral testimony in the record was offered to prove the places where the demand was made, and to show what was the most notorious place on the premises. If the pleadings of either party would be considered insufficient in a Court of record, for the want of a more specific averment or denial of the place of the demand, yet they are sufficient in proceedings commenced before a Justice of the Peace.

The appellants also claim a forfeiture of the lease, by reason of the breach, by the lessees, of their covenant to build the warehouse, as specified in the lease, within two years from the date of the lease. Provision is made in the lease for the re-entry of the lessor, "if default shall be made in any of the covenants on the part and behalf of the said parties of the second part, to be kept or performed," and under it the lessor had the right of entry for a forfeiture incurred in consequence of a breach of the covenants to build. But the respondents claim that the forfeiture was waived, by the lessors receiving the rent after the forfeiture. Rent was received by the appellants for the months of July, August, September, October, November and December, 1861, and January, 1862. The warehouse was to be completed, according to the covenant, by the 14th of July, 1861. The appellants, to avoid the consequences of the receipt of the rent, and to show that it did not amount to a waiver of the forfeiture, say that the covenant to build is a continuing covenant; that the failure of the lessees after the 14th of July, 1861, to build was a continuing breach of their covenant, and that if the receipt of rent accruing after that time was a waiver of the forfeiture, the neglect of the lessees to build after such receipt of rent was a continuing cause of forfeiture.

There can be no doubt that the receipt of rent accruing subsequent to the act which works the forfeiture, waives the forfeiture. (Jackson v. Allen, 3 Cow. 229, and cases cited; Bleeker v. Smith, 13 Wend. 530; Jackson v. Sheldon, 5 Cow. 448; 2 Platt on Leases, 468; Taylor, Land. and Ten. sec. 497.) But it must appear that the lessor, at the time of the receipt of the rent accruing subsequent to the breach of the covenant or condition, knew that the forfeiture had been incurred. (Jackson v. Brownson, 7 John. 234; Jackson v. Shultz, 18 John. 174; Clark v. Cummins, 5 Barb. 359; 2 Platt on Leases, 468-471.) It appears from the stipulation of the parties, that since the 14th day of July, 1861, the appellants with full knowledge of the facts constituting the breach of the covenant to build, accepted the rent from the lessees, on seven different occasions, but none that accrued since February 1st, 1862. The appellants have waived the forfeiture unless the covenant to build is a continuing covenant.

No case is cited by the appellants that asserts the doctrine, that a covenant to build within a given period, is a continuing covenant, and we have been unable to find such a case.

A covenant to pay rent by instalments, to keep the premises in repair, to keep them insured, to pay the taxes, to properly cultivate the land, and many others that indicate or necessarily imply the doing of the stipulated acts successively, or as often as occasion may require, are continuing covenants; but the covenant to repair or insure on or before a time certain, or forthwith, to pay a gross sum as rent for the term, or not to assign the lease, and others of a like character, are not continuing covenants, because the parties contemplated by such covenants, to provide for the doing or the omission of a single act. The distinction between the two classes of covenants, is well illustrated by the covenants against sub-leasing, and against the assignment of the term. If the lessee assigns contrary to his covenant, it is a "breach once for all," but a forfeiture accrues to the lessor each time the lessee sub-leases the premises contrary to his covenant. If the lessee should, after his assignment, contrary to his covenant, procure a re-assignment of the lease to himself, a forfeiture would not be worked by his assignment the second time.

In Stuyvesant v. Mayor etc., of New York, 11 Paige, 247, the plaintiff had conveyed a certain portion of his land to the city, subject to the covenant on the part of the city to proceed immediately to regulate, inclose and improve the land in a designated manner, and to hold and use the same for a public square. The Chancellor held that the covenant to proceed immediately to regulate, inclose and improve the lands for a public square was "like a covenant to build a house for the benefit of the covenantor, or for the enhancement of the value of his property," and said it was "an entire, not a continuing covenant," differing in that respect from the covenant to hold and use the land solely for the purposes of a public square. The plaintiff had long previously sued the city and recovered a judgment for a breach of the covenant to "regulate, inclose and improve;" and the Court held that such judgment exhausted the plaintiff's remedy on that covenant; that there was not a new breach produced by the continued failure of the city to keep the covenant. There is nothing in the nature of the covenant to build by a given time, that indicates that a continued failure to perform the covenant will produce a succession of breaches; but, on the contrary, it more nearly resembles, in this respect, the covenant not to assign, or for a re-entry in case of the bankruptcy of the lessee, in either of which cases the breach, if it takes place, is once for all. We are of the opinion that the proposition of the appellants, that the covenant under consideration is a continuing covenant, is unsupported by reason or authority; and it follows, therefore, that their receipt of the rent accruing after the breach, with a full notice thereof, was a waiver of the breach; and that, they once having waived the breach, had no right of entry thereafter for the forfeiture.

By the Court, RHODES, J., on petition for rehearing.

The appellants insist that a sufficient demand of the rent was made at the dwelling house; and they made the same point in their brief, but it was overlooked by us, probably in consequence of their holding that the demand at the warehouse was sufficient. The Court below found "That the demand was made at each of the doors, on the north, west, and east sides of the warehouse, but that no demand was made at the said dwelling house, or in front, or at the front door thereof." Although the person, while making the demand at the office door, stood near the dwelling house, we doubt if he intended to make a demand at the front door of the dwelling house, and we cannot say that the Court committed an error in finding the fact to be, that no demand was made at that place.

Turner et al. v. Tuolumne County Water Company.

We are satisfied that we have correctly stated the law in respect to the place where the demand was required, at common law, to be made. The remarks of Sergeant Williams, in the notes to Duppa v. Mayo, 1 Saund. 287, may have been founded on mere dicta, as stated by the appellants, but that learned writer's notes have for many years been regarded as high authority, and the doctrine that the demand must be made at the front door of the dwelling house, if there is a dwelling house on the leased premises, has been generally recognized by the Courts, except when the rule has been changed by statute.

We are asked to grant a rehearing, that the question may be argued, whether the common law demand was required, when the landlord proceeded under section thirteen of the Forcible Entry Act. If the question was now for the first time before the Supreme Court, we should have great hesitation in holding, that in such a case, the demand as required at common law was necessary to be made; but, in Chipman v. Emeric, 3 Cal. 273, and Gaskill v. Trainer, 3 Cal. 334, it was held, that in order to work a forfeiture for the non-payment of rent, the landlord must make the demand with all the strictness required at common law. Those decisions have been too long recognized as the correct construction of section thirteen of the Forcible Entry Act, to be now changed by the Courts; and the rule has, in fact, been changed by the Legislature since the commencement of this action. (See Statutes 1862, page 420.)

APPEAL from the District Court, Fifth Judicial District, Tuolumne County.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the Court.

H. P. Barber, for Appellant.

H. H. Hartley, for Respondents.

By the Court SANDERSON, C. J.

This action was brought to recover damages from the defendant, a ditch corporation, for the negligent, careless and wanton discharge of the waters accumulated in defendant's ditch in and upon the lands of the plaintiffs, whereby the same were injured to the amount of ten thousand dollars, as alleged in the complaint. The jury rendered a verdict in favor of the plaintiffs for the sum of six thousand one hundred and thirty-seven dollars and fifty cents. Thereupon the defendant moved for a new trial upon the following grounds:

First—Misconduct and irregularity in the proceedings of the jury in determining their verdict by chance.

Second—Insufficiency of the evidence to justify the verdict, and that it is against law.

Third—Error in law occurring at the trial and excepted to by defendant.

The motion for a new trial was denied, and the defendant appeals.

1. As to the first ground, both parties rely solely upon the affidavits made by most, if not all, of the jurors by whom the verdict was rendered, no other evidence being offered by either. As to the facts established by these affidavits the parties disagree. Under the view which we have taken of the question presented, it becomes unnecessary for us to determine this dispute, and we shall assume that the facts presented by the affidavits are as claimed by the appellant. For the purposes of our decision, we therefore assume that the verdict, so far as the amount of the damages was concerned, was rendered in pursuance of an agreement between the jurors to the effect that each should put down upon a separate piece of paper the amount which he thought the plaintiffs were justly entitled to recover; that the several sums thus marked should be added together and the total amount divided by twelve, and that the quotient, whatever it might be, should be their verdict, without further consultation or discussion.

Where damages are to be assessed by a jury, it not unfrequently, if not always, happens that there is a great diversity of opinion as to the amount which ought to be given. Where such is the case the verdict must necessarily be the result of mutual concession, and the jury are bound to seek for a medium sum upon which their conflicting views may harmonize. It will frequently happen that this medium sum will be the average, or approximately so, of the different sums advocated by each. To ascertain this average, the jury may properly adopt the method which was used in the present case, but they ought not to agree to be bound by the result, whatever it may be. If they do so agree, and such result is made the verdict without further consultation or assent, such verdict is vicious and irregular, and must be set aside whenever the fact is made to appear by proper and competent evidence. If, on the contrary, they do not agree to be bound by the result, but reserve to themselves the right to dissent, such a proceeding is not irregular; and if afterwards, upon consultation and discussion, they finally agree to adopt such result as their verdict, the verdict so found is good. (Dana v. Tucker, 4 John. 487; Harvey v. Rickett, 15 John. 87; Smith v. Cheetham, 3 Caines, 57; Grinnell v. Phillips, 1 Mass. 541; Warner v. Robinson, 1 Root, 194; Wilson v. Berryman, 5 Cal. 44; Roberts v. Failis, 1 Cowen, 338.)

Under the facts of this case, as we have assumed them to be, the verdict is undoubtedly vicious, and ought to be set aside. The only question for us to determine is, whether the affidavits of the jurors can be received for the purpose of establishing those facts. Although there is some conflict of authority upon this question, the better opinion seems to be, that by the common law, the affidavits of jurors cannot be received for the purpose of impeaching their verdict, but may be admitted in support thereof. (Vaise v. Delaval, 1 Term Rep. 11; Dana v. Tucker, 4 John. 487; Sargeant v. Deniston, 5 Cowen, 106; Ex parte Cayhendall, 6 Cowen, 53; The People v. Columbia Common Pleas, 1 Wend. 297.) But this rule of the common law has been changed, in this State, to a certain extent, by statute. The second subdivision of the one hundred and ninety-third section of the Practice Act provides that the misconduct of the jury shall be cause for new trial, "and whenever any one or more of the jurors shall have been induced to assent to any general or special verdict, or to a finding on any question or questions submitted to them by the Court, by a resort to the determination of chance, such misconduct may be proved by the affidavits of any one or more of the jurors." Being in derogation of the common law, this statute must be strictly construed, and cannot be held to include such kinds of misconduct as do not come clearly within the descriptive terms of the Act. Why the Legislature should sanction different modes of proving different kinds of misconduct is not readily perceived: If the affidavits of the jurors are to be received for the purpose of establishing certain kinds of misconduct, there seems to be no good reason why they should not be received as to all kinds without distinction. But that the Legislature has made such a distinction is manifest, and we are bound to take the law as we find it, regardless of its incongruities. As the law now stands, there are certain irregularities fatal to a verdict which may be proved by the affidavits of the jurors, and certain other irregularities equally fatal which can only be proved in the manner authorized by the rules of the common law; and it only remains to determine whether that which is alleged in the present case belongs to the former or latter class. If the method adopted by the jury for the purpose of arriving at a verdict may be properly characterized as "a resort to the determination of chance," the affidavits in question are admissible; otherwise, not.

We have not been able to find a case in which such a verdict has been held to be a chance verdict, but we have found several where the contrary has been maintained. In Cowperthwaite v. Jones, 2 Dallas, 55, the jury adopted the same method of ascertaining the amount of damages which was resorted to in this case, and the Court said: "The first objection as to the manner of the jury collecting the sense of its members, with regard to the quantum of damages, does not appear to us to be well founded or at all similar to the case of casting lots for their verdict." This case was afterwards affirmed in the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania. In Thompson's Case, 8 Grat-tan, 637, the Supreme Court of Virginia, in commenting upon this method of ascertaining the amount of damages to be inserted in a verdict, said: "What more, we would ask, have the jury done in this case than what we know is of every day occurrence in trials of Courts of equity, where, when a question of damage, or value or compensation arises before the Master, and when witnesses of equal credibility or integrity and intelligence differ in their estimates, the Master adopts as his assessment an average of the estimates of such witnesses; and this practice is sanctioned by a Court of equity, which is a Court of conscience as it is of law and justice. Indeed, in some cases, it may be considered a rule of necessity as well as conscience." In Smith v. Cheetham, 3 Caines, 61, Mr. Chief Justice Kent said: "If the jury cast lots for whom they shall find, it would, no doubt, vitiate the verdict. * * * The charge here is not that the jury cast lots whether they should find for the plaintiff or defendant, but only that in ascertaining the amount of the damages they took the average sum deduced from the different opinions of each other. This has no analogy to the case of casting lots or determining by chance for whom they shall find." In Wilson v. Berryman, 5 Cal. 46, Mr. Chief Justice Murray said: "Such verdicts are regarded in the same light by the Courts as gambling verdicts, and will be invariably set aside, just as if the jury had thrown dice or resorted to any species of gambling to determine the amount." Thus he admits that such a verdict is not a chance verdict, while he holds it to be equally vicious.

But independent of authority, it is manifest that there is no element of chance in such a verdict. Each juror marks a sum which, in his judgment, represents the true amount of damages. Neither of these sums is the result of chance; on the contrary, each is the result of the judgment or will of the juror by whom it was marked. Neither is the aggregate of these sums, nor the quotient resulting from a division of the aggregate by twelve, the result of chance; but, on the contrary, the result of the most accurate of the sciences. Thus from the commencement to the end of the process no quantity which enters into the final result is determined by a resort to chance.

We are therefore of the opinion that the verdict in this case is not a chance verdict, within the meaning of the second subdivision of the one hundred and ninety-third section of the Practice Act, and that for that reason the affidavits of the jurors by whom it was rendered cannot be admitted to impeach it. There being no other evidence, it follows that the verdict, so far as the point under consideration is concerned, must be allowed to stand.

2. It is next claimed by appellant that the verdict is contrary to the evidence, and ought to be set aside upon that ground.

The cause of action specified in the complaint is the negligent, careless, and wanton discharge of the waters of defendant's ditch upon the lands of the plaintiffs by the act of the defendant. This was done during the great flood of eighteen hundred and sixty-two, and it is claimed by the appellant that the damages sustained by the plaintiffs were occasioned by the act of God. The extraordinary storms of that year, it is true, were the acts of God; but the evidence shows that those storms would not have caused the damage in question but for the agency of the defendant. But for defendant's ditch and their management of it, the plaintiffs' farm would have remained uninjured. As appears from the evidence, the storm was not sudden, but gradual, affording the agents of the defendant ample time to take such steps for the protection of the ditch against its effects as their judgment dictated. To that end they adopted such measures as they saw proper, and it is of those measures that the negligence, carelessness and wantonness which are the foundation of the action are predicated. The evidence shows that had other measures been taken the defendant's ditch would have been equally protected and no damage would have been done to the plaintiffs' farm. While the defendant had an undoubted right to ward off from its own property the damaging effects of the storm, yet in exercising that right it was bound to take care not to injure that of the plaintiffs. The defendant had no right to adopt measures for the protection of its own property which would lead to the destruction of the plaintiffs. A., for the purpose of saving his own life, may, if it be necessary, take the life of B. Thus, if A. and B. are wrecked at sea and both cling to the same spar, as the only means of saving life, and the spar is insufficient to sustain both, A. may wrest the spar from the grasp of B. although the death of B. may be the immediate consequence. This is allowed by the law of self-preservation. But this rule does not extend to property, and A. may not, in order to save his own property, destroy the property of B. however urgent the necessity. The evidence shows that the defendant's ditch passed along the side-hill, crossing and damming up ravines and gulches which in times of freshet constituted natural watercourses into which defendant could have turned the water without any injurious result to the plaintiffs' farm; yet this was not done, but on the contrary the water which was so destructive to the plaintiffs' farm was turned out of the ditch at a point where there was no ravine or gulch. The agents of the defendant seem to have acted solely for the safety of the ditch, regardless of consequences, so far as the property of others was concerned. Whether in so doing they were guilty of negligence was a question for the jury to determine from the evidence under the instructions of the Court. That the evidence tends to prove negligence cannot be denied, and that the jury was correctly instructed by the Court as to the law of the case we are bound to presume, for the record does not contain the instructions. It results that, in our judgment, the evidence sustains the verdict.

3. The only error of law assigned which we have not already considered is as to the admission of certain evidence as to the construction of the ditch. This evidence was objected to by counsel for the appellant, and the objection was overruled by the Court, but it nowhere appears in the record that counsel took an exception to the ruling of the Court. Such being the case, he is presumed to have acquiesced therein.

Judgment affirmed.

JAMES LICK v. WILLIAM FAULKNER AND GEORGE L. FAULKNER.

TREASURY NOTES — BILLS OF CREDIT.—The Constitution of the United States confers upon Congress the power to issue treasury notes or bills of credit—not in express terms, but as a power necessarily implied — whenever Congress in its wisdom shall determine that it is necessary to issue them in order to carry into effect a power expressly granted.

TREASURY NOTES A LEGAL TENDER.—The Act of Congress of February 25, 1862, authorizing treasury notes to be issued, and making them lawful money and a legal tender in payment of debts, was an exercise of sovereign authority within the scope of the powers granted in the Constitution, "to provide for calling forth the militia to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrections, and repel invasions," and "to raise and support an army," and "to provide and maintain a navy."

POWERS OF CONGRESS.—Whenever an express power is granted to Congress in the Constitution of the United States, the choice of the means by which the power expressly granted is to be carried into effect is left to the wisdom of Congress, with only this qualification: that the means adopted must bear a relation in the nature and fitness of things to the end to be accomplished.

TREASURY NOTES A LAWFUL TENDER.—The making of treasury notes lawful money, and a legal tender in payment of debts, is one of the means which Congress may constitutionally adopt to enable the General Government "to raise and support an army, to provide and maintain a navy," and "to provide for calling forth the militia to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrections, and repel invasions."

APPEAL from the District Court, Twelfth Judicial District, City and County of San Francisco.

This action was brought to recover the sum of four hundred and fifty dollars, due from the defendants to the plaintiff for the rent of a store in the City of San Francisco. The rent was two hundred and twenty-five dollars per month, and the sum sued for accrued for the months of September and October, 1862. The defendants in their answer admitted their indebtedness, but set up that after the same had accrued, and before the commencement of the action, they tendered to plaintiff the amount in United States notes, issued by virtue of an Act of Congress, entitled "An Act to authorize the issue of United States notes, and for the redemption or funding thereof, and for funding the floating debt of the United States," approved February 25, 1862, and that the plaintiff refused to receive the same. Upon the commencement of the action the defendants brought the notes into Court and deposited them in the Clerk's office, ready to be delivered to plaintiff when he would accept of the same.

Plaintiff demurred to the defense set up in the answer, and make paper money a tender as a distinct and separate one from either the power to emit bills or to coin money.

In section ten of Article one, the States are prohibited from the exercise of certain powers specified, some of which are expressly granted to Congress and some withheld.

Among the powers specified in that section are, the powers "to coin money," "to emit bills of credit," "to make anything but gold and silver coin a tender in payment of debts," "grant letters of marque and reprisal," "enter into treaties," etc.

Of the powers specified, the Federal Executive is allowed the power to enter into treaties.

Congress is allowed the power to coin money, and to grant letters of marque, but the power to make anything but gold and silver a tender in payment of debts is carefully withheld.

It cannot be pretended that the Convention supposed this power involved in the power to coin money, because, then there would have been no necessity to specify it, and, after specifying it as a power separate from the power to coin money, it would most certainly have been enumerated among those granted, if it had been the design that Congress should ever exercise such a power. This conclusion seems inevitable. The prohibition of the States to exercise such a power was necessary, for otherwise, the States might have exercised it; but to authorize Congress to exercise it required an express grant, especially after the prominence given it among the powers prohibited to the States.

The Convention, having singled it out as an independent power, the exercise of which by the States was prohibited, and then, having declined to confer it upon Congress, there is no possible sophistry that can justify the latter in its exercise. It is too clear to require argument, that, where any power is enumerated in the Constitution, and not granted to Congress, it is impossible for that body to exercise it without doing violence to rules of construction universally recognized and established.

The Supreme Court of the United States, in Craig v. State of Missouri, 4 Peters, 411 and 423-4, held that "The Con-

Lick v. Faulkner et al.

the business transactions of the people. In the journals of Congress we find but one instance, prior to the last year, of a proposition to make treasury notes a legal tender.

On the 12th of November, 1814, at a period of the war with Great Britain when there was most desperate need for funds, Mr. Hall, of Georgia, introduced into the House of Representatives a series of five resolutions.

The first directed an inquiry into the expediency of authorizing the Secretary of the treasury to issue — millions of treasury notes, convenient for circulation, etc.

The second resolution was to the effect "that the treasury notes which may be issued as aforesaid shall be a legal tender in all debts due or which may hereafter become due between the citizens of the United States, or between a citizen of the United States and a citizen or subject of any foreign State or kingdom."

The third resolution provided for the purchase of as much supplies in each State and district as the amount of taxes levied therein. The fourth authorized the exchange of notes for six per cent. bonds, and the fifth pledged taxes, imposts, duties, and proceeds of public lands, for the redemption of the notes. After some remarks by Mr. Hall, the question on the consideration of the resolutions was taken separately.

The House agreed to consider the first, third, fourth, and fifth resolutions, but refused to consider the second (the legal tender one) by a vote of forty-two in favor and ninety-five against.

Among the negative votes was that of Daniel Webster, then a member of the House. (Benton's Abridg. Vol. V, 361; see, also, Annals of Congress.)

This is the only recorded instance in the history of the Government of any attempt to make treasury notes a forced medium of exchange, and this is the reception which it then met with: a refusal even to consider it, by a vote of more than two to one.

If Congress can make paper a legal tender, it can of course prohibit the discharge of a debt by gold and silver. Suppose efficacious and useful at one time, or under certain circumstances, may at another be ineffectual, or even mischievous.

Government presupposes a perpetual mutability in its own operations in behalf of its citizens; and a perpetual flexibility in adapting itself to their wants and interests, their habits, occupations, and infirmities. This is the language of the Supreme Court in every case touching a general power. And we ask if, tried by these rules and tested by this language, there can exist a doubt that under the general power to "coin money," Congress is authorized to make this paper the "lawful money" of the land?

It will be instructive to call to mind the very words themselves, the interpretation of which gave rise to the decisions relied on, and to the rules in them embraced. And we distinctly state that in every instance the construction given by the Federal Judiciary to the words and phrases now to come under review is infinitely more liberal than that for which we contend. That the words upon which the doctrine has been made to rest are far less able to support it than those which are here presented. That the circumstances of each and every case rendered it far more laborious to reach those conclusions, and causes much greater difficulty to maintain them when arrived at, than can be experienced here.

Thus the word "necessary," was held not to mean "indispensable;" it was decided that it did not always import absolute and physical necessity; but that if reference was had to the common affairs of life, or to approved authors, it would be found to mean nothing more than convenient, useful, essential. (McCulloch v. Maryland, 4 Wheaton, 413.)

"Commerce" is held to mean "intercourse," "navigation." "The subject to be regulated is commerce; our Constitution being, as was aptly said at the bar, one of enumeration and not of definition, to ascertain the extent of the power, it becomes necessary to settle the meaning of the word." (Gibbons v. Ogden, 9 Wheat. 189; Brown v. State of Maryland, 12 Wheat. 419.)

In the Passenger Cases, the word "commerce" was extended not only to vessels carrying passengers, as was the case in Gibbons v. Ogden, and to the articles or things imported, as in Brown v. Maryland, but to the passengers themselves; for it was decided that the word "imports" also applied to passengers. We are aware that Mr. Webster denied the right of Congress to make a legal tender of the paper issued "on the coinage power alone." The question of legal tender is not now under consideration, but simply the power to create money out of paper. That, confessedly, is derived from the "power to coin money and regulate its value." Hereafter it will be demonstrated that whatever money can be created on the coinage power, the same can be made a legal tender.

The power of coinage granted to the United States, is much more liberal in its terms than that given to the old Confederation. As contained in the Constitution, it is: Congress shall have power to coin money, with a prohibition on the States from its use in any maner, save making a legal tender of gold and silver in payment of debts. In the Articles of Confederation it was: "The United States in Congress assembled, shall also have sole and exclusive power of regulating the alloy of coin struck by their authority, or by that of the respective States." It was only a power to strike coin — the specific, not the generic term money — with the power, too, not exclusive, but shared with the individual States. Nor was there any right in the Confederation to regulate the value of foreign coin; this, also, being reserved to the States. It was such limitations, such restrictions, that caused the Confederacy to expire from mere debility. Our proposition is, that the United States can coin money," the reply is, that it can only "strike coin." We claim this paper to be money, and it is said it is not coin. The framers of the Constitution well knew that the word money could not be construed to mean gold and silver only; they knew that to prohibit the States from making anything but money a tender, would be an absurdity; that instead of an inhibition, it would be an invitation to each and every State to make that a tender which to them seemed good. They undertook to limit the States to gold and silver, and have accomplished their undertaking by exactly saying what they meant. Had they adopted the word "money," in place of the words "gold and silver coin," all know that long ere this the States would have declared the paper of the individual banks a tender in payment of debts. Thus it is in every case; where words of limitation are required, they are expressed; where terms comprehensive and generic are needed, as in granting a great power to the Federal Government, they are used; to the end that the power "may be varied to meet the exigencies of the times, and not confined to one mode of operation exclusive of all others."

The question now to be asked is, can the money which Congress by the Constitution is authorized to coin (create) be made a legal tender? That Congress can make some thing, some substance, a legal tender, is admitted; we have never heard it doubted except by the counsel for appellant, when this case was argued in the Court below, and even there it was but feebly intimated, and is here silently abandoned. It would be useless to deny it. The practice of the Government throughout its entire history, proves it; and every authority that has been, or can be cited as opposed to the exercise of the power upon paper or the inferior metals, affirms the right to make gold and silver a tender in payment of debts of every kind and nature. Without doubt, therefore, this right to make tender of some material, is vested in the United States. But where? From what clause of the Constitution is this power derived? There is no grant of it in express words; nothing which declares, affirmatively, that Congress shall have power to create gold and silver, or any substance whatever, a legal tender. Why, then, does Congress possess, and from whence does it obtain this right, which confessedly exists? The answer must be — can only be — from the power to "coin money and regulate its value." The coinage power, then, contains this right; it is implied, included in it. (Story on Con. Secs. 449, 1,117.) This being the case, all other questions are of easy solution. Why is gold a legal tender? It is manifest gold, as gold, does not answer the purpose; not gold dust, gold quartz, gold bars, but gold converted into money, constitutes the legal tender of this nation; and the reason, as money it constitutes it, springs from the fact that it is "coined money." The same is true of silver. It is not from "the intrinsic value" these two metals possess, but because Congress can convert them, as materials, into money, that they are now, or that they ever have been, a legal tender in the United States. We affirm then, that as the power to coin money is also the power to make that money, when coined, a legal tender, whatever substance or thing, by virtue of this power, can be converted into money, the same can be made a legal tender. Can Congress make gold and silver a tender? Certainly, since it can coin gold and silver into money. Can Congress make a tender of copper, iron, or lead? Yes. Because they are materials which can be fashioned into money. Can paper be made a legal tender? Assuredly it can; for, "Upon the coinage power alone, it can be converted into money."

By the Court, CURREY, J.

This case involves the constitutionality of the Act of the Congress of the United States, passed on the 25th day of February, 1862, entitled "An Act to authorize the issue of United States notes and for the redemption or funding thereof, and for funding the floating debt of the United States," so far as it provides and declares that the notes to be issued by virtue thereof shall be lawful money and a legal tender in the payment of all debts, public and private, within the United States, except duties on imports and interest on the bonds and notes of the United States. If the notes issued by the authority of this Act be lawful money and a legal tender in payment of private debts, then the judgment in this action must be affirmed, otherwise it must be reversed.

With a sense that the question to be considered is one of extraordinary interest, and of paramount public importance, we have given to the subject a thorough and careful examination, and the conclusion to which we have come is the result of anxious inquiry and deliberation.

In order the better to appreciate what may follow, it is deemed appropriate to refer briefly to the character of the Government of the United States, as it existed under the Articles of the Confederation, if indeed that compact could be regarded as rising to the dignity of a Government, in the true sense of that term.

The Confederation seems to have been a league of friendship between the thirteen original States, entered into for their common defense, the security of their liberties, and for their mutual and general welfare; and by this league the States which were parties to it bound themselves to assist each other against all force offered to, or attacks made upon them, or any of them, on account of religion, sovereignty, trade, or any other pretense whatever. The style of the Confederacy was declared to be "The United States of America," and by the fifth of these Articles it was provided, that for the management of the interests of the United States, delegates should be annually appointed in such a manner as each State should direct, to meet in Congress. No State could be represented in Congress by less than two nor more than seven members, and in determining questions therein each State was entitled to a single vote.

To this Congress, composed of a single House of Delegates, and which was the only department of the Government, was granted a list of powers which, in appearance, placed the Confederation on an equal footing with the other civilized and enlightened nations of the world; but this was so in appearance only, for it was expressly declared by the sixth section of Article Nine that the United States, in Congress assembled, should never engage in war, nor grant letters of marque and reprisal in time of peace; nor enter into any treaty alliances; nor coin money; nor regulate the value thereof; nor ascertain the sums or expenses necessary for the defense or welfare of the United States; nor emit bills, nor borrow money on the credit of the United States; nor appropriate money; nor agree upon the number of vessels of war to be built or purchased, or the number of land or sea forces to be raised; nor appoint a Commander-in-Chief of the army or navy, unless nine States should assent to the same; and by the second section of the First Article it was declared that each State retained its sovereignty, freedom and independence, and every power, jurisdiction and right which, by the Confederation, was not expressly delegated to the United States, in Congress assembled. The means to carry into execution the powers granted were reserved to the States; and in respect thereto, each State could act as it deemed proper; so that whatever measures Congress might devise for the common defense, for the security of the liberties of the States, or for their mutual and general welfare, were subject to be defeated, because of the utter want of all coercive authority to carry them into effect. In truth, all the power Congress possessed was the power of recommendation. It depended on the good will of the States whether a measure should be carried into effect or not. (Federalist, No. 15; 1 Story on Cons., Secs. 248, 253.) Hence it was that the acts of Congress were disregarded, and the Confederation, which it was intended should possess the efficient powers of a Government, was found to be destitute of the elements essential to its perpetuity.

This Confederation which, as time rolled on, was expiring from its inherent debility, was finally given over by its friends as impracticable and devoid of the faculties of a vital Government. But the necessity for a Government, composed by the union of the States, possessing the powers of a sovereign nation, was realized by the people. Without such a Government, it was known that the independence recently won could not be retained, and hence the people of the same United States, conscious from experience of the weakness and infirmities of the Confederation as a Government, did, in order to form a more perfect union than that which existed under the Articles of Confederation, and to establish justice, insure domestic tranquillity, provide for the common defense, promote the general welfare and secure the blessings of liberty to themselves and their posterity; ordain and establish the Constitution for the United States of America under which, for more than seventy years, the Government has grown in power and material wealth, until as a nation it has become one of the most potent of the earth.

The manifest design of the framers of the Constitution, and of the people of the States who adopted it, was to organize an efficient consolidated Government, possessing all the elements of power essential to a great nation, with capacity to perform all things necessary to accomplish and secure the ends enumerated in the preamble of the Constitution. For this purpose and to these ends, the Government was made to consist of three departments—the legislative, the executive, and judicial—and to the legislative department was committed certain powers, among which are the following:

1. To lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts and excises; to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States.

2. To borrow money on the credit of the United States.

3. To regulate commerce with foreign nations, and among the several States and with the Indian tribes.

4. To coin money, regulate the value thereof, and of foreign coin, and to provide for the punishment of counterfeiting the securities and current coin of the United States.

5. To establish post offices and post roads.

6. To declare war, grant letters of marque and reprisal.

7. To raise and support an army; to provide and maintain a navy.

8. To make rules for the government and regulation of the land and naval forces.

9. To provide for calling forth the militia to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrections and repel invasions.

10. And to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers, and all powers vested by the Constitution in the Government of the United States or in any department or officer thereof.

Here is an array of powers which were granted, to be exercised.

cised as occasion might demand. If the exigency requiring the exercise of any power granted to Congress exists, then Congress, as the legislative department of the Government, cannot, consistently with duty, do otherwise than exercise the power for the accomplishment of the object demanded, and for this purpose may adopt such measures as are appropriate to that end.

Congress has power to raise and support armies; to provide and maintain a navy; and to provide for calling forth the militia to execute the laws, suppress insurrections and repel invasions. But these things cannot be done merely by legislative enactments, to the effect that armies shall be raised and supported, that a navy shall be provided and maintained, or that the militia shall be called forth for the purposes designated. To accomplish these objects men and material are indispensable; and money, as a means and medium of exchange, is necessary to obtain the services of men, and the material requisite can only be provided by an expenditure of labor and money. That wars, invasions and insurrections of fearful and direful magnitude might arise was foreseen by the wise men who framed the Constitution and by the people who adopted it, and ample powers were expressly granted to Congress to provide for every conceivable emergency requiring the exercise and exertion of governmental power and authority, for the maintenance and preservation of the United States as a sovereign and independent nation.

Though the Government of the United States is one of enumerated and limited powers, it is supreme within its sphere of action. The Constitution emanated from the people, who, in its adoption, declared and decreed that "This Constitution, and the laws of the United States which shall be made in pursuance thereof, and all treaties made or which shall be made under the authority of the United States, shall be the supreme law of the land, and the Judges in every State shall be bound thereby, anything in the Constitution or laws of any State to the contrary notwithstanding." (McCulloch v. Maryland, 4 Wheat. 405, 406.)

The enumerated powers are general and comprehensive, and were manifestly supposed to be ample for the purposes declared in the preamble of the Constitution. But they could not be carried into execution without legislation; of this the framers of the Constitution were aware, and hence Congress was empowered to make all laws necessary and proper for carrying into execution the powers specified, and all other powers vested by the Constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any department or officer thereof.

In McCulloch v. Maryland, 4 Wheat. 407, Mr. Chief Justice Marshall said: "A Constitution, to contain an accurate detail of all the subdivisions of which its great powers will admit, and of all the means by which it may be carried into execution, would partake of the prolixity of a political code, and could scarcely be embraced by the human mind. It would probably never be understood by the public. Its nature, therefore, requires that only its great outlines should be marked, its important objects designated, and the minor ingredients which compose those objects be deduced from the nature of the objects themselves."

In Martin v. Hunter, 1 Wheat. 326, Mr. Justice Story, in delivering the opinion of the Court, said: "The Constitution unavoidably deals in general language. It did not suit the purposes of the people, in framing this great charter of our liberties, to provide for minute specifications of its powers, or to declare the means by which those powers should be carried into execution."

In the thirty-first number of the Federalist Mr. Hamilton said, in reference to the clause of the Constitution conferring on Congress the authority to make all laws necessary and proper for carrying into execution the express powers granted, that it was only declaratory of a truth which would have resulted by necessary and unavoidable implication from the very act of establishing the Federal Government and vesting it with certain powers; and in respect to the same clause Mr. Madison said: "Had the Constitution been silent on this head there can be no doubt all the particular powers requisite as a means of executing the general powers would have resulted to the General Government by unavoidable implication. No axiom is more clearly established in law or in reason than that wherever the end is required the means are authorized; wherever a general power to do a thing is given, every particular power necessary for doing it is included," (Federalist, No. 43;) and as a reason why it was inserted in the Constitution Mr. Justice Story said: "Such a clause was peculiarly useful in order to avoid any doubt which ingenuity or jealousy might raise on the subject. Much plausible reasoning might be employed by those who were hostile to the Union and in favor of State power to prejudice the people on such a subject and to embarrass the Government in all its reasonable operations. Besides, as the Confederation contained a positive clause restraining the powers of Congress to powers expressly granted, there was a fitness in declaring that that rule of interpretation should no longer prevail. The very zeal, indeed, with which the present clause has been always assailed is the highest proof of its importance and propriety. It has narrowed down the grounds of hostility to the mere interpretation of terms." (Story on the Const., Sec. 1,242; Federalist, No. 31.)

There can be no doubt that Congress has the power to make all laws which may be necessary and proper to the complete execution of the powers enumerated, and to which we have referred, because the Constitution itself has so declared; and the only question to be settled by the Courts is as to what laws are necessary and proper for the purpose; for it must be conceded that laws might be enacted upon the pretext that they were necessary and proper to carry into execution an enumerated power granted to Congress, which might be repugnant to the Constitution or in violation of common right, which the Courts would be bound to pronounce invalid; but "it is not on slight implication or vague conjecture that the Legislature is to be pronounced to have transcended its powers, and its acts to be considered as void." (Fletcher v. Peck, 6 Cranch, 128.)

the 25th of February, 1862, is involved in the consideration of this case, but it is not, with the authorities before us, of difficult solution. In fact, it may be regarded as settled in principle by the application of the rule of construction declared and vindicated in the masterly and exhaustive argument of the Chief Justice in McCulloch v. Maryland, 4 Wheat. 418, 421. In that case the clause of the Constitution which conferred the power on Congress to make all laws necessary and proper for carrying into execution the powers vested in the Government of the United States, was elaborately and ably considered, and in conclusion the Court, by its learned Chief Justice, said: "The result of the most careful and attentive consideration bestowed upon this clause is, that if it does not enlarge it cannot be construed to restrain the powers of Congress or to impair the right of the Legislature to exercise its best judgment in the selection of measures to carry into execution the constitutional powers of the Government. If no other motive for its insertion can be suggested, a sufficient one is found in the desire to remove all doubts respecting the right to legislate on that vast mass of incidental powers which must be involved in the Constitution, if that instrument be not a splendid bauble.

"We admit, as all must admit, that the powers of the Government are limited, and that its limits are not to be transcended. But we think the sound construction of the Constitution must allow the National Legislature that discretion with respect to the means by which the powers it confers are to be carried into execution which will enable that body to perform the high duties assigned to it in the manner most beneficial to the people. Let the end be legitimate, let it be within the scope of the Constitution, and all means which are appropriate, which are plainly adapted to that end, which are not prohibited, but consistent with the letter and spirit of the Constitution, are constitutional." (See also Gibbons v. Ogden, 9 Wheat. 187, and Ogden v. Saunders, 12 Wheat. 332.)

That the necessity for raising, equipping and supporting large armies, and for providing and maintaining a navy of unprecedented power, and for providing and furnishing the supplies and munitions indispensable to the prosecution of war, existed when the Act of Congress in question was passed, Congress determined in the affirmative; and recognizing the condition of the country, as we must, as in a state of war, engaged in the endeavor to suppress an insurrection and rebellion that was at the time and is still mighty and wicked beyond any example furnished by the history of the past, we cannot doubt the necessity of the Act now before us in judgment, or some other measure, adequate as a means to accomplish the objects of the war; nor can we doubt its propriety, provided it be within the scope of the Constitution and consistent with its letter and spirit. (Story on Const. Secs. 1,243 to 1,256.)

In United States v. Fisher, 2 Cranch, 358, Mr. Chief Justice Marshall, in reference to the clause of the Constitution under consideration, said: "In construing this clause it would be incorrect, and would produce endless difficulties, if the opinion should be maintained that no law was authorized which was not indispensably necessary to give effect to a specific power. Where various systems might be adopted for that purpose, it might be said with respect to each that it was not necessary, because the end might be attained by other means. Congress must possess the choice of means, and must be empowered to use any means which are in fact conducive to the exercise of a power granted by the Constitution."

Thus it appears, upon authority which commands our highest respect, that to Congress pertains the choice of means to carry into effect a power granted in express terms, though it must be admitted that in the adoption of means for the purpose there must be a relation, in the nature and fitness of things, between the means used and the end to be accomplished.

The power to declare war, to raise and support armies and a navy, to suppress insurrections and repel invasions, is, as already appears, expressly granted to Congress by the Constitution; and the power to pass laws for carrying these express powers into execution is also granted in terms. Then, with respect to these express powers, the Government must be considered as supreme; and in carrying them into effect, its powers are not limited, except by constitutional provision. (Story on Const., Secs. 417 to 426, and 433, 434.)

Congress having passed the Act in question, as a means to carry into effect the power to raise and maintain an army and a navy to suppress the existing insurrection and rebellion, it devolves on those who object that the means selected are repugnant to the Constitution to point out and show wherein is the repugnancy. If the Constitution contains no provision operating in restraint of the emission of treasury notes, and making the same lawful money and a legal tender in the payment of debts, in order to make them the more efficient for the end to be attained, then upon what principle would a Court be authorized to proceed to the conclusion that the law is unconstitutional and void, in so far as these notes are made lawful money and a legal tender in the payment of debts?

The objection interposed to the binding obligation of the tender clause of the Act is sought to be maintained on the ground that the power to make treasury notes or bills of credit a tender for the payment of private debts is not conferred on Congress by the Constitution, either expressly or by implication.

It must be admitted that this power is not granted in express terms. If it exists, it is to be found in that vast mass of incidental powers involved in the Constitution, which are to be exercised by Congress when necessary and proper to carry into effect powers expressly granted. But though the Act in question be one depending for its constitutional warrant in the exercise of authority which is subordinate and ancillary to a principal and specific power, it may be equally valid as a law enacted to accomplish, in the most palpable and direct mode, an object specifically designated by the clearest constitutional expression. The Act is one relating to the means which Congress may adopt to attain an end; and the whole controversy is narrowed down to the constitution-ality of the means; because, as we have seen, the end is legitimate and within the scope of the Constitution, and Congress has determined that a necessity existed for some measure adequate to secure the objects for which the Government was formed, and to secure which ample powers were granted in the Constitution.

The able argument of the appellant's counsel against the policy of the legislation of Congress making these treasury notes a legal tender in the payment of private debts, which he has enforced by an array of examples which should cause legislators to pause in their deliberations, would have been particularly appropriate could it have been addressed to Congress before passing the Act in question; but the evils portrayed as the consequence of making anything besides gold and silver a medium of exchange and a tender in the payment of debts would not alone authorize this Court to pronounce against the law. As an argument ab inconvenienti, it would have its just weight in the determination as to the validity of a law of doubtful authority, and this is the use to which, we apprehend, the learned counsel intended it should be applied.

The Constitution does not deny to Congress the authority to emit bills on the credit of the United States, nor is this power expressly conferred. If it can be exercised it must be in subordination to some specific power, when necessary and proper for carrying such power into execution. That the framers of the Constitution intended to leave the subject in the condition in which it is left, we think is manifest from the debates that transpired in the Convention in respect to it. From these debates it appears that the subject was considered and that the Convention refused to confer on Congress the power in express language to emit bills of credit. From this it seems apparent that the framers of the Constitution and the people who adopted it intended that this power should not be granted to Congress as a principal power; and as the authority was not inhibited, we think it follows that it was intended Congress might exercise the power as ancillary to the powers expressly granted, when in its wisdom it should be deemed necessary and proper, else why was not the power to issue bills of credit forbidden to the National Government as well as to the States?

Mr. Calhoun, in his speech on the bill to establish a national bank, delivered in the House of Representatives in February, 1816, argued that, taking into view the prohibition against the States issuing bills of credit, there was a strong presumption that this power was intended to be given exclusively to Congress (Calhoun's Works, 2 Vol. 155, 156.) It is certain that from a very early period in the history of the Government the power to issue bills of credit, or, in other words, notes on the credit of the United States, has been exercised; and if legislative exposition, acquiesced in and maintained by the Courts, is ever of paramount force, it would seem that the power of Congress over this question must be considered as settled.

The next question that occurs in the discussion, after having arrived at the conclusion that Congress has the power, under circumstances of necessity, to issue treasury notes or bills of credit, is as to the power of Congress to make such notes or bills lawful money, or the equivalent of lawful money, and a legal tender in the payment of private debts.

What constitutes money, and its use as a measure of values, has ever been, among political economists, an important element in the consideration of subjects relating to material wealth. Money, in its enlarged sense, is that general medium of exchange by reference to which the value of other things is estimated, and is the representative and equivalent of such value. Those who desire, may learn from history that since society had its first existence many different commodities have been used as a circulating medium or medium of exchange. Some of these were most inconvenient and ill adapted to the purposes of exchange, but seem to have been adopted for want of something better. The precious, as well as the base metals, were used in some countries at an early date, though in others, at a comparatively modern period, other substances were employed as the currency, by which exchanges were effected.

Shekels of silver were current money in the time of Abraham. The Spartans adopted iron; the ancient Romans copper; the Russians, at one time, platinum; the North American Indians used wampum, with which the Puritans, at one time, effected their own exchanges. To this enumeration might be added others, and also instances of the use of the products of labor as a medium of exchange or money. The writers on political economy generally agree that whatever comes to be used as the common equivalent for other things, and the standard by which their values are measured, be the commodity whatever it may be, is money. (McCullough's Political Economy, Ch. 4; John Stuart Mill's Political Economy, Book 3, Ch. 7; Bowen's Political Economy, Ch. 18; Rees' Cyclopedia.)

In all ages of the world, and in nearly all countries, metals seem to have been used, as if by common consent, to serve the purposes of money; other articles have been and still are used as money, such as paper in highly civilized countries, and courrie shells and like articles of insignificant intrinsic value among barbarous nations. Metals, in all times of which we have any historical knowledge, were esteemed of value for practical uses, and were employed in commerce, probably not so much as a general standard of the value of other things as an article which facilitated exchange by barter. In the earliest annals of commerce metals are spoken of as objects of value; and it may safely be assumed that metallic money was selected as a medium of exchange because its value was less fluctuating than that of most other substances. Especially, says Mr. Mill, was gold and silver fixed upon by the tacit concurrence of almost all nations to serve this purpose, for the reason that no other substances unite the necessary qualities in so great a degree with so many subordinate advantages. The contrivance of fabricating gold and silver into coins, by which the weight and value of each coin was ascertained and indicated by its face, is of remote antiquity. And in order to secure the advantages of uniformity and public confidence in the currency, Governments in modern times have usually exercised the exclusive right to coin money and regulate its value. By the Constitution of the United States this right was conferred on Congress as a principal power. Without a means of this kind to ascertain the value of coin, it would be difficult if not impossible to determine the sufficiency of tenders made for the discharge of pecuniary obligations.

Gold and silver fashioned into coins are not exempt from the laws which govern the prices of other commodities, though generally they have been less subject to fluctuations in value than almost any other articles of production, for the reason that their production has not, except perhaps in two instances of modern times, exceeded their ordinary demand. The instances referred to stand connected with the discovery of the mines of Spanish America, in the sixteenth century, and the more recent and transpiring discoveries of the precious metals in Australia and upon the Pacific slope of the United States of America. In the course of a century and a half immediately following the discovery of the Spanish American mines, the depression in the value of gold and silver was as three to one; and we who live at this day have not failed to observe the great and permanent increase in the price of commodities within the last fifteen years, consequent upon the increased production within this time of the precious metals; so that, though moulded into coins and impressed with the stamp of the mint, they retain all their properties as articles of commerce, and are a measure of the value of other things in the same manner as the latter are a measure of the value of gold and silver.

Mr. Mill says: "The relations of commodities to one another remain unaltered by money; the only new relation introduced is their relation to money itself; how much or how little money they will exchange for—in other words, how the exchange value of money is determined. And this is a question not of any difficulty, when the illusion is dispelled which caused money to be looked upon as a peculiar thing not governed by the same law as other things. Money is a commodity, and its value is to be determined with that of other commodities, temporarily by demand and supply, permanently and on the average by cost of production."

Professor Colton, in treating of the subject of paper money, and banking, says that gold and silver, used as money are a mere credit currency, representing all the values arising from the great variety of their uses, and their credit is based upon these values, their value as money being but a fraction of the whole, itself borrowed from these other values. (Public Economy, Ch. 16.)

Both gold and silver, as to their value, are alike subject to the laws of change consequent upon the extent of their demand and production, and are therefore imperfect standards of value. Affected by the same law or principle, each of these metals is subject to change in its own value, and in relation to the value of the other, and also to that of other commodities; and hence it is that the inequalities in the relations of value between these two metals have been sought to be adjusted by Governments, as the exigencies of change required, by altering the quality or weight of the coin without changing its denomination.

In the time of and prior to the reign of Henry III of England, silver was the universal medium of exchange in that country, and it was not until the time of Edward III that gold, as well as silver money, became a legal tender; and from that period until the year 1774, both these kinds of money were recognized by law as authorized standards of value, in all payments whatever, when it was provided by statute (14 George III, c. 42) that thereafter silver coins should not be a legal tender in payment of any sum exceeding twenty-five pounds, except according to their value in weight, at a specified valuation per ounce. In 1816 the legal tender of silver coins was still further restricted to payments not exceeding forty shillings. (1 Blackstone Com. 277.)

A writer, whose name we have been unable to learn, in an able article on the subject of money, argues that, as a matter of convenience, "the metal of which the chief medium of exchange is fabricated should have reference to the wealth and commerce of the country for which it is intended; that copper or silver coins of the lowest denominations suffice for the convenience of a very poor country; but that as a country advances in wealth its commercial transactions are more costly and require coins of corresponding value." (Standard Library Cyclopedia, Vol. 3, page 351.) This writer maintains that a large circulation of coins is the most extravagant mode of furnishing a people with a medium of exchange, because of accidents and contingencies by which they are irretrievably lost or destroyed, thus diminishing the wealth of the country and wasting the products of labor; and he then says "some cheaper kind of money therefore should, as far as possible, be used as a substitute for gold and silver—and such a substitute has been found in paper;" which he argues is not only more economical than gold or silver, but is more convenient than either for effecting large payments or for transmitting large sums to a distance; and that in this respect it excels gold more than gold excels silver.

Mr. Ricardo, in his work on political economy, at page 507, expresses the opinion that money, in its most perfect state, is paper money; and Adam Smith said: "The substitution of paper in the room of gold and silver money replaces a very expensive instrument of commerce with one much less costly and sometimes equally convenient." (Wealth of Nations, Vol. 1, page 447.) Professor Colton argues that money, in all its forms and substances, is a credit currency, and derives its credit from considerations extraneous to itself; and that the invention of paper money was, in the march of civilization, as much an improvement on metallic currency, in its adaptation to the necessities of the commercial world, as metallic money was an improvement on the system of barter.

Thus much has been said respecting metallic and paper money for the purpose of furnishing a general idea of the causes which induced and necessitated the use of these substances as a medium for effecting exchanges, and particularly with the object of dispelling the illusion which, having become inveterate from misleading associations, has caused the precious metals to be esteemed as the only substances of which money can be made, and as the only legitimate currency for the uses of commercial exchanges.

Money is, as we have before observed, in a general and enlarged sense, a medium of exchange, by which the value of other things is estimated, and is the representative and equivalent of such value, and in the sense of the term as thus defined we must understand the words "lawful money," as used in the Act of Congress under consideration.

The principal objection on the part of the appellant is that Congress had not the power under the Constitution to make the notes issued in pursuance of the provisions of the Act in question a legal tender in the payment of private debts. If Congress has the power to make gold and silver coined at the Mint a legal tender in the payment of debts, upon what argument can the objection to the making of treasury notes issued on the credit of the United States a like tender, be maintained? It may, perhaps, be answered that the power to coin money is granted, and that coining money means the fabricating of metals into coins, and that therefore nothing except coined metals can be made a legal tender in the discharge of pecuniary obligations. Were it admitted that the power "to coin money" is limited to a coinage of metals, it would not result from this that no other kind of money could be made a legal tender, unless it were first conceded that Congress had no power to adopt means for the execution of a designated power except the means were specified. Such a concession, however, has never been made by the judiciary, nor by any enlightened statesman, however narrow have been his views of constitutional power. We do not maintain, nor do we believe, that Congress possesses any powers not granted in the Constitution, but it cannot be conceded that no powers are granted except those expressed in terms. The powers to levy and collect taxes, to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and welfare of the United States, to borrow money, to regulate commerce, to coin money, to establish post offices and post roads, to raise and support an army and to provide and maintain a navy, involve in their execution the means for the accomplishment of the objects proposed; and those who framed the organic law of the nation, many of whom were profound jurists, recognized as axiomatic truth that whenever a general power to do a thing is given the means necessary to its execution results as an incident of the power.

The truth that the United States of America was constituted by the people a consolidated Government, sovereign and supreme within the scope of the powers specified, should ever be kept in view when estimating the measure of its capacity and power. In Cohens v. Virginia, 6 Wheat. 414, Chief Justice Marshall said: "America has chosen to be, in many respects and to many purposes, a nation; and for all these purposes her Government is complete; to all these objects it is competent. The people have declared that in the exercise of all powers given for these objects, it is supreme. It can, then, in effecting these objects, legitimately control all individuals or Governments within the American territory." In the same case this venerated Judge, who never failed, when the occasion for an opinion demanded a construction of the powers of the Government as a nation, to show how utterly fallacious and destructive of nationality was the doctrine of a narrow and illiberal construction of the Constitution, said: "A Constitution is framed for ages to come, and is designed to approach immortality as near as mortality can approach it. Its course cannot always be tranquil; it is exposed to storms and tempests, and its framers must be unwise statesmen indeed if they have not provided it, as far as its nature will permit, with the means of self-preservation from the perils it is sure to encounter." (6 Wheat. 387.) And in the course of his exhaustive argument in the same case he further said: "We think that in a Government acknowledged supreme, with respect to objects of vital interest to the nation, there is nothing inconsistent with sound reason, nothing incompatible with the nature of Government, in making all its departments supreme in so far as is necessary to their attainment." (Id. 415.) "The sword and the purse," he said in McCulloch v.

Maryland, "and all the external relations, and no inconsiderable portion of the industry of the nation, are intrusted to its Government. It can never be pretended that these vast powers draw after them others of inferior importance merely because they are inferior. Such an idea can never be advanced. But it may be, with great reason, contended that a Government intrusted with such ample powers, on the due execution of which the happiness and prosperity of the nation depend, must also be intrusted with ample means for their execution." (4 Wheat. 407.)

To declare war and to suppress insurrections and repel invasions are sovereign powers in a Government, necessary for its defense, perpetuity and the general welfare. It must be intended that those who organized the Government of the United States were well aware that the republic, which had its origin in their day, would be exposed to perils from without and also to dangers from within, and hence the power was granted to declare war as the exigencies for war might arise; as also the power to repel invasions, to suppress insurrections and to punish treason, that thereby the general welfare might be promoted, and the blessings of liberty secured for themselves and their posterity, who, through succeeding generations, should possess the land for ages to come.

The power to declare war, suppress insurrections and repel invasions is paramount among the specifically enumerated powers granted to Congress, to which all other express powers stand in auxiliary relation. Among these is the power to raise and support an army, and to provide and maintain a navy; and directly to this end every able-bodied citizen may be compelled, as exigencies require, by pains and penalties involving his liberty and life, to leave the peaceful avocations of his home to meet in arms the enemies of his country; and to the same end all material and munitions necessary to the successful prosecution of war may be appropriated if need be. Fortifications may be constructed, and ships for the navy may be built and equipped, at the cost of labor and money; and to accomplish these and like objects, all of which are auxiliary to the ultimate ends of war, money may be borrowed on the credit of the nation, to repay which the faith of the Government, together with its property and that of its citizens will stand pledged; also taxes, duties, imposts and excises may be laid and collected, by which the citizen may be drained of his last dollar. To the same end the power to regulate commerce may be exerted to the extent of enforcing embargoes and non-intercourse with nations unfriendly to the cause of the Government. Upon this topic illustrations might be multiplied, but those given seem to us ample for all who are willing to know the truth and to be conducted to the goal to which truth ever leads its votaries.

Without the power to defend against invasions and to suppress insurrections and rebellions, our Government would rise to a degree of importance no greater than a "splendid bauble." But happily for the people who organized it and their posterity, its powers were and are sufficiently comprehensive to constitute the union of the States a consolidated Government and a sovereign within the scope and measure of the powers granted, which powers not only comprehend those specified in terms, but also all incidental powers, necessary and proper for carrying into execution the powers particularized. (Story on Const. sections 430-435.)

As we view the question, it is not necessary to seek for the power to make the treasury notes issued under the Act of Congress of the 25th of February, 1862, a legal tender in the payment of debts alone among the powers to borrow money, to regulate commerce and to coin money, though we do not say it may not be deduced from some one of these; but we think it appropriately belongs to the power which Congress has over the subject as a means, ancillary to the accomplishment of the legitimate object for which they were really issued, and that the Act of Congress upon this particular point was an exercise of sovereign authority within the scope of the powers granted in the Constitution.

The general conclusion to which we have been conducted has been reached by the Court of Appeals of New York, in Meyer v. Roosevelt, and other cases, in able opinions maintaining the power of Congress under the Constitution to make United States notes lawful money in the sense herein indicated and a legal tender in the payment of debts; and though we have traced this power to its authoritative sources by a somewhat different course of reasoning from that pursued by the New York Court of Appeals, the great fundamental principles upon which that Court and this place the decision of the question are the same. We may also refer to the case of the Bank of Commerce against New York City, decided by the Supreme Court of the United States, involving the principle of the supremacy of the national authority, exempting the bonds and notes issued under the Act of Congress of February 25, 1862, from taxation by or under State authority as maintaining in some degree, at least, the doctrines which we have upon reason and authority sought to support. (2 Black's R. 620.)

This law having emanated from the sovereign authority, by which the notes issued in pursuance of its provisions are made lawful money and a legal tender in the payment of debts, is the supreme law of the land, and is with us the rule of judgment.

Therefore the judgment must be and is hereby affirmed.

FREDERICK KRAMER v. THE SAN FRANCISCO MARKET STREET RAILROAD COMPANY.

ACTION FOR CAUSING DEATH.—A civil action for damages for the death of a person, per se, cannot be maintained by any one at common law.

WHO MAY MAINTAIN ACTION FOR DEATH OF PERSON.—In this State a civil action for damages for the death of a person can be maintained only by the administrator or executor of the deceased.

APPEAL from the District Court, Twelfth Judicial District, City and County of San Francisco.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the Court.

Kramer v. Market Street Railroad Company.

W. P. C. Whiting, for Appellant, cited Green v. The Hudson River R. R. Co., 28 Barber, 9.

Whitcomb, Pringle & Felton, for Respondent.

By the Court, SANDERSON, C. J.

This action is brought to recover damages for the death of the plaintiff's son, a child of the age of five years and ten months, caused, as is alleged in the complaint, by the carelessness, negligence, and unskilful management of the defendant. The child, as appears from the complaint, was run over by a railroad car belonging to the defendant, and thereby instantly killed. The defendant demurred to the complaint. The demurrer was sustained by the Court below, and final judgment rendered thereon, from which the plaintiff appeals.

That a civil action for the death of a person, per se, cannot be maintained by any one at common law is too well settled to admit of discussion at the present time. This rule is so well and firmly established that an investigation of its reason and philosophy would be idle and useless. A citation of a few authorities is deemed sufficient. (Higgins v. Butcher, Yelverton, 89; Baker v. Bolton, 1 Camp. 493; Carey v. Berkshire R. R. Co., 1 Cush. 475; Hollenbeck v. Berkshire R. R. Co., 9 Cush. 480, 109; Safford v. Drew, 3 Duer, 637; Quin v. Moore, 15 N. Y. 436; Green v. Hudson River R. R. Co., 28 Barb. 9.)

In Baker v. Bolton, cited above, Lord Ellenborough used these words: "In a civil Court the death of a human being cannot be complained of as an injury." These words are in harmony with the legal maxim which has obtained since the earliest days of the common law—actio personalis moritur cum persona.

An action for the death of a person can only be maintained in this State by virtue of the provisions of the Act entitled "an Act requiring compensation for causing death by wrongful act, neglect, or default," passed April 26, 1862. (Statutes of 1862, p. 447.) The eleventh section of the Practice Act—which provides that the father, or, in case of his death or desertion of his family, the mother, may maintain an action for the injury or death of a child, and a guardian for the injury or death of his ward—does not create a right of action where none existed before, but merely designates the persons by whom an action, for the causes therein mentioned, which then existed or might thereafter be created by statute, should be brought. At the time the Practice Act was passed the death of a person constituted no cause of action; and the eleventh section of that Act, so far as it designates the parties by whom an action for the death of a person may be brought, is repealed by the Act of 1862, which provides that “every such action shall be brought by and in the names of the personal representatives of such deceased person.” The words “personal representatives,” as used in that Act, mean the administrator or executor of the deceased, and not the heir or next of kin, as claimed by counsel for appellant. If the words “personal representatives” leave it doubtful whether the administrator and executor or the heir and next of kin are intended, such doubt is removed by the provision immediately following, to the effect that “the amount recovered by such personal representatives shall be for the exclusive benefit of the widow and next of kin of such deceased person, and shall be distributed to such widow and next of kin, in the proportions provided by law in relation to the distribution of personal property left by persons dying intestate.”

The Act of 1862 is in derogation of the common law, and must, therefore, be strictly construed. The cause of action thereby created can be prosecuted only by the persons therein designated. The plaintiff does not sue as the administrator or executor, but as the father and sole heir of the deceased person. That as “father and sole heir” he cannot maintain this action, we have no doubt.

Judgment affirmed.

Mr. Justice SHAFTER, having been of counsel in a similar case now pending, and in the result of which he is now interested, did not participate in the decision of this appeal.

JOSHUA B. LYLE v. WILLIAM ROLLINS AND S. P. HARVEY.

ACTION TO DETERMINE ADVERSE CLAIM TO REAL PROPERTY.—An action cannot be maintained for the purpose of determining an adverse claim to or estate or interest in real property, under section two hundred and fifty-four of the Practice Act, unless the plaintiff, at the time of the commencement of the action, is in the actual possession of the property himself, or in possession by his tenant.

EVIDENCE TO SUPPORT FINDING.—Where there is a conflict of testimony on any question of fact, the Supreme Court will not ordinarily disturb the finding, but where the testimony is all one way on any one point essential to sustain the judgment, and the finding is contrary to the evidence, a new trial will be granted.

APPEAL from the District Court, Fourth Judicial District, City and County of San Francisco.

Plaintiff recovered judgment for all the land described in the complaint, and defendants appealed.

The other facts are stated in the opinion of the Court.

E. W. F. Sloan, for Appellant.

Brooks & Whitney, for Respondent.

By the Court, SAWYER, J.

This action was instituted under the two hundred and fifty-fourth section of the Practice Act. The plaintiff alleges that he is in possession of certain lands described, claiming title in fee, and that the defendants set up some claim of title adverse to the plaintiff. He asks a judgment that defendants have no title, and that they be barred from ever thereafter setting up any title or claim to the premises.

An essential condition to the maintenance of this action under section two hundred and fifty-four is, that the plaintiff must, at the time of the commencement of the action, be in possession of the real property, either by himself or his tenant. If the plaintiff was not thus in possession at the time of filing his complaint, he must fail in this action, even though he may have a perfect title in fee simple, and the right to immediate possession. (Rico v. Spence, 21 Cal. 511.) In Van Winkle v. Hinckle, 21 Cal. 342, possession by tenant was held to be insufficient when the action is brought by the landlord against the tenant in possession setting up a claim adverse to his landlord.

The action was tried without a jury, and the Court found that plaintiff was in possession at the commencement of the suit. The finding as to a portion of the premises is claimed to be entirely unsupported by the evidence.

The plaintiff put in evidence a record of a judgment for the possession of the premises in question, recovered in 1854, in the case of Sindle v. McKenna et al. Also, a writ of restitution issued in the same year on said judgment, and the Sheriff's return, by which it appeared that Sindle was put in possession. Plaintiff then deraigned title from Sindle, and introduced some further testimony tending to show possession at some time prior to the commencement of this suit, which was in September, 1862. Plaintiff then testified on his own behalf as follows: "I am in possession of a portion of the premises claimed in this action. I am in possession of the sixty-eight foot lot on Howard street, corner of Michigan avenue. I have a house on it; live there; I have a fence around it. Of the rest I have only the possession conferred by my deed." This is the only evidence of present possession on the part of the plaintiff other than the presumption, that a possession once shown continues until the contrary appears.

On the part of the defense, Shultz testified that in 1861 he helped build a fence on a part of the premises in question on the corner of Mission and Johnson streets for defendant, Rollins; that about three months afterward Rollins built a house upon that lot; that he knew the gentleman who occupied the house, by sight, but did not know whether he had a lease or not; that the fence he helped put up was not there then; that the fence was standing three weeks; but, when he passed three months after, it was gone.

The defendant, Rollins, on his own behalf, also testified to fencing the lot on the corner of Mission and Johnson streets, colored red on the diagram, in December, 1860, and then said: "The house on the corner of Mission and Johnson streets I built. I commenced it March 18, 1862. Martin Conroy occupies the house as my tenant, and pays me rent; he has so since April, 1862. He occupied it when this suit was commenced. * * * The house was ten by twenty-eight, boarded up and clapboarded over. * * * The fence of 1861 was of two boards. That was taken away. * * * Commenced building the house March 18, 1862. It was six weeks before it was finished. My tenant moved in on the 29th. That was on the fifty-five foot lot." Some further testimony was introduced by defendant tending to show that there was no fence round this corner lot prior to the fence built by defendant in 1861; some conveyances under which defendant claimed, and some further testimony on the part of plaintiff tending to show that Cottle, one of plaintiff's grantors, built a fence round Block Three in 1860, and this constitutes all the evidence on the question of possession.

There is, then, not the slightest conflict in the evidence as to who was in possession of that part of the premises in dispute on the corner of Mission and Johnson streets on the 13th of September, 1862, the date of the commencement of this suit. The plaintiff may have had possession at some prior period of time. But if so, at this time all the testimony shows, that there had been an ouster as to this particular portion. Plaintiff himself testifies, that, as to all the premises in dispute, except the sixty-eight foot lot where he lives, on Howard street, "I have only the possession conferred by my deed." While it clearly appears by uncontradicted testimony, that the defendant built a house on the lot on the corner of Mission and Johnson streets in March, 1862—that he immediately placed a tenant in it, who occupied it, paying defendant rent down to and at the time of the commencement of this suit, in September—a period of some six months. As plaintiff lived on the same block, he must be presumed to have had notice of this occupancy, and he was aware that it was under claim of title by defendant, for he alleges such claim in his complaint, and institutes this suit expressly to have this claim of title adjudicated. Clearly the defendant, by his tenant, and not the plaintiff, was in the actual possession of this portion of the premises in dispute, at the time of the commencement of the suit, and the Court erred in not excepting it, as well as the other two parcels excepted from its findings.

Where there is a conflict in the testimony on any question of fact, this Court will not ordinarily disturb the finding of the Court, or the verdict of the jury upon that point; but where, as in this case, the testimony is all one way upon any one point essential to sustain the judgment, and the Court below has by any means overlooked it, and found contrary to the evidence, we feel called upon to grant a new trial.

The plaintiff may have shown a prior possession, and title sufficient to enable him to recover possession of the land, but he does not show a possession of the part referred to at the time of the commencement of the action, and for this reason he is not entitled to the relief prayed for under section two hundred and fifty-four of the Practice Act, as to that portion, and his judgment is too broad.

The extent of the portion of the premises in the actual possession of the defendant, at the time of the commencement of the suit, is not very clearly indicated by the record. We call attention to this fact, in order that it may be fixed with precision on the next trial.

For the error indicated, the judgment must be reversed and a new trial had, and it is so ordered.

THOMAS E. KIMBALL v. CHARLES D. SEMPLE et al.

ACKNOWLEDGMENT OF DEEDS OUT OF THIS STATE.—A Master in Chancery is not one of the officers authorized by law to take the acknowledgment of deeds out of this State, and within any other State.

CERTIFICATE OF ACKNOWLEDGMENT OF DEED.—A certificate of acknowledgment to a deed must state that the maker of the deed is either known to or proven to the officer taking the acknowledgment to be the person who executed the same; and if it state that he is proven to be the person who executed the same, it must also state that it was the sworn testimony of a credible witness, giving the name of the witness.

DESCRIPTION OF LAND IN DEED.—In order to give a proper construction to a description of property conveyed by a deed, the Court will place itself, as nearly as possible, in the position of the contracting parties, and their intent will be ascertained in the same manner as in the case of any other contract, and if, when the Court has placed itself in that position, the intent of the parties is not apparent from the deed, it is to be sought by a resort to the rules of construction which give greater effect to those things about which the law presumes the parties are least liable to mistake. Arbitrary rules of construction are not to be invoked, if the intention of the parties can be plainly discovered without their aid.

WARRANTY IN DEED CONVEYING GRANTOR'S INTEREST IN LAND.—Where a deed, conveying to the grantee whatever interest the grantor then has in the land mentioned in the deed, contains a covenant that the grantor will "warrant and defend the premises conveyed from and against all or any incumbrances, claims, or demands, created, made, or suffered by, through, or under him, and against none other," the warranty in the deed attaches itself to the interest conveyed, and not to the land itself, and does not estop the grantor from setting up an after acquired title, nor does it cause an after acquired interest of the grantor to feed the estoppel, and inure to the benefit of the grantee.

CONSTRUCTION OF DEED BOUNDING LAND ON A RIVER.—L. executed to W. a deed, conveying all his estate, right, title, etc., in and to an undivided half of nine Spanish leagues of land on the Sacramento River, described as "commencing at a point on the said river two Spanish leagues in length along the said river below a point on the same made by the intersection with the river of the lower or southerly boundary line of a tract of land on said river, known as the Rancho of Larkin's children; thence running southerly, (its eastern boundary for the whole length being the said river) nine Spanish leagues, more or less," to the southern boundary of the Jimeno grant, and back from the river one league more or less, the whole length of the tract conveyed. The grantor further recited in his deed that he meant and intended to convey all his rights, etc., in and to the Jimeno grant, "with the exception of a tract of two Spanish leagues in length, along and with said river, on the upper or northerly part of said Jimeno grant." Held, that the surrounding circumstances showed that the parties did not contemplate an accurate measurement of the land, and that the place of beginning to survey the nine leagues conveyed is to be ascertained by measuring two leagues in length from the southern boundary of Larkin's children's rancho in a straight line, without following the meanderings of the river, to such point on the river as the straight line two leagues in length would strike it, and that the land conveyed extended down the river nine leagues more or less from the point of beginning, following the meanderings of the river to the southern boundary of the Jimeno grant.

DEED OF EXECUTORS AS EVIDENCE.—An Act of the Legislature which empowers the executors of a deceased person to sell and convey lands of the deceased is not sufficient to lay the foundation for introducing in evidence a deed executed by the executors without proof of the death, and that deceased made a will appointing executors who had entered upon the discharge of their duties.

PATENT.—A patent of a confirmed Mexican grant of land issued by the United States cannot be called in question in an action brought by those claiming under it to recover possession of the land, by evidence showing that the Mexican Government had granted to the grantee more than eleven leagues of land, previous to the grant on which the patent was issued.

APPEAL from the District Court, Fifteenth Judicial District, Colusa County.

The defendants recovered judgment in the Court below, and plaintiff appealed.

The other facts are stated in the opinion of the Court.

A. C. Whitcomb, for Appellant.

Upon the general question of how measurements are to be made when the descriptions in deeds are very indefinite, or are silent upon the point, the reports contain but few cases that have not arisen in Kentucky or upon the Ohio River.

And the following appear to be rather the leading cases: Pannell's Heirs v. Johnson, 2 Wheaton, 206; Littlepage v. Fowler, 11 Id. 215; Whitaker v. Hall, 1 Bibb, 79; Hite v. Graham, 2 Bibb, 143.

And by them the following general principles appear to be established:

1. That when distance is indicated by a road, it is computed by the meanders of the road.
2. That distances on navigable streams—like the Ohio River—are computed by the meanders.
3. That in fixing, in a description, the point of commencement from another known point, the measurement is made invariably by the meanders, whether it is by road or by navigable stream.

We claim, therefore, in reference to the deed from Larkin to Whitcomb:

1. That the language of the description is unmistakable; that the expression, "two Spanish leagues in length along and with the said river," does not mean, and cannot be interpreted to mean, a tract of land two Spanish leagues in quantity, or even two Spanish leagues in a straight line.

As a deed of Larkin to Whitcomb contains a full covenant of warranty as to the acts of the grantor, we claim for the benefit of the grantee therein the full benefit of a general covenant of warranty as to any act or conveyance of the grantor. That covenant so contained has all the force and vigor of a general covenant of warranty; but is limited in its operation to the acts of one person, to wit: the grantor. So far as any act of his is concerned, it is in all respects equivalent to the general covenant; for the whole theory of a subsequent title inuring to the benefit of the grantee in a former deed containing a covenant of warranty, is based upon the anxiety of the law "to avoid circuitry of action and to enforce complete justice without delay and further litigation." (Clarke v. Baker, 14 Cal. 630.)

The breach of covenant of warranty in this case was made (if made at all) by the sole act of Larkin, acting for himself, and as the attorney in fact of Missroon, in the deed of September 23d, 1851, to Hastings and Seawell. If any interest was conveyed by that deed in conflict with the interest conveyed in the deed to Whitcomb, it was of course a breach of the covenant in the latter deed. Then, if Larkin re-acquired (by the deed to him of March 26th, 1856) that former interest, it inured to the benefit of Whitcomb and his successors in interest, because the law will not encourage a multiplicity of suits by forcing Whitcomb or his grantees to sue Larkin upon that covenant, after the latter had re-acquired and could convey the very interest which was the foundation of the breach of covenant.

The only question presented by the Colus title as against the Jimeno patent, is that which arises from the attempt made by the defendants to show that prior to November 4th, 1844, the Mexican Government had granted to Manuel Jimeno twelve square leagues of land.

Even if this were true as a matter of fact, there are two good and sufficient reasons why it cannot avail the defendants:

1. The defendants are not the third persons who can raise the question, as they are still confessedly seeking a final confirmation of a survey making their general gift a specific one as of the date of January 31st, 1861.
2. Even if they were in a position to raise the question, it could not avail them, as the grant to Jimeno would not be void, but only voidable at the instance of the granting power.

Upon the cession of California to the United States, this granting or controlling power became vested in the Government of the United States. (Teschmacher v. Thompson, 18 Cal. 24, 25.) The latter Government provided for the exercise of this power, as well as all others in reference to claims for land in California prior to the treaty, by the passage of the Act of Congress of March 3, 1851, creating a Board of Land Commissioners, with the rights of appeal from its decisions, first to the District Court of the United States, and finally from its decree to the Supreme Court of the United States.

This controlling power, then, was exercised in the matter of the Jimeno grant:

1. By the approval and confirmation thereof by the said Board of Commissioners.
2. By the approval and confirmation thereof, on appeal, by the United States District Court.
3. By the approval and confirmation thereof, on appeal, by the Supreme Court of the United States.
4. By the approval and confirmation of the survey thereof by the consent decree of the said United States District Court of April 6, 1861.
5. By the issuance by the Government of the United States of the patent dated July 18, 1862, for the said rancho under the hand of the President and the seal of the General Land Office.

Semple and Goodwin, for Respondents.

The Jimeno grant and patent is void because it was issued against law, the thing granted being prohibited by statute, and the officer granting having exhausted his power, and therefore having no power—having granted twelve leagues of land in the Californias prior to the grant under consideration. (See Colonization Laws of 1824 and 1828; United States v. Hartnell's Executors, 22 Howard; 1 Black, 132.) That a void patent may be attacked collaterally, see 2 How. 284 and 318; 13

Peters, 434; U. S. Condensed Reports, Vol. 3, p. 324; 1 Wheat. 112; Patterson v. Winn, 11 Wheat. 380; 10 John. 25; Doll v. Meador, 16 Cal. 330, 331, and 324, 325; Attorney-General Toucey's opinion and authorities, Lester's Land Laws of the United States, p. 661.

The power of attorney from Missroon to Larkin, dated in 1850, is sufficiently acknowledged. (See Cowan's notes to Phillips on Evidence, Vol. 2, pp. 585, 586; Statutes of California, 1860, p. 357.) The two deeds of 1851, and those of 1856, between Larkin, Seawell, and Hastings, must be construed as one instrument. (See Stow v. Tift, 15 Johnson, 458; 7 Mass. 496; 4 Mass. 266; 1 Johnson's, page 91; 3 Wend. 233; 9 Cowen, 274.) Even if these were a clause of warranty, title would not inure to Whitcomb. (Stow v. Tift, supra.)

A deed ought to be construed with a view to the thing sold. Larkin sold one half of nine square leagues of land. (See 18 John. 110.) The intention of the parties, which may be shown by parol, and dehors the deed must control. (See 1 Metcalf, 378; 3 Mass. 352; 10 Cal. 106; 1 John. 399; 3 John. 388.)

The computation of the distance to the beginning ought to be by a straight line—particularly as a tract of land was reserved, two leagues, etc. (See general rule in index, under head seven, title "Entry," 1 Bibb's Ky. Rep. and authorities there cited, some of which are: 1 Bibb, 55; Id. 123; 2 Bibb, 254; Id. 370, 371, 359-361; Id. 478; Id. 251; 3 Monroe, 185; 2 A. K. Marshall, 594.)

The deed ought to be construed according to the understanding of the parties at the date of the deed. (See 18 Wend. 451; 2 A. K. Marshall, 184; 3 A. K. Marshall, 574; 2 Ohio, 11; 1 Cranch, 45; 13 Peters, 81; Id. 133; 15 Peters, 173; 16 Peters, 162.)

By the Court, RHODES, J.

This action was brought to recover a tract of land which, it is claimed, formed a part of the Jimeno Rancho. The defendants claim that the premises in controversy are included within the Colus Rancho, and the defendant Semple also claims under the Jimeno title. The consideration of the case will first require the solution of a number of questions arising upon the construction of certain deeds of conveyance.

The Jimeno Rancho was granted to Manuel Jimeno in 1844, and consisted of eleven Spanish leagues of land, (the diseño containing a much larger tract,) and is bounded on the east by the Sacramento River. The Colus Rancho was granted to John Bidwell in 1845, and is a grant of two Spanish leagues within a larger area, the whole tract being bounded by the Sacramento River on the east, and the larger portion of it being included within the Jimeno Rancho. Larkin and Missroon purchased from Jimeno.

The defendants offered in evidence a power of attorney executed by Missroon to Larkin, authorizing him to sell lands, etc., which was acknowledged before a Master in Chancery, in the State of New Jersey, who certified, among other things, that he was "satisfied" that Missroon and wife were the grantors named in the deed, but not that they were known or proved to him to be such. No proof was offered of the execution of the power, except what was afforded by the certificate of acknowledgment.

The plaintiff objected to its introduction as evidence, on the ground that it was neither proven nor properly acknowledged. A Master in Chancery is not one of the officers authorized by law to take the acknowledgment of deeds, out of this State, and within any other State; and the certificate, by whomsoever made, must state that the maker of the instrument was known to him, or proven to him to be the person who executed the instrument. If he is "satisfied," he must state how, whether by personal knowledge, or by the sworn testimony of a credible witness, whose name is inserted in the certificate. The power of attorney should not have been admitted without proof of its execution.

On the 23d of September, 1851, Larkin and Missroon, by Larkin (who professed to act by virtue of the power of attorney just mentioned,) executed to Seawell and Hastings a deed of conveyance, purporting to quitclaim to them the undivided two thirds of two Spanish leagues of land, "formerly known as the Colus tract," including the Town of Colusa, being a part of the eleven Spanish leagues "granted to Jimeno." "Said two leagues of land is supposed to have been granted by Don Pio Pico, formerly Governor of Alta California, to John Bidwell." And at the same time, Seawell and Hastings quitclaimed to Larkin and Missroon the undivided third of the same land. The evident intent of the parties was to make Seawell, Hastings, Larkin and Missroon tenants in common of the two leagues, so that Seawell and Hastings should hold each one third, and Larkin and Missroon the remaining third. The deed of Larkin and Missroon was inoperative as to Missroon's interest, in the absence of proof of power in Larkin to convey; but it will be unnecessary to inquire what interest—whether the one third or one half—passed by the deed of Larkin to Seawell and Hastings; for in March, 1856, Seawell and Hastings re-conveyed to Larkin all the right, title and interest they acquired by the deed of the 23d of September, 1851, except in certain town lots in the Town of Colusa, before that time sold and conveyed by Seawell and Hastings. On the 2d of February, 1853, Missroon executed a deed which was recorded November 24, 1853, by which he conveyed to Larkin all Missroon's "right, title and interest in the upper or northern two leagues of a rancho or grant of eleven leagues of land granted to Manuel Jimeno * * *, which two leagues join the rancho or grant of land on said Sacramento River called rancho of Larkin's children." The description of the premises in the deed last mentioned, does not include any of the Colus tract, when surveyed so as to include the Town of Colusa, except a strip of land of the width of five eighths of a mile, and extending from the Sacramento River to the west, about one league in length. In March, 1856, at the same time that Seawell and Hastings executed their deed to Larkin, he executed to them a deed of the undivided two thirds of the northern or upper two leagues of the Jimeno Rancho—one of the objects of the parties to the conveyances being to correct a misunderstanding between them as to the true location of the lands described in their deeds of 1851.

On the 22d of April, 1852, Missroon conveyed to Coghill all his right, title, and interest in the one undivided half of nine Spanish leagues of land, "commencing two Spanish leagues below or southerly from the tract of land on said river known as the rancho of Larkin's children; thence running with said river southerly nine Spanish leagues, and one Spanish league back or westwardly from said river, being part of a tract on said river known as the Jimeno grant," excepting therefrom one thousand two hundred acres conveyed to Belden; and on the 23d of July, 1852, Larkin conveyed to Whitcomb all his estate, right, title, etc., in and to an undivided half of nine Spanish leagues of land, "commencing at a point on the said river, two Spanish leagues in length along the said river, below a point on the same made by the intersection with the river of the lower or southerly boundary line of a tract of land on said river known as the rancho of Larkin's children; thence running southerly (its eastern boundary for the whole length being the said river) nine Spanish leagues, more or less," to the southern boundary of the Jimeno grant, and back from the river one league, more or less, the whole length of the tract conveyed. The one thousand two hundred acres conveyed to Belden was excepted. The grantor recites in his deed that he means and intends to convey all his right, etc., in and to the Jimeno grant, "with the exception of a tract of two Spanish leagues in length along and with said river on the upper or northerly part of said Jimeno grant," and with the exception of the Belden tract. The title that passed by the last two deeds to Coghill and Whitcomb subsequently vested in the plaintiff.

In July, 1856, Seawell and Todd conveyed to defendant Semple, all their interest, "supposed to be two fifths of two thirds, in and to two leagues of land known as the Colus tract;" also whatever interest they had in the Jimeno tract. It does not appear that Todd had any interest, and the deed simply passed Seawell's undivided third in the upper two leagues conveyed to him by Larkin. In 1861, Hastings and Lincoln conveyed to Semple a tract, described by metes and bounds, including a portion of the Jimeno and Colus Ranchos, as surveyed, and in the same month Hastings conveyed to Semple all his interest in the Colus Rancho. The record does not show that Lincoln had any interest other than that derived from the deed of Larkin's executors to him. That deed will be hereafter considered, but it will be sufficient now to say that the deed, as offered in evidence, did not pass Larkin's title.

The parties present the question, whether the place of beginning in the deed from Larkin to Whitcomb, is to be ascertained by measuring two leagues in length from the southern boundary of Larkin's children's rancho, in a straight line, or following the meanderings of the river. If measured in a straight line, the excepted portion will be five eighths of a mile longer than if measured by the meandering line. The plaintiff insists upon the meandering line, and the defendants upon the straight line. It is the duty of the Court to give the deed the same construction that the parties gave it, at the time of its execution. The Court will place itself, as nearly as possible, in the position of the contracting parties, and their intent will be ascertained in the same manner as in the case of any other contract. If, when the Court has placed itself in that position, the intent of the parties is not apparent from the deed, it is to be sought by a resort to the rules of construction which give greater effect to those things about which the law presumes the parties are the least liable to mistake. But arbitrary rules of construction are not to be invoked, if the intention of the parties can be plainly discovered without their aid. At the date of the deed to Whitcomb, the southern line of the rancho of Larkin's children does not appear to have been established, nor was the northern line of the Jimeno Rancho; but the parties in this case assume in argument that the two lines coincided. Neither the Jimeno nor the Colus Rancho had then been surveyed. The Jimeno Rancho seems to have been considered by the parties as a grant of eleven leagues of land in length, with the average width of one league, bounded by the Sacramento River. The parties did not indicate an accurate measurement of the lines or of the land in any respect, but they simply provided for the conveyance of the undivided half of the lower nine leagues, or of all the rancho except the northern two leagues in length. From the point of beginning, the eastern line extended down and followed the river nine leagues, more or less, to the southern boundary and the tract extended to the west one league, more or less. The river is the only locative call in the conveyance, but the southern boundary, according to the testimony of Green, the surveyor, was a well known slough, called Sycamore Slough, designated on the diseño and on the plat attached to the patent of the Jimeno Rancho.

We can see nothing in the deed requiring a strict rule to be applied to the survey of the two leagues that does not as imperatively require the same rule in the survey of the nine leagues. The parties evidently did not contemplate a strict measurement, for after describing the premises conveyed they returned, as if for the purpose of a better description of the land to be conveyed, and say that the premises include all the Jimeno Rancho except a tract of two leagues in length along and with the river, on the upper part of the rancho. The excepted tract could not be two leagues in length, if the meanders of the river were required to be measured to find the length of the tract. Nor, on the other hand, would the tract conveyed, include the half of all the rancho besides the excepted portion, if surveyed as the plaintiff requires the upper two leagues to be measured; for the rancho exceeds eleven leagues in length. The situation of the land, the fact that it had not been surveyed, the absence of abutments except on one side, the uncertain location of an adjoining rancho, the low price of the land, the loose description of the land conveyed and the land excepted, and all the surrounding circumstances, seem to indicate that the parties did not contemplate an accurate measurement of the lines, or a measurement by the meanders of the river. The rule contended for by the plaintiff has been more frequently enforced in Kentucky, than any other State, and there were peculiar reasons for its application in that State, that do not exist in this, and its application was mostly in cases where persons had made locations of warrants in their own behalf, and had estimated distances by the usual routes of travel. In Littlepage v. Fowler, 11 Wheat. 215, the Supreme Court of the United States, while willing to give effect in Kentucky to the authorities of that State, said, in a case where one party contended for the measurement by the meanders of the river and the other for a straight line: "We have examined these cases (the Kentucky cases), and are satisfied that neither party is supported in his doctrine as a universal principle, but that the Courts of Kentucky, with that good sense which uniformly distinguishes their efforts to extricate themselves from the chaos of rights in which political relations and inveterate practice had involved them, have left each case to be governed by its own merits, whenever distance has been resorted to as the means of identifying a locative call; and certainly the sense in which the enterer uses the reference to distance is the only general rule that can govern a Court in construing an entry. That sense may be gathered from the language, or inferred from the habits of men and the state of the country; but as he is responsible for the sufficiency of his entry, it would be unfair to impose an arbitrary and unusual meaning upon the language of unlettered men exploring a country covered with thickets and replete with dangers."

It is apparent that the deed, when viewed by the light of surrounding circumstances, was intended as a conveyance of the undivided half of all the rancho except the upper or northern portion thereof, which was two leagues in length; and this construction leaves the strip of land five eighths of a mile in width, to the north of the plaintiff's northern line.

A further point is raised in respect to the deed of Larkin to Whitcomb, the defendants contending that at its date Larkin did not hold any title in the Jimeno Rancho south of the upper two leagues, and within the Colus Rancho; that Larkin, by his deed of 1861 to Seawell and Hastings, conveyed to them his interest in the Colus Rancho; and the plaintiff asserting that the title acquired by Larkin, through the deed of Seawell and Hastings to him in 1856, vested in Whitcomb, by virtue of the warranty in Larkin's deed to Whitcomb. Larkin, by his deed, covenants with Whitcomb that he will warrant and defend the premises conveyed from and against all or any incumbrances, claims or demands created, made or suffered by, through or under him, and against none other.

At that time, he had parted with his interest in that portion of the land, which was included within the Colus Rancho. The deed to Whitcomb was simply a conveyance of whatever interest Larkin then held in the land mentioned in the deed, but it did not purport to convey the land, nor any certain interest therein, nor any interest he might thereafter acquire. The warranty in the deed attached itself to the interest conveyed, and not to the land itself, the grantor warranting the title conveyed by him against any incumbrance, claim or demand made or suffered under or through him.

The deed itself would not estop Larkin from setting up an after acquired title, nor will a warranty of the character of the one before us, when annexed to a conveyance merely of the grantor's present interest, cause the after acquired interest of the grantor to "feed the estoppel," and inure to the benefit of his grantee. In Gee v. Moore, 14 Cal. 472, a deed of the character of the one before us, and containing a covenant similar to the one in this case, was considered, and the Court held that the warranty was confined to the estate conveyed; and Mr. Chief Justice Field, in speaking of the deed, said: "It purports to pass all the right, title and estate which the grantor possessed in the land, but does not operate upon interests subsequently acquired." (Blanchard v. Brooks, 12 Pick. 47; Comstock v. Smith, 13 Pick. 116; Miller v. Ewing, 6 Cush. 34; Duchess of Kingston's Case, 2 Smith's Leading Cases, and Notes.)

It results from the construction we have given to the several conveyances, that the title to no part of the northern two leagues of the Jimeno Rancho passed to plaintiff through those conveyances; that the deeds to Semple conveyed to him no interest in the southern nine leagues of the rancho; and that the interest in that portion of the rancho lying south of the northern two leagues, which was conveyed by Seawell and Hastings to Larkin—and we do not undertake to ascertain what that interest was—remained in Larkin, so far as the record shows, at the commencement of this action.

The matters of greatest importance involved in this case, and which, perhaps, more than any other, it was desired by the parties should be decided on this appeal, are the questions arising out of the conflict between the boundaries of the two ranchos. Since the trial of this cause in the Court below, it is understood that the Supreme Court of the United States, in the case of The United States v. Sepulveda, and in other cases, have more fully and accurately defined the jurisdiction of the District Courts of the United States respecting the surveys of private land claims in this State; and if they have not modified their previous opinions, they have prescribed narrower limits to the power of the District Courts, under the Act of Congress of the 14th of June, 1860, than the bar of the State seem to have understood were fixed by that Act. This case was not presented in view of the law as declared by the more recent decisions of that Court. But be that as it may, the record is not in such form that we can properly pass upon the questions of conflict of boundaries, and settle the rights of the parties depending upon the priority of the segregation of the respective ranchos from the public lands. The plaintiff presented an approved survey and a patent of the Jimeno Rancho, and on the plat the lines of a tract of land, marked "Colus Rancho," are delineated. The defendants introduced a plat and the field notes of a survey of the Colus Rancho, approved by the United States Surveyor-General and the Judge of the District Court. Three other surveys of the Colus Rancho were offered by the plaintiff, without any explanation as to the action taken upon them by the Surveyor-General or the United States District Court. In such a condition of the evidence in respect to the survey of the Colus Rancho, it is impossible to pass upon these questions satisfactorily to ourselves, and as it will be necessary to order a new trial on other grounds, we think it unnecessary to pass upon those questions at this time, but will leave the parties to present their evidence in the Court below, unrestricted by our opinion rendered upon a very unsatisfactory and meagre statement of facts.

We will proceed to notice further some of the errors assigned by the plaintiff. The deed from Frederick H. Larkin and Rachel Larkin to Jerome Lincoln was improperly admitted as evidence. There was no proof that Larkin made a will as mentioned in the deed, nor that he was dead, except that afforded by the Act of the Legislature, which denominates him "Thomas O. Larkin, deceased," and we doubt the power of the Legislature to determine judicially that Larkin was dead, or that he made a will; or if dead, who were his executors, or any other fact that must be ascertained by the proper Court, in order that proceedings to sell the real estate of any alleged decedent may have any validity.

The Court erred in admitting in evidence that portion of the "Spanish documents" consisting of the grant of the Sal Si Puedes, and other ranchos, which were offered for the purpose of proving that the Mexican Government had granted to Jimeno more than eleven leagues, previous to the grant of the Jimeno Rancho. These matters might perhaps have been properly addressed to the Federal authorities, in the proceedings to confirm the Jimeno Rancho title, but the legality or effect of a patent issued by the United States cannot, in this manner, be called in question. And for the same reason the several conveyances by Jimeno, of those ranchos to Crockett, Davidson and others were inadmissible.

The questions arising upon the admission of certain other deeds offered by the defendants, have been disposed of in considering the effect of the deeds already referred to.

The plaintiff also assigns for error the admission, as evidence, of the confirmation, survey and decree of confirmation thereof of the Colus Rancho, and of oral testimony respecting the quantity of land within the exterior lines of the Jimeno

Rancho; also, the exclusion of evidence offered by him in relation to the different locations claimed by defendant Semple of the Colus Rancho; but it is unnecessary to pass upon those points until the main questions, arising out of the conflict of the boundaries of the two ranchos are presented as above indicated.

Judgment reversed and cause remanded for a new trial.

Mr. Chief Justice SANDERSON expressed no opinion.

By the Court, RHODES, J., on petition for rehearing.

A rehearing was granted upon the petitions of both parties, and with the expectation, on our part, that on a re-argument of this complicated case, much additional light would be shed upon several points that, in the present state of the record, are quite obscure, but the cause has been resubmitted upon the former briefs and the petitions for rehearing. We shall, therefore, not pass upon any of those questions which, in our former opinion, we decline to consider, for reasons there stated; but will notice some of the points made in the petitions for rehearing.

The learned counsel for the appellant requests the Court "to fix with certainty the starting point in the deeds to Coghill and Whitcomb." To do so would be to find a fact, and that is the province of the jury, not of the Court. We have attempted to give a construction to the deeds that will serve as a means—a rule—to the jury, by which, coupled with the evidence, they may find the beginning point of the land described in the Coghill and Whitcomb deeds. We frequently state a portion of the facts in a case, not as finding them from the evidence, but to give application and point to our reasoning. If we mistake the facts or the evidence, it cannot by any possibility benefit or injure either party in a new trial of the action, for in that forum the parties must again produce their evidence and have the facts found, in the same manner as required at the first trial. If we had been of the opinion from the evidence that the beginning corner was at a certain tree or stake on the river, and had so stated, and if on a new trial it should appear that another tree or stake was the point of beginning, our opinion would not overrule the effect of such evidence. The counsel affords in his petition, a better illustration than the case we just supposed. He claims that we are mistaken in saying that the southeast corner of the rancho of Larkin's children was uncertain or undetermined. We saw no evidence in the record showing that the rancho had been surveyed, or that the corners had been established, and in the absence of such evidence we considered that at the date of the deed to Whitcomb the rancho had no defined corners; but if on a new trial it shall appear that a survey had been made or that a line or corner had been established, the jury or the Court below will so find, without regard to what our opinion — not finding — of the fact may have been.

In regard to fixing the starting point, we have done only that which we are authorized by the power and jurisdiction of the Court to do; that is to say, to construe the deeds and to declare the law arising upon our construction of them, and our decision thus given will govern the Court below and the jury, in ascertaining the bounds of the premises described in the deeds.

We adhere to the construction of the deeds we have given, holding that the two leagues in length should be measured in a straight line from the point where the southern line of the rancho of Larkin's children intersects the Sacramento River. The position of the southern line of the rancho of Larkin's children, like any other fact in the case, must be proven on the new trial, by competent evidence. Our opinion that it was or was not proven at the first trial, will not dispense with proper proof at the new trial. We must have been strangely unfortunate, in the selection and use of language to express our opinion, in construing the deed of Larkin to Whitcomb, if the learned counsel is justified in saying that "it appears from the opinion that it was decided rather from the presumed or supposed intention of the parties to the deed, rather than from the language itself of the deed," etc. We attempted to read and interpret the words of the deed "in the light of the surrounding circumstances." We ascertain the intention by an examination of the words of the deed, not by a resort to presumption or supposition; and we question the surrounding circumstances to learn the meaning of the terms employed by the parties—to enable us to occupy, as nearly as may be, the position of the parties when executing the instrument.

It will be a sufficient answer to the statement of counsel, made in connection with his remark just cited—that he drew the deed and used the language therein contained, to express the intention he now contends for—to say that he cites no authority, that permits the parties to a deed, to take the witness stand, and explain the meaning of the instrument they have executed.

If the language employed in describing the distance was the same as that used in the description of that portion of the land left out of, and excepted from the conveyance, there would be far more force in the appellant's views of the proper construction. In describing the distance of the point of beginning, from the rancho of Larkin's children, the words are: "Two Spanish leagues in length along the said river;" and in respect to the excepted land the language is: "A tract of land two Spanish leagues in length along and with the said river." A road may be said to run along a river that passes from point to point on the river, without following its meanders; but the boundary of a tract of land extending along and with a river, would coincide with the meanders of the river. Parties intending to describe a course or distance, coinciding with the bank or thread of a river, could very readily, and naturally would use language like that employed by Mr. Green, the surveyor, in giving his testimony—"the meanders of the river"—or words of similar import.

Counsel insist that the tract conveyed was not nine leagues in quantity, and the excepted portion two leagues in quantity—that is, leagues in area of land. We interpret the deeds in this respect as does the counsel for the appellant. The terms

"the upper two leagues" and the "lower nine leagues" were used in the opinion as convenient terms of designation, to avoid a long paraphrase. Our construction of the deeds, gives two leagues as the length of the upper portion of the rancho, not included in the conveyances to Coghill and Whitcomb, without regard to its width; and speaking of the lower nine leagues conveyed to them, we said: "From the point of beginning, the eastern line extended down and followed the river nine leagues, more or less, to the southern boundary, and the tract extended to the west one league, more or less." This sufficiently indicates the sense in which were employed the terms "upper two leagues" and "lower nine leagues," as designating respectively the northern and southern portions of the rancho, as separated by the line drawn westerly from the point of beginning, mentioned in the deeds to Coghill and Whitcomb, without regard to the quantity of land in either tract.

Our attention is again called by the appellant to the deed of the 23d of September, 1851, executed to Seawell and Hastings by Larkin and Missroon — Larkin, professing to act for Missroon under the power of attorney, the execution of which was not proven. The appellant objected to the deed as void for uncertainty, and now holds that if not void, it left in Larkin and Missroon one undivided third of the tract, out of which they professed to convey the undivided two thirds. We were inclined to the opinion that if Larkin had not, in fact, power to execute the conveyance for Missroon, the conveyance purporting to be for the undivided two thirds of the premises, was sufficient to convey the undivided half then held by Larkin, but we did not think the case required an examination and decision of that point, it appearing that whatever interest passed by that conveyance was conveyed to Larkin by Seawell and Hastings in eighteen hundred and fifty-six, subsequent to Larkin's deed of his interest to Whitcomb. Counsel have failed to point out an important discrepancy between the description of the premises in the two deeds. In our previous examination of the record, we had the impression that the description of the premises conveyed by Larkin and Missroon to Hastings and Seawell, by the deed of September 23, 1851, was identical with that in the deed of Hastings and Seawell to Larkin and Missroon of the same date (except that one was of the undivided two thirds, and the other of the undivided one third of the tract of land), and was also identical with that contained in the deed of March 26, 1856, from Hastings and Seawell to Larkin, which purported to reconvey the lands so described in the deed of September 23, 1851, from Larkin and Missroon to Hastings and Seawell, and which professed to recite the precise description in the deed of September 23, 1851; but upon a further examination of the transcript, it is found that the descriptions materially differ. In the deed of September, 23, 1851, by Larkin and Missroon, a portion of the description is as follows: "Two Spanish leagues (or dos sitios de ganado mayor) of land, on the west bank of the Sacramento River, part of the land formerly known as the Colusa tract, including the Town of Colusa," etc.; while in the two other deeds the description is: "Two Spanish leagues (dos sitios de ganado mayor) of land, on the west bank of the Sacramento River, part of the land formerly known as the Jimeno grant, now known as the Colusa tract, including the Town of Colusa," etc. Doubtless one of the latter two deeds was before us when considering the appellant's point that the first deed was void for uncertainty. If the deed is correctly copied into the transcript, there would appear to be more force in the appellant's objection, than we formerly gave it. We would be justified in supposing that there was a mistake in one of the copies, and as we might do one of the parties an injury by passing upon a deed incorrectly copied into the record, we decline to pass on any question arising upon either of the three deeds.

The learned counsel for the respondents earnestly urges us to affirm the judgment, for the reason that the evidence shows, as he says, that the defendants' possessions were not included within the lands described in the appellant's deeds. We have remarked that we do not agree with him in holding that those deeds convey nine Spanish leagues in quantity. It is the duty of the jury—not of the Court—to locate the deeds upon the land, and if the respondents were satisfied that the evidence showed that the deeds, when a proper location of them was made, would not include the land in controversy, they could well have rested their case at that point; but it is their misfortune that they have introduced illegal evidence of such a description that it is impossible for us to determine, whether the jury found for them on the legal or illegal evidence.

If the proof by the witnesses was, as the respondents assert, that they were all, except Roberts, above what they call the dividing line between the upper two and lower nine leagues, it might not necessarily follow that they were entitled to a verdict, for they admit that they were in possession of the “premises in controversy,” which, according to the pleadings, are the premises described in the complaint, and which we understand to extend south of the said dividing line. .

No appeal was taken from the judgment against defendant Amos Roberts, and that judgment is not before us for review.

The judgment entered May 14, 1863, is reversed and the cause remanded.

SAMUEL G. BOYCE v. THE CALIFORNIA STAGE COMPANY.

DAMAGES FOR PERSONAL INJURIES.—In an action against a stage company to recover damages for personal injuries occasioned by the overturn of the coach, it is only necessary for the plaintiff to prove the overturn and the injuries he sustained. The presumption of law is, that the overturn occurred through the negligence of the defendant, and the burden of proving that there has been no negligence is cast on the defendant. In order to rebut the presumption of negligence, the defendant must show that the overturn was the result of inevitable casualty, or of some cause which human care and foresight could not prevent.

INSTRUCTIONS TO A JURY.—Counsel may propose instructions to the Court, but the Court is not compelled to give or refuse them as asked. If in the opinion of the Judge the proposed instructions are defective in form of expression, or erroneous in law, he may modify them in either particular and give them to the jury in their modified form, or he may refuse them altogether.

VARIANCE BETWEEN ALLEGATIONS AND PROOF.—If in the progress of a trial evidence is offered by the plaintiff at variance with the allegations of the complaint, and the counsel for the defense does not object to it at the time.

nor move to strike it out upon the ground of variance, the error is waived, and the Court may instruct the jury in relation to the whole field of inquiry covered by the evidence.

ERROR.—A judgment will not be reversed because an error has intervened in the course of a trial, which does not prejudice the defendant's case.

CHANCE VERDICT.—A verdict which is arrived at by each one of the jurymen marking such sum as he thinks proper, and then adding the several sums together and dividing the total by twelve, and making the quotient the verdict, is not a chance verdict within the meaning of the second subdivision of section one hundred and ninety-three of the Practice Act.

IMPEACHMENT OF VERDICT OF A JURY.—The verdict of a jury cannot be impeached by the affidavits of the jurors, except when the verdict is arrived at by a resort to the determination of chance.

RULE OF DAMAGES.—In all cases where there is no rule of law regulating the assessment of damages, and the amount does not depend on computation, the judgment of the jury, and not the opinion of the Court, is to govern, unless the damages are so excessive as to warrant the belief that the jury must have been influenced by partiality or prejudice.

APPEAL from the District Court, Tenth Judicial District, Yuba County.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the Court.

Charles E. Filkins, for Appellant.

The Court erred in overruling the motion of defendant for a new trial on the ground of misconduct on the part of the jury, in deciding the case by a resort to gambling. (See Statutes of 1862, p. 38; Wilson et al. v. Berryman et al., 5 Cal. 44; Harney v. Rickett, 15 Johnson, 87; Roberts et al. v. Fallis, 1 Cowen, 238; Donner v. Palmer et al., 23 Cal.)

W. C. Belcher and C. E. De Long, for Respondent.

Appellant claims that the Court must give or refuse instructions as they are asked.

It is true that the late Supreme Court seem to have held in Conrad v. Lindley, 2 Cal. 173; Russell v. Amador, 3 Cal. 400; and Jamson v. Quivey, 5 Cal. 490, that instructions must be given substantially as asked for; that the Court might modify the phraseology so as to make it more intelligible to the jury, but could not alter the sense. It is noticeable, however, that there was nothing in either of these cases to call for any such decision or rule; that in each of those cases, the instructions, as asked, clearly and correctly expressed the law of the case, and as modified and given, did not.

Such a rule was at one time adopted in Alabama, but was discarded, after mature consideration, in Long v. Rogers, 19 Ala. 321, and if it can be said to exist here since the decision in Lawrence v. Fulton, 19 Cal. 690, California is the only State, so far as we have been able to discover from a pretty careful examination of the reports, in which such a rule obtains.

In Vaughan v. Porter, 16 Vt. 268, Mr. Justice Redfield says: "In regard to all written requests, the Court are never bound to regard them in their charge, unless they are couched in such terms as to be sound to the full extent. The fact that some sound law might be extracted from the requests, or that, in general terms, they may be sound law, with certain qualifications, is not enough. They must be wholly sound law, and without any necessary qualification, or it is not error for the Court to refuse to charge as requested. * * * These written requests are more in the nature of briefs than anything else. * * * But the truth is, these written arguments, in the way of requests, are of but little use. The Court are bound to charge upon every point material to the case upon which there is evidence, and to charge correctly and fully, whether requested or not." And in Campbell v. Day, 16 Vt. 560, the same Court say: "It is incumbent on the Court to charge the law correctly, and they may adopt their own language."

In Lowry v. Beckner, 5 B. Monroe, 42, the Court of Appeals of Kentucky say: "The Court had the unquestionable right to refuse all the instructions asked on both sides, and give such prepared by himself as might be illustrative of the principles of law involved in the controversy, in any aspect of the proof."

In Theobald v. Hare, in the same Court, (8 B. Monroe, 42,) the question of a material modification was directly before the Court, and it was decided that it is proper to modify or add to instructions asked by a party, to meet the Court's opinion of the law of the case.

In Mask v. The State, 36 Miss. 7 George, 94, the High Court of Errors and Appeals of Mississippi say: "It is not only the right, but the duty of the presiding Judge, to modify all instructions so as to make them conformable to his own views of the law. In the exercise of this right, this Court is to presume that the high and dignified tribunals to whose discretion it is previously committed, are always actuated by motives consistent with the delicate, responsible, and important trusts confided to their care.

"While, therefore, we admit the soundness and force of the views of counsel as to the impolicy, as a general rule, of the unnecessary interference of the Court in modifying instructions for the defendant, drawn with legal accuracy and precision, both as to the terms employed and the principles declared, yet this is a matter of discretion and taste for their determination, and not ours, so long as they properly declare the law given in charge."

Was there any misconduct on the part of the jury in adopting the means they did to arrive at their verdict?

The rule is well settled that the affidavits of jurors in exculpation of themselves, and in support of their verdict, are admissible, and that they are not admissible to impeach their verdict, unless rendered so by special statute. This case is not brought within the statute—it was not "a resort to the determination of chance," but simply finding the average of the deliberate judgments of the jurors, formed and expressed under the solemnities of an oath. Until the contrary is shown, we must suppose that each juror expressed his own judgment honestly.

As was said by the Supreme Court of Virginia, in Thompson's Case, 8 Grattan, 637: "What more, we would ask, have the jury done in this case than what we know is of every day occurrence in trials of Courts of equity, where, when a question of damage, or value, or compensation, arises before the Master, and when witnesses of equal credibility, or integrity and intelligence, differ in their estimates, the Master adopts as his assessment an average of the estimates of such witnesses; and this practice is sanctioned by a Court of equity, which is a Court of conscience, as it is by law and justice. Indeed, in some cases, it may be considered a rule of necessity as well as convenience." At least, there is no element of chance in such a method. It does not in any respect resemble throwing up cross or pile, as in Mellish v. Arnold, 1 Bun. 51, or hustling half pence in a hat, as in Parr v. Seaver, Barnes, 438, or drawing lots, as in Hale v. Cove, 1 Stra. 642, or flipping coppers, or throwing dice, or any other means resorted to for the determination of any matter, when men are willing to trust to blind chance rather than their own judgments. The whole subject is ably discussed in Thompson's Case, 8 Grattan, 637. (See also Cowperthwaite v. Jones, 2 Dall. 55; Chandler v. Baker, 2 Harrington, 387; Heath v. Conway, 1 Bibb, 398; Opinion of Chief Justice Kent in Smith v. Cheatham, 3 Caines, 61; Dana v. Tucker, 4 Johns. 488.)

C. E. Filkins, for Appellant, on petition for rehearing.

The common law, as well as American authorities, agreeing that such a verdict as the one rendered in this case is vicious and void, and ought not, in morals or in law, be permitted to stand. And a number of cases show that hearsay evidence (the remarks of jurors on the subject, and the testimony of the officer having a jury in charge as to what he saw the jurors do and heard them say in the jury room) has been held good enough evidence to impeach such verdicts. And thus, in the anxiety of the law to detect and punish fraud on the part of jurors, the ordinary rule of evidence has been changed.

To the general rule that the affidavit of a juror is inadmissible to impeach the verdict there is an important exception which those learned authors distinctly enunciate in their text in 3d Graham & Waterman on New Trials, 1,447, under the head of "As to the mode adopted in their finding," which is as follows:

"But though jurors after a verdict cannot be permitted to testify as to the reasons and motives of their determination, yet they may show the mode adopted by them in deciding as to the amount of damages." (8 Harrington, 469; 6 Mass. 272; 7 Mass. 110; 6 Pickering, 206.)

It is conceded that under the law as it existed prior to the Act of March 5, 1862, (subject to one exception, which will be hereafter explained,) the reasoning of the Court is right; and, consequently, if that statute does not materially alter it, and the case does not fall within the exception, there is no ground for complaint on the part of the respondent.

The relevant part of the statute is contained in its second section, which reads as follows:

"Misconduct of the jury, and whenever any one or more of the jurors shall have been induced to assent to any general or special verdict, or to a finding on any question, or questions, submitted to them by the Court, by a resort to the determination of chance; such misconduct may be proved by the affidavits of any one or more of the jurors."

The learned Court will agree with me that the law as it existed for twelve years in this State, as to how misconduct on the part of jurors could be proved, was unsatisfactory, and that the legislative department, in the exercise of its undoubted authority, intended, by the law of March 5, 1862, to a greater or less extent to remedy the mischief by holding jurors to a more conscientious discharge of their duties, and removing from them the temptation to careless or dishonest action, which the rules of the common law excited by withholding the only means of detecting it.

A verdict reached by the mode adopted in this case is called a "chance verdict," by the Supreme Courts of the States of Massachusetts, New York, Rhode Island, Indiana, Tennessee, and Iowa, and also by the learned authors, Graham and Waterman. (Dorr v. Fenno, 12 Pickering, 521; Dunn v. Hull, 8 Blackford, 32; Forbes v. Howard, 4 R. I. 364; Harvey v. Pickett, 15 John. 87; Mannix v. Meloney, 8 Iowa, 81; 3 Graham & Waterman, 1,447.)

By the Court, SANDERSON, C. J.

This action was brought to recover damages on account of personal injuries sustained by the plaintiff by reason of the negligent and careless upsetting of the defendant's stage coach upon which he was a passenger. The damages were laid in the complaint at fifty thousand dollars, and the jury found a verdict in favor of the plaintiff for the sum of sixteen thousand and five hundred dollars. The defendant moved for a new trial, which was denied. The appeal is from the judgment and order.

The facts as gathered from the testimony contained in the record are substantially as follows: On the 19th of October, 1861, the respondent paid the usual fare and took passage in one of defendant's coaches, to be conveyed from Downieville, in Sierra County, to Marysville, in Yuba County. He took a seat on the outside with the driver. The coach started soon after midnight. The moon was near its full, and the night clear and bright. About two o'clock in the morning, the coach was slowly ascending Goodyear's Bar hill, and was about a mile from the summit. At that point the road curves around a very steep, rocky ravine. The roadway was constructed by digging into the bank on the upper or right hand side, and building a rock crib about eleven feet in height on the lower side and filling in with rock and earth. A log about eighteen inches in diameter was placed on the edge of the rock crib or wall, and was a little higher than the road. The road was wide enough for the convenient passage of a coach, mule team or any kind of ordinary vehicle, and the track for the lower wheel was about two feet from the edge of the wall or crib.

As the coach approached this curve, it turned out from the usual track at a small angle, and gradually approached the edge of the wall or crib instead of following around the curve, and tracked along the log nearly its whole length, when, having passed beyond the highest point of its circumference, one of the wheels slipped over the outer side of the log, and the coach, horses and passengers were precipitated down the ravine. The respondent was very severely and dangerously injured, having his lower jaw broken in three places, the upper jaw separated from its bony attachment, his right shoulder dislocated and the right shoulder-blade broken, the skull fractured, the face, mouth and body bruised, contused and wounded. His injuries were of so serious a character as to render him entirely insensible for many days, and for a considerable time to render his recovery doubtful, and were such as to require the removal of portions of the bone of the lower jaw and to produce great and permanent disfigurement.

Up to the time of the trial of the case, more than a year and a half after the accident, he had not acquired the ordinary use of the lower jaw; the right shoulder and arm were stiff and weak and the hand partially paralyzed, being unable to perform any labor except with the left hand. The plaintiff was a laborer by occupation, and the injuries to the right shoulder and arm were of such a character as to permanently impair his capacity for laborious pursuits.

Previously, and up to the time of the accident, he was a strong, healthy man, and had the perfect use of all the members of his body.

I. The first point made by counsel for appellant is to the effect that the verdict is not sustained by the evidence when taken in connection with and confined to the allegation of carelessness and negligence contained in the complaint. And in support of this proposition it is argued that the only allegation of negligence contained in the complaint relates to the manner of driving and nothing else; that there is no evidence which explains the cause of the accident, and that there is evidence furnished by numerous experts which establishes the character of the driver for care and skill, which evidence rebuts the presumption of carelessness and negligence on his part, arising from the fact that the coach was overturned.

Admitting, for the sake of the argument, that the allegation of negligence is as narrow as counsel for appellant claims it to be, and that the cause of the accident is unexplained by the testimony, and that the general reputation of the driver for care and skill is established beyond question by the evidence, it does not follow that the overturning of the coach is to be charged to the account of unavoidable accident, or to some

1. The first part of the paper is devoted to a discussion of the

2. The second part of the paper is devoted to a discussion of the terial so far as the point under consideration is concerned. The plaintiff did not undertake to prove where the negligence rested, nor did the law require him to do so; and in our judgment the defendant failed to show that it did not rest where he claims the complaint had placed it. At the point where the overturning occurred the road formed the arc of a circle. Instead of moving on the arc the team took the chord, and went so near the precipice as to allow the wheels to run off. There was no such abrupt turning out of the beaten track as would probably result from a sudden fright; on the contrary, the team seems to have moved in a straight line, or nearly so, instead of following the curve of the road. They were going up hill and moving in a slow walk. One cannot read the evidence in connection with the diagram contained in the record without coming to the conclusion that the overturning which caused nearly fatal injuries to the plaintiff, and death to some of the other passengers, was the result of careless inattention on the part of the coachman in not keeping his team in the road. This could not have happened from his inability to see the road, for it was a clear moonlight night, but it is most probable from the evidence that his inattention was the result of drowsiness, induced by the hour and the use of too much liquor.

II. The defendant, upon the trial, asked the Court, among others, to give the following instructions:

1. "That in order to find for the plaintiff, the jury must find that the stage coach was driven in a "careless, negligent or unskilful manner." The Court, upon its own motion, added after the word manner, "or that there was some fault on the part of the proprietors."

2. "If the jury believe, from the testimony, that the coach was upset by the act of the horses, as in becoming frightened, or from other cause which was not the fault of the driver, then they should find for the defendant." The Court added to this instruction, after the word "driver," the words "or proprietors."

3. "If the jury find from the testimony that the driver

(Miles Nesmith) was a person of competent skill and in every respect qualified, and suitably prepared for the business in which he was engaged, and the accident was occasioned by no fault or want of skill or care on his part, then the defendant is not liable in an action for damages in this case, and the jury should find for the defendant." To this the Court added, after the words "on his part," the words "or the proprietors."

Counsel for the appellant insists that if the foregoing instructions were correct in law, the Court was bound to give them as asked, without any modification which would alter their sense, and in support of that proposition cites Conrad v. Lindley, 2 Cal. 173; Russell v. Amador, 3 Cal. 400; and Jamson v. Quirey, 5 Cal. 490.

To those cases, so far as they may be construed to uphold the doctrine that a party may of right insist that an instruction shall be given or refused, as asked, and that a modification thereof by the Court, whether right or wrong, is of itself error, we are unable to give our assent. It is the duty and province of the Judge to expound the law, and it is his right and privilege, in doing so, to select and make use of such language and illustration as, in his judgment, is best calculated to explain the same and render it clear to the comprehension of the jury. Upon him the law imposes the duty, and he may determine the manner of its performance. Counsel may propose such instructions as their wisdom may suggest, and submit them to the Judge; but beyond this they have no legal right to dictate to the Judge either the form or substance. If, in the opinion of the Judge, such instructions are defective in form or expression, or erroneous in law, he may, at his election, modify them in either particular, and give them to the jury in their modified form, or he may refuse to give them altogether. If error be assigned upon such instruction, the test question is not, Did the Judge modify the instruction? On the contrary, the test is the same as in other cases, and is to be applied to the instruction in its modified form; and if it appear that the instruction as modified correctly states the law, no error has intervened. This Court passes upon instructions, so far as they are given, in the form in which they were received by the jury; and the fact that they were prepared by counsel, and, before given, modified by the Court, cannot be regarded as error per se, or as having any bearing whatever upon the question of error. (Long v. Rogers, 19 Ala. 321.)

It is next claimed that the instructions as modified are erroneous, because they are broader than the issue of negligence tendered in the complaint and instruct the jury in effect that they need not confine their deliberations upon the question of negligence, solely to the manner in which the coach was driven, but may go beyond the driver in search of negligence, and inquire from the evidence whether the defendant was in fault in other particulars than the mere manner of driving.

In support of this position it is argued that the allegation of negligence, as contained in the complaint, does not embrace the whole field of the defendant's obligation and duty, but is narrowed, by the language used, to the carelessness and negligence of the coachman in managing and driving his team; that under this allegation the plaintiff could not recover if the overturning was the result of negligence other than careless driving, and that therefore the inquiries of the jury should have been confined by the Court to the manner in which the coachman performed his duty.

The allegation in question is expressed in the following terms: "And this plaintiff further avers that the said defendant then and there received this plaintiff as such passenger in said coach and then and there undertook, and it became its duty to use due and proper care to carry and safely convey in the said stage coach this plaintiff from Downieville to Marysville, via Goodyear's Bar and Forest City; yet the said defendant, regardless of its duties and undertakings, did not use proper care in the transportation of this plaintiff, but suffered and permitted the stage coach to be driven without due care and attention, and in so careless, negligent and unskilful a manner that," etc.

So far as what transpired at the trial can be gathered from the record, both parties and the Court, up to the time the defendant submitted his instructions, proceeded upon the theory that there was nothing in the complaint restricting the field of inquiry. There was no evidence, however, except in one particular, which tended in the least to fasten blame anywhere except upon the driver. There was some slight testimony as to the character of the nigh wheel-horse and tending to show that he was inclined to shirk the performance of his share of the labor. Being upon the side of the precipice over which the coach and team were precipitated, it is possible that the failure of this horse to perform his duty may have had a slight tendency to swing the team and coach toward the bank, and thus in a measure the unfitness of this horse may be said to have contributed to the overturning of the coach. If the horse was unfit, and his unfitness contributed to the accident, the fault so far did not originate with the driver but with the defendant. But to this evidence counsel for the defendant did not object at the time, nor did he afterwards move the Court to strike it out upon the ground of variance. On the contrary he introduced evidence for the purpose of contradicting it and establishing the fitness of the horse. When the Judge came to instruct the jury upon the application or on behalf of the plaintiff, he did so upon the theory that the whole field of the defendant's obligation and duty was open for investigation by the jury, and that they were not confined to the manner of driving; yet to these instructions counsel took no exception. On the contrary, the first four instructions asked by defendant, and given by the Court, proceed upon the same theory, and the modifications of the Court were only such as were necessary in order to make the defendant's instructions consistent with each other and in harmony with those which had been already given without objection.

Admitting then the narrow construction put upon the complaint by counsel for appellant to be correct, and that a slight portion of the testimony is at variance with the allegation, we think the defendant by his course at the trial waived the objection, or, in other words, failed to take advantage of it at the proper time. But it is not necessary to rest our decision wholly upon this ground. In our judgment the testimony shows beyond question that the whole fault lay with the coachman, and beyond his misconduct no fault attached to the defendant, and this is made so clear by the circumstances of the case in evidence that it cannot be presumed that the jury based their verdict upon any other ground of negligence than that averred in the complaint. The evidence against the horse was very slight, and the probability that his laziness contributed to the catastrophe still more so. Moreover, the testimony was successfully contradicted by the defendant, and with no show of reason can it be claimed that it had any influence upon the verdict. Such being the case, the instructions in question could not have misled the jury and put them upon a false scent. If there was any error, we are of the opinion that it did not prejudice the defendant's case.

III. It is next claimed that the verdict is a chance verdict, within the meaning of the second subdivision of section one hundred and ninety-three of the Practice Act.

Admitting, as claimed by counsel, that the amount of damages given by the jury was ascertained by each marking a sum which he thought proper, then adding the several sums and dividing by twelve, and that it had been previously agreed that the quotient, whatever it might be, should be their verdict without further consultation, still, as we have decided in Turner v. The Tuolumne Water and Mining Company, 25 Cal. 397, such verdict was not a chance verdict within the meaning of that section; and, although vicious, its character in that respect could not be established by the affidavits of the jurors who tried the case. There is no other evidence offered in support of the charge than that which comes from the jury, and it follows that the verdict stands unimpeached.

Nor can we disturb the verdict upon the ground that the damages are excessive. The rule upon this point is well stated by Mr. Justice Wilde in Worster v. Proprietors of Canal Bridge, 16 Pick. 547: "In all cases where there is no rule of law regulating the assessment of damages, and the amount does not depend on computation, the judgment of the jury, and not the opinion of the Court, is to govern, unless the damages are so excessive as to warrant the belief that the jury must have been influenced by partiality or prejudice, or have been misled by some mistaken view of the merits of the case. In the present case, the plaintiff was exposed to the imminent peril of his life, to great bodily and mental suffering, and we cannot say that the sum assessed by the jury exceeds a reasonable compensation. We do not consider whether or not we should have assessed the same amount of damages, if the case had been submitted to the Court to decide; for, in a case like the present, men of sound judgment may differ not a little in estimating the compensation which the circumstances of the injury would justify; and it is the judgment of the jury, and not that of the Court, which must govern. To justify the interposition of the Court, the damages must be manifestly exorbitant."

We see nothing in this case to warrant the belief that the verdict is the fruit of passion or prejudice. (Aldrich v. Palmer, 24 Cal. 518.)

By the Court, SANDERSON, C. J., on petition for rehearing.

We are asked to grant a rehearing in this case upon two grounds: First—Because we have erred in holding that at common law the verdict in this case cannot be impeached by the affidavits of the jurors; and Second—Because we have erred in holding that the verdict is not a chance verdict within the meaning of the second subdivision of the one hundred and ninety-third section of the Practice Act. In respect to these points this case was decided upon the authority of Turner & Platt v. The Tuolumne Water & Mining Company, 25 Cal. 397. We there held that, although there was some conflict of authority, the better rule was that, at common law, the affidavits of jurors could not be received for the purpose of impeaching their verdict. By so doing we did not establish the rule for the first time in this State; on the contrary, we merely affirmed a rule which was established as early as the first volume of California Reports and has been strictly adhered to from that time to the present. In the case of The People v. Baker, 1 Cal. 405, Mr. Justice Bennett said: "We consider it a settled rule, founded upon considerations of necessary policy, that the testimony of a jurymen cannot be received to defeat his own verdict." In Amsby v. Dickhouse, 4 Cal. 103, Mr. Chief Justice Murray said: "It is well settled that a juror cannot be allowed to impeach his own verdict. The reason of this wholesome rule of law is too obvious to require any explanation." The same rule was declared in Castro v. Gill, 5 Cal. 42, by Mr. Justice Heydenfeldt. In Wilson v. Berryman, 5 Cal. 45, the rule was again reiterated by Mr. Chief Justice Murray. In The People v. Wyman, 15 Cal. 75, the verdict was sought to be impeached upon the ground that it was not a fair expression of the opinion of the jury, and the affidavit of one of the jurors was relied on for that purpose. The opinion of the Court was delivered by Mr. Justice Cope, who said: "We have repeatedly decided that this cannot be done." Thus the law of this question had become too firmly established in this State to be disturbed by the judiciary, and in order to effect a change it was found necessary in 1862 to resort to legislative action. This was done, and it was enacted that verdicts found by a "resort to the determination of chance" might be impeached by the affidavits of the jurors. (Stats. 1862, 38.) But it is argued that while such is the general rule at common law, there are exceptions to it. Admitting this to be so, we answer, in the first place, that the Legislature of this State has legislated in regard to those exceptions, and that such legislation has superseded the common law. By declaring in what cases verdicts may be impeached by the affidavits of jurors, the Legislature, upon the maxim, expressio unius, exclusio alterius est, has declared that verdicts of a different class shall not be so impeached. And we answer in the second place, if such exceptions exist, this verdict, viewed by the light of the common law as heretofore declared in this State, does not fall within the exception. In Wilson v. Berryman, before cited, the verdict was found by the same process as in the present case. The facts were brought to the notice of the Court by an affidavit which was sworn to by one of the jurors and also by the Sheriff. The Court expressly held that the affidavit, so far as it was the affidavit of the juror, could not be received to impeach the verdict. Thus, however it may have been elsewhere before the decision of the present case, in this State it had been judicially determined that verdicts like the present did not fall within any supposed exception, but were within the general rule of the common law.

As stated in our opinion in Turner & Platt v. The Tuolumne Water and Mining Company, the authorities elsewhere are conflicting. We do not attempt to reconcile them; to do so would be impossible. We ground the rule upon the decisions and the legislation of this State, and we declare the law to be in this State, however it may be elsewhere, to the effect that the affidavits of jurors cannot be received in any case to impeach their verdict, except as provided in the second subdivision of the one hundred and ninety-third section of the Practice Act. And in conclusion upon this branch of the case, we may add that a line of judicial decision which struggles to multiply exceptions to a plain and simple rule, founded on considerations of the wisest policy, is not to be favored; on the contrary, the struggle should be to bring every case within the rule, lest the rule itself become shadowy, and in time wholly disappear in a multitude of exceptions.

Upon the point as to whether the verdict in this case is a chance verdict within the meaning of the one hundred and ninety-third section of the Practice Act, as amended in eighteen hundred and sixty-two, our opinion remains unchanged. In addition to what is said upon this point in our opinion in Turner & Platt v. The Tuolumne Water and Mining Company, (ante, p. 397,) reference may be made to the history of the amendment of eighteen hundred and sixty-two, for the purpose of ascertaining what the evil was which the Legislature had in view, and for which they sought to provide a remedy.

On the 1st of March, 1862, a judgment was rendered, upon the verdict of a jury, in the Twelfth District Court, in the case of Donner v. Palmer. (The case is reported in 23d Cal., at page 40.) For the purpose of showing how the verdict in that case was found, we make the following extract from the opinion of the Court delivered by Mr. Justice Crocker: "The affidavit of one of the jurors, Day, after stating generally what occurred in the jury room in the way of discussion and votes, states that after a time a vote unanimous for the plaintiff was taken, but immediately thereafter Hiller and Fortune, who are charged with the misconduct, recanted and said their vote was not according to their convictions; and soon after the affiant saw Fortune approach Hiller, and heard him propose to the latter that he would place a piece of money and the latter should guess heads or tails, and if he guessed right then their verdict should be for the plaintiff; that Hiller assented; that Fortune then placed a piece of money and covered it so that the former could not see it; he guessed, and they announced that he had guessed right, and they thereupon agreed to a verdict for the plaintiff, but both said it was still contrary to their convictions."

Here was a clear case of chance, without any proof of the fact except by the affidavits of the jurors. Under the law as it then stood these affidavits could not be received. The Legislature was in session at San Francisco, where the case was tried. The verdict was rendered on the first of March. On the fifth of the same month the bill amending the one hundred and ninety-third section of the Practice Act so as to allow verdicts to be impeached by the affidavits of jurors, on the ground of chance, was signed by the Governor, and became a part of the law of the land. Thus, aside from the mere wording of the law, the intent of the Legislature is made clear by a legitimate reference to the facts and circumstances which led to the passage of the Act. The Act was made broad enough to cover the case then in the mind of the Legislature and others like it. In our judgment the verdict in this case is not like it. Some cases are cited by counsel where the Court, in commenting upon verdicts like this, loosely employ the words "chance" and "hazard," but the precise question, to wit: whether such a verdict is a chance verdict, which is here directly presented, was not involved, the question there being whether such a verdict was good or bad. On the contrary the cases cited in our former opinion, and upon which it is based so far as authority is concerned, show that the precise question which we have considered was there considered and passed upon. Counsel has filed an able argument in support of his petition, but we find therein no reason for a change of opinion.

Rehearing denied.

BENJAMIN H. HUTTON v. JOSEPH L. REED, HENRY STEIL, AND CHARLES F. WEHN.

ASSIGNMENT OF ERRORS.—An assignment of errors at common law was in the nature of a pleading, to which there was a demurrer or joinder in error. It did not constitute a part of the transcript, but was founded on it, and was filed in the appellate Court after the transcript had been filed.

SAME.—The term assignment of errors is not used in our Practice Act, nor is it known in our practice in its common law sense.

APPEAL ON JUDGMENT ROLL.—When an appeal is taken on the judgment roll alone, and no statement is made, a specification of grounds of error is not required to be inserted in the transcript. But when the Court comes to examine the case, and no brief or statement of points and authority has been furnished by the appellant, as required by Rule XVII, the judgment will be affirmed without examination.

STATEMENT ON APPEAL.—A general specification in the statement of grounds of error relied on, such as insufficiency of the evidence to justify the verdict, the verdict and judgment are against law, or error in law occurring at the trial, is not sufficient; but the statement should specify the particular grounds of error relied on; and annexed to the statement of the grounds of error relied on by the appellant should be so much of the evidence as may be necessary to explain the points specified, and no more.

STATEMENT NOT SPECIFYING ERRORS RELIED ON.—A specification of the particular grounds of error is the essential element of a statement; the evidence is the mere incident. On appeal from the judgment, if the transcript contains a paper purporting to be a statement, which does not distinctly specify the grounds of error relied on, and objection to its insufficiency in this respect to constitute a statement is made at the proper time, such paper will be disregarded, and only such errors as are disclosed by the judgment roll will be considered.

STATEMENT ON MOTION FOR NEW TRIAL.—When the appeal is from an order denying a new trial, and the statement does not contain the specific grounds of error relied on, the order will be affirmed, or, on motion, the appeal will be dismissed.

SAME.—If a paper purporting to be a statement on motion for a new trial does not contain a specification of the particular grounds relied on, there is no such statement as is required by section one hundred and ninety-five of the Practice Act, and nothing on which the Court can act.

WHAT STATEMENT SHOULD CONTAIN.—The statement made on appeal, or on motion for new trial to be annexed to the judgment roll, should contain first a clear specification of the particular grounds relied on by the appellant, and then so much of the evidence, rulings of the Court, instructions, etc., as may be necessary to explain the points relied on.

VERDICT OF JURY.—In action to recover possession of land, the jury rendered the following verdict: "We, the jury in this cause, find a verdict in favor of the plaintiff against defendants, for the possession of the premises described in the complaint herein, and the sum of one hundred and sixty-five dollars damages." Held, to be substantially a general verdict, covering all the issues, and that it does not limit the finding to any particular fact or single issue.

APPEAL from the District Court, Fourth Judicial District, City and County of San Francisco.

The following are the pleadings in this action. The complaint and answer were verified:

Benjamin H. Hutton, plaintiff, complains of Joseph L. Reed, Henry Steil, and Charles F. Wehn, defendants; and for cause of action says, that heretofore, to wit: on the first day of January, A. D. 1862, the plaintiff was the owner in fee, entitled to the possession, and in the possession of that certain piece or lot of land, situate, lying, and being in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, and bounded and described as follows, to wit: Commencing on the southerly line of O'Farrell street at a point distant one hundred and thirty-seven feet six inches westwardly from the westwardly line of Jones street; thence running westerly along said line of O'Farrell street one hundred and thirty-seven feet six inches; thence southerly and parallel with Jones street one hundred and thirty-seven feet six inches; thence easterly and parallel with O'Farrell street one hundred and thirty-seven feet six inches; thence northerly and parallel with Jones street one hundred and thirty-seven feet six inches to the point of beginning, and being fifty vara lot No. 1,115, as designated and numbered upon the official map of the City of San Francisco.

That afterwards, and while plaintiff was so as aforesaid the owner in fee, entitled to the possession, and in possession of said described tract of land, to wit: on the 26th day of February, A. D. 1862, the said defendants wrongfully and unlawfully trespassed into and upon said tract of land and ousted the plaintiff, and from thence hitherto have and still do wrongfully and unlawfully detain the same and the possession thereof from the plaintiff, and to his damage in the sum of five hundred dollars.

Wherefore plaintiff prays judgment against said defendant for restitution of said premises, for five hundred dollars damages, and costs of suit.

PRATT & CLARKE,

Attorneys for Plaintiff.

And now come the said defendants, Joseph L. Reed, Henry Steil, Charles F. Wehn, and for answer to the complaint of the plaintiff in the above entitled action say, that they deny that on the first day of January, A. D. 1862, the said plaintiff was the owner in fee, entitled to the possession, and in the possession of that certain piece or lot of land, situate, lying, and being in the City and County of San Francisco, and particularly described in said plaintiff's complaint by metes and bounds, as fifty vara lot on the official map of the City of San Francisco as number eleven hundred and fifteen (1,115.)

And for further answer to said plaintiff's complaint, the defendants deny that on the 26th day of February, A. D. 1862, that they, the said defendants, or either of them, wrongfully and unlawfully trespassed into and upon said tract of land and ousted the plaintiff therefrom. And defendants deny that from thence hitherto, and that they still do wrongfully and unlawfully detain said piece or lot of land and the possession thereof from said plaintiff. And defendants deny that said plaintiff has sustained damages in the sum of five hundred dollars or in any other sum whatever.

And for further answer the defendants deny all and singular, the facts and allegations in said plaintiff's complaint contained.

Wherefore the said defendants pray that a judgment may be rendered in their favor and against said plaintiff, and for costs of suit in this action.

JOHN MOHENRY,
Attorney, and of Counsel for Defendants.

Plaintiff recovered judgment, and defendants appealed.
The other facts are stated in the opinion of the Court.

James B. Townsend, for Appellants.

If this verdict has any intelligible meaning, it is that the jury find that the plaintiff should have or is entitled to the possession of the premises described, etc.

But whether or not the plaintiff should have or is entitled to said premises, is a conclusion of law merely, to be pronounced by the Court after the facts have been ascertained, and depending upon those facts. It is not the province of the jury to decide what the plaintiff should have or is entitled to. The law, which is pronounced by the Court after the facts are ascertained, settles this.

"Ad questiones juris respondent judices, ad questiones facti juratores."

The verdict in question, unless by implication and argument, decides none of the issues of fact joined between the parties and upon which their respective rights depend.

It does not decide whether the plaintiff is, or ever was, owner in fee, or owner of any other estate or interest in the land, unexpired.

It does not decide whether the plaintiff was ever in the possession of the land, or ousted therefrom by the defendants.

It does not decide whether the defendants have detained said land from the plaintiffs from February 26th, 1862, until the commencement of this action, or during any portion of that time.

These were the material issues of fact to be decided by their verdict.

Upon one or both of the two former depends the plaintiff's right to recover the possession of the land; upon the latter, his right to recover damages in the nature of meane profits.

The verdict (at most) finds that the plaintiff has the right to the possession, (which, as before remarked, is a matter of law for the Court to determine,) entirely omitting to find the facts upon which that right depends; and it also finds the amount of damages to which the jury consider the plaintiff entitled, without finding the ouster and detention of the premises by the defendants, upon which such right depends; in other words, it finds only conclusions of law, wholly omitting to find the facts upon which those conclusions would arise.

It is well settled that a verdict to authorize any judgment thereon, must find all the material facts put in issue. (Patterson v. United States, 2 Wheat. 224; Bemus v. Beekman, 3 Wend. 667; Boynnton v. Page, 13 Wend. 425; 1 Grah. Prac. 3d Ed. 773, 777; Com. Dig. Pleader, Seca. 19, 20; Kints v. McNeal, 1 Denio, 436.)

It must find those facts directly, not argumentatively, or by implication. (Com. Dig. Pleader, Sec. 22.)

It must find facts, not legal conclusions. (King v. Dean of St. Asph, 3 T. R. 428, note a.)

Clarke & Carpentier, for Respondent.

By the Court, SAWYER, J.

The respondent made a preliminary motion to dismiss the appeal, on the ground that the record contains no statement on appeal, and no assignment of errors, or statement of the grounds upon which appellant relies. The motion to dismiss was argued orally, and the case at the same time submitted on its merits on briefs, subject to the motion to dismiss.

We have frequently had motions to dismiss appeals from orders denying new trials, and from judgments, on the general ground that there was no assignment of errors in the record. But the term, "assignment of errors," seems to be used somewhat loosely and vaguely. The real difficulty to be reached — though frequently the point is not distinctly presented — is, that there is no such statement of the grounds intended to be relied on, on motion for a new trial, or on appeal, as is required by the statute; and this is the point of the objection in this case. Notwithstanding the repeated decisions on the point, there still seems to be a misapprehension as to what is required, under the statute, to constitute a valid statement of the grounds relied on in such cases, and there is more or less discussion upon the subject whenever these motions are made. For this reason, we propose now to examine these questions, and, once for all, lay down the rule which we suppose to be contemplated by the statute, and established by the decisions.

The term assignment of errors is not used in our Practice Act. An assignment of errors, in the strict common law sense of the term, was in the nature of a pleading, to which there was a demurrer or joinder in error. (2 Tidd's Prac. 1,168; 3 Steph. Com. 644; 2 Burr. Prac. 147.) It did not constitute a part of the transcript, but was founded upon it, and was filed in the appellate Court at, or subsequent to the time of filing the transcript. It is hardly necessary to say, that the filing of such an assignment of errors was never required under the system of practice in this State. Yet we find the term often used in our reports in a sense somewhat different from, but analagous to its common law sense. Thus, in The People v. Goldbury, 10 Cal. 312; People v. Comedo, 11 Cal. 70, and Sayre v. Smith, 11 Cal. 129 — generally cited in these discussions — the appeals were dismissed; and in Squires v. Foorman, 10 Cal. 298, the judgment was affirmed for want of "an assignment of errors." These cases, except the last, are imperfectly reported, and we have taken the trouble to examine the records with a view of ascertaining, if possible, the precise circumstances under which they were decided; the sense in which the term, "assignment of errors," was used by the Court, and the practice which has heretofore prevailed in such cases. So far as we are able to ascertain the facts from the records, the appeals in these several cases were not dismissed, nor the judgments affirmed on motion of the respondents' a hearing at any term, the statement of his points and authorities shall be filed five days before the hearing, and unless so filed the appeal shall be dismissed." Probably a similar provision was contained in the rules prior to that time. The records of the Court, so far as we have been able to discover, do not show a dismissal of an appeal for want of an assignment of error in any other sense, or under any other circumstances than those stated, and under the rules of the Court requiring points to be filed.

The case of Barrett v. Tewksbury, 15 Cal. 354, presents a different question. The question in that case was, whether the document purporting to be a statement contained a sufficient specification of the grounds on which the appellant relied, to constitute a valid statement, and render it available on appeal. And this is the question which is, or should be presented, when objections are taken to statements on the motions so frequently made in this Court.

Section three hundred and thirty-eight of the Practice Act of eighteen hundred and fifty-one, in force at the time the statement in that case was prepared, provides, that the statement shall "contain the grounds upon which he (the appellant) intends to rely on the appeal, and shall contain so much of the evidence as may be necessary to explain the grounds, and no more."

In deciding the case Mr. Chief Justice Field says: "The specification of the grounds is the essential element of a statement; the evidence is the mere incident. It is the statement 'of the case,' and not of the evidence, which is to be annexed to the record of the judgment or order appealed from. The case on appeal consists of the questions of law or of fact raised. These must be distinctly set forth and accompanied with only so much of the evidence as may be necessary to explain and show their pertinency and materiality, and no more." The specification is necessary, in the preparation of the statement, to enable the adverse party to suggest, intelligently, such amendments as he may deem important to the just determination of the case. Without it neither the adverse party, nor the Judge, can well know how much of the evidence should be set forth. It often happens that, of numerous points taken in the progress of the trial, the greater number, after mature consideration, are abandoned by counsel, and the appeal made to rest on one or two of them. In such instances a large portion of the testimony actually given becomes entirely immaterial on appeal; but without a specification of the grounds on which the appellant intends to rely, the adverse party will be ignorant of the materiality of that which is inserted or omitted in the statement." (15 Cal. 356-7.)

And again, page 358: "In all future cases, the specifications must be made when the statements are originally prepared. Nor is there any difficulty in pursuing this course; but on the contrary, the labor of the parties, as well as their expenses, will be thereby greatly lessened. It is certainly a very simple matter for the party appealing to allege, either at the commencement or conclusion of his statement, that on appeal he will rely upon certain errors committed by the Court; as, for example, in admitting the testimony of a particular witness, or in excluding certain documents, or in giving or refusing certain instructions, or in making particular rulings upon the contract or subjects in controversy. When the grounds are thus specified it will be an easy matter to state so much of the evidence as may be necessary to explain and point them, and the adverse party will be enabled to suggest readily and intelligently such amendments to the statements as he may deem important to their just determination. There may be cases where equitable relief is sought, as suggested by the learned counsel of the petitioners in which the general ground of appeal will be that the decree is not warranted by the evidence; yet, even then the general ground will be found, in a great majority of instances, subject to more particular specifications—as that the evidence does not establish a contract, or show a tender, or compliance with particular condition precedent, or the like, which will constitute the matters urged upon the Court." (For further illustrations see opinion in the case cited.)

That case was well considered in the first instance, and again on petition for rehearing, and had the concurrence of all the Judges. The requisites of a statement are so fully and precisely laid down that we have quoted at length from the opinion in the case, for the purpose of calling particular attention to the subject; for it seems to us that this case must have been overlooked, or there could not be so frequent occasion for making similar objections to statements in cases appealed to this Court.

The amendment to section three hundred and thirty-eight since the decision in Barrett v. Tewksbury, prescribes these essential requisites in still more precise and emphatic language. It now provides that the appellant in his statement "shall state specifically the particular errors or grounds upon which he intends to rely on the appeal." If there ever was room for doubt as to what was necessary to state, there can be none since the amendment of the Act. It is manifest that the Legislature intended by this language something more than a specification of the grounds of appeal in general terms, such as those in the so called assignment of errors in Squires v. Foorman, or such as the general language of the statute in enumerating the cases for granting new trials, in section one hundred and ninety-three of the Practice Act. It was intended that the specific error should be distinctly pointed out. It is as easy to do this in the statement as in points or briefs, and such is the requirement of the statute. It is also easy to indicate the ground so distinctly that there can be no room for discussion here as to whether "the errors or grounds upon which the appellant intends to rely" are specifically stated or not. Hereafter, if the grounds are so loosely or defectively stated as to admit of argument as to their sufficiency, it must not be expected that this Court will adopt a liberal construction for the purpose of saving the appellant's case.

It is optional with the appellant, when he appeals from the judgment alone, whether he will make a statement or not. If he makes no statement, it is not necessary that there should be in the transcript, or on file, what has heretofore been denominated "an assignment of errors," or any statement of the grounds upon which he relies, for neither the statutes nor the rules of this Court now require it, and an appeal cannot in such cases be dismissed on motion for want of an assignment of errors in the transcript, or of a statement, or where there is a defective statement; but in such cases, only the errors appearing upon the judgment roll can be considered. But when the Court comes to examine the case, and no brief, or statement of points and authorities is furnished on the part of the appellant to aid in the investigation, as required by Rule XVII, the judgment will be affirmed without any examination of the case, as was done in Edmondson v. Alameda County, 24 Cal. 349, and in other cases since.

In this case there is no statement on appeal; but the appellant was not required to make one, and the appeal, so far as it is taken from the judgment, cannot be dismissed. It must, however, rest upon the judgment roll alone. But an appeal is also taken from the order denying the motion for new trial, and the objection to the sufficiency of the statement applies to this branch of the appeal. The statement on motion for new trial was made under section one hundred and ninety-five, as amended in 1861, and the sufficiency of the statement must be determined by a construction of that section as it then stood. It provides that the party intending to move for a new trial shall prepare "a statement of the grounds upon which he intends to rely * * *."

"The grounds of the motion shall be specifically set forth, and the statement shall contain so much of the evidence, or reference thereto, as may be necessary to explain them, and no more." The language here is similar to that of section three hundred and thirty-eight, relating to statements on appeal, since the amendment of that section in 1864, and more specific than the language of that section as it stood at the time of the decision in Barrett v. Tewksbury. The same construction must be given to both sections.

In Wing v. Owen, 9 Cal. 247, plaintiff recovered. The defendant made what was intended to be a statement on motion for new trial. It stated the evidence, the various rulings upon the admissibility of evidence, and the exceptions taken by defendants; the instructions given at the request of plaintiff, and those asked by defendant and refused, and the exceptions thereon taken by defendant—in short, the full history of the proceedings; but it did not state the particular errors or grounds upon which the defendants intended to rely on their motion. The District Court granted a new trial, and plaintiff appealed. The document called a statement was held to be no such statement as the Act required, and therefore no statement at all; and the order granting a new trial was reversed on that ground. Mr. Justice Field said: “In this case no statement was filed setting forth the grounds upon which defendants intended to rely on their motion for a new trial. The failure to file such statement operates as a waiver of the right to the motion.” (Page 247.) This construction of section one hundred and ninety-five is on the theory, that the specification of the particular errors, or grounds relied on, is the essential constituent, without which there is no statement, and the evidence, rulings and exceptions only the incidents which serve to explain and illustrate those essentials—the errors or grounds relied on. The language of section one hundred and ninety-five at that time was more general than after the amendment of 1861, as it did not contain the clause: “The grounds of the motion shall be specifically set forth.” The principle of this case, as we have seen, was affirmed in Barrett v. Tewksbury in respect to statements on appeal, in which case, the Court explained more fully, and in terms not liable to be misapprehended, what is intended by the grounds upon which a party intends to rely. This case was approved and followed in Dobbins v. Dollarhide, 15 Cal. 375, and recognized in Valentine v. Stewart, Id. 396.

If then, “the grounds of the motion,” as thus defined, are not “specifically set forth” in the statement in this case, there is no such statement as is required on motion for new trial, and nothing on which the Court was authorized to act.

The only statement of the grounds is an enumeration of the causes for new trial specified in the fifth, sixth and seventh clauses of section one hundred and ninety-three, very nearly in the words of the statute, as follows:

First—Insufficiency of the evidence to justify the verdict.

Second—The verdict and judgment are against law.

Third—Excessive damages as given by the jury.

Fourth—Error in law occurring at the trial and excepted to by the defendants; without in the remotest degree indicating wherein the evidence was insufficient, the verdict against law, or the error in law at the trial occurred.

The third specification, as here stated, is not recognized by the statute as a cause for new trial, for there is no averment or pretense that the damages were "given under the influence of passion or prejudice."

We do not think the grounds are "specifically set forth," within the meaning of the statute as before construed. There is nothing here that indicates the specific errors or grounds relied on. The specification affords to the other party no information that is of any service to him in suggesting amendments to the statement. Upon such a specification he could not safely accept a statement that did not contain everything that transpired at the trial; and statements under such a system would be incumbered with hundreds of pages of matter worse than useless—one of the very evils, which the requirements of the statute were intended to obviate. The provision is that the "grounds" shall be "specifically set forth," and "the statement shall contain so much of the evidence * * * as may be necessary to explain them, and no more." If the opposite party knows the precise grounds relied on, he will have no difficulty in determining exactly what evidence is necessary to explain them. But if the grounds are stated in terms so broad as to include everything that transpired at the trial, it is impossible for him to know what is necessary to be included to explain the grounds, or what may safely be omitted. Such a statement affords no information whatever, and so far as any useful purpose is concerned, it might just as well be altogether omitted. We are disposed to carry out these provisions of the Practice Act according to the letter and spirit; and the construction given them, as we conceive, will accomplish that result. We again call attention to Barrett v. Tewksbury, 15 Cal. 358, where the correct practice is distinctly pointed out.

Whenever the statement, on motion for new trial, or on appeal, does not conform to the requirements of the statute as construed in this opinion, and the objection is made at the proper time, it will be disregarded, and such errors only considered as are disclosed by the judgment roll.

When the appeal is from the order denying a motion for new trial, and the motion was not based on such a "statement of the grounds" as is herein approved, or upon affidavits, the practice will be to affirm the order, or, on motion, to dismiss the appeal.

The only point made on the judgment roll in this case is, that the issues of fact are not found by the jury, and the verdict is insufficient to sustain the judgment. The action is for the recovery of the possession of land and damages for detention. The verdict is, "We, the jury in this cause, find a verdict in favor of the plaintiff against defendants for the possession of the premises described in the complaint herein, and the sum of one hundred and sixty-five dollars damages."

We must presume the Court correctly instructed the jury as to what was necessary for them to find to entitle the plaintiff to recover the possession of the premises. We think this is substantially a general verdict covering all the issues. The words "for the possession of the premises described in the complaint herein" do not limit the finding to any particular fact or issue.

We deem it proper to say here that we have come to the conclusion that the statement on motion for a new trial in this case must be disregarded as insufficient with less reluctance, for the reason that we are satisfied upon examination of the record that no injustice will result from the judgment if unreversed. The substantial question on the validity of the grant by Alcalde Geary was determined in White v. Moses, 21

The accidental circumstance of the reconveyance of the premises to William A. Grover lends no feature favorable to the plaintiff.

The defendants derive title through Lester K. Grover from the original Alcalde grant of the lot of which these premises are a part. That the title came immediately from William A. Grover to them, after the reconveyance to him, does not connect the transaction with his previous ownership of the land, when he executed the mortgage, any more than if he had never owned it. The land and the defendant were separated from each other, and remained so from the 20th of August, 1856, to the 17th of December, 1859, some three years and five months. So far as William A. Grover is concerned, and when, on the latter date, he was re-invested with the title, that act did not again unite the debt and the land.

He then conveys by general warranty, which necessarily operates as a covenant against this mortgage to Charles Morrill, on the 19th of July, 1860, having done no new act in the meantime to operate as a new incumbrance on the land.

The question of notice has nothing to do with this case.

The records are open to the inspection of every one; and when a man finds a recorded mortgage out of date, he has notice of the law that such a mortgage cannot be enforced.

If he inquires, and discovers that part payment of principal and interest has been made upon the mortgage, but in a way rendered valid by law, he is still at liberty to buy, and he will not be bound by such part payment.

S. W. Holladay, for Respondent.

In reply to the objection that the extension agreement could not affect or extend the mortgage, because Grover had already sold the land, we say, that Grover after that conveyance became again the owner of the land, standing in his original position as debtor and mortgagor.

Had he, therefore, been the sole defendant, he would have been estopped from denying his right to extend the mortgage.

His extension agreement, although only executory at the time it was made, when the land was conveyed back to him had been faithfully observed by the plaintiff in his forbearance to sue; it was then fully executed as distinguished from what it was at its date—merely executory. When Grover became again the owner of the land, having had all the benefit of the extension agreement, he could not be heard to question its validity.

He was then estopped. His interest acquired subsequent to the agreement was sufficient to feed the estoppel.

If Grover had the power to extend the time of payment while the debt and the land were both united in him, (as is practically conceded by appellants' counsel,) it seems natural that the same consequence should follow when, by getting back the title, the debt and the land became united in him—the interest acquired by the conveyance feeding the estoppel contained in the extension agreement, as shown in the brief of Mr. Carey.

James C. Carey, also for Respondent.

But are the Morrills and Grover in a position to attack this agreement? It will be remembered that Lester K. Grover reconveyed the fee to Wm. A., December 29th, 1859, and he of course took subject to his own mortgage and extension agreement. He would be estopped to deny that agreement or its effect. He adopted it and continued to pay interest up to July 13th, 1860, when he sold the fee to C. Morrill. While the fee was in Lester K., Morrill could not complain, for he was a stranger to the property, and when he purchased it the agreement bound his grantor, although it may have been invalid when made as to Lester K. Grover. Wm. A. Grover would have been estopped by it, and the Morrills claiming through him, it estops them with or without notice.

“The interest, when it accrues, feeds the estoppel.”

This rule is well illustrated in the Rawlin Case, 4 Co. R. 52. A man leased land in which he had nothing, and afterwards bought the land. The lease was held good against him and all parties to whom the estate might come. He was estopped to deny his lease, and when the interest accrued upon which it was to operate, it fed the estoppel, and the lease was held good. (2 Smith's Leading Cases, p. 500, et seq.; Id. 545-551.)

It was held in like manner in Helps v. Hereford, 2 Barn. & Adolp. 242, that a fine levied by an heir who had no estate in the land at the time, either contingent or vested, bound the estate by estoppel upon its subsequent descent from his ancestor.

To the same point: Webb v. Austin, 7 Manning and Granger, 701; McKenzie v. Lexington, 4 Dana, 129; Sturgeon v. Springfield, 15 Meeson & W. 224.

It was held in Somers v. Skinner, 3 Pick. 52-58, that where a grantor conveyed land with warranty in which he had nothing at the time, he was not only estopped in claiming in opposition to his deed, but that an estate which vested in him subsequently was bound by the estoppel and transferred to the grantee.

In White v. Patten, 24 Pick. 324, the Court went still further, and held that where a party who was in actual possession of land, but without title, mortgaged it with warranty, and afterwards acquired a good title by conveyance, the warranty took immediate effect on the land thus acquired, and transferred it to the mortgagee not only as against the mortgagor, but as against those claiming under him subsequently to the conveyance.

To the same point: Clark v. Baker, 14 Cal. 612, and cases cited by Botts, p. 621; Mack v. Willard, 18 N. Hamp. 389; Baxter v. Brodbury, 20 Maine, 26; and authorities cited in Doe v. Oliver, 2 Smith's Leading Cases, 551.

By the Court, SHAFER, J.

This is an action to foreclose a mortgage. The complaint describes a promissory note, and a mortgage executed to secure its payment; it states the amount due, and asks a decree of foreclosure and sale of the premises, waiving personal judgment against either of the defendants for any deficiency after applying the proceeds of sale of the land to the satisfaction of the judgment.

William A. Grover, the maker of the note and mortgage, was served with process, but failed to answer, and a default was entered against him. The other three defendants—Charles Morrill, O. F. Morrill and D. W. Chambers—answered separately, and the plaintiff interposed a demurrer to the greater portion of each of the answers, on the ground that the facts therein stated constituted no defense to the action. The Court below sustained the demurrers, and the defendants failing to amend, and the cause coming on regularly for an assessment of damages, a final decree was rendered for the plaintiff, in conformity to the facts and prayer of the complaint. From this final decree the appeal is taken.

The complaint is verified, and its matter may be briefly stated as follows:

1st. That on the 17th of January, 1855, the defendant, Wm. A. Grover, executed his note to Messrs. Newhaus for four thousand five hundred dollars, payable two years thereafter, at one and three quarters per cent per month interest.

2d. At the same time, to secure the payment of the note, Grover executed a mortgage upon the described land, which mortgage was duly acknowledged and recorded on the same day in the county where the land lies.

3d. That on January 13, 1857, the principal sum, four thousand five hundred dollars, and five hundred dollars interest, was due on the note and mortgage, when Messrs. Newhaus, the payees, assigned the same to plaintiff, in consideration of five thousand dollars paid therefor, and the deed of assignment was duly acknowledged and recorded at its date. The deed of assignment also recited said sum of principal and interest as then due.

4th. At the time of said assignment, plaintiff and the defendant Grover, the mortgagor, agreed in writing, signed by them, that the above named sum was due, and that Grover should pay plaintiff interest on said sum of five thousand dollars, at one and one half per cent per month, and that the time for payment of said note and mortgage should be extended for two years from that date, i. e., two years from February 13, 1857.

5th. Two years thereafter—to wit: February 13, 1859—the accrued interest in arrear, added to the principal, amounted to five thousand nine hundred and twenty dollars, when plaintiff and defendant Grover, by agreement in writing signed by them, stated and agreed that said sum was then due and payable, and that thereafter Grover would pay interest on that whole sum at one and one quarter per cent per month. Grover continued to pay interest up to the month of July, 1860, when he conveyed the mortgaged premises to the defendant, Charles Morrill, with full and actual notice of the note and mortgage, and the extension of time of payment for two years from January 13, 1857, and of the amount due thereon, and the rate of interest which Grover agreed to pay.

6th. That from July 19, 1860, (the date of Grover's conveyance to Morrill) up to and including August 17, 1862, the defendants Charles Morrill and O. F. Morrill paid plaintiff the accruing interest on said note and mortgage at the rate above stated.

7th. Since July 19, 1860, defendant Charles Morrill has repeatedly promised to pay plaintiff the said sum of five thousand nine hundred and twenty dollars, due as aforesaid, but has neglected, etc.

8th. That O. F. Morrill and Chambers claim to have some interest, which is subsequent and subject to the plaintiff's mortgage.

9th. The prayer of the complaint is for a judgment against defendant William A. Grover, for five thousand nine hundred and twenty dollars, accruing interest, and five per cent counsel fees and costs, for a sale of the mortgaged premises, and foreclosure against the defendants, etc.; "but plaintiff does not ask and hereby waives all claim to a personal judgment against either of the defendants for any deficiency after apply-conveys the mortgaged lands to a third person, and while the note is yet underdue gives an acknowledgment in writing to the holder that the note is a subsisting contract against him, and he thereafter accepts a reconveyance of the lands before time has run on the note as extended, and thereafter, but while the note as extended is yet underdue, conveys the land to a stranger—are the lands in the hands of this last grantee affected by the written acknowledgment of the mortgagor before named?

In Lord v. Morris, 18 Cal. 484, the Court held that "a mortgagor, after disposing of the mortgaged premises by deed of bargain and sale, loses all control over them. His personal liability thereby becomes separated from his ownership of the land, and he can by no subsequent act create or revive the charge upon the premises. He is as to the premises henceforth a mere stranger. And if, instead of selling the premises, he execute a second mortgage upon them, he is equally without power to destroy or impair the efficacy of the lien thus created by a subsequent renewal of the first mortgage note."

To the correctness of this decision we fully accede. It is founded upon the principle that the power of incumbering property, and of extending the life of existing incumbrances for a longer period of time than that to which they were limited in the first instance, as well as the power of disposing of property in any and all possible modes, is vested in the person to whom the property belongs. The right of property and the right to dispose of it as the proprietor may choose, are indissoluble.

As we conceive, however, there is one fact disclosed in the record which takes the case at bar out of the operation of Lord v. Morris, by withdrawing it from the operation of the principle upon which the judgment in that case was based.

It is true that the mortgagor, W. A. Grover, when he conveyed the land to L. K. Grover, on the 20th of August, 1856, became "a stranger" to the title, and as between himself and his grantee, Grover had no more power to extend the mortgage in time, than he had to increase the rate of interest, enlarge the principal sum due, or make a new mortgage out-another rule protecting Grover's grantee in the beneficial enjoyment of his estate. But when the temporary hindrance had been removed by the reconveyance to Grover, the mortgage, under the maxim named, at once assimilated itself to the note as renewed and extended.

This result cannot be considered an inequitable one. The rights of third persons were no longer concerned after the mortgagor had recovered the title, and we are at a loss to conceive upon what principle it can be held that, as between the original parties to the note and mortgage, the mortgage failed to match itself to the note in the new dimensions imparted to it by the prior written acknowledgment.

It is a matter of no moment that Chambers, when he took his conveyance of the land in 1862, had no knowledge that the note and mortgage had been extended. Lent was not delinquent in any known common law or statute duty or requirement. He was not bound to serve personal notice of the acknowledgment of February, 1859, upon any one, nor to publish the fact in the gazettes; and if he had caused the acknowledgment to be recorded in the Recorder's office it would have been followed by no legal consequences. Chambers, on the other hand, knew, at least, when he bought and paid his money, that the mortgage had not been discharged of record. He further knew, as matter of law, that under the Statute of Limitations a renewal of the note was a possible event. He might, and as a prudent man he ought, before concluding his purchase, to have sought out Lent and inquired of him as to whether the note had been renewed in fact. If on such application Lent had told him that there had been no renewal, and if, thereupon, Chambers, on the faith of the statement, had closed the trade and paid his money for the land, Lent would have been estopped from setting up the mortgage against the man whom his own false suggestions had misled. Not having pursued that course, however, Chambers must be understood to have bought and taken his conveyance subject to all hazards.

II. As to the covenant contained in the deed of Grover to coin of the United States. The prayer of the complaint was for judgment in the amount due on the note and for the costs of the suit, and for such other and further relief as the nature of the case demanded.

The defendants answered alleging that when the note became due they tendered to the plaintiff the amount due thereon in United States legal tender notes, at their face, and that such tender was made in payment of the sum due by said note, but that plaintiff refused to receive the same in payment thereof; and they also alleged that they had always, since said tender, been and still were ready and willing to pay plaintiff the sum due him, and thereupon they brought the same money and deposited it in Court for the plaintiff.

The cause was tried before the Court without a jury, when the facts pleaded by the parties, respectively, were admitted. Upon this, the Court, after reciting the facts stated in the complaint, found and decided that: "When the day of payment arrived the defendants offered to the plaintiff the principal and interest, in paper of the United States, which was worth about sixty cents for each dollar. The plaintiff refused this paper and claimed gold or silver. This Court, having equity powers, must decide that the tender was ill made, and that the defendants must return the same class of money which they received, or its equivalent, according to the intent of the parties at the time of negotiating the loan."

Judgment was entered upon this decision of the Court to the effect that the plaintiff do have and recover of and from the defendants the sum due, with interest thereon, at the rate specified, until paid, "payable in gold or silver coin of the United States, or in foreign coin, at the value fixed therefor by the Acts of Congress, together with costs and disbursements incurred in the action;" the amount of which is specified.

The defendants have appealed from the judgment, and the only question involved is the constitutionality of the Act of Congress passed February 25, 1862, making the notes issued under that Act lawful money and a legal tender in the payment of private debts. We have decided this question in Lick

v. Faulkner, (ante 405,) sustaining the law of Congress, and therefore we hold that the tender pleaded by the defendants and the payment of the same money into Court for the plaintiff was a good and lawful tender, and that the Court erred, first, in giving judgment in a sum exceeding the amount tendered, and directing the kind of money in which the judgment should be paid; second, in giving judgment in favor of plaintiff against defendants for the costs of the action.

The judgment is therefore reversed, and the District Court is directed to render a judgment in favor of the plaintiff for the sum of money due when the tender by the defendants to the plaintiff was made; and a judgment in favor of the defendants against the plaintiff for their costs in this action.

YANKEE JIM'S UNION WATER COMPANY v. MILTON W. CRARY.

ADVERSE POSSESSION OF WATER RIGHT.—The right to the use of a water-course in the public mineral lands, and the right to divert and use the water taken therefrom, may be held, granted, abandoned, or lost, by the same means as a right of the same character issuing out of lands to which a private title exists. The right of the first appropriator may be lost by the adverse possession of another; and when such person has had the continued uninterrupted, and adverse enjoyment of the water, or of some certain portion of it, during the period limited by the Statute of Limitations for entry upon lands, the law will presume a grant of the right so held and enjoyed by him.

EVIDENCE IN ACTIONS FOR DIVERTING WATER.—In an action for the wrongful diversion of water, where the answer sets up more than five years continuous adverse possession in the defendant, if the plaintiff before resting introduces evidence tending to show his possession during the five years, and the defendant then introduces evidence to sustain the answer, the plaintiff, in rebuttal, may introduce evidence to show that defendant's possession has not been continuous, or uninterrupted, or adverse, but he cannot claim as a right to introduce evidence to prove the same facts that were proved in his opening.

ERROR IN ADMITTING TESTIMONY CURED BY INSTRUCTIONS.—If the Court errs in the admission of testimony during the trial, but afterwards instructs the jury to disregard such testimony, the error is not sufficient to entitle the party objecting to the testimony to a new trial.

PRESUMPTION OF GRANT TO WATER.—In an action for the wrongful diversion of water, if the jury are satisfied from the evidence that the defendants have been in the continued, adverse, uninterrupted possession, use, and enjoyment of the water in dispute for five years preceding the commencement of the action, they are justified in presuming a grant to the defendants.

DIVERSION OF WATER.—If A. is the owner of a ditch, and of the right to divert and use the waters of a stream in the same, and B. diverts the waters of the stream at a point above A.'s ditch and uses them for mining, but turns them back into A.'s ditch at another point before A. has use for them, A. has no cause of action against B.

APPEAL from the District Court, Eleventh Judicial District, Placer County.

The defendant's ditch was excavated on the side of the mountain above plaintiff's ditches, and took the water from the same stream at a point about three fourths of a mile above plaintiff's ditches. The defendant used the water for working his claim, and then allowed it to flow into plaintiff's ditches down another ravine above a mile distant from the one where it was diverted.

Defendant recovered judgment and plaintiff appealed.

The first instruction, given at defendant's request, was as follows:

"If the defendant and his grantors have been in the continued adverse uninterrupted possession, use and enjoyment of the waters in dispute for the period of five years preceding the commencement of this suit, the jury must find for the defendant."

The second instruction given at defendant's request, was as follows:

"If, after defendant's use of the water, it flows back into a cañon, and, without material diminution in quantity or quality, it is again conducted by plaintiff into ditch, and used by them as it would have been used but for the diversion by defendant, the jury must find for defendant."

The other facts are stated in the opinion of the Court.

Tuttle & Hillyer, for Appellant.

The second instruction, given at defendant's request, is erroneous.

Nearly all the ditches in the mining regions pass for miles along the sides of mountains, and take up the waters of numerous streams. The law, as laid down, will give the right to subsequent appropriators to go above those ditches and divert those streams to any point above the first ditch, so that the water finds its way back at some point, no matter what, into the oldest ditch. If A. excavates a ditch ten miles on the side of a mountain, diverting half a dozen streams, B. may afterwards dig a ditch eighty rods above him, of the same length, and divert the same water, if he finally empties it back into some point of A.'s ditch, even though six miles of A.'s ditch is left dry.

The first of defendant's instructions was also erroneous. It declares that if defendant had been for five years in the adverse uninterrupted possession and enjoyment of the waters in dispute, that defendant must recover.

This instruction ignores entirely the question of possession under claim of right or ownership. It assumes that a trespasser who does not claim to own the property, and knows that he does not own it, by a continuation of his trespasses may acquire a title.

This was an action to abate a nuisance. No length of time could give defendant a right to commit the nuisance. (Tuolumne Water Co. v. Chapman, 8 Cal. 397; Parker v. Kilham, 8 Cal. 79; Paddleford v. Paddleford, 7 Pickering, 152; Ewing v. Burnett, 11 Peters, 41.)

Jo Hamilton and P. L. Edwards, for Respondent.

The appellant has no right to require the return of the waters into its ditch at the point where it first diverted them, and must be satisfied if they are returned to it where they were intended to be, and were used.

If there is any error in the instructions given by the Court, it is in favor of the appellant, and not of the respondent.

This was not an action to abate a nuisance, neither in form or substance. Its only legitimate purpose was to determine the conflicting claims of the parties to the water in question.

By the Court, RHODES, J.

The plaintiff is the owner of two water ditches, constructed for mining purposes, which conduct the water from a cañon, and the defendant owns a third ditch which heads in the same cañon, above the plaintiff's ditches. The plaintiff claims the right to the water, on the ground of a prior appropriation and a continuous user down to a time subsequent to May, 1861, when, it is alleged, the defendant diverted the water into his ditch. The object of the action is to recover damages for diverting the water, and to enjoin the defendant from the further diversion of it from the plaintiff's ditches. The defendant had a verdict and judgment, and the plaintiff appeals from the judgment and the order denying the motion for a new trial.

In considering the errors assigned, several points may be passed upon at the same time.

1. The plaintiff was not entitled to a judgment on the pleadings, for the defendant denies the right of the plaintiff, except where the water has receded to four inches, and he sets up title in himself; and we hold that those matters, as set up in the answer, do constitute a defense to the plaintiff's action.

2. After the plaintiff had rested and the defendant had introduced his evidence, the plaintiff "offered to prove by William McClure, one of the former owners of plaintiff's ditches, and James McClure, former agent, that in 1853, 1854, 1857, 1858, 1859 and 1860, plaintiff had possession of and used in its ditches, during all the summer season except when there was a surplus [the] water in controversy," and the testimony was excluded on the objection of the defendant. The plaintiff alleges in its complaint that it now owns two ditches; that the ditches were constructed by its grantor in 1851 and 1852; that by means thereof, the plaintiff's grantors diverted and appropriated the waters of the cañon; that the plaintiff has owned the ditches since August, 1853; and that by means of the ditches, since they were excavated, the plaintiff and its grantors have continuously, up to May, 1861, used appropriated, diverted and enjoyed the waters flowing down said cañon above the plaintiff's ditches.

The defendant, in his answer, after denying that the plaintiff or his grantors ever had or claimed any right to the water of the cañon above where his ditch heads, except as the owners of his ditch permitted them to use such water, avers that he is the owner of said ditch, and that he and his grantors, ever since the summer of 1853, have been the owners and in the peaceable and quiet possession thereof; that the same was constructed, and ever since has been used for the purpose of conveying the waters of said cañon; that they have had the quiet and peaceable possession of said waters, and have continuously, during nine years past, diverted all of said waters that could be conveyed in their ditch; that they had the right so to do; that by "virtue of such continuous use, enjoyment and appropriation of said water," which use and possession "has been held by them adversely and against all claimants," the defendant is the owner, and entitled to the use, enjoyment and diversion of said water; and "that, by reason of the nine years use and enjoyment and diversion, and the adverse possession of the same, he has acquired the title thereto;" and that the defendant has never disputed the plaintiff's title, until the commencement of the present suit.

The plaintiff thus asserts title founded upon prior appropriation in 1851 and 1852, and the continued appropriation down to the time of the alleged diversion by the defendant in 1861; and the defendant asserts title acquired by prior appropriation in 1853, together with continuous use from that time to the commencement of the action in 1862. He also relies upon title by prescription. The Court below and the plaintiff have treated the answer as setting up the Statute of Limitations in bar of the action. We do not so understand the answer. Although it is not pleaded with great accuracy or technical precision, it contains all the substantial allegations necessary in a case where a party sets up title to an incorporeal hereditament, which has accrued to him by the continued, uninterrupted adverse use and enjoyment — a title by prescription. The right to the use of a watercourse in the public mineral lands, and the right to divert and use the water taken therefrom, is acquired by appropriation and user, the person first appropriating it being deemed to have the title, as against all the world, except the United States and persons claiming under them, to the extent that he thus appropriated it before the rights of others attached. The rights thus acquired may be held, granted, abandoned or lost by the same means as a right of the same character issuing out of lands to which a private title exists. The right of the first appropriator may be lost, in whole or in some limited portions, by the adverse possession of another. And when such person has had the continued, uninterrupted and adverse enjoyment of the watercourse, or of some certain portion of it, during the period limited by the Statute of Limitations for entry upon lands, the law will presume a grant of the right so held and enjoyed by him. (Bealy v. Shaw, 6 East. 208; Balston v. Bensted, 1 Campb. 463; Ricard v. Williams, 7 Wheat. 59; Williams v. Nelson, 23 Pick. 141; Calvin v. Burnet, 17 Wend. 564; Hammond v. Zahner, 23 Barb. 473.)

The defendant, having proven facts sufficient to warrant the jury in presuming a grant in his favor, the plaintiff, not wishing to rely upon the proof offered by it upon the same points, was at liberty to produce evidence tending to show that the defendant's enjoyment of his asserted right had not been continuous, or uninterrupted, or adverse; but it was not authorized for that purpose, to enter upon its original case, and again prove the same facts that were proved by it in making its prima facie case. At least, such evidence would be admissible only in the discretion of the Court below, in furtherance of justice—not in rebuttal, but as a part of the plaintiff's original case.

The other issue between the parties was, as already stated, a contest between them as to which had the better right, founded on prior possession and continued user. The plaintiff had called upon the same witnesses that he then offered, to prove its continuous possession and use, and they had testified concerning those matters, and the offer was in substance to prove the same facts (perhaps more in detail) that those witnesses had testified to in chief for the plaintiff. The examination of those witnesses upon the same point was not permissible, except in the discretion of the Court.

3. The plaintiff further assigns for error, the admission of the testimony of Randolph and the deposition of Beegan, so far as the same related to an arrangement between the defendant's grantors and the plaintiff's agent, on the ground that there was no proof that the agent had authority to make such an arrangement. It is sufficient on this point to say, that the Court, by its instructions, excluded that testimony from the consideration of the jury, the Court instructing them that the agent's acts in that behalf were void, because he had no authority, and there was no proof of the ratification of his acts by the company.

The plaintiff further objects to the testimony of those witnesses, because it was attempted to be proven by them, by parol, that the defendant's grantors had sold and conveyed the ditch to him. It is alleged in the answer, and not denied in the replication, that the persons who constructed the defendant's ditch sold the same to two persons, who afterward sold it to the defendant, and no evidence was needed on that point. Those sales were proven by parol evidence, without objection on the part of the plaintiff, by two other witnesses, and the record contains no objection to the testimony of Randolph on that ground. The admission of the testimony complained of, though improper as it was offered, yet under the circumstances did not amount to an error sufficient to entitle the plaintiff to a new trial.

4. The first instruction given at the request of the defendant was proper, under the pleadings. If objectionable at all, it is on the ground that it does not go far enough, for the Court might have charged the jury that if they found that "the defendant and his grantors have been in the continued, adverse, uninterrupted possession, use and enjoyment of the waters" for five years preceding the commencement of the action, they would be justified in presuming a grant to the defendant. The charge, as given, had relation to the probative facts upon which title by prescription depended, rather than to the ultimate fact of title. In that view it was not erroneous. (Hammond v. Zehner, 23 Barb. 473.) The second instruction was proper, for if the plaintiff had title to the water, and had not been injured by the acts of the defendant, the plaintiff had no cause of action against him.

The instructions concerning the adverse possession and prescription, given at the request of the plaintiff, were very favorable to it, and obviated whatever objection there might be to the defendant's instructions upon the same matter. The remaining points in the assignment of errors do not require a separate consideration.

Judgment affirmed.

SAWYER, J., concurring specially.

I concur in the judgment.

IN THE MATTER OF THE ESTATE OF CHARLES BOYD, DECEASED.

RULE IX OF THE SUPREME COURT.—Rule IX of the Supreme Court is in harmony with the three hundred and forty-sixth section of the Practice Act as amended in 1864.

TRANSCRIPT ON APPEAL.—Matter that does not tend in some degree to illustrate the points made on appeal should be omitted in a transcript.

CERTIFICATE TO TRANSCRIPT.—The object of the rule allowing attorneys to stipulate to the correctness of a transcript was to enable the attorney for the appellant, with the consent of the opposite attorney, to make up the record, and omit all useless and superfluous matter, and thereby save expense and facilitate the examination, and hasten the decision of causes.

SERVICE OF TRANSCRIPT.—The failure of the attorney for appellant to serve a copy of the transcript upon the attorney for the respondent before or at the time of filing, is not a ground for dismissing the appeal, if reasonable diligence is used, but the respondent may object to a hearing at the first term if service is not made in time for him to prepare for argument.

SAME.—When the appellant prints the transcript, service should be made before or at the time of filing, and when sent to the Clerk to be printed, the appellant should direct the Clerk to forward him copies as soon as printed for service.

STATEMENT ON APPEAL FROM PROBATE COURTS.—Section three hundred and thirty-eight of the Practice Act, prescribing what statements on appeal shall contain, applies to statements made on appeal from the Probate Courts.

STATEMENT ON APPEAL FROM PROBATE COURT.—If a statement on appeal from the Probate Court does not state specifically the particular errors or grounds upon which the appellant intends to rely, and the appeal rests on the statement alone, the appeal will be dismissed on motion of the respondent.

APPEAL from the Probate Court, El Dorado County.

This was an appeal taken by F. A. Hornblower, Public Administrator of El Dorado County, from an order of the Probate Court of that county, appointing J. H. Potter administrator of the estate of James Boyd, deceased. The appeal was dismissed on motion of respondent's attorney. Appellant afterwards, and at the same term, moved the Court to set aside the order dismissing the appeal.

George E. Williams, for Appellant.

James Johnson, for Respondent.

By the Court, SAWYER, J.

This is a motion to set aside the order dismissing the appeal.

The first ground relied on by the respondent in his motion to dismiss the appeal was, that the transcript was certified by the Clerk without having been first submitted to the attorney of the respondent for his certificate. It is claimed that under Rule IX the transcript cannot be certified by the Clerk except in cases "where the parties do not agree." These words in the rule might, perhaps, as well have been omitted, but the restriction contended for was not contemplated; nor is such a limitation necessarily implied by the language of the rule. The rule and section three hundred and forty-six, as amended in 1864, were designed to be in harmony. A transcript is a copy of the record, or portions of the record, in the case, and there is little chance for disagreement between attorneys as to whether the record is correctly copied or not, unless it is wilful. It was thought that the printing of transcripts would greatly facilitate the examination and hasten the decisions of causes, as well as lessen the liability of the Judges to overlook or misapprehend important facts in the case, and in other respects promote the administration of justice. As each attorney would have a copy, it would enable the counsel to more thoroughly prepare their cases for argument, and facilitate their references to the record. It was also anticipated that the expense would be the only objection that could be urged against printing. By omitting all matter that does not in any way serve to illustrate the points made on the appeal, and by allowing the appellant to make up the record himself, when the respondent is willing to join in the certificate, it was supposed that the expenses of the appeal would be less even than under the former system; thus every objection would be obviated and a great advantage secured. Hence the amendment of the Practice Act and the adoption of the rule. We are satisfied if parties conform in these particulars to the spirit of the amendments, especially by excluding all useless matter from the transcripts, that our highest expectations will be fully realized. We are gratified to find that transcripts are much less voluminous than formerly, but many records still contain much that might be advantageously omitted; for all matter that does not tend in some degree to illustrate the points litigated is an incumbrance and positively injurious. Many pages are often taken up with verifications of papers, acknowledgments of deeds, title of the cause repeated in every paper of the record, etc., when no point is made on them; in which case, where the record is certified by the attorneys, it would answer all purposes if in the place of the verification, acknowledgment, title, etc., the words "duly verified," "duly acknowledged," "title of the cause," etc., and the date of the document or filing were substituted.

We take this first occasion in which we are called upon to construe the rules, to call the attention of the bar and litigants to the reasons which influenced us in their adoption, in the hope that they will co-operate with us in carrying out the reform in the particulars indicated, and that thereby the expense of appeals may be lessened, and the business of this Court and the correct, as well as speedy decision of causes greatly facilitated.

Another ground relied on by respondent for dismissing the appeal was, that the printed transcript was not served on his attorney till several days after it was filed, instead of before, or at the time of filing, as required by Rule IX. The failure to serve the transcript punctually is not a ground for dismissing the appeal, if reasonable diligence is used. But, if the appellant fails to serve the transcript, he will not be permitted to bring on the hearing at the first term, against the objection of the respondent made on that ground, when he has not had ample time after service of the transcript to prepare for the argument.

When, as in this instance, the transcript is sent from a distant part of the State to the Clerk to be printed, under the provisions of Rule X, it would perhaps not be practicable in all cases to return the copies in time to serve before filing the printed transcript, without unduly delaying the filing. But in such cases, the appellant should direct the Clerk to forward to him for service the necessary copies, as soon as printed. When the appellant himself has the transcript printed, there is no reason why the copies should not be served at or before the time of filing.

The next point relied on was, that the statement on appeal does not allege specifically the particular errors or grounds upon which appellant intends to rely. Section two hundred and ninety-nine of the Probate Act authorizes the appellant to annex a statement to the record, and prescribes the time within which it shall be prepared. But it does not define the term "statement," or prescribe what it shall contain. This term is a new one, and but recently introduced into our legal vocabulary. It is used in the Practice Act, and the requisites of the statement are there prescribed. Under section three hundred of the Probate Act, the provisions of the Practice Act, section three hundred and thirty-eight, prescribing what the statement shall contain, are made applicable to appeals from the Probate Court, as it is one of the sections of Chapter I, Title 9, and is not in conflict with any provision of the Probate Act.

The Probate Act authorizes a statement to be made, but we must look to the Practice Act, section three hundred and thirty-eight, to ascertain what the statement is. In the statement the appellant must "state specifically the particular errors or grounds upon which he intends to rely on the appeal." We have discussed at length, and construed this provision at the present term in the case of Hutton v. Reed, 25 Cal. 478, and we need not repeat the discussion here. In this case a statement was necessary to present the point relied on. As no statement was made of the grounds of the appeal, in pursuance of section three hundred and thirty-eight, as construed in Hutton v. Reed, and as the appeal rests on the statement (there being no judgment roll), this objection is fatal to the motion. It is unnecessary, therefore, to decide or discuss the other objections made. We have, however, looked into the record, and find that at the time of the appointment of Hornblower, administrator, the amendment to section fifty-two of the Probate Act was not in force, and the creditor was entitled to preference over the Public Administrator.

The motion to vacate the order dismissing the appeal is denied.

LLOYD TEVIS v. JOHN S. ELLIS, JOHN WADE, DAVID CALDERWOOD, CHARLES B. HARWOOD, AND FRANCIS KATTENDORFF.

WHO SHERIFF MAY NOT DISPOSSESS ON WRIT OF RESTITUTION.—A Sheriff has no authority by virtue of a writ of restitution to remove from the premises described in the writ persons who were not parties to the judgment on which the writ was issued, and did not enter under defendant in the judgment pending the suit.

INJUNCTION TO RESTRAIN SHERIFF.—One who is the owner of land, and in possession of the same, is not entitled to an injunction to restrain a Sheriff from executing a writ of restitution issued on a judgment rendered against third parties, to which judgment the plaintiff is a stranger.

Tomlinson v. Radio, 16 Cal. 202, disapproved of by CURREN, J.

APPEAL from the District Court, Twelfth Judicial District, City and County of San Francisco.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the Court.

Patterson, Wallace & Stow, for Appellant.

Plaintiff has had two trials, one at law and one in equity, in both of which he established his right against Wade, by establishing it against his grantor, Calderwood, from whom he took a conveyance pendente lite—and as we contend from the answer, after both judgments, and if after judgment, the judgment was notice to him. (1 Bailey's Eq. 208; 1 Ohio, 372; 2 Leading Cases in Eq. 155; Adams' Eq. 367.)

Under these circumstances plaintiff was [is] entitled to an injunction, and it should not have been dissolved.

There is an injunction called a perpetual injunction for quieting a man in the possession of his estate; this is generally upon a plain equitable title, or where one, two, or more verdicts have gone against a man. This injunction is to quiet the plaintiff and his heirs forever, and all claiming by, from, or under him, and it is very often granted and in many instances the justice of the Court calls for it. (Bushnell v. Harford, 4 John. Ch. 301.)

In Dunn v. Vail, 7 Martin, La. 436, (Vol. 3, N. S. 603,) an injunction was granted to restrain the sale of personal property (a slave) claimed by plaintiff, who was not a party to the execution.

Ford v. Rigby, 10 Cal. 449, was a similar case.

Wm. W. Chipman, for Respondents.

By the Court, SHAFER, J.

The complaint states that on the 20th of August, 1862, the plaintiff was, and is now, the owner in fee simple absolute of certain lots in the City of San Francisco, and that he is in the actual possession of the lots by his tenant.

That on the 20th of August, 1862, the plaintiff recovered a judgment for the possession of the lots in an action brought by him against Daniel O'Connell.

That notice of lis pendens was filed in the Recorder's office, March 13, 1862, the day the action was commenced.

That pending the suit, O'Connell made a deed of the premises to Calderwood, defendant herein, who thereafter defended the suit; and that on the 16th day of April, 1863, by virtue of a writ of restitution issued on the aforesaid judgment, the plaintiff was put in possession of the lots, and Calderwood was ousted therefrom.

That on the 8th of December, 1862, it was adjudged and decreed in another suit, brought by Calderwood against Tevie and others, that he, Tevie, was the owner of the lots, and entitled to the possession thereof.

That the defendant Wade has no title except under Calderwood, acquired after the filing of the notice of lis pendens before named.

That the defendants herein, in pursuance of a combination between them "to obtain possession of said lots, and to compel the plaintiff to bring another action to obtain possession thereof, brought an action of ejectment in the Twelfth District Court, in the name of John Wade (one of the defendants herein,) against said Calderwood, C. B. Harwood and F. Kattendorff (also defendants herein,) to recover possession of said lands and premises."

That the complaint in said action was filed March 10, 1863, and judgment was entered therein by default June 5, 1863.

That a writ of restitution has been issued upon said judgment and is now in the hands of Ellis, Sheriff, etc., who threatens to execute said writ, and to remove plaintiff and his tenant from the possession of said premises, and will do so unless restrained by injunction.

That Calderwood, Harwood, and Kattendorff were, or some of them were, in possession of the lots, or some part thereof, at the date of the said judgment in Wade v. Calderwood. That the suit was brought by Wade at the instigation of Calderwood, and that all the defendants therein suffered judgment by default, for the fraudulent purpose of enabling Wade to obtain possession of the premises and then to surrender them to Calderwood.

That Calderwood paid the expenses connected with the suit, and has been active in soliciting and urging Ellis, the Sheriff, to execute the writ of restitution and turn plaintiff and his tenant out of possession.

Wherefore the plaintiff prays judgment that "the defendants Wade and Ellis, and the successors in office of said Ellis, his deputies, and all other persons, be perpetually restrained and enjoined from executing said writ of restitution on said judgment of Wade v. Calderwood et als., and from executing any other writ of restitution founded on said judgment, and that the plaintiff be adjudged to be the owner in fee simple of said lands and premises," etc.

A temporary injunction was granted on the complaint and affidavit, and was subsequently dissolved upon bill and answer, and from that order this appeal is taken.

It is insisted on the part of the appellant that the complaint may be sustained as a bill of peace, or on the ground of the two hundred and fifty-fourth section of the Practice Act, as a bill in equity to quiet the plaintiff's title.

For all the purposes of the present appeal, it is unnecessary to pass upon either of those questions; for, if the appellant's views concerning them should be accepted as correct, it by no means follows that he is entitled to the injunction prayed for in the complaint. A plaintiff must have good cause of action before he can claim an injunction, but he may not be entitled to an injunction though he has a good cause of action. The two things are not necessarily, nor are they even generally connected.

The bill prays that Sheriff Ellis and his successors may be restrained from executing a writ of restitution issued upon a judgment in ejectment, to which judgment neither the plaintiff nor his tenant is party or privy.

The plaintiff and his tenant are not only beyond the reach of the writ, but are unaffected by the judgment as an instrument of evidence, and therefore have nothing to fear from either. Should the Sheriff interfere with the plaintiff's possession of the lots, the writ would not only fail as a justification, but would be pertinent to convict the Sheriff of an act of official oppression.

The plaintiff, then, having no relations to the writ, and the writ having no relations to him, the writ may be laid out of account; and the question remaining to be considered is whether the defendants' threat and purpose to commit a naked trespass upon the plaintiff's land, is a ground upon which he can claim an injunction to intercept them.

The case is not as strong in its facts as the case of Tomlinson v. Rubio, 16 Cal. 202. In that case the complaint alleged that the plaintiff's business would be broken up by the threatened trespass; but in the case at bar there is no such allegation. The two cases, though differing in certain particulars, are alike in this, that so far as the relief of present injunction is concerned, the relief is asked for on the ground of a threatened trespass.

Again, the prayer of the complaint is not that the Sheriff may be restrained from dispossessing the plaintiff of the lots under the writ or under color of the writ, but generally, that the Sheriff may be restrained from "executing the writ." But the complaint charges that the plaintiff is now in possession of the lots by his tenant; and assuming that allegation to be true, then Calderwood, Harwood and Kattendorff, against whom the writ runs, must be out of possession; and if out of possession, then there is no occasion for enjoining the execution of the process as to them, nor for restraining the Sheriff from putting Wade in; for under the writ the Sheriff cannot deliver possession to Wade unless he should find the lots vacant or in the occupation of Calderwood, or perhaps in possession of those claiming under him by titles acquired pendente lite.

The decision in Ford v. Rigby, 10 Cal. 449, and in Daubenspeck v. Grear, 18 Cal. 443, to which we have been referred, went upon the ground of irreparable injury—a ground that entirely fails here. The principal purpose of this action is to obtain a decree quieting the possession of the plaintiff and suppressing future litigation at law by perpetual injunction. If it appeared by the complaint and affidavit that the defendants were doing or were threatening to do, or were procuring to be done, or were suffering to be done, some act in violation of the plaintiff's rights respecting the subject of the action and tending to render the judgment ineffectual, or tending to the great and irreparable injury of the plaintiff, an injunction might go, staying the act in view of its consequences. But the complaint does not present a case of that impression. It charges, as a ground for the injunction, that the defendants intend to disseize the plaintiff of his lands—that and no more; and asks that they may be restrained from carrying their purpose into execution.

Should the defendants succeed in their design, the remedies at law would be speedy, adequate and complete.

The order dissolving the injunction is affirmed.

CURREY, J., concurring specially.

I concur in the affirmance of the order dissolving the injunction in this case, but at the same time, in order to guard against an implication to the contrary, I desire to express my disapproval of the decision made in Tomlinson v. Rubio, 16 Cal. 202, as applied to the facts of that case.

THE PEOPLE OF THE STATE OF CALIFORNIA v.
JOHN S. LOVE, J. E. GALLOWAY, WM. A. BOLIN-
GER, W. P. WEAKS, W. P. ELLIS, AND F. L. AUD.

SUIT ON COLLECTOR'S BOND.—The District Attorney of a county has the authority, of his own volition, with or without instructions from the Controller of State, County Court, or the Board of Supervisors of a county, to bring an action upon the official bond of the Tax Collector of a county.

SAME.—All the money due on a Tax Collector's bond may be recovered in a single action in the name of The People of the State, although part of the money thus due may belong to the county and part to the State.

PARTIES DEFENDANT.—It is no misjoinder of parties defendant for the plaintiff to sue one, or any number more than one, of all the persons severally liable upon the same obligation or instrument.

COMPLAINT.—A complaint in an action on the bond given by a Tax Collector as Collector of Taxes of Yuba County, is not ambiguous and uncertain because it does not aver that any of the money sued for was collected by the Tax Collector on account of foreign miners' licenses.

TAX COLLECTOR'S BOND.—An Act of the Legislature which makes the Sheriff of a county its Tax Collector, and also makes the Sheriff and his bondsmen responsible for the payment of all taxes collected by him, has the effect of making the bond of the Sheriff his bond as Tax Collector.

COMPLAINT.—The complaint in an action on a Tax Collector's bond need not aver that the taxes charged on the assessment roll were legally assessed.

TAX COLLECTOR'S BOND.—A Tax Collector's bond, in which the principal and sureties bind themselves in the sum of fifty thousand dollars, "to be paid to the State of California in the following manner and proportion," followed by a specification of the several amounts for which each surety respectively binds himself, the aggregate amounting to the sum of fifty thousand dollars, without any specification of the amount for which the principal is bound, is valid, both against the principal and his sureties.

JOINT AND SEVERAL BOND.—A bond running thus: "for which sums respectively, unto the said State of California, in the manner and in the proportions hereinbefore set forth, we bind ourselves, our and each of our heirs, executors, and administrators, jointly and severally, firmly by these presents," is a joint and several bond.

FORM OF JUDGMENT ON OFFICIAL BOND.—A judgment rendered in an action against the sureties on an official bond, who sign for different amounts respectively, may be entered up against each surety for the amount for which he is liable on the bond, and all the costs, with a direction that plaintiff have execution on the judgment, but that no more shall be collected than the sum (mentioning the same) found to be due from the principal.

APPEAL from the District Court, Tenth Judicial District, Yuba County.

The judgment in this case, after reciting the amount found due from the principal, which was thirty-one thousand and forty-eight dollars, reads as follows:

"It is, therefore, by the Court ordered and adjudged, that the plaintiff in this action have judgment against the said J. E. Galloway, and judgment is hereby ordered in favor of the plaintiff, against the said Galloway in this action, for the sum of fifteen thousand dollars, ($15,000,) and all the plaintiff's costs in this behalf expended, taxed at $101.45."

Separate judgments, in same form, following each other,

People v. Love et al.

were rendered against each surety for the amount for which he was liable on the bond.

The judgments were followed by the following direction:

"And it is further ordered and adjudged, that the plaintiff have execution on the above judgments, but that no more shall be collected thereon than the aforesaid sum of $31,048, with accruing interest, and the costs of suit, and accruing costs."

John S. Love was the principal on the bond, but was not served with process. The sureties alone appeared and defended. Bolinger and Ellis alone appealed.

The other facts are stated in the opinion of the Court.

Chas. E. Filkins, for Appellants.

The Court below erred in overruling demurrer of defendants upon the first and second points. (People v. Lattimore, 19 Cal. 365; Wolverton v. Commonwealth, 7 Sergt. & Rawle, 273; Montgomery v. Commonwealth, 1 Monroe, Ky. 197; Practice Act, Secs. 4 and 12.)

The Court erred in overruling the fifth point in the demurrer. (Whitfield v. Woodbridge, 28d Miss., 1st Cushman, 183; Evans v. State, 2d Blackford, 388.)

The bond sued upon is not a bond required by law; is voluntary and not binding upon the sureties, and the Court erred in overruling the sixth point in the demurrer. (State v. Bartlett, 30th Miss., 1st George, 624; Statutes of 1851, page 190; Act of April 20th, 1851; Act of May 1st, 1851, pp. 153 and 158, Sec. 1; Statutes of 1854, p. 110, Sec. 92; Statutes of 1855, p. 164; Stevens et al. v. Ira Hays et al., 6th Cushing, 229; People v. Cabaness, 20 Cal. 525.)

The Court erred in entering judgment against the sureties without proceeding to judgment against the principal; there being no obligation on the part of the principal. (People v. Hartley, 21 Cal. 585; Sacramento v. Dunlap, 14 Cal. 491.)

George Rowe, and J. O. Goodwin, for Respondent.

By the Court, SANDERSON, C. J.

This is an action brought by the District Attorney of Yuba County, in the name of The People of the State of California, upon the official bond of the Tax Collector of that county to recover a certain amount of taxes, part belonging to the State and part to the county, alleged to have been collected by the Tax Collector and not paid over by him to the County Treasurer, as required by law. The defendants demurred to the complaint upon several grounds, which will be noticed in their order.

1. The objection to the effect that this action should have been brought by the Attorney-General instead of the District Attorney, is not well taken. The thirty-sixth section of the Revenue Act of the 17th of May, 1861, (Statutes of 1861, p. 431,) provides that: "If any Tax Collector shall refuse for a period of five days, or wilfully neglect to make the payments and settlements with the Treasurer and Auditor of his county, as in this Act specified, he and his sureties shall be held liable to pay the full amount of taxes charged upon the assessment roll; and the District Attorney, of his own volition, or on being instructed to do so by the Controller of State, or by the County Court or Board of Supervisors of the county, shall cause suit to be brought against such Tax Collector and his sureties for the full amount due on the Auditor's books. And if any such suit is commenced, no credit or allowance whatever shall be made to such refusing or neglecting Tax Collector for the delinquent taxes outstanding." Under this section there can be no question but that the District Attorney had full power and authority to bring this action. The terms of the Act are plain and explicit, leaving no room for construction. Upon the happening of the contingency named at the commencement of the section, it is imperatively made his duty to bring the suit "of his own volition." Whether the money sued for may belong to the State or county, or part to the former and part to the latter, or whether one suit is sufficient, or separate suits are necessary where the money belongs in part to the State and in part to the county, is of no moment so far as the question of power is concerned, for, in either event, the suit or suits are to be brought by the District Attorney, and he may bring them with or without instructions to that effect.

2. The second and fourth grounds of demurrer are to the effect that the money or taxes sued for, being in part due to the State and in part due to the county, cannot be recovered in a single action, in the name of The People of the State, and that separate suits are necessary — one in behalf of the State and the other in behalf of the county.

In considering this question, counsel for appellants turn aside from the statute, and argue from the principles of the common law, for the purpose of establishing the alleged misjoinder. But, in our judgment, the question finds a ready solution in the provisions of the Revenue Act, and no resort to common law principles is made necessary. The Tax Collector does not report to or account with any State officer for the taxes collected by him. It is his duty, upon receiving the duplicate assessment roll, to collect the taxes therein charged against the taxpayers of his county; and it is his duty, on the first Monday of each month, to pay to the County Treasurer all money in his hands belonging to or collected for the use of the State or county, and take his receipt therefor, and on the same day deliver the same, together with a true and correct account, under oath, of all his transactions since his last settlement to the County Auditor; and on the first Monday in December of each year it is made his duty to attend at the County Auditor's office, with his duplicate assessment roll, and make with the County Auditor a final settlement touching all the taxes charged against him on account of such assessment roll. If he fails to do all this he and his sureties become liable, upon his official bond, to pay the full amount of all taxes charged against him on account of said assessment roll, without any credit for outstanding delinquent taxes — said amount to be recovered by suit upon his bond. Thus the Tax Collector neither accounts to nor pays over any money to any

State officer, nor has he any duty to perform in regard to the apportionment of the money collected by him as between the State and county. His account is kept with the county, and with her he deals and settles. His whole duty is performed when he has collected the money charged in the assessment roll and paid the same to the County Treasurer and made his settlements with the County Auditor. There his duty and liability, and that of his sureties, cease. To whom the money belongs is no concern of his or of his sureties. So far as his duty and liability and that of his sureties are concerned, the money is but one fund, to be collected and paid over to a single individual. Its distribution thereafter is controlled in no way by him or them; nor is he or they in any manner responsible therefor. By their bond he and his sureties have bound themselves to the obligee in the bond to the effect that he will collect and pay over all the money charged in the assessment roll to the County Treasurer, or in default thereof he shall make good the deficit. So far as his duty, and his and their liability is concerned, the money belongs to the obligee named in the bond, and they have no legal right or license to look beyond the bond for the purpose of seeing where the money goes, nor need they be at all anxious whether the right party gets it. That duty the law has not imposed upon them. When they have watched its course until it has reached the hands of the County Treasurer their supervision is no further required. As to them the money constitutes but one fund, to wit: the public revenue, and belongs to but one owner, to wit: the public, and has but one custodian, to wit: the County Treasurer. When there is a defalcation, such defalcation is measured by the difference between the total amount charged against the Collector in the Auditor's books, and the amount paid to the Treasurer by him. For the purpose of a suit upon his bond, such deficit constitutes but one sum, and may be declared for without designating the State's or county's portion. The statute manifestly contemplates but one suit, to be brought by the District Attorney in the name of the obligee named in the bond. It speaks in the singular number, and provides, without limitation, that the full amount found due on the Auditor's books may be recovered in that suit. Nor does this impose any hardship upon the Tax Collector or his sureties; on the contrary, it enables them to determine in one suit what otherwise would require two. Nor is there any technical difficulty, as we have already seen, in determining the whole controversy in one action. Where this can be done, the policy of the law requires that it should be done. It follows that the record presents no case of misjoinder.

3. The next ground of demurrer is to the effect that there is a misjoinder of parties defendant, because J. G. Eshom, one of the sureties upon the bond, is not made a party.

The bond upon which the suit is brought, as will more fully appear hereafter, is joint and several. The fifteenth section of the Practice Act provides that "persons severally liable upon the same obligation or instrument * * * ~~may~~ all, or any of them, be included in the same action, at the option of the plaintiff." This section changes the common law rule, that one or all, and not any intermediate number, may be sued. Under this section a plaintiff may, at his election, sue one or more, or all the persons severally liable upon the same obligation or instrument.

4. It is next claimed that the complaint is ambiguous and uncertain because it does not designate what portion, if any, of the money sued for was collected by the Tax Collector on account of foreign miners' licenses, for which amount, if any, the sureties upon the bond in suit were not liable.

There is no averment in the complaint showing that any of the money sued for was collected by the Tax Collector on account of foreign miners' licenses, nor is there any averment from which it can be inferred that any money realized from that source constitutes a part of the amount for which judgment is asked. It is true that under the law relating to the Tax Collector of Yuba County (Statutes of 1855, p. 164) he is required to give the same bonds which were theretofore required of the Sheriff in his capacity of ex officio Tax Collector. Of the Sheriff (as will hereafter more fully appear) the law required two bonds—one for fifty thousand dollars as Collector of Taxes, and one for fifteen thousand dollars as Collector of Foreign Miners' Licenses. The former bond is the one sued on, and upon that bond neither the Tax Collector nor his sureties could be made liable for any defalcation for money collected on account of foreign miners' licenses. In suing upon this bond the plaintiff alleges in substance that the Tax Collector had collected a certain amount of money belonging to the State and county which he failed and refused to pay over according to law, and that in consequence of such failure he and his sureties have become liable for that amount upon the bond in suit. This was sufficient in our judgment, and it was not necessary to insert a negative allegation to the effect that no part of the money sued for was derived from foreign miners' licenses. The particular source or sources from which the Tax Collector obtained the money was matter of proof rather than allegation. In any event it is clear that there is no such ambiguity in the complaint as would justify us in disturbing the judgment on that ground. No recovery was had on account of money derived from foreign miners' licenses, and we do not think the defendants have been in any manner prejudiced by any real or supposed ambiguity in the complaint.

5. It is next claimed that the complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action; first, because the bond sued on is not a bond required by law, but is a mere voluntary bond, and therefore not binding upon the defendants; second, because there is no averment that the taxes were legally assessed by the proper officers. These positions the learned counsel for appellant has also failed, in our judgment, to maintain.

Prior to the first day of May, 1851, taxes were collected by the County Treasurer. From that time until the office of Tax Collector was created in Yuba County (April 27, 1855) the taxes were collected by the Sheriff. By the Act of the 27th of April, 1851, (Compiled Laws, 711) the Sheriff of Yuba County was required to give a bond in the sum of fifty thousand dollars for the faithful performance of the duties pertaining to his office as Sheriff. By the Act of the 30th of March, 1853, (Compiled Laws, 219) the Sheriff was required to give a bond in the sum of fifteen thousand dollars for the faithful performance of his duties as Collector of the foreign miners' license tax. By the Revenue Act of 1854, section ninety-two (Statutes of 1854, p. 110,) the Sheriff and his bondsmen were made responsible for the payment of all taxes collected by him. By the Act of 1855, (Statutes of 1855, p. 164,) separating the office of Tax Collector from that of Sheriff in Yuba County, the Tax Collector is required to give such bond or bonds as were then required by law to be given by the Sheriff as Tax Collector.

It is claimed by counsel for the appellants that under the statutes above cited the Sheriff was never required to give any bond as Tax Collector, except the bond for fifteen thousand dollars for the performance of his duty as Collector of the foreign miners' license tax, and hence that the Tax Collector is not required by law to give any bond except the bond for fifteen thousand dollars. Such is not the proper construction. By declaring that the Sheriff and his bondsmen should be responsible for all taxes collected by him, the Legislature in effect declared that his bond as Sheriff should be his bond as Tax Collector. The same individual was vested with two offices, but for the sake of convenience he was required to give but one bond. That bond pertained no more to one office than it did to the other, but pertained equally to both. It was his bond as Sheriff and his bond as Tax Collector, and when he gave it he gave it as Tax Collector as well as Sheriff. Such being the case, the law of 1855 requiring the Tax Collector to give the same bonds which had been previously required of the Sheriff made it obligatory upon him to give two bonds—one in the sum of fifty thousand dollars and the other in the sum of fifteen thousand dollars. Pursuant to this requirement of the statute the bond in suit was given, and the same, so far as the question under consideration is concerned, is binding and obligatory upon the principal and his sureties.

Nor do we think it was necessary to aver that the taxes charged upon the assessment roll were legally assessed. The statute provides that, upon the happening of the contingency named, the principal and his sureties shall be liable to pay the full amount of the taxes charged upon the assessment roll. Thus the assessment roll is made the measure of their liability, regardless of the fact as to whether the taxes there charged have been collected. It was the intention of the Legislature to relieve the State from the burden of proving the legality of the assessment, or the collection of the taxes, and make the Auditor's books the measure and the evidence of the liability. This is made more manifest by the clause which forbids any credit or allowance for delinquent taxes outstanding and uncollected. The sufficiency of the complaint is to be determined by a reference to the provisions of the statute under which the suit is brought, and not by a resort to the principles of the common law, to which our attention is invited by the counsel for the appellants. Tested by those provisions, the complaint is not, in our judgment, obnoxious to the objection under consideration.

6. It is next claimed that the principal, by reason of the peculiar phraseology of the bond, is not bound thereby, notwithstanding he has signed it, and that, therefore, his sureties are not.

The principal and his sureties all sign the bond and bind themselves in the sum of fifty thousand dollars, "to be paid to the State of California in the following manner and proportion;" then follows a specification of the several amounts for which each surety respectively binds himself, the aggregate amounting to the sum of fifty thousand dollars, without any specification as to the amount for which the principal is bound, and it is argued by counsel for the appellants that by reason of the absence of any specification as to the principal, he is not bound. By this process of reasoning the learned counsel for the appellant substitutes the exception for the rule. The specifications are limitations upon the general clause which precedes. Strike them from the bond and the principal and sureties are all bound in the sum of fifty thousand dollars. Insert them and the liability of the sureties is reduced to the amounts respectively specified, but the principal, not being named in the exception, is wholly unaffected thereby and stands as before bound for the full amount of fifty thousand dollars.

7. It is next claimed that the bond in suit is a joint bond only and not joint and several, and upon that hypothesis, several other points are made, which, in view of the conclusion we have arrived at upon the first, it is unnecessary to notice in detail. The language which characterizes the liability of the obligors is as follows: "For which sums respectively, unto the said State of California, in the manner and in the proportion hereinbefore set forth, we bind ourselves, our and each of our heirs, executors and administrators, jointly and severally, firmly by these presents." If, by the use of words, a joint and several liability can be created, it would seem that it has been done in this instance. We certainly know of no words more apt to express that idea than those used. They have been long used for that purpose, and we are not aware that they have lost their force and vigor. In this connection our attention is called to the case of Sacramento v. Dunlap, 14 Cal. 421, and the case of The People v. Hartley, 21 Cal. 585. The first case, as reported, does not contain a copy of the bond sued on. In the opinion of the Court it is declared to be a joint, and not a joint and several bond; but as a copy of the bond is not given, that case throws no light upon the question under consideration. In The People v. Hartley, a copy of the bond was given, and the words "joint and several" were not used. The word "severally" was used, which the Court read as applying only to the various sums for which the sureties bound themselves, and not as giving legal character to their liability. The language used was less explicit than that found in the present case, and the conclusion to which the Court arrived in that case cannot be regarded as establishing a rule for the decision of this, where the language is too clear and precise to afford any room for construction.

People v. Garcia.

The objection to the form of the judgment is not well taken. It is in conformity with the rule of the common law, and we are not aware that that rule has been disturbed by statute.
Judgment affirmed.

THE PEOPLE v. JOSE GARCIA.

COUNTY WHERE INDICTMENT MAY BE FOUND.—Where a hired servant who is intrusted by his employer with property withdraws himself from his employer and goes away with the property with intent to steal the same and defraud his employer thereof, he may be indicted and tried for the offense in any county into which he takes the property and is found.

INDICTMENT.—An indictment against a servant for withdrawing himself from his employer and taking with him his employer's property, intrusted to him, with intent to steal the same and defraud his employer thereof, is sufficient, if it charge the offense in the language of the Act defining it, and set out fully the circumstances under which it was committed.

ADMISSION IN CRIMINAL CASE.—An admission of a fact made by a defendant's counsel for the purposes of the trial in a criminal case, in open Court and in the defendant's presence, and not objected to by him, and recorded by the Court, is presumed to be with the defendant's consent, and may be read in evidence against him on the trial.

CHARGE OF COURT IN CRIMINAL CASE.—If the record does not show that the charge of the Court below was oral, the Supreme Court will not presume that it was oral, but the presumption will be that it was in writing.

ORAL CHARGE TO JURY MAY BE WITHDRAWN.—If a portion of the charge of the Court to the jury was oral, and counsel for the defendant objected to it on that ground, the Court may withdraw the oral charge and direct the jury to disregard it, and reduce it to writing and give it as written.

APPEAL from the County Court, Tuolumne County.

The following is the indictment:

"José Gasseo is accused by the Grand Jury of Tuolumne County by this indictment of the crime of going away with the property of another, with intent to steal," etc., committed as follows: "That the said José Gasseo, at the County of Mariposa, on the 24th day of August, 1863, and previous thereto, was the hired servant, as laborer and farm servant, of Edward C. Bell, his master and employer; and that as such hired servant he was intrusted by his master and employer with one bayo coyote horse, of the value of eighty dollars, and two saddles, of the value of fifteen dollars each; and that the said José Gasseo, being so intrusted with the horse and saddles aforesaid, the same being the property of the said Edward C. Bell, his employer as aforesaid, did withdraw himself from his master and employer aforesaid, and go away with the property aforesaid, with intent to steal the same, and defraud his master and employer, Edward C. Bell, thereof, contrary to the trust and confidence in him reposed by his master and employer aforesaid; and that the said José Gasseo did bring the said property into the County of Tuolumne. All of which is contrary to the form of the statute, and against the peace of the people of the State of California."

Defendant, when arraigned, gave his true name as José Garcia.

Defendant was convicted, and appealed.

The other facts are stated in the opinion of the Court.

James W. Coffroth, for Appellant.

Defendant's counsel had no power to bind by his admissions the defendant. The transcript shows that defendant was addressed through an interpreter. His assent to or knowledge of the admission is not shown by the record. By our statutes defendant's attorney could not plead guilty for him; ergo, how could the attorney admit a fact establishing defendant's guilt? (Wood's Digest, 293, sec. 301; 4 Cal. 238.)

Our Federal Constitution says that a party charged with crime shall be confronted on the trial with the witnesses against him. (U. S. Const., Art. VI—amendments; Greenleaf on Evidence, Vol. 3, sec. 39.) The only exception to this rule is in cases of dying declarations. (People v. Glenn, 6 Cal.)

J. G. McCullough, Attorney-General, for Respondent.

The admission would be good for defendant—why not for the State? (People v. Diaz, 6 Cal. 248; People v. Green, 15 Cal. 512.)

People v. Garcia.

They were competent testimony—were forced on the State—beneficial to defendant—voluntary on his part. They were solemn admissions in open Court; made on the trial, and taken as part of the proofs of the case. The defendant may waive a constitutional privilege, except only in capital cases perhaps. (1 Whar. Crim. Law, sec. 591, e.) But these cases go upon the theory of benefit to the prisoner—that when asked he may fear injury to his cause unless he consent to a waiver, and he will not be permitted to consent his life away. Here, the defendant actually forced the State to accept his admissions. Besides, these cases only go to the waiver of a constitutional privilege, and not to the admission of facts, which the State otherwise would be bound to prove. The defendant or his counsel may admit such a fact in open Court at the trial. (8 Greenlf. on Evidence, sec. 39; Regina v. Thornhill, 8 Car. & Payne, 575; People v. Hobson, 17 Cal. 425–431; People v. Bruzzo, 24 Cal. 41.)

By the Court, SAWYER, J..

There was no error in overruling the demurrer to the indictment. The property is alleged to have been brought into Tuolumne County, and the offense was indictable in that county. (Wood's Digest, 277, secs. 87–92.)

The offense is charged in the language of the Act defining it, (Wood's Digest, 339, sec. 70,) and the circumstances under which it was committed are fully set out. This has repeatedly been held to be sufficient under our statute, without using the word "feloniously." (6 Cal. 487; 7 Cal. 403; 10 Cal. 309; 14 Cal. 30; 19 Cal. 601.)

On the 20th of January the District Attorney filed an affidavit, stating that a witness for the prosecution, who had been subpoenaed, was absent, and the facts which he expected to prove by him, and asked a postponement of the trial. The prisoner's counsel opposed the postponement, and offered to admit the facts expected to be proved by the absent witness, and thereupon made, and permitted to be entered upon the records of the Court, an admission "that the property mentioned in the indictment was intrusted to the defendant by Edward C. Bell, to take to the ranch in Merced County. * * And that the value thereof is as set forth in the indictment." Upon the entry of this admission upon the records, the Court denied the motion to postpone the trial.

On the 21st the case was called for trial. Again the defendant's attorney, in the presence of the defendant in open Court, admitted the same facts, and consented that the admission be again entered on the records of the Court, which was accordingly done.

After examining several witnesses on the part of the prosecution whose testimony tended to prove the same and other facts, the District Attorney, without objection by the defendant, read to the jury from the records of the Court the admissions thus made and entered, and rested.

After the District Attorney had made his opening argument to the jury, and during the argument of defendant's counsel, the counsel for defendant, for the first time, asked the Court to strike from the testimony the admissions read in evidence as before stated, on the ground that the testimony was illegal and incompetent. The Court refused to strike out, but no exception was taken to the ruling.

The defendant's counsel, at the close of the argument, asked the Court, substantially, to charge the jury to disregard the said admissions read in evidence, which the Court refused to do, but no exception was taken to the refusal. The admission of this evidence, and the several subsequent rulings in regard to it, are assigned as error. The admission was a solemn admission of record of a fact at the commencement of the trial, and for the purposes of the trial, by the prisoner's counsel in open Court, in his presence, and we must presume with his consent. And the admission was on the trial read from the record, in pursuance of the purpose for which the admission and record were made, without any objection on the part of the prisoner. An admission of a fact made at the trial in open Court by the prisoner or his counsel may be properly considered by the jury, (3 Greenl. Ev., Sec. 39; People v. Hobson, 17 Cal. 425-431,) and such we consider this to be. No exception was taken to the subsequent rulings in regard to it.

We cannot presume that the charge was oral. The presumption is that the action of the Court was in pursuance of the law, and that the charge was in writing. (People v. Chung Lit, 17 Cal. 322.) If the Court gave the charge orally, the fact should appear in the record. The strong implication from the record is that the charge of the Court was in writing. For it appears that the Court at first gave a written charge, asked by the District Attorney, with an oral explanation, to which defendant excepted because the explanation was not in writing, whereupon the Court withdrew the instruction and oral explanation, reduced the same to writing, and read them to the jury as written, directing the jury to disregard them as first given. It does not appear that any oral charge was given other than as just stated. If there had been, the Court, after what occurred, would undoubtedly have corrected the error. We think it was competent for the Court to correct the error at the time, in the manner shown by the record.

No other point requires notice.

Judgment affirmed.

JAMES N. BURSON ON HIS OWN BEHALF, AS WELL AS ON BEHALF OF THE PEOPLE OF THE STATE OF CALIFORNIA v. SAMUEL COWLES, COUNTY JUDGE OF THE CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO.

APPEAL TO COUNTY COURT.—An appeal to the County Court lies from a judgment rendered in a Justice's Court in an action brought to recover the penalty for an overcharge, pursuant to the provisions of the Act of the 14th of April, 1863, concerning street railroads in this State.

CIVIL ACTIONS.—Where the Legislature creates a right of action, and makes no special provisions for its enforcement other than by directing that a civil action may be brought for that purpose, such action may be commenced and prosecuted pursuant to the provisions of the general law regulating proceedings in civil cases, and parties to such actions may take all steps authorized thereby.

Burson v. Cowles.

PETITION to the Supreme Court for a writ of prohibition to the County Judge of the City and County of San Francisco.

Plaintiff recovered judgment in the Justice's Court in San Francisco against the Omnibus Railroad Company for the sum of two hundred dollars, for having charged him six and one quarter cents each for four tickets for passage, and defendant appealed to the County Court. In the County Court plaintiff moved that the appeal be dismissed, which motion was denied. Plaintiff then applied to the Supreme Court for a writ of prohibition commanding the County Judge to desist from all further proceedings in the case.

J. A. Fletcher, for Petitioner.

All proceedings under a special Act must be had by authority of the Act itself. (Dorsey v. Barry, 24 Cal. 449; Cosgrave v. Howland, 24 Cal. 457.)

Wm. H. L. Barnes, for Defendant.

The amendment of 1854, which is the law now in force, provides that:

"Any party dissatisfied with a judgment rendered in a Justice's Court, may appeal therefrom to the County Court of the county at any time within thirty days after the rendition of the judgment." (Prac. Act, Sec. 624.)

And the Judiciary Act, passed May 19, 1853, at section forty-three, provides:

"The County Court shall have jurisdiction to hear and determine all civil causes appealed thereto from a Justice's, Mayor's, or Recorder's Court, in the county."

Certainly no legislation was necessary in the passage of this "Act concerning street railroads," in order to give the right of appeal from a judgment of a Justice's Court in a civil action. It had already been given in the broadest terms in all actions.

By the Court, SANDERSON, C. J.

This is an application for a writ of prohibition to be directed to the Hon. Samuel Cowles, County Judge of the City and County of San Francisco, commanding him to desist from all further proceedings in a certain suit taken to his Court by appeal from a Justice's Court, on the ground that no appeal is given by law in the action in question. The action referred to was brought by Burson to recover of the Omnibus Railroad Company the sum of two hundred dollars for alleged overcharges, pursuant to the provisions of the Act of the 14th of April, 1863, concerning street railroads in this State. (Statutes 1863, p. 296.) The only question involved in the case is as to whether an appeal in such an action is allowed, from the judgment of the Justice's Court to the County Court.

It is claimed on the part of the petitioner that the judgment of the Justice's Court is a final judgment, from which there is no appeal; and in support of this proposition it is argued that the action authorized by the provisions of the Act in question is not an ordinary civil action, in which the method of procedure is found in the Practice Act, but, on the contrary, that it is a proceeding in its character summary and governed solely by the provisions of the statute creating it, and hence, no appeal being given in terms, the right to an appeal does not exist.

The Act in question provides a penalty for overcharging in the sum of two hundred dollars, and that it may be recovered in a civil action in any Justice's Court in the County, or in the city and county, as the case may be, in which the street railroad is situated. Beyond the words "civil action" the Act contains no terms descriptive of the nature and character of the proceeding authorized by its provisions. The words "civil action" are not restricted or qualified in any manner. No mode of issuing or serving summons is prescribed. No provision for a trial or the other various steps incident to an action is made. On the contrary, the Act is entirely silent upon the mere mode of procedure except in so far as the same is imported by the term "civil action;" and we fail to find in the Act any provision which at all distinguishes the "civil action" therein mentioned from any other civil action. The clause making the plaintiff in the action a competent witness, in his own behalf, in no respect can be said to affect the mode of procedure; but if it did, it would not distinguish it from the mode adopted in other civil actions, for the same provision existed in the Practice Act at the time the Act in question became law. The same is true of the clause which directs the distribution and payment of the judgment when collected. (Section 633 of the Practice Act.)

Thus the Act merely creates a cause of action to be enforced in a "civil action" in a Justice's Court. In this State there is but one form of civil action, and but one mode of procedure therein, which is prescribed by the Practice Act. By the six hundred and twenty-fourth section of that Act, "any party dissatisfied with a judgment rendered in a Justice's Court may appeal therefrom to the County Court of the county at any time within thirty days after the rendition of the judgment."

Where the Legislature creates a right of action and makes no special provisions for its enforcement, other than by directing that a civil action may be brought for that purpose, such action may be commenced and prosecuted pursuant to the provisions of the general law regulating proceedings in civil cases, and parties to such actions may take any and all steps authorized thereby.

The writ is denied.

JAMES MITCHELL v. JOHN B. HOCKETT AND JAMES J. DICKENSON.

EVIDENCE OF SATISFACTION OF EXECUTION.—The return of a Sheriff, indorsed on an execution placed in his hands for collection, that the execution is satisfied by promissory notes received for the amount due on it, is not evidence of the satisfaction of the judgment on which it was issued, nor can it be admitted in evidence as tending to prove a satisfaction of the same.

SATISFACTION OF EXECUTION BY NOTES.—The plaintiff in an execution may accept of promissory notes by a special agreement, as an absolute payment of the same, but the agreement must be proved by testimony other than the Sheriff's certificate.

SALE OF A JUDGMENT.—In the purchase of a judgment the rule of coest emptor applies, so far as third parties are concerned, in the same manner as in the purchase of any other personal property. If the assignor has no title, the purchaser will take none, whether he have notice of a former sale or not.

SEAL.—It is not necessary that the assignment of a judgment should be under seal.

SATISFACTION OF JUDGMENT.—If the defendant in a judgment delivers to the plaintiff therein a promissory note of third parties in satisfaction of the same, which is void because fraudulently obtained by defendant from the payors, it is not necessary for the plaintiff to return the note before enforcing his judgment by execution.

SPECIAL ISSUES WITHDRAWN FROM A JURY.—Where special issues are submitted to a jury, and they announce that they cannot agree upon the special issues, but can agree upon a general verdict, and by consent of counsel on both sides the special issues are withdrawn and a general verdict received by the Court, no error is committed.

APPEAL from the District Court, Thirteenth Judicial District, Stanislaus County.

In 1854, Mitchell, the plaintiff, recovered a judgment against Jacob H. Gardenhire, and on the same day assigned it to Terry & Perley by an assignment in writing, which was deposited with the Clerk of the Court. In 1856 Mitchell took out execution on the judgment, and placed the same in the hands of Kirk, the Sheriff, who levied on property claimed by a son of Gardenhire. Mitchell and four others indemnified the Sheriff, and he sold the property. Gardenhire's son sued the Sheriff and Hockett and Dickenson, appellants here, who were his official bondsman, for taking the property, and recovered judgment. The judgment was collected from Hockett and Dickenson, and to protect them the Sheriff assigned to them the indemnifying bond which he had received from Mitchell and others. H. & D. then sued Mitchell on the indemnifying bond, and recovered judgment for six hundred and seventy dollars and thirty-two cents costs, and issued execution on the same, and the Sheriff levied on Mitchell's property. Mitchell then issued a second execution on his judgment against Gardenhire, and caused a levy to be made on property, when Gardenhire's son and one Martin gave Mitchell their note for the amount due on the judgment against Gardenhire, and the levy was released. Martin and young Gardenhire claimed that Mitchell agreed to assign them the judgment in consideration of the note. Mitchell assigned the note to Hockett and Dickenson, and the Sheriff released the property levied on, and returned their execution against Mitchell with the indorsement mentioned in the opinion of the Court. Hockett and Dickenson sued young Gardenhire and Martin on the note, and they interposed a defense that Mitchell did not own the judgment for which it was given, and had obtained it by fraud, etc., and defeated H. & D. in the suit. Hockett and Dickenson then caused another execution to be issued on their judgment against Mitchell, and the Sheriff levied on Mitchell's property. Mitchell then commenced the present action to enjoin the sale of his property, and further proceedings on the judgment, on the ground that the judgment had been paid.

The third instruction referred to in the opinion of the Court was as follows:

"That if the jury believe from the evidence that Hockett and Dickenson received the note of Martin and Gardenhire from Mitchell in satisfaction of their judgment against him, then that they had no right again to enforce execution on said judgment until they had returned said note to Mitchell; or, in other words, they must place Mitchell in the same position he was in at the time they received the note."

Plaintiff recovered judgment in the Court below, and defendants appealed.

The other facts are stated in the opinion of the Court.

L. Quint, for Appellants.

The Sheriff had no authority to discharge or satisfy the execution, much less the judgment, by returning it satisfied, unless he proceeded and executed it in due process of law.

The taking of a negotiable promissory note, receiving it as payment, and returning the execution satisfied, would not operate as a discharge of the execution, even though the defendant pay subsequently such note to third parties to whom it had been assigned. (Bank of Orange County v. Wakeman, 7 Cow. 46; Hart v. Waterhouse, 1 Mass. 433.)

Taking the promissory note of a third party, or even of the party himself, for a pre-existing debt, does not extinguish the debt, unless it be so expressly stipulated. (Ramsdell v. Percival, 12 Pick. 126; Wilkins v. Hill, 8 Ib. 522; Pomeroy v. Rime, 16 Ib. 22; Greenwood v. Curtes, 4 Mass. 93; Thompson v. Bills, 4 Ib. 192-194; Cole v. Sackett, 1 Hall, 516; Griffith v. Grogan et al., 12 Cal. 317.)

A judgment with reference to its assignable qualities is a chose inaction, and may be assigned by an instrument in writing, without being under seal; or even a parol assignment is good. (Ford v. Stuart, 19 Johns. 342; Allen v. Holden, 9 Mass. 133; Brown v. The P. D. Co., 11 Mass. 152; Dunn v. Snell et als., 15 Mass. 481; Crandall v. Blen, 13 Cal. 15.)

S. Heydenfeldt, and Dwinelle & Shafter, for Respondent.

The second alleged error is in allowing improper testimony, to wit: "the return of the Sheriff upon the execution marked 'C' to show satisfaction of the same."

Respondent upon this point does not contest the soundness of the principles and authorities cited in appellant's brief, but holds them totally inapplicable to the facts in this case.

The plaintiff in an execution certainly has the moral and legal right to accept satisfaction of the same in any substance and in any manner he may deem proper, and his direction to the Sheriff to satisfy the execution must be controlling and conclusive.

If any doubt can be suggested as to the agency of the Sheriff to make the arrangement for the appellants, then it is insisted that their acts in receiving the note and bringing suit upon it was a ratification of the act; they could not accept of the benefit of a part of the arrangement without submitting to the entire transaction; and having endeavored to avail themselves of what was valuable, they must also submit to what is onerous, especially as the latter was the consideration for the former.

Mitchell v. Hockett et al.

By the Court, SAWYER, J.

Plaintiff introduced in evidence an execution in the case of Hockett et al v. Mitchell, and the return of the Sheriff indorsed thereon in the words following: "I return this execution satisfied by two notes of hand—one for ninety-one dollars and seventy-two cents, and the other, six hundred and fifty dollars, making in all seven hundred and forty-one dollars and seventy-two cents—and the above property is released. July 20, 1857."

The object was to prove the satisfaction of the judgment—the main issue in the case. The defendants objected to the introduction of the return, on the ground that it was improper evidence to prove satisfaction of the judgment. The objection was overruled and defendants excepted.

If this return contained any element entitled to be considered, which tended to prove satisfaction of the judgment, it was admissible. But we think it does not. The officer, by virtue of his office, had no authority to accept notes in satisfaction of the judgment, and no authority to certify any other act than one performed in the proper exercise of his powers. The judgment creditor may, undoubtedly, by an express agreement, receive a promissory note in satisfaction of a judgment, or any other antecedent debt. But it must be by an express agreement. "It is a rule well settled * * * that taking a note, either of a debtor or of a third person, for a pre-existing debt, is no payment, unless it be expressly agreed to take the note in payment, and run the risk of its being paid; or unless the creditor parts with the note, or is guilty of laches in not presenting it for payment in due time. * * * It only postpones the time of payment of the old debt until a default be made in the payment of the note." (Toby v. Barlow, 5 John. 68; Griffith v. Grogan, 12 Cal. 322.)

If there was any satisfaction of the judgment and execution, it was by an acceptance of the notes referred to in the return by the plaintiff in the execution, under a special agreement to take the paper as absolute payment; and it was necessary to prove such acceptance and agreement by testimony other than the Sheriff's certificate. The Sheriff's certificate upon that point was no more entitled to be considered than the certificate of any other person. His return that it was satisfied in the particular manner specified, in effect amounts to nothing more, than a certificate that the plaintiff received the notes under a special agreement to accept them as an absolute payment and extinguishment of the debt, and in satisfaction of the judgment. The certificate being incompetent to prove these facts, it was error to admit it in evidence. As it was admitted, the jury must be presumed to have considered and given it weight in making up their verdict.

The defendants allege, and introduce testimony tending to prove, that the notes referred to in the Sheriff's return (being non-negotiable notes) were obtained by plaintiff by fraud practiced by him upon the makers, Martin and Gardenhire; that the consideration of the notes was the assignment to the makers of a judgment represented by plaintiff to be then held by him against J. H. Gardenhire — the father of one of the makers — when, in fact, the said plaintiff had, before the making of said notes, assigned said judgment to other parties; that at the time of the assignment to Martin and Gardenhire he did not own the judgment; and that there was, therefore, no consideration for the notes, and they were fraudulently obtained. There was testimony, also, tending to show that the first assignment of said judgment was made by a written instrument under seal, and filed among the records of the case on the day of its recovery. But it was claimed by plaintiff, that the testimony was insufficient to show that the instrument had a seal.

With reference to this testimony the Court, at the request of the plaintiff, and under objection and exception on the part of the defendants, gave the following instruction: "That an assignment of a judgment entered in a Court of record, in order to give notice to third parties, must be under seal and filed and entered in the Clerk's office where the judgment was entered. That if they believed from the evidence that no such assignment was made by plaintiff, then that the plaintiff could enforce the collection of such judgment by execution, and that any settlement which he might make would be a full discharge of the defendants." This instruction, if it contains any principle proper to be stated to the jury, is so ambiguous that it must necessarily have confused and misled them. The first part of the instruction, as to "notice to third parties," seems to refer to the assignees of the judgment under the assignment made in consideration of the notes. Treating them as third parties purchasing the judgment, we are not aware of any rule of law that makes any notice, actual or constructive, necessary in order to prevent them from taking title by an assignment. If they buy a judgment, the rule of caveat emptor — so far as any interest acquired as against third parties is concerned — applies to them in the same manner as in the purchase of any other personal property. If the assignor has no title they will take none, whether they have notice or not. The latter part of the instruction referring to "any settlement" which "would be a full discharge of the defendants," must refer to some party different from the "third parties" mentioned in the first part of the instruction. If the judgment debtor should pay to his judgment creditor the amount of his judgment before notice of the assignment, he would be discharged. If it was intended to instruct as to any principle of law applicable to these different classes of parties, the instructions should have been presented in distinct propositions, and in such a manner that the jury could clearly comprehend the scope and purpose of the instructions, and be able to apply them intelligently to the testimony.

It is not necessary that an assignment of a judgment should be made under seal. (Ford v. Stuart, 19 John. R. 342.)

If the jury attempted to make anything at all out of this instruction, or attempted to apply it to the testimony, they must almost necessarily have been misled, and it was the leading instruction in the case.

The third instruction given at the request of the plaintiff, if correct in other respects, ignores the question of fraud in obtaining the note and in inducing defendants to accept it. If the note was a nullity on account of any fraud perpetrated by Mitchell, as there is testimony tending to show, it would not be necessary for defendants to return it before enforcing their judgment by execution. Conceding such necessity when the transaction was made in good faith, still the acceptance of the note under such circumstances as is claimed by the defense to have been shown by the testimony would vitiate the agreement.

As was very proper in this class of cases, the cause was submitted to the jury upon special issues. It is very remarkable, when we consider the question submitted, that they could not agree upon the special issues but did agree upon a general verdict. But counsel, before the verdict was announced upon the statement of the jury that they could not agree upon the special issues, consented to receive the general verdict, and there was no error in this.

There are many other points made which we do not consider it necessary to notice.

We think the judgment should be reversed and a new trial had, and it is so ordered.

Mr. Justice SHAFER, having been of counsel, did not participate in the decision of this case.

COMPLAINT.—An allegation in the complaint, of the place where the property was taken, in an action to recover possession of personal property, is surplusage.

DENIAL IN ANSWER.—Where the complaint avers that the defendant wrongfully and unlawfully took and carried away personal property, and the answer denies that defendant wrongfully and unlawfully took and carried it away, it is a confession of the taking and carrying away, and a denial merely of its wrongful character.

SHERIFF'S BILL OF SALE.—A Sheriff's bill of sale of personal property sold on execution need not contain all the formalities of a regular certificate.

APPEAL from the District Court, Seventh Judicial District, Solano County.

On the 24th day of September, 1861, A. Y. Easterby recovered judgment in the District Court for Napa County, against James Glassford, for five thousand seven hundred dollars and ninety-nine cents, and an execution was issued thereon and placed in the hands of J. S. Stark, the Sheriff of Napa County, who levied on, and on the 4th day of October, 1861, sold to plaintiff, Lay, at Glassford's ranch, two thousand and eleven sacks of wheat. There was some doubt as to whether Glassford's ranch was in Napa County, and on the day of sale Glassford consented to the same.

On the 5th day of October, 1861, and before Lay had removed all the wheat from Glassford's ranch, Lewis and Merchant commenced an action against Glassford in the District Court of Solano County, and placed the same in the hands of defendant, Neville, who was Sheriff of Solano County, who, on the same day, at Glassford's ranch, levied on five hundred sacks of the same wheat.

It was to recover this wheat or its value that this action was brought.

Lay claimed title under the sale made by the Sheriff of Napa, and claimed that the ranch was in Napa County, while defendant, Neville, claimed that it was in Solano County.

The following is the certificate of purchase executed to plaintiff by the Sheriff of Napa:

Lay v. Neville.

"District Court, Seventh Judicial District, Napa County.

"A. Y. EASTERBY

v.

"J. GLASSFORD.

"I have sold this day to John Lay, at public sale, on execution in the above cause, two thousand and eleven sacks of wheat, lying at the ranch of Glassford, for and in consideration of the sum of three thousand and sixty-two dollars and five cents, the receipt whereof is hereby acknowledged.

"NAPA, October 4, 1861.

"J. S. STARK, Sheriff Napa County.

"Per J. H. WATERSON, Under Sheriff."

Whitman & Wells, for Appellant.

This is one of the cases that form an exception to the rule respecting hearsay testimony, and, being on a question of public right, is well established — so well established, it has been said, "that Judges, the most fastidious in regard to this kind of evidence, do not pretend to dispute its competency, however widely they may differ on its force and effect." (Per Lord Ellenborough, C. J.; Weeks v. Sparke, 1 Maule & Selwyn, 686-7.)

It may, therefore, be taken as settled that when the boundary concerns the extent of a public municipal jurisdiction, as whether lands lie or rights are exercisable within its true limits, either public reputation or the particular declarations of deceased persons, made ante litem motam, are receivable." (Nichols v. Parker, 14 East. 331, note — cited in 1 Cowen & Hill's Notes, Note 186, p. 241.)

So, in a case cited in the note above quoted, the question being whether a turnpike was within or without the limits of a certain town, evidence was permitted to be given by the party claiming it as within, to show general reputation that the town extended to a piece of land, and that old people, since deceased, said such was the boundary of the town.

And, on trying the validity of a distress for a poor rate, by magistrates, on land claimed as a part of the parish of B., to determine whether it lay there, descriptions in ancient leases, granted by the ancestors of plaintiff's landlord, and old rates made by the parish officers of B. on the occupiers of the land, and deceased overseers' accounts, crossing out the tax of the occupier, were all received as evidence of reputation on the question of public boundary. (Same Note above cited; Plaxton v. Dall, 10 Barn. & Cress. 17.)

"So, in another case, orders of Justices, describing Nottingham Castle as being in the Hundred of B., and evidence that it had long been reputed to be in that hundred was received, to show that it belonged to that hundred, and an extract from Domesday Book was received to repel that presumption."

The authority cited for the last quotation—in the note above referred to—is Duke of Newcastle v. Broxton, 6 Barn. & Adolphus, 273.

These, like the case at bar, presented cases where the matter in controversy was of public and general interest, but the principle does not require that the right should be public in a literal sense, but rather that it should be general, and such as concerns a multitude of persons; (1 Phillips on Evidence, 238, 239; 1 Greenleaf on Evidence, Secs. 128, 145; Boardman v. Reed, 6 Peters, 328; Conn et al. v. Penn et al. 1 Pet. C. C. Rep. 496; Doe & Taylor v. Roe et al., 4 Hawks, 116; Ralston v. Miller, 3 Randolph, 44, wherein it is said, as cited in Greenleaf, that ancient reputation and possession were entitled to infinitely more respect in deciding upon the boundaries there in question than any experimental survey.)

P. W. S. Rayle, for Respondent.

The vital mistake, amounting to a fundamental error, appellant falls into, is in urging and presenting his case as if it were a contest between the Counties of Napa and Solano, and as though Napa is estopped from asserting her right to exercise jurisdiction in the disputed territory, when, in fact, the respective counties had no more interest in or connection with the subject matter of litigation in this action than the State of New York or Massachusetts.

Lay v. Neville.

In order to show the absurdity of allowing general reputation of a county line to be given in evidence we will refer the Court to the fact that the boundary line of Napa County has been twice changed by the Legislature since it was fixed in eighteen hundred and fifty.

By the Court, RHODES, J.

This action was brought to recover the possession of five hundred sacks of wheat, which were attached by the defendant, as the Sheriff of Solano County. The complaint states that the wheat was taken possession of by the defendant, at Glassford Ranch, in Napa County, and the defendant denies that he took possession of it in Napa County. The allegation of the place where the property was taken is mere surplusage, and the issue formed upon it is immaterial. The plaintiff has not alleged directly that he was the owner of the wheat when it was taken by the defendant, or at any other time, but the defendant has not taken an objection to the complaint on that ground, and perhaps it can be held that the averment is argumentatively made; at least the defendant seems to so understand the meaning of the allegations of the complaint, for he denies that the plaintiff is the owner of the wheat. The complaint does not state that the defendant detains the wheat, but alleges that he refuses to deliver it to the plaintiff on his demand. The defendant makes no objection to the complaint for that reason, and both parties have treated the case, as an action to recover the possession of the personal property of the plaintiff that was then wrongfully detained by the defendant, or the value thereof, and we shall consider the case as an action of that character.

The defendant denies that he at any time or place "wrongfully and unlawfully took, became possessed of and conveyed into Solano County the personal property of the plaintiff as in complaint alleged." This is intended as a denial of the plain-tiff's allegation that the defendant wrongfully and unlawfully took, became possessed of and conveyed into Solano County, the property of the plaintiff, but it strictly amounts to no more than a denial that those acts were wrongfully done; but the plaintiff made no objection to that style of denial, and in view of the extreme liberality with which each party has treated his adversary's pleadings, we would be justified in construing the word and to signify or, wherever it occurs in that denial of the defendant.

The defendant justifies the seizure of the property under an attachment and an execution, issued at the suits of creditors of Glassford, and alleges that the wheat was Glassford's property, and was then in Solano County.

The jury found that the plaintiff was entitled to the possession of the property in controversy, and found the value thereof; and the defendant appeals from the judgment and the order denying his motion for a new trial.

Three principal questions have been argued by counsel: First, whether the plaintiff was, as between himself and Glassford, the owner of the wheat; Second, whether there had been such an immediate delivery and actual and continued change of possession of the property as would satisfy the requirements of the Statute of Frauds; and Third, whether the property at the time of its seizure was in Napa or in Solano County.

1. A. Y. Easterby had recovered a judgment against Glassford in the District Court for Napa County, upon which an execution issued to the Sheriff of that county, and under the execution, the Sheriff levied upon a large parcel of wheat, as the property of Glassford, on the 25th day of September, 1861, and on the 4th day of October, 1861, sold to the plaintiff two thousand and eleven sacks of said wheat, the same being then on Glassford's ranch. At the time of the sale there was some question about the right to the property, and as to its being in Napa County. The Sheriff asked Glassford if he should proceed with the sale, and he answered in the affirmative, and consented to the sale being made. The wheat was bid off by the plaintiff, who forthwith paid the purchase money to the Sheriff, and the Sheriff then gave the plaintiff a bill of sale, and directed him to take possession, which he immediately did and placed the same in charge of a person as his agent and keeper. Glassford was present during all these transactions and made no objection to the proceedings, then nor since that time, so far as the record shows. The purchase money was applied toward the satisfaction of the execution in the case of Easterby v. Glassford. There is no valid objection to the bill of sale executed to the plaintiff by the Sheriff. It is not in form a certificate of sale, but it contains all the essentials of a certificate, it lacking the mere formal statement, "I do hereby certify," etc. The sale was sufficiently proven without the bill of sale, and its introduction was unnecessary, but not erroneous.

If the Sheriff, in fact, had no authority, as Sheriff, to sell; and if, upon doubt being expressed, the execution defendant directed the Sheriff to sell, or consented to his proceeding with the sale, which was thereupon made, and the price was paid and possession of the property given to the purchaser, as in this case, the execution defendant would be estopped from asserting title to the property; for, relying upon such consent to the sale, the purchaser has parted with his money and the execution defendant has received the benefit of it. If the Sheriff had no authority by law to sell, and for that reason it should be held that his sale as Sheriff, under his execution, was void—and it is not necessary to say that Glassford's consent could vest him with authority, as a Sheriff, to sell—then the sale would be upheld, as any other sale made under the direction of the owner of the property sold, or a sale made by a third person, in the presence of the owner, by his consent, or with his acquiescence.

The Sheriff would be regarded as the agent—the auctioneer—of the owner, and the owner would be bound by his acts done in pursuance of his authority as such agent; and as between the owner and the purchaser, the sale would stand as if made by the owner without the intervention of the Sheriff.

As between Glassford and the plaintiff, the sale was complete and valid. (Story on Agency, Secs. 90-93; Dunlap's Paley's Agency, 171.)

2. At the time of the sale, the wheat was in the field of Glassford, in the possession of the Sheriff's keeper; and the Sheriff, upon receiving the amount of the plaintiff's bid, delivered the grain to the plaintiff, who thereupon put Preston in charge as his keeper, who remained in charge a short time, and on leaving placed the grain in the care of O'Niel, who kept control of that which was left on the ranch, until it was taken by the defendant. The plaintiff without delay procured six to eight teams, and engaged them in hauling the wheat from the ranch of Glassford; and on the fifth of October, when the defendant attached five hundred sacks of the grain, the plaintiff had removed the larger part of the grain, and was then removing the remainder. It is not intended by the fifteenth section of the Statute of Frauds, to make a sale void, as against the creditors and purchasers of the vendor, unless the vendee shall perform in every case, what might in some cases be an impossibility. It was intended that the vendee should immediately take and continuously hold the possession of the goods purchased, in the manner and accompanied with such plain and unmistakable acts of possession, control and ownership, as a prudent bona fide purchaser would do, in the exercise of his rights over the property, so that all persons might have notice, that he owned and had possession of the property. The acts that will constitute a delivery, will vary in the different classes of cases, and will depend very much upon the character and quantity of the property sold, as well as the circumstances of each particular case. The same acts are not necessary to make a good delivery of a ponderous article, like a block of granite or a stack of hay, as would be required in case of an article of small bulk, as a parcel of bullion. It might properly be required, that there should be a manual delivery of a single sack of grain at the moment of its sale, but upon the sale of two thousand sacks, this could not be done without incurring great and unnecessary expense, and departing from the usual course of business. The same is true of the acts that may be requisite to manifest the actual and continued change of possession required by the statute. Each case must, in a great manner, depend upon its own circumstances. This is well illustrated in the case of Chaffin v. Doub, 14 Cal. 384. The property mortgaged consisted of hay lying in swaths, winrows and stacks, over three large fields of the mortgagor, and the possession of it had been given by constructive delivery to the mortgagees, who from thence continued to work on the hay during eight days, when it was attached for the vendor's debts. The Court held that, "if an actual and immediate delivery were construed to mean a removal immediately from the premises, the requirement of the statute in such cases would be impossible of performance," and that time was necessarily required to gather and remove the hay. (See, also, Pacheco v. Hunsacker, 14 Cal. 120.) In this case, all the acts were done that could be reasonably required on the part of the vendor, to effect an immediate delivery of the property sold, and the acts of the purchaser in taking and keeping possession, and diligently proceeding and continuing to remove the grain from the premises, were sufficient to satisfy the requirements of the statute.

2. The Act of eighteen hundred and fifty-five, defining the boundaries of Napa County, describes the southern boundary as follows: "Commencing at a point in Guichica Creek where the said creek empties into San Pablo Bay; thence running in a direct line due east to the top of the mountains dividing Napa Valley from Suisun Valley." The initial point in the line is where the middle of the stream of the creek meets the line of San Pablo Bay. A competent surveyor, and perhaps any other person, could find that point; and when that point has been ascertained the line must run thence due east to the "top of the mountains," no question being made that the line thus run will strike the mountains. Previous to the Act of eighteen hundred and fifty-five, the southern boundary of Napa County was further to the north, and that line coincided with the northern boundary of Solano

Lay v. Neville.

County; and it is understood that the southern boundary of Napa County and the northern boundary of Solano County still coincide; for though not expressly so declared in the Act, yet as a portion of Solano was added to Napa, the two counties would be held to be bounded by each other.

The defendant offered to prove the southern boundary of Napa County, by evidence of general reputation among persons living near the line in question and in other parts of the counties. The evidence was excluded, and the defendant having taken his exception, now complains of the ruling of the Court in that respect. Some of the objections to the defendant's being permitted to prove the boundary in that manner may be stated, but the ground has been so fully occupied in the numerous and carefully considered opinions of the Courts, and by the text writers, that it is quite unnecessary to discuss them in detail. This boundary is not in any sense an ancient boundary. It was not proposed to prove an accurate or a defined line on the land—a line indicated by any locative calls or visible landmarks—but simply where the line was reputed to be. The only point that could by any possibility serve to determine the position of the line was the initial point, and when that point was ascertained no amount of testimony of any character could make the line from that point vary from true east. It was competent for the defendant as well as the plaintiff to prove by general reputation which of two or more streams in 1855 was known as Guichica Creek, or where was the line of San Pablo Bay, so as to ascertain the initial point as declared by the Legislature; but general reputation was not admissible to show where a line, commencing at the point thus ascertained and running east, was, or would be. This species of evidence is admissible only "from the nature and necessity of the case," as where the bounds depend upon prescription, or cannot be proven to have existed except by parol; but where better evidence exists it must be produced.

The party offering in evidence reputation to prove ancient boundaries, must confine his proof to the declarations of persons having competent knowledge of the matter in controversy, and who are since deceased. This species of evidence is very properly denominated traditionary evidence. (1 Greenl. Ev., secs. 130, 145, and notes; 1 Phil. Ev., Cowen, Hill & Edward's Notes, 218, and note 87.)

Herron v. Hughes et al.

The evidence that persons living in the disputed territory voted, were assessed, and paid taxes in either county, and that officers of either county served process there, might show where they believed the line to be, but it was not competent proof of where the line actually was.

It is not necessary for the purposes of this action to determine whether the survey and map made under the direction of the Surveyor-General are authoritative and conclusive; but the testimony of De Woody, the County Surveyor of Napa County, who assisted in the survey and knew where the initial point was, was competent evidence to show whether the line running east from that point included the Glassford Ranch in Napa County. The testimony of the County Surveyor of Solano County, who knew the initial point but had not run the line, was admitted, and the jury doubtless gave the greater weight to the testimony of De Woody. D'Hemacourt did not know the initial point, and his testimony as to the position of the line, relative to Glassford's ranch, was properly excluded. The testimony of Wells, if it had been admitted, would, at best, have been but secondary evidence.

The instructions are substantially correct.

Judgment affirmed.

C. E. HERRON v. J. HUGHES, W. NICHOLS, AND P. NICHOLS.

AGREEMENT TO CONVERT PROPERTY.—A mere agreement between two or more persons to convert the property of another, without an actual intermeddling with it, does not give the owner a cause of action against the parties to the agreement.

CONSPIRACY WITHOUT DAMAGE NOT ACTIONABLE.—A simple conspiracy, however atrocious, unless it results in actual damage to the party, is not the subject of a civil action; but if the conspiracy be carried into execution and damage ensue, the damage is the ground of the action.

Herron v. Hughes et al.

ACTIONS AGAINST TWO OR MORE PERSONS FOR JOINT WRONGS.—Where two or more persons are sued for a joint wrong done, it may be necessary to prove a previous combination between them in order to secure a joint recovery; but it is not necessary to aver this previous combination in the complaint, and if averred, it is not to be considered as of the gist of the action.

SALE OF GOODS BY AGENT OF OWNER.—Where one is intrusted by another with goods with power to sell the same as the agent or clerk of the owner, a mere intention on his part to appropriate the proceeds to his own use, does not amount to a conversion of the goods; but while his agency continues, his sales, in pursuance of his authority, are valid and bind the owner.

WHEN PURCHASE OF GOODS FROM AGENTS IS A CONVERSION.—If one is intrusted with goods by the owner with power to sell the same at retail for the owner as his agent or clerk, and if he then sells the goods, in payment of his private debt, to one who has full knowledge of the owner's title and the agent's relation to the goods, the purchase made with this knowledge amounts to a conversion of the goods by the purchaser.

LEVY ON GOODS.—A levy made by a constable on goods which he does not see or have in his possession is void.

APPEAL from the District Court, Eleventh Judicial District, Placer County.

The answer was filed by the defendants, Nichols, and they alone appealed. Defendant, Hughes, made no defense.

The other facts are stated in the opinion of the Court.

Tuttle & Fellows, for Appellants.

Hamilton & Arnold, for Respondent, referred to Sedgwick on Measure of Damages, 98, 453, and Dorsey v. Malone, 14 Cal. 554.

By the Court, SHAFTER, J.

It is alleged in the complaint in this action:

That on the 1st of July, 1862, the plaintiff was engaged in business at Dutch Flat as a dealer in boots and shoes, etc., and that on that day his stock on hand was of the value of two thousand seven hundred dollars.

That on the 11th of July, 1862, and during a temporary absence of the plaintiff, Hughes commenced an action against him on a pretended and fictitious indebtedness of one thousand two hundred dollars, and caused the whole of plaintiff's said stock to be attached in said action by the Sheriff, etc., who placed it in the hands of one Willetts, for safe keeping.

That Hughes went no further with the suit, nor has he made any attempt to prosecute the same to judgment.

That on the 17th of October, 1862, the defendants, W. and P. Nichols, held a pretended and void judgment against the plaintiff for two hundred dollars improperly recovered during the aforesaid absence of the plaintiff.

That they, with full knowledge of the fact that the claim of Hughes was a pretense and fraud, conspired with Hughes to obtain the property attached and then in the hands of Willetts as Sheriff's keeper, and to that intent fraudulently agreed with Hughes that said property should be sold on execution to be issued on said two hundred dollar judgment, and subject, ostensibly, to the prior attachment of Hughes. That said property should be bid off by one Merriman for eight hundred and eighty dollars, and that thereafter said Hughes should dissolve his attachment, when the property was to be divided amongst the conspirators.

That in fulfilment of this fraudulent scheme W. and P. Nichols took out execution upon their judgment and delivered it to the township constable for service, and instructed him to make "a pretended levy thereof upon the aforesaid property, which the said constable then and there did, without taking into his possession, or in any way interfering with, said property; and that, in pursuance of the further direction of said defendants, the constable, on the 23d day of October, 1862 — the goods being still in Willett's possession — sold them in one lot, and boxed up they were, to Merriman, at eight hundred and eighty dollars, as previously arranged."

That both the constable and one of the defendants Nichols, announced at the auction that the property was offered for sale subject to Hughes' attachment for twelve hundred dollars.

That Hughes, pursuant to the corrupt agreement aforesaid, soon after the pretended sale caused his attachment to be released.

That the Sheriff thereupon "ordered Willetts to surrender said property to the plaintiff, and the same was, on or about the 25th day of October, 1862 — the same being still the property of plaintiff — by said Willetts so surrendered as directed.”

Herron v. Hughes et al.

That “at the same time the property, by virtue of the said pretended sale, was unlawfully taken from the plaintiff by the defendants and converted to their own use.” That since said conversion plaintiff has demanded the property and defendants refused to deliver it.

General damages are claimed to the amount of five thousand dollars.

The answer denies the allegations of the complaint and justifies the sale on the ground that it was made by virtue of an execution issued upon a judgment of a Justice of the Peace in favor of the defendant Nichols and against the plaintiff. That the property was struck off to Merriman October 23d, 1862, and that said defendants thereafter, on the 26th of January, 1863, bought the property of Hughes and Merriman, and received from them the possession of the goods, or rather the remnant thereof.

Trial by jury. Verdict — two thousand five hundred dollars “for value of the goods, and damages one thousand three hundred and thirty dollars.” Motion for new trial denied. Appeal taken from the order and from the judgment.

1. Counsel differ as to what constitutes the gravamen of this action.

There are allegations in the complaint suggestive of the idea that the pleader intended to declare for a vexatious suit or malicious attachment, or for both. There are other allegations that suggest a conspiracy to depreciate the value of property to be offered at public sale, as a gist; and others still that look toward a mere conversion of the plaintiff's goods under circumstances of aggravation.

We consider that the only actionable injury disclosed in the complaint is a conversion by the defendants of the plaintiff's goods.

The averments respecting the attachment suit brought against the plaintiff by the defendant Hughes on the 11th of July, 1862, show no cause of action against him; for it is not averred that the suit is at an end, nor that it was brought without probable cause.

The Nichols are not implicated by the complaint in the bringing of that suit, nor in the attachment. The goods attached had been lying in the hands of Willetts, as Sheriff's keeper, for more than three months before the Nichols are alleged to have had any notice even of the transaction in either one of its branches.

Nor does the corrupt agreement of October 17, 1862, to get a title, or colorable title, to the plaintiff's property, at less than its value, even when coupled with the averments showing that all the devices of that agreement were carried out, disclose an actionable injury. The devices were: 1st. A void judgment. 2d. Execution thereon. 3d. A delivery of the execution to a constable, who was to sell property not only not in his possession at the time, but beyond his official reach. 4th. A falsehood to be suggested, and which was in fact suggested to the bidders, that the sale was to be made subject to Hughes' attachment, when it had in fact been pre-arranged that if Merriman should buy in the property at eight hundred and eighty dollars, the attachment should be dissolved, for the joint benefit of the conspirators.

We have nothing here but a series of mere appearances, commencing with a judgment alleged to be void upon its face and ending with a sale of goods not in the custody of the official who made it, and who neither delivered, nor attempted to deliver, the goods to the purchaser (Drake on Attachment, Sec. 265), and who made no return of the sale on the execution. The whole proceeding was vox et preterea nihil. In substance it amounted to nothing more than a verbal agreement between three persons to take and convert the property of another. Such an agreement would not affect the right of property, nor would it amount to an intermeddling with it, nor to an exercise of dominion over it subversive of the dominion of the owner. (2 Mass. 398; 7 John. 254; 10 Shep. 326.) Fraud without damage, or damage without fraud, gives no cause of action; it is only where both concur that an action lies.

A simple conspiracy, however atrocious, unless it results in actual damage to the party, never was the subject of a civil action; and though such conspiracy be charged, the averment is immaterial and need not be proved. (Hutchins v. Hutchins, 7 Hill, 104.)

Where two or more are sued for a wrong done, it may be necessary to prove previous combination in order to secure a joint recovery, but it is never necessary to allege it, and if alleged it is not to be considered as of the gist of the action. That lies in the wrongful and damaging act done. In Saville v. Roberts, 1 Ld. Raym. 378, Mr. Chief Justice Holt said: "An action will not lie for the greatest conspiracy imaginable if nothing be put in execution; but if the party be damaged the action will lie. From whence it follows that the damage is the ground of the action, which is as great in the present case as if there had been no conspiracy."

In the case at bar the Nichols and Merriman, prior to the constable's sale, were absolute strangers to the title and to the possession of the plaintiff's goods, and when that farce had been fully enacted they are found standing in that relation still. (Parker v. Huntington et al., 2 Gray, 125.)

2. Assuming, then, that the complaint sets forth no other actionable injury than a conversion by the defendants of the plaintiff's goods, we shall proceed to consider that ground of claim in connection with sundry statements in the complaint and as it stands related to the proceedings at the trial.

The complaint states that Hughes, soon after the constable's sale, released his attachment, and that Willetts, the keeper, in obedience to the Sheriff's order, on the 25th of October surrendered the property to the plaintiff.

As soon as Hughes' attachment was dissolved it doubtless became the duty of the Sheriff to redeliver the property to the plaintiff, and according to the complaint that duty was performed promptly.

The next succeeding averment charges that "at the same time [thereupon] the goods were unlawfully taken from the plaintiff by the defendants and converted by them to their own use."

Herron v. Hughes et al.

The testimony of the plaintiff at the trial tended to prove that when he left Dutch Flat, in the fore part of July, 1862, he left his goods in the possession of Hughes, as his clerk, with authority to sell them in the course of a retail trade, and that after the release of Hughes' attachment Willetts delivered the goods to Hughes and Merriman.

The original agency of Hughes, under the plaintiff, at the time when he accepted a return of the goods, was still on foot. Hughes had not renounced his agency, the plaintiff had not revoked it, nor had it ended by act and operation of law. If Hughes had perpetrated any fraud upon his principal before the goods were returned to him, or if he meditated any fraud thereafter, that fact would not divest him of the powers with which the plaintiff had clothed him, nor relieve him of his trust obligations. The counsel of the plaintiff seem to have considered that the agency was on foot at the date of the redelivery of the goods to Hughes, for they put in no evidence to prove the averment that the goods were surrendered to the plaintiff, except the redelivery to Hughes. That the Sheriff could, on the ground of that redelivery, have defended an action brought by the plaintiff against him for the goods, or their value, there can be no doubt.

From these views it follows that the act of Hughes in taking the goods in his possession on the dissolution of his attachment, was not in itself considered an act of conversion; and that possession not being tortious, it follows that the Nichols, in facilitating a return of the goods to Hughes by paying the Sheriff's charges, did not make themselves wrongdoers.

It appears further from the plaintiff's evidence that immediately after the goods were delivered to Hughes, or to Hughes and Merriman, they proceeded to sell them in the course of a retail trade conducted in their own names, but under circumstances tending to prove that Hughes intended to appropriate the proceeds to his own use or that of his firm. Still, those sales did not, to a legal intent, amount to a conversion of the goods by Hughes. Conversion does not lie in intention, but conduct. Hughes had a subsisting authority to sell, and to sell at retail, as previously stated. The wrong to the plaintiff is not to be found in the acts of sale, but in the failure of Hughes to account for the proceeds; and the liability of Hughes to account therefor, or of Hughes and Merriman, may be now enforced in a proper action. There can be no doubt that the proper parties who in good faith bought the plaintiff's goods at retail of Hughes, or of the firm of which he was a member, acquired a title to them as against the plaintiff. (Sto. Ag. 126, 127.)

The case shows that these sales so made by Hughes, or under his sanction, were continued until the 27th of January, 1863, when Hughes and Merriman transferred the residue of the plaintiff's goods to the Nichols for the purpose, in the first place, of satisfying, and in the happening of a certain contingency, for the purpose of securing a debt which they, Hughes and Merriman, were owing to them. The Nichols took possession of the goods under this contract, and thereafter, on demand made, they refused to deliver them to the plaintiff.

In transferring the balance of the goods to the Nichols for the purpose of paying or securing a private debt, Hughes transcended his powers, and the Nichols, in accepting the transfer, with a full knowledge of the plaintiff's title and of Hughes' true relation to the goods, converted them to their own use; and inasmuch as Hughes participated in the wrong, he is jointly responsible with them. (Sto. Agency, Sec. 437.)

This joint conversion by the defendants of the plaintiff's property, on the 27th of January, 1863, we consider to be the only actionable injury that the plaintiff, on his complaint and proofs, has sustained. The case shows that the defendants intended a fraud; that they adopted certain measures for the purpose of accomplishing it, and that they carried out those measures — but in legal judgment the fraud was without damage. The fraud culminated in the sale to Merriman; but that was a sale without consequences affecting either the plaintiff's title or possession.

In the language of the plaintiff's counsel: "The levy of the constable was a fiction. The sale was a mockery, and void. The constable made no levy because he had no possession of the property, nor even had sight of it. He made no sale because he could make none. Before he could sell he must have levied; he must have had the right and possession and control of the property levied upon, after which he must have advertised and proceeded according to law to their sale. The purchaser at such void sale could acquire no title, and much less could a purchaser with full knowledge."

The subsequent release of the attachment was not a wrong, but the reverse, assuming that the suit of Hughes was groundless. Nor was the payment of the Sheriff's fees at all prejudicial to the plaintiff. If after the constable's sale any one had taken possession of the goods without authority so to do from the plaintiff, it would have amounted to a conversion; but they went immediately into the hands of Hughes, the plaintiff's agent—that is, into the plaintiff's possession, in legal effect, as averred in the complaint. The subsequent retail sales by Hughes were not unlawful, nor did the Nichols participate either in them or the proceeds.

We do not consider it necessary to review in detail the errors assigned. It is sufficient to say, that in the hurry of the trial the true theory of the plaintiff's case was misapprehended. This is manifested both by the tenor of the rulings and the instructions to the jury. Though the verdict may not be too large on the theory of wrong and damage on which the case was tried, nor too large when regarded as a chastisement for the chicanery that the defendants practiced in fact, and the actionable fraud which they attempted to perpetrate, still, under the narrower views entertained by us as to the true character and scope of the plaintiff's injuries, it cannot be considered otherwise than as excessive.

Judgment reversed and new trial ordered.

Carpentier v. Atherton.

HORACE W. CARPENTIER v. FAXON D. ATHERTON.

LAWFUL MONEY.—By the laws of the United States there are three kinds of money, to wit: gold, silver, and treasury notes, each of which is made a legal tender in payment of debts.

ENFORCEMENT OF A SPECIFIC CONTRACT.—The Act of the Legislature of this State, passed April 27th, 1863, commonly called the "Specific Contract Law," providing for the enforcement in terms of contracts made payable in a specified kind of money or currency, is not in derogation of nor does it conflict with the laws of Congress making United States notes lawful money and a legal tender in payment of debts; and under said Act a judgment may be rendered and enforced, payable in the kind of money specified in the contract or obligation on which it is rendered.

IDEM.—Said Act creates no new right. It only adds one to the cases found in the common law in which it is competent for Courts to enforce the execution of contracts specifically.

DISCHARGE OF MONEY CONTRACTS.—A contract made to pay money generally may be discharged by a tender and payment of either of the three kinds of money made a legal tender by the laws of the United States; but a contract made to pay in one of the three kinds of money cannot be discharged by a tender of either of the two other kinds.

VALUE OF EACH KIND OF MONEY.—A Court cannot say judicially that one kind of money, made a legal tender, is of greater or less value than another; nor can evidence be received that a dollar of one kind is of greater or less value than another.

COSTS AND INTEREST.—Where a contract is made payable in a specific kind of money, the judgment enforcing it may enforce the payment of costs and interest in the kind of money mentioned in the contract.

APPEAL from the District Court, Twelfth Judicial District, City and County of San Francisco.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the Court.

W. W. Cope, for Appellant.

Assuming the Act of Congress to be constitutional and valid, it is clear to my mind that the Act of the Legislature is invalid. No debt can be created under the latter to which the former does not apply, and the two Acts are directly repugnant to each other. The one embraces all debts not therein specially exempted, and declares that they may be paid in legal tender notes; the other provides for a class of debts not included in the excepted cases, and declares that payment shall be made in such money as the contract may call for. The effect is to make an exception not made in the original

Act; and if this can be done, the object of the Act may be entirely defeated, and its efficacy as a piece of practical legislation destroyed. A contract payable in money is a debt, and the fact that it mentions a particular kind of money in which payment is to be made, does not alter its legal character. It is still a debt, and by the express letter of the law of Congress may be paid in legal tender notes.

It is said, however, that the Act of the Legislature merely furnishes a remedy where none existed before; that the contracts referred to are legal and valid, and that the remedy given is in strict accordance with the spirit and principles of equity jurisdiction. All this may be admitted without prejudice to the position for which I contend, as it obviously does not make the point. The question is — whether the Act is in conflict with the law of Congress; if so, it is invalid; and its validity must be tested by that law. If there is any conflict in the practical working of the two Acts, the Act of Congress must stand, and the other fall. If the latter derogates in any respect from the force and effect of the former, there is an end of the question. If it takes from its operation any case embraced by its provisions, the conflict is beyond dispute. It is immaterial in what way, or by what means the conflict is brought about. The simple question is, does it exist; and as to that I see no ground for a difference of opinion. The effect of enforcing contracts of this character specifically, is not merely to compel a literal performance of the contracts, but to exempt them from the operation of a law which clearly embraces them in its provisions. The Act of Congress applies to the payment of contracts and not to the making of them, and any attempt to avoid its operation by means of new remedies based on the form of the contract, is a fraud upon the law. In substance and legal effect, a contract payable in gold is the same as a contract payable in money generally; it is simply a debt, and must be so regarded for all purposes. As between the parties, it may be just and equitable to enforce such a contract according to its terms, but under the Act of Congress the Courts have no power to do so. Every contract having the character of a debt may be paid in legal tender notes; so says the paramount law of the land.

Clarke & Carpentier, for Respondent.

The statute for enforcing specific contracts simply supplies a remedy wanting at the common law, but entirely within the spirit of equity jurisdiction, in decreeing specific performance.

By the common law every contract to transfer a thing is treated as a mere personal obligation, which, if unperformed, is compensable only in damages, thus allowing the party contracting the benefit of the election to perform or pay damages.

Where the damages can be clearly ascertained and exactly computed, the remedy at law is held to be sufficient. But where compensation in damages would fall short of the redress to which a party is entitled, the jurisdiction of equity arises, upon the principles of natural justice, to compel a performance in specie. (Story on Eq. Jur. §§ 714-719.)

The specific contract law is not forbidden by or in contravention of the legislation of Congress on the subject of the currency.

The statute of Congress passed July 11, 1862, (Supp. to Brightley's Dig. 1,165,) authorizes the issue of notes by the Secretary of the Treasury "on the credit of the United States, which shall be receivable in payment of all loans made to the United States, and of all taxes, internal duties, excises, debts, and demands of every kind due to the United States, except duties on imports and interest, and of all claims and demands against the United States, except for interest upon bonds, notes, and certificates of debt or deposit; and shall also be lawful money and a legal tender in payment of all debts, public and private, within the United States, except duties on imports and interest as aforesaid."

The power of Congress to pass this law is not disputed.

But, the question arises, whether our specific contract law is forbidden by or in any way contravenes this Act of Congress. And in determining this question, we must consider the object and intention of Congress, as well as the language employed in the Act.

Congress might have forbidden contracts answerable in coin, and might have forbidden the employment of gold and silver as a currency, and then the only question would be one of power, under the Constitution of the United States, to pass such a law. But such was not the policy of the Government. The object was to give a value to treasury notes, by making them a legal tender in certain cases, in relief of its financial necessities. There is nothing in the law to indicate the design to interfere with the ordinary course of commercial transactions, to shape or control business contracts, or to suppress the circulation of the precious metals wherever the stipulation of parties may except in their favor. By the law there are two kinds of currency recognized and established, but which are confessedly of different values, and which no law can equalize.

The Act of Congress excepts in favor of gold in the payment of certain debts, payable by Government, and of certain others payable to the Government.

By the Court, CURRY, J.

The defendant made and delivered to the plaintiff his contract in writing, bearing date the 2d of April, 1864, by which, for a valuable consideration, he promised to pay to the plaintiff the sum of five hundred dollars on demand, in United States gold coin. Some time afterwards the plaintiff duly demanded payment of the sum of money due on this contract, in the kind of currency specified therein. The defendant refused to pay in gold coin, but subsequently, and before this action was commenced, tendered and offered to pay to the plaintiff certain United States notes, amounting in the aggregate to the sum of the principal and interest due the plaintiff. The United States notes so tendered were issued under and in pursuance of the Act of the Congress of the United States, entitled "An Act to authorize an additional issue of United States notes, and for other purposes," approved July 11, 1862. By this Act the notes so tendered were made lawful money and a legal tender in the payment of all debts, public and private, within the United States, except as therein otherwise provided.

The defendant, by his answer, pleaded the tender of these United States notes for the payment of the amount due, and brought the same into Court with his answer, ready to be paid to the plaintiff.

The plaintiff demurred to the answer on the ground that it did not state facts sufficient to constitute a defense, specifying as causes of demurrer:

1st. That the United States notes tendered are not money, and the plaintiff was not nor is by law obliged to receive the same in payment of the sum of money due him.

2d. That by the contract on which the action was brought the defendant promised to pay the sum of money due plaintiff in gold coin of the United States, and the defendant does not aver a tender of the amount due in such coin.

The demurrer was sustained, and at the same time leave was granted to the defendant to amend his answer, which he declined to do, whereupon the Court ordered and adjudged that the plaintiff have and recover against the defendant the principal and interest due, and the costs of the action, specifying the amount thereof, payable in gold coin of the United States; and it was further ordered and adjudged that the plaintiff have execution to enforce the collection of such judgment, with the interest which might accrue thereon, and that such execution specify, direct and provide that the judgment and all accruing interest thereon "shall be collectable only in gold coin of the United States."

The defendant has appealed from this judgment, which brings up the case to be considered upon certain alleged errors, that are assigned in a well drawn bill of exceptions, presenting the whole case upon its real merits.

The exceptions taken to the rulings and judgment of the Court, raise the question as to the validity of the Act of the Legislature of this State passed on the 27th of April, 1863, commonly called the "Specific Contract Law," in so far as its provisions relate to the points involved in this controversy. (Laws of 1863, p. 687.)

The second section of this Act provides that: "In an action on a contract or obligation in writing, for the direct payment of money, made payable in a specified kind of money or currency, judgment for the plaintiff, whether the same be by default or after verdict, may follow the contract or obligation, and be made payable in the kind of money or currency specified therein." The third section of the Act provides that the execution to be issued on such judgment shall state the kind of money or currency in which the judgment is payable, and shall require the Sheriff to satisfy the same in the kind of money or currency in which it is made payable, and that the Sheriff shall refuse payment in any other kind of money or currency; and in case of levy and sale of the property of the judgment debtor, he shall refuse payment from any purchaser at such sale, in any other kind of money or currency than that specified in the execution.

It is a cardinal rule in the construction of statutes that every reasonable intendment is to be made in support of their validity. (Morris v. The People, 8 Denio, 381; Ex parte McCollum, 1 Cow. 564; Fletcher v. Peck, 6 Cranch, 87; People v. Supervisors of Orange, 17 N. Y. 241.) But whenever it is clear that the Legislature has transcended its powers, in the passage of an Act which is repugnant to paramount law, it is among the most important duties of the judicial authority to declare the invalidity of the Act so passed. (Adams v. Howe, 14 Mass. 345; Fletcher v. Peck, 6 Cranch, 87.)

By the laws of the land, the country is furnished with three kinds of money—gold, silver and United States notes—as a medium of exchanges. Money, made by the coinage of gold or silver, is a legal tender as prescribed by law, in the discharge of obligations, which are to be satisfied by the payment of money, in general terms; and we have held in Lick v.

Faulkner, (ante, 405,) and in other cases, that the notes of the United States, issued by the authority of the laws of the National Legislature, are a lawful and authorized currency, and in that sense lawful money and a legal tender in the payment of private debts; but it does not follow that every kind or any kind of money which by law is a legal tender in the payment of debts may be tendered in satisfaction of every obligation capable of performance by the transfer and delivery of property in satisfaction of it.

In Lick v. Faulkner we said, upon good authority, that gold and silver are commodities, the value of which is estimated by the value of other things, in the same manner as that of the latter is estimated by the value of gold and silver. This quality or characteristic of the precious metals is not destroyed by their division into parcels bearing the impress of the mint and possessing a specific value, ascertained and regulated by positive law. If one agrees generally to pay or deliver to another a given number of dollars, he may perform his contract by the payment of the specified sum in any kind of dollars which are recognized as such and made a legal tender for the purpose by the law of the land; for by doing so he fulfils his engagement according to its letter; but if he contracts to pay his debt in a particular kind of money, his obligation cannot be discharged in accordance with his stipulation by payment in a different kind of money; and though by the unaided rules of the common law he could not be compelled to perform specifically that which he had promised, yet, in morals, his obligation to do so is in no degree diminished.

Courts of equity from an early period have exercised jurisdiction, enforcing the specific performance of contracts, for the reason that the Courts of common law, though recognizing the obligation of the parties to a contract to perform their respective parts of it according to its terms, could not afford this remedy to the party injured by the non-performance of the other. At law the party disappointed by the breach of the contract was compelled to be satisfied with money, as a substitute for the thing for which he had contracted, and to which he was in justice entitled.

The money recovered in such cases, by way of damages, was considered as a substantial equivalent for the injury sustained by the breach of the contract. But upon this subject Judge Story says: "It is against conscience that a party should have a right of election whether he will perform his covenant or only pay damages for the breach of it." (Story on Eq. Jur. 717 a.)

Contracts relating to real property embrace by far the most numerous instances in which the jurisdiction of a Court of equity may be invoked to administer the remedy of specific performance. But this species of remedy has not been limited to the enforcement in terms of agreements relating to lands. It has been in many instances extended to enforcing specifically contracts relating to personal property, and also to the performance of personal acts, though in such cases peculiar circumstances must exist to call forth the remedial agency of the Court. The reason assigned for the universal exercise of this jurisdiction as to contracts respecting lands and not in relation to agreements concerning personal property is not because of any distinction between realty and personalty, but because in the former case damages at law cannot be regarded as a complete and adequate remedy for the breach of the contract, while in the latter a compensation in damages is deemed commensurate with the injury sustained. But whenever a violation of a contract relating to personal property cannot be correctly estimated in damages, or whenever, from the nature of the contract, a specific execution of it is indispensable to justice, a Court of equity will not refuse its aid. (Duff v. Fisher, 15 Cal. 381; Willard's Eq. Jur. 271, 280; Fells v. Reed, 3 Vesey, 70; Sullivan v. Tuck, 1 Maryl. Ch. Decisions, 59; Waters v. Howard, Id. 112; Barr v. Lapsley, 1 Wheat. 152; Phillips v. Berger, 2 Barb. 608, and 8 Barb. 528; Stuyvesant v. The Mayor of New York, 11 Paige, 414, 427; Story's Eq. Jur., Sections 712 to 720.)

The man who contracts to sell and convey lands is under no greater obligation, morally, to perform his agreement than he who agrees for a valuable consideration received, to deliver to the purchaser personal property which he has sold, is to perform his. If there be any distinction between the two cases, let the learned casuist resolve it, for if on this point we are in error we need to be instructed.

The Act of the Legislature by authority of which the judgment in this case was rendered is remedial in its nature, affording to the party who may be justly entitled to the performance of the contract in terms the means of enforcing it. The right to its enforcement is consistent with good faith, and with the dictates of a scrupulous and exact justice. Then, is the Legislature competent to provide for the creditor a remedy to compel his debtor to do what he has solemnly and deliberately bound himself to do? On this point there can be no doubt, unless the Act under consideration is in derogation of the laws of Congress making United States notes lawful money and a legal tender in the payment of debts. Upon the solution of this question our judgment must necessarily depend.

Before a Court, duly appreciating the measure of its duty, will declare an Act of the Legislature invalid, as contravening the laws of Congress, a case must be presented in which there can be no rational doubt (Ex parte McCollum, 1 Cow. 564;) for it is not on slight implication and vague conjecture that the Legislature is to be pronounced to have transcended its powers, and its acts to be considered void. (Fletcher v. Peck, 6 Cranch, 87.)

It is insisted on the part of the appellant that, as the Acts of Congress making United States notes lawful money and a legal tender in the payment of private debts is the paramount law, therefore such currency is adequate for the discharge of all debts which are to be satisfied by the payment of money. This is so, as we have already observed, in respect to debts that are payable in money generally; but as to the contract, which is the foundation of the judgment in this case, it is more than a contract for the payment of money merely. It goes to the extent of defining by what specific act the contract shall be performed. By the admitted and settled rules of law, such a contract can be performed, according to the agreement of the parties, only by the payment of the kind of money specified. Is there anything in law or morals opposed to such a contract? If not, what objection can there be to enforcing it in case its voluntary performance is refused? That a creditor may have uses for money of a particular kind, the Acts of Congress making United States notes lawful money and a legal tender in the payment of debts seem to have contemplated. He may have to pay duties on imports and debts beyond the territorial jurisdiction of the United States, and for these uses these Government notes are not a legal tender. Necessities of the kind suggested exist in commercial communities, where United States notes are the usual media of exchanges, as verified by every day's experience. The importer of merchandise must have gold and silver money to pay the duties imposed by law on his importations. With such means only can he discharge his pecuniary obligations to the Government. He must have metallic money for the purchase of such merchandise, because the paper currency of the Government will not answer his purpose abroad. The importation of goods from foreign countries is a lawful trade, which Congress, under the Constitution, may regulate and has from time to time regulated. By what means is the merchant, who is engaged in this species of trade, to provide for his necessities—that is, for the payment of his debts abroad and his duties on imports at home—unless by securing payment from his debtors in the kind of money which he needs and without which he must abandon the business in which he is engaged? Perhaps it will be answered that he must sell his goods for ready money, and not upon a credit, and thus secure a price in gold and silver; and the purchaser from him must in his turn also sell for like ready money in order to be furnished with the means to pay the importer; and the consumer must also provide himself with the same kind of money, let it be derived from what source of industry it may, to pay for the goods he may need for consumption.

If the owner of property may sell the same for metallic money, to be paid concurrently with the sale and delivery of it, we can see no reason why he cannot sell for the same kind of money to be paid at a future day. A sale on credit is, by the customs and laws of trade, recognized as legitimate and is deemed to be consistent with good conscience and sound morals.

It is sometimes argued that the Act of the Legislature under consideration discriminates invidiously, to the discrediting of United States notes. We are unable to perceive wherein. There is certainly nothing in the Act itself that can justify any such interference. If such a charge were made against the Act of Congress making United States notes lawful money and a legal tender in the payment of certain debts, it might be maintained with more seeming plausibility. Congress itself has limited the uses to which the notes can be applied, and has provided expressly that in certain cases gold and silver money only shall be used within the United States for the discharge of pecuniary obligations, and thus, by implication, at least, has recognized an existing necessity for the employment of gold and silver money for the excepted uses. But even in this we cannot perceive that any unjust discrimination is made between the different kinds of money. With the people of some countries trade can be carried on by the use of silver money with greater convenience and advantage than with gold coin; yet it cannot be said that the merchant who furnishes himself with silver money for his purposes thereby discriminates to the prejudice of gold. The argument that the Act in question unjustly distinguishes between metallic and paper money, if valid as an objection to contracts for the direct payment of a particular kind of money, upon a credit given, is equally so as to sales made for the same kind of money, paid concurrently with the sale. It would be illogical to hold that the effect in the one case is more or less detrimental to the credit of United States notes than in the other. Arguments of the character which we have here noticed are too obviously fallacious to require even the attention which we have devoted to their refutation.

Again. The man of means, actuated by patriotic motives to aid the Government, or for the purpose of legitimate investment, may desire to accumulate United States notes, with the view of exchanging them for bonds of the Government payable within the time and bearing the rate of interest specified and provided in the Act of Congress. Is there, or can there be, any good reason why he may not provide for the desired supply by securing payment from his debtors in the kind of money that would serve his purpose? Is not the end which he seeks lawful, and are not the means employed legitimate to the end?

The Acts of Congress relating to the national currency, comprehending all kinds of money, and the various provisions of those Acts, must be considered and construed in pari materia. By this course it will be readily and at once perceived that while United States notes are by the sovereign behest made lawful money and a legal tender in the payment of debts, except in the instances specified, gold and silver money is equally, by force of positive law, a legal tender in the payment of all debts, and is also recognized as an indispensable currency for purposes to which Government notes cannot be applied; and therefore the inference is logical, if not inevitable, that Congress did not design that these Acts should interfere to prevent men from contracting for any particular kind of money they might need.

Whatever, in the estimation of men engaged in monetary transactions, may be the difference in value between gold and silver money and the paper currency of the Government of the same denominations, we cannot say judicially that a gold or silver dollar is of greater or less value than a United States note of the same denomination, and we doubt if a case could be presented to a Court of justice which would authorize evidence of a difference in the value of the two kinds of money. A Court would be placed in an anomalous and absurd predicament in listening and giving heed to evidence designed to establish as a fact that one dollar is worth more or less than another. (Woods v. Bullens, 6 Allen's R. 516.)

By an Act of the Congress of the United States, passed in eighteen hundred and fifty-three, silver money, consisting of half dollars, quarter dollars, dimes and half dimes, issued in accordance with the standard of that Act, was made a legal tender in the payment of debts, in sums not exceeding five dollars. Now, if A. should loan to B. one thousand half dollars, coined under the Act of eighteen hundred and fifty-three, and B. should in consideration thereof contract with A. to pay the debt so created in like silver coin, would not a tender of the same kind of money in payment of the debt be a legal tender? No one, we apprehend, who understands the import of the word tender, would answer otherwise than in the affirmative. Then, if the debtor in such case could discharge his obligation by a voluntary performance of his promise, on what just principle could he escape it if he were so determined? The duties of the obligor and obligee in such cases must be reciprocal, and they should be commensurable. In the nature of things, that which it is lawful to tender, under the contract supposed, on the one hand, it is lawful to demand on the other. (8 Barb. 528; 1 Sim. & Stu. 174 and 607; 9 Edw. Ch. R. 531; Story's Eq. Jur. Sec. 723.)

The Act of the Legislature under consideration is purely remedial in its nature. It creates no new right in the abstract. It does no more than add to the cases in which it is competent for the Courts to enforce the execution of contracts specifically, and provides the means by which this can be done. In this, the Act is in harmony with the doctrines of equity jurisprudence relating to kindred subjects, and at the same time it in no just sense contravenes the laws of Congress making United States notes lawful money and a legal tender in the payment of debts.

It is alleged, on the part of the appellant, that the Court erred in determining by judgment that the costs and disbursements of the action must also be paid in gold coin.

The second section of the Act provides that judgment for the plaintiff may follow the contract or obligation and be made payable in the kind of money or currency specified therein. The plaintiff was entitled to recover his costs, which became a component part of the judgment and payable in the kind of money specified therein.

The judgment is affirmed.

SAWYER, J., concurring.

I entered upon the consideration of the questions involved in this case, not without grave doubts as to the validity of the Specific Contract Act; for, when we held the Act making treasury notes a legal tender in payment of all debts, public and private, to be constitutional, it seemed to follow as a logical consequence, that if an agreement to pay a given sum of money in gold coin is a debt, within the meaning of the law, then, the debtor is entitled to discharge it by paying the amount called for in treasury notes. And this would undoubtedly be true in relation to all debts contracted generally, without any limiting or qualifying term in the contract creating the liability. In such a case, the law has given to the debtor his option to elect which kind of money made by law a legal tender he will adopt in discharging his liability. It is a right or privilege conferred on him of which he cannot be deprived except with his consent. But a right or privilege conferred upon an individual, either by constitutional, or statutory law, may be waived by the party interested unless such waiver would contravene public policy. Such is the case even in criminal law. Natural persons of full age, of sound mind and under no recognized legal disabilities, are endowed with an unlimited capacity to contract with other persons similarly situated, in all things except as to those matters which are against public policy, or prohibited by law. Gambling contracts, contracts for the payment of money in consideration of future cohabitation in a state of concubinage, and the like, are prohibited as being contrary to good morals, and the best interests of society. In some States usurious contracts are contrary to public policy, and are prohibited. But there is nothing in a contract for a sufficient consideration to pay a given sum in gold coin, or any other kind of money, that is immoral, or that in any respect contravenes public policy. It has never been prohibited, either expressly or by implication, and no policy against the making of such contracts has in any manner been indicated on the part of the Government. The Government has created three kinds of money, which, it has provided, shall be legal tender in the payment of debts—gold coin, treasury notes, and silver coin in limited amounts—but it has nowhere intimated, in the remotest degree, a preference for any one of these kinds of money over the others, or any desire that debts should be paid in any one rather than in the other, but has left it to the parties interested to act as their own interests may dictate. Neither, so far as we have been able to discover, has there been any restriction placed upon the capacity or right of parties to contract with reference to these several kinds of currency, other than is hereinafter specified. On the contrary, the law expressly recognizes contracts for the delivery of gold coin.

Carpentier v. Atherton.

The Act of March 3, 1863, amending the Act to provide for internal revenue, etc., provides "that all contracts for the purchase or sale of gold or silver coin, or bullion, and all contracts for the loan of money or currency, secured by pledge or deposit, or other disposition of gold or silver coin of the United States, if to be performed after a period exceeding three days, shall be in writing, or printed, and signed by the parties, or their agents or attorneys, and shall have one or more adhesive stamps, as provided in the Act to which this is an amendment," etc. * * * * "And no loan of currency or money on the security of gold or silver coin of the United States, as aforesaid, or of any certificate or other evidence of deposit payable in gold or silver coin, shall be made, exceeding in amount the par value of the coin pledged or deposited as security; and any such loan so made or attempted to be made, shall be utterly void." * * * * "That all contracts, loans or sales of gold and silver coin and bullion, not made in accordance with this Act, shall be wholly and absolutely void." (12 U. S. Statutes at Large, p. 719, Sec. 4.)

Here is an Act of Congress upon the subject of the purchase and sale of gold coin, which recognizes the validity of such contracts, and regulates the mode of making them. It only prescribes that in all cases where more than three days shall elapse between the time of making the contract and its fulfilment, the contract shall be written or printed, and signed by the parties, and shall have one or more adhesive stamps. Upon well settled rules of construction, all such contracts made in conformity with the provisions of this Act, and also all contracts of sale or purchase not having three days to run, are valid. This is the only limitation or restriction upon the power of parties to contract for the payment, or sale and delivery of coin. When we come to a loan of currency or money on the security of gold or silver coin, or of any certificate or other evidence of deposit payable in gold or silver coin, the law prescribes that the amount of the loan shall not exceed the par value of the coin. But no restriction as to price is imposed upon the sale or purchase of, or any other dealings in coin. Of course, if contracts in regard to coin are permitted by the law, those contracts must be valid, and the law contemplates that the contracts will be fulfilled according to their terms.

So, also, the Act to provide ways and means for the support of the Government, passed March 3, 1863, provides "that the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to receive deposits of gold coin and bullion with the Treasurer and Assistant Treasurer of the United States, in sums not less than twenty dollars, and issue certificates therefor in denominations of not less than twenty dollars each, corresponding with the denominations of United States notes. The coin and bullion deposited for or representing the certificates of deposit shall be retained in the Treasury for the payment of the same on demand." (Ib. p. 711, Sec. 5.)

For the convenience of the people, the Government consents to become a depository of their coin when desired by the owner; and upon a deposit of gold coin, the Treasurer is authorized to issue a certificate of deposit to the owner, payable in gold coin. The coin thus deposited is not to be used, but is to be "retained in the Treasury for the payment" of the certificate, on demand. Why not pay it in treasury notes? Simply because it was deposited upon an agreement at the time that it should be returned in coin, and common honesty demands that the contract should be fulfilled. The Government would get no coin deposited in its Treasury upon any other terms; hence, when it undertook to become a depository of coin for its citizens, it was necessary to do as other bankers or persons receiving deposits do—enter into a contract to return the deposit in like funds. These certificates go into circulation in the place of the coin, and become subjects of commercial and financial transactions. The Government in these acts recognizes the propriety of such transactions. And why should not a banker, in the absence of any law prohibiting such transactions, not receive gold coin on deposit, and when he has done so, and issued a certificate showing the fact, and agreeing in consideration thereof to repay the same in gold coin, not be bound by his contract? And why should not a party who has borrowed gold on the faith of his agreement to return the loan in like kind be required to perform his solemn obligation? Good faith and good morals demand it. No law prohibits it, or prohibits making such contracts; the Government has made no discrimination through the law-making power in favor of one kind of money against another. It makes such contracts itself with the citizen, and expressly recognizes contracts between citizens for the purchase and sale of coin. The Government also requires certain portions of its revenues to be paid in coin, and thereby imposes on its citizens a necessity to procure it. No one disputes the right of a party to make all his business transactions upon a coin basis, and to refuse to part with any piece of property, or perform any service without requiring the coin in hand. If, to meet the necessities imposed on him by Government, or his convenience otherwise demand it, he may make a contract for coin, to be executed by delivering it at the time the contract is made, why may he not make a similar contract providing for the anticipated emergency, to be executed in the future, when the emergency shall arise? And if he make the contract, why is he not entitled to have it enforced according to its terms? We have seen that the Act of Congress permits a contract to sell and deliver gold coin on a future day. In what respect does an agreement, for a sufficient consideration, to pay on some future day a given amount in gold coin differ in principle from a contract to sell and deliver at a future day a like amount of gold coin? I can perceive none. The transactions in effect are substantially the same. Practically, the party who agrees to sell and deliver coin at a future day does not agree to sell or deliver any specified piece or pieces of coin then in his possession, but he agrees to sell gold coin generally, relying upon his ability to procure it when the time for fulfilment arrives. A contract payable in coin is substantially the same thing. The only difference is in the form of expressing the contract, and not in the substance of it—the thing to be done. Such contracts do not appear to me to be against the policy of the law; for we have seen that the Act of Congress expressly recognizes, and nowhere forbids them. Coin is lawful money. A party may lawfully pay his debts in coin. He may, at his election, waive his right to pay in anything else, either with or without consideration. The only question is, as to when he shall exercise his right to make his election or waive his privilege; and when he has made his election, and inserted it as one of the essential terms and conditions of his contract, for a full and adequate consideration, there seems to be no good reason in morals, or public policy, why he should not be compelled to abide by his election and the express terms of his agreement. Such contracts, then, are valid.

Both a contract to pay a sum of money in gold coin, and a contract to sell and deliver coin at a future day, create a debt in a general sense, and in that respect stand on the same footing. But they do more. The party agreeing to pay or deliver gold coin at a future day, not only creates a debt which he agrees to pay, or discharge, but he also waives the privilege which the law would have guaranteed to him had he not voluntarily renounced it, and takes upon himself an obligation to pay it in a specific kind of lawful money, and nothing else. The waiver and obligation are essential conditions, and parts of the consideration of the contract, without which, we must presume the contract would not have been made. The agreement to pay in coin is as much a part of the consideration as the agreement to pay at all, and the presumption is that an ample equivalent has been received for the promise. The parties, then, are competent to contract—the contract is not against public policy—it is not prohibited by law—is payable in a lawful kind of money, and is a lawful contract.

But in case of a breach, independent of the statute, there was no adequate remedy. It was not one of the cases in which Courts of equity were in the habit of granting relief by decree for specific performance, although equity did grant relief upon breach of many, but not all contracts, in which the remedy at law was inadequate. And in a Court of law the only remedy was a suit for damages. But damages could only be estimated in dollars and cents, and in legal contemplation, whatever the fact might be in the commercial world, a dollar in one kind of money was equivalent to a dollar in another. Hence, while in theory there was a remedy, practically it was inadequate. There are many other cases in which parties who suffer from breaches in their contracts are without any adequate remedy. For instance, a merchant has a large amount due him payable upon a given day, upon which he relies to meet his own obligations. His debtor fails to pay at the time. The merchant in consequence fails to meet his own engagements, is attached, his business broken up, and ruin is the result. The measure of damages in such case, in a suit against his debtor, is only the money due and interest, while the actual damages may be three times that amount. But that is the only remedy the law affords. In such cases, and many others, it would be impracticable to afford full relief. Many difficulties inherent in the nature of things exist, which conspire to prevent the granting of a full measure of relief, and the law affords that measure of relief, only, which experience teaches, on the whole, to be most practicable, and to approximate, as a general rule, most nearly to doing substantial justice to all parties. But in the case of a contract payable in coin, an easy and practicable remedy may be applied to the breach of that branch of the contract requiring payment in a particular kind of money, by a judgment analogous to a decree in equity for specific performance. In these cases our statute affords the remedy, by authorizing, a judgment for the specific kind of money agreed to be paid, and directing the execution to follow the judgment, and the Sheriff to sell property for, and receive in satisfaction of the execution, the kind of money only, which is provided for in the contract and judgment.

I do not see wherein this law, which only affords a more complete remedy for a breach of a contract lawful in itself, is in any respect in conflict with the Act of Congress, making treasury notes a legal tender in payment of debts. A contract payable in money generally, is undoubtedly payable in any kind of money made by law a legal tender, at the option of the debtor at the time of payment. He contracts simply to pay so much money, and creates a debt pure and simple, and by paying what the law says is money his contract is performed. But if he agrees to pay in gold coin it is not an agreement to pay money simply, but to pay or deliver a specific kind of money, and nothing else; and the payment in any other is not a fulfilment of the contract according to its terms, or the intention of the parties.

For these reasons, in addition to those contained in the able opinion of Mr. Justice Currey, I think the law relating to specific contracts valid, and that the judgment should be affirmed.

THOMAS BODLEY v. ASA FERGUSON, A. J. MYRES, MATTHEW FELLOW, AND J. H. STEMMERMAN.

APPEAL.—Upon an appeal to the Supreme Court from an order denying a new trial, the appellant must furnish the Supreme Court with a copy of the papers used on the hearing of the motion for new trial in the Court below, and if he fail to do so, the appeal will, on motion, be dismissed.

APPEAL from the District Court, Third Judicial District, Santa Clara County.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the Court.

W. T. Wallace, for Appellant.

D. P. & A. Barstow, and Edward Tompkins, for Respondents.

By the Court, SANDERSON, C. J.

This is an appeal from an order granting a new trial. The plaintiff takes the appeal. The case is brought here upon what purports to be a bill of exceptions made up ex parte and inserted in the record without the knowledge or consent of the defendant, the statement upon which the motion for a new trial was made in the Court below being omitted. The respondent moves to dismiss the appeal upon the ground that the appellant has not furnished this Court with the necessary papers.

The three hundred and forty-sixth section of the Practice Act provides that "On appeal * * * from an order the appellant shall furnish the Court with a copy of the notice of appeal, the * * * order appealed from, and a copy of the papers used in the hearing of the Court below; such copies to be certified by the Clerk to be correct. * * * If the appellant fail to furnish the requisite papers, the appeal may be dismissed."

Under this provision it is incumbent upon the appellant to furnish this Court with the statement or affidavits, or both, as the case may be, which were used in the Court below upon the hearing of the motion for a new trial, and the substitution of a different record is wholly unauthorized. The appellant having failed to comply with the law in this respect, the appeal must be dismissed.

Ordered accordingly.

IN THE MATTER OF THE ESTATE OF MICHAEL CARR.

ADMINISTRATORS.—The right of persons entitled to administer on an estate to have, upon their written request, letters of administration granted to persons not entitled to administer, only exists where there is a vacancy in the administration.

SAME.—Where notice in the manner prescribed by law has been given of an application for letters of administration, and upon the hearing no opposition is made, and letters are issued to the applicant, who is not within the degrees of consanguinity mentioned in the sixty-seventh section of the Act to regulate the settlement of the estates of deceased persons, the only parties who can obtain a revocation of the letters as an absolute, unqualified right, are, the wife, child, father, mother, or brother, of the intestate, and they are only authorized to have the letters revoked by presenting a petition praying the revocation, and that letters may be issued to him or her.

APPEAL from the Probate Court, Sacramento County.

George R. Moore, for Respondent.

By the Court, SAWYER, J.

Michael Carr died intestate in the County of Sacramento, leaving a sister, Dorothy Bolton, wife of George Bolton, residents of Sacramento County; a brother, Mark Carr, a resident of Sonoma County, and several married sisters in England, but no other relations in the State of California.

George Bolton, husband of said Dorothy Bolton, and F. McComber, Public Administrator of Sacramento County, each applied for letters of administration. Upon a hearing on the several petitions, it was ordered that letters issue to George Bolton. George Bolton afterwards, as appears by the findings, "came into Court and declared himself unable to procure the requisite sureties, waived his right to administer, and consented that letters of administration should be granted to said McComber." Thereupon letters were issued to McComber, who qualified and entered upon his duties as administrator. Afterwards said Mark Carr, brother of deceased, filed a petition praying that the letters granted to McComber be revoked, and the administration granted to him. Upon the hearing, the prayer of the petitioner was denied on the ground that he was not entitled to letters under the fifty-fifth section of the Act relating to estates of deceased persons, for want of integrity. John Bennett and Stephen Addison then filed a petition praying a revocation of the letters granted to McComber, and the issue of letters to themselves, which petition was accompanied by a written request to the same effect, signed by said Bolton and wife, and Mark Carr. The prayer was denied, and from the order denying the petition this appeal is taken.

There is no question as to the entire fitness of both McComber and the appellants to discharge the duties of the trust. The only question is, as to the absolute, unqualified right of Mark Carr and Bolton and wife, on their written request, to have the letters issued to McComber revoked, and other parties of their selection, not otherwise entitled, appointed. This right is claimed by the appellants under the sixty-sixth and sixty-seventh sections of the Act. We think section sixty-six refers to cases where there is a vacancy in the administration. The Public Administrator is one of the persons entitled to letters. There are others entitled to preference. In this case a petition was filed by Bolton, the husband of the sister of the deceased, in right of his wife, and by McComber at the same time. Letters were awarded to Bolton, but being unable to give the necessary bond, letters were issued to McComber with his assent. On the hearing of McComber's application, all parties interested having had notice in the mode prescribed by law, had an opportunity to oppose it. No opposition having been made, the letters were duly issued to him, and were subject to be defeated by the mere will of the parties interested only in the cases specified in section sixty-seven. The only parties who are authorized to obtain the revocation under that section are the wife, child, father, mother or brother of the intestate, and such persons are only authorized to have the letters revoked by presenting a petition "praying the revocation and that letters of administration may be issued to him or her," and not to parties not entitled to administer otherwise than by the request of such parties praying the revocation. Neither Bolton nor his wife is one of the parties mentioned in section sixty-seven. Mark Carr asks that the letters be revoked, not that he may be appointed himself, but that letters may issue to strangers, who, aside from his request, have no right to administer. We think no such unqualified right to have the letters revoked and appellants appointed, as claimed by appellants, exists. In Pacheco's Case, 23 Cal. 476, one of the petitioners was a child of the deceased, and she asked that letters be issued to herself.

In the present case it appears that it had been judiciously determined in a proceeding on a prior application that Mark Carr was himself incompetent.

Judgment affirmed.

JACOB FOX v. MARY FOX.

PLEADINGS IN DIVORCE SUIT.—If the complaint in an action to obtain a divorce avers the marriage of plaintiff and defendant, and the answer does not deny the averment, it is an admission of the fact for the purposes of the trial, and the marriage need not be proved.

FINDING OF FACTS.—Facts averred in the complaint and not denied in the answer, are not required to be found by the Court.

FOX v. FOX.

DECLARATIONS AS EVIDENCE.—If the deposition of a witness has been introduced on behalf of one party, the other may prove his confessions or declarations for the purpose of contradicting his deposition or impeaching his credit.

OBJECTION TO A QUESTION.—An inquiry of a witness, whether he has heard a person, not a party to the suit, say anything about the matter in controversy, is not objectionable. If such question, merely, is objected to, and the witness afterwards states what the conversation was the evidence will be allowed to remain, unless the other party objects to the testimony or moves to strike it out.

APPEAL from the District Court, Sixth Judicial District, Sacramento County.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the Court.

Robinson & McConnell, for Appellant.

There is no proof of the marriage of the parties. This is essential. The plaintiff must allege and prove his marriage with the defendant. The marriage is the foundation of the whole proceeding. (Bishop on Marriage and Divorce, 3d Ed. §§ 314, 315, and cases there cited.)

Proof of the marriage of the parties is as material as proof of the adultery. (Abrogart v. Abrogart, 8 How. Pr. R. 298; Dobbs v. Dobbs, 3 Edwards' Ch. R. 377.)

When the defendant does not contest the marriage, the plaintiff must prove it in connection with his other allegations. (Bishop on Marriage and Divorce, 3d Ed. § 315, and cases there cited.)

The Court will require proof of the marriage even though the party accused makes default of appearance. (Williams v. Williams, 3 Greenleaf, 135.)

The necessity of proving the marriage arises not only from the fact that the marriage is an essential ingredient in the offense alleged, since no violation of matrimonial duty can take place where the matrimonial relation does not exist, but, likewise, from the consideration that as divorce is the suspension or dissolution of this relation, if there is no relation subsisting there is nothing for the divorce to act upon. (Bishop on Marriage and Divorce, 3d Ed. § 315, and cases there cited.)

The conclusion that we arrive at from these authorities is, that the plaintiff must not only allege his marriage with the defendant, but he must prove it, even though the party accused makes default of appearance, or when the defendant does not contest the marriage.

The amount and species of proof necessary to establish a marriage in suits for divorce and separation seems not to be very clearly defined upon authority. (Bishop on Marriage and Divorce, 3d Ed. § 318, and cases there cited.)

But in a suit for divorce on the ground of adultery, like the case at bar, the rule seems to be clearly settled upon both principle and authority that there must be proof of an actual marriage in opposition to proof by cohabitation, reputation, and other circumstances from which a marriage may be inferred. (2 Greenleaf on Evidence, § 49, and cases there cited; 1 Phillips on Evidence, Cowen & Hill's, and Edwards' notes, 631, and cases there cited; Case v. Case, 17 Cal. 598; Bishop on Marriage and Divorce, 3d Ed. §§ 324, 325.)

Henry Stow, for Respondent.

Here is a serious and solemn admitted fact that the defendant was married to plaintiff, by not denying it in the answer.

The object of the rule requiring proof in corroboration of defendant's confession is to guard against collusion; and when the entire testimony, confession and circumstances repel all suspicion of collusion, and leave no doubt of the truth of the confessions, the Court should act upon them. (Baker v. Baker, 13 Cal. 87.)

By the Court, RHODES, J.

This is an action for a divorce a vinculo matrimonii, on the alleged ground of adultery. The Court found for the plaintiff, and decreed a divorce. The defendant's motion for a new trial was denied, and she appeals from the order and the judgment.

The appellant assigns for error the failure of the plaintiff to prove the marriage. The plaintiff alleges that he was married to the defendant in 1852, in the City of Chicago, and that ever since that time they have lived together as husband and wife.

The defendant failed to deny this allegation, and it thereby stands admitted as fully as if she had expressly alleged it to be true, and in any civil action, except an action for a divorce, her admission thus made upon the record, of the fact of the marriage, would be conclusive upon her, and no evidence on the point would be required. The Act concerning divorces (section eight) provides that "no divorce shall be granted in any action by default of the defendant, nor on the admission or statement of either party; but in all cases the Court shall require proof of the facts alleged as the grounds for divorce."

What are the grounds for a divorce referred to in the statute? They are those causes enumerated in section four of said Act—natural impotence, adultery, extreme cruelty, willful desertion, and the other grounds mentioned in that section. The marriage is in no sense a ground for the divorce. The marriage must have been solemnized before an action can be maintained for its dissolution, but the existence of that fact being found, then the legal causes for its dissolution constitute the grounds mentioned in the statute, of which proof is required. The statute was framed to prevent collusion between the parties, having for its object the dissolution of the marriage relation, not its creation. The fact of the marriage is fully established by the defendant's failure to deny it in her answer, and that is equivalent to the most direct proof.

The appellant makes the point that the finding is insufficient to authorize the decree, because there was no finding of the fact of the marriage. The fact was not in issue between the parties, and therefore was not required to be found by the Court.

There was no error in admitting in evidence the confessions of David Fox, the alleged particeps criminis, for his deposition had been taken in behalf of the defendant, and his confessions previously made were admissible and competent to contradict him or impeach his credit. While a witness for the plaintiff, who lived in the same house with the defendant and the child of the parties, aged about six years, was testifying on behalf of the plaintiff, he asked the witness this question: "Did you ever hear the child say anything about her mother sleeping with Uncle David?" The defendant objected to the question as "leading, incompetent; that the child would not be a competent witness on account of its age." The Court overruled the objection. The question was not leading, and if it had been it was admissible in that form, in the discretion of the Court. The objection on the ground of the tender age of the child is not worthy of any consideration, for if the declarations of any person in respect to the subject of the inquiry were admissible those of the child would be. The objection cannot be maintained on the ground that the testimony was incompetent. The inquiry was not what the child had said, but was preliminary to questions relating to that subject. The only proper answer to the question asked was simply "Yes" or "No;" and if answered in the affirmative it might be proper, after showing that the mother was present, to ask what the child said, for the purpose of proving what was her mother's language, conduct, or demeanor when the child made the declaration.

The witness, instead of answering the question, went on to state what the child said, and what another person thereupon said, without objection on the part of the defendant. If the defendant had objected to such testimony, or if after it had been given, without showing the presence of the defendant, she had moved for its exclusion, it would have been error for the Court to have overruled the objection or motion. But no such objection was made. It was confined to the preliminary inquiry, whether the witness had heard the child say anything about the matter referred to in the question.

Judgment affirmed.

M. KIERSKI v. H. O. MATHEWS.

TREASURY NOTES — LEGAL TENDER.—The Act of Congress passed February 25th, 1862, making the notes issued thereunder a legal tender in payment of private debts, is constitutional.

Kieraki v. Mathews.

APPEAL from the District Court, Fifth Judicial District, San Joaquin County.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the Court.

H. O. Beatty, for Appellant.

A. M. Heslep, for Respondent.

By the Court, CUNNEY, J.

This is an action for the recovery of the amount due from the defendant to the plaintiff on two promissory notes, both of which were made and delivered on the 17th day of May, 1862, and both of which are for the payment of money without specifying of what quality or kind. The defendant, by his answer, admitted the making and delivery of the notes, and then further answered, pleading a tender of the sum due on the same in "United States legal tender notes, commonly denominated greenbacks," except ten dollars, which was tendered in gold and silver; and also pleaded facts showing that he had kept his tender good; and with his answer he brought and paid the money into Court for the plaintiff.

To the affirmative matter so pleaded, the plaintiff demurred, alleging the same to be insufficient in law, and as constituting no defense.

"1st. Because the facts stated do not constitute a tender.

"2d. Because legal tender notes or greenbacks are not money."

The Court sustained the demurrer, and the defendant excepted. The plaintiff then applied for judgment upon the complaint and answer as they then stood, whereupon judgment was rendered and entered in favor of the plaintiff against the defendant for the amount due by said notes, and also for the costs of the action. From this judgment the defendant has appealed, and the only question now to be determined is, as to the sufficiency of the tender pleaded by the defendant, and this rests entirely upon the validity and binding obligation of the Act of Congress passed February 25, 1862, by authority of which said legal tender notes were made lawful money and a legal tender in the payment of private debts. In the case of Lick v. Faulkner, (ante, 405,) we considered this subject at length, and upon the reasoning and authority of that case we hold that the tender made was sufficient, and the Court erred in sustaining the demurrer and in rendering judgment against the defendant for a sum exceeding the amount tendered and for the costs of the action. Upon the case as disclosed by the record, the plaintiff was entitled to judgment against the defendant for the sum tendered, and the defendant was entitled to judgment against the plaintiff for his costs in the action.

The judgment is reversed and the cause remanded, with directions to the Court below to render judgment in accordance with this opinion.

JEREMIAH CLARKE v. WILLIAM HUBER.

STATUTE OF LIMITATIONS.—The period of limitation in this State, to bar a right of entry upon real estate, commences to run from the 22d of April, 1855.

ESTOPPEL AT COMMON LAW.—At common law a purely equitable estoppel, or purely equitable title, could not be entertained, even if it were represented upon the record.

ESTOPPELS IN PALS MUST BE PLEADED.—Under our system of practice equitable estoppels and defenses can be entertained in actions at law, but they must be specially stated in the answer.

EVIDENCE OF ESTOPPEL.—If an equitable estoppel, relied on in an action of ejectment, is not specially set up in the answer, evidence to sustain it should be rejected.

ARGUMENT IN SUPREME COURT.—The respondent on an appeal to the Supreme Court is at liberty to suggest any ground that he may choose, to show that the ruling of the Court below was right, whether the grounds suggested were advanced in the discussion before the Court below or not, while the appellant is confined to the objections urged in the Court below.

APPEAL from the District Court, Third Judicial District, Santa Clara County.

Plaintiff recovered judgment, and defendant appealed.
The facts are stated in the opinion of the Court.

Clarke v. Huber.

Patterson, Wallace & Stow, for Appellant.

No ground is given on which the objection to evidence of an equitable estoppel is based. It cannot, therefore, be said it was because the estoppel was not pleaded. If that had been the ground, the objection might have been obviated by an amendment of the answer.

The proof of the pointing out and location by Robles, the taking possession and the claim of ownership under the Koch deed, should have been received, and were sufficient to control the erroneous description in the deed, independent of the Statute of Limitations. (Livingston v. TenBroeck, 16 Johns. 482; Jackson v. Vedder, 2 Caines, 210; Stanley v. Green, 12 Cal. 162, 163.)

J. Clarke, for Respondent.

By the Court, SHAFER, J.

This was an action of ejectment brought to recover the possession of a portion of the Rancho Santa Rita, situated in the County of Santa Clara.

In addition to the usual allegations in ejectment, it is averred in the complaint that "the plaintiff claims the premises and the possession thereof, under title derived from the Mexican Government, and that said title was, viz: on the first Monday in December, eighteen hundred and fifty-nine, finally confirmed by the legally constituted authorities of the United States, viz: the Supreme Court thereof."

The answer contains a general denial; a special plea of title in Henry A. Huber, containing an averment that the defendant is in possession of the premises by leave and license of the said Henry A. Huber; and a further plea of the Statute of Limitations. In this last plea the defendant impliedly admits that a Mexican grant embracing the property was confirmed by the Court, and at the date named in the complaint, but denies the allegation that the plaintiff claims the premises, or any part thereof, by virtue of such grant.

Clarke v. Huber.

1. As to the title of Henry A. Huber, which the defendant justifies.

It was admitted at the trial that the lands described in the complaint were part of the Rancho Santa Rita, granted by the Mexican nation to José Pena; that the said grant had been finally confirmed by the Supreme Court of the United States in December, eighteen hundred and fifty-seven, to José Teodoro Robles and Secundino Robles, grantees of said José Pena.

It further appeared that José Teodoro Robles, one of the tenants in common, on the 2d of April, 1858, conveyed an undivided moiety of said rancho to Antonio Larrain, who conveyed the same to Vallejo, who conveyed to the plaintiff on the 25th of March, 1859. It was admitted that the plaintiff and defendant both claimed under the aforesaid grant.

It appeared from evidence introduced by defendant that José Teodoro Robles, having first procured from Secundino Robles a conveyance of all his interest in the said rancho, conveyed (as we shall for the purposes of the present investigation assume) three hundred and twenty acres of the rancho to Louis and Wilhelmina Koch, on the 8th day of February, 1853, and that the said grantees conveyed the same to the said Henry A. Huber on the 23d day of September, 1853. It further appeared that the defendant was in possession of the lands described in the complaint by the license alleged in the answer.

The defendant, for the purpose of proving that the lands described in the complaint were included in the deed under which Huber claimed from Robles, produced a plat of survey, and called the surveyor by whom it was made as a witness. The witness testified in chief that the survey was correct, and that the deeds of Huber included the land in controversy; but on cross examination he admitted that he had made a mistake in his survey, and that no part of the premises demanded were in fact included in the title deeds of Huber. These deeds called for a parallelogram, one thousand varas north and south by fourteen hundred varas east and west, but the survey and plat had been made on the false supposal that the true north was north thirty-three degrees east, and the true south south thirty-three degrees west. This was all the testimony introduced upon the question of the location of the lands called for by the deeds relied upon by the defendant, and it was decisive to show that the premises described in the complaint were not included within them.

Clarke v. Huber.

2. As to the defense of the Statute of Limitations.

It appeared in evidence that the defendant, under the license before named, entered upon the premises in eighteen hundred and fifty-four, and inclosed them with a fence, and that he had possessed them ever since. This action was commenced on the 17th of April, 1860.

In Billings v. Harvey, 6 Cal. 383, the Act of eighteen hundred and fifty-five, passed on the twenty-second of April of that year, was held to be the only Statute of Limitations applicable to actions for the recovery of real property, and that the time fixed therein runs only from the passage of that Act. This decision was reaffirmed in Billings v. Hall, 7 Cal. 3, and it is now too late to question the correctness of the rule established by those cases. This action was commenced five days before the expiration of the five years.

8. It appears from the record that the defendant, in the course of the trial below, offered to prove "that when Henry A. Huber was about to purchase of the Kochs the tract of land described in the deed to said Henry A. Huber, already given in evidence, and before he paid the purchase money, the plaintiff's grantor, Robles, went with said Koch and said Huber on the land now in possession of defendant, and pointed out to said Huber the lands now in the possession of defendant as the land embraced in the deed of Robles to Koch, said Robles then knowing that said Huber was about to purchase the same; and that, after so pointing out the same, said Huber immediately purchased the same, and paid said Koch three thousand dollars therefor; and immediately thereafter the defendant, as the agent and servant of said purchaser, took possession of the premises so pointed out, and has ever since continuously occupied the same."

The introduction of this evidence was objected to by the plaintiff, and the objection was sustained by the Court. To this ruling the defendant duly excepted.

For all the purposes of this hearing the respondent concedes that the facts embraced in the defendant's offer would amount to an estoppel, but he justifies the ruling excluding the evidence on the ground that the estoppel was not specially set up in the answer.

The appellant, in reply to this objection, insists that by the rule of the common law it was not necessary that estoppels in pais should be specially pleaded, and authorities are cited in support of this position.

It may be admitted that at common law estoppels of that character might be proved under the general issue; still it is to be borne in mind that a purely equitable estoppel, or purely equitable title, could not be entertained at common law even if it were represented upon the record, for the reason that the common law Courts have no jurisdiction over such titles considered as a subject matter. Under our system, however, the jurisdictional difficulty has been overcome; but still the decisions of this and of the late Supreme Court require that in actions at common law all equitable defenses should be specially stated in the answer. If they are not so stated they are waived for all the purposes of the action. (Arguello v. Edinger, 10 Cal. 150; Lestrade v. Barth, 19 Cal. 660; Downer v. Smith, 24 Cal. 114; Blum v. Robertson, 24 Cal. 127.)

The defense which the appellant offered to prove was not only an equitable defense, but was one over which the jurisdiction in equity was exclusive. The rejected evidence was not offered for the purpose of proving a boundary agreed upon, by parol, between conterminous proprietors, followed by possession conforming to the agreed line; nor was it offered for the purpose of fixing the position of a monument called for by a deed, as in Stanley v. Green, 12 Cal. 162. It stands confessed that Huber had no deed applicable to the premises in controversy. Assuming the facts embraced in the offer, Huber has a right, perhaps, as against Clarke, to have his deed reformed, or a right to compel Clarke to give a new deed to him embracing the demanded premises. But this right is not only an equitable right in view of its origin and subject matter, but for the further reason that under the old system it would be cognizable in equity only. From these views it follows that the evidence offered to prove the right at the trial was properly excluded.

It is further insisted for the appellant that inasmuch as the objection taken by the respondent to the introduction of the evidence was a general one, he ought not now to be permitted to justify the ruling on the ground that the equitable right was not specially pleaded.

The reasoning, pushed to its consequences, would preclude the respondent from submitting any argument in favor of the ruling. It is unnecessary, however, to consider the question upon principle, for it is well settled that the burden of showing error is upon the party who alleges it. The error alleged here is the exclusion of the defendant's testimony. The respondent is at liberty to suggest any ground that he may choose, to show that the ruling was right, whether advanced in the discussions below or not. If the testimony had been admitted, and Clarke had appealed, he would have been required to confine himself to objections specifically taken at the trial and stated in the record. The distinction is between the case of a party seeking to reverse a judgment and that of a party resisting the attempt.

Judgment affirmed.

DISMISSAL OF APPEAL.—Where an appeal has been dismissed by reason of the failure of the appellant to file the transcript of the record in the Supreme Court within the time required by the rules, the order of dismissal will not be vacated and the appeal restored unless the appellant shall make it appear, not only that there has been no want of diligence on his part, but also, shall show that, at least in the opinion of his counsel, the appeal has been taken in good faith, and that there are substantial errors in the record which ought to be corrected by the Supreme Court.

APPEAL from the District Court, Tenth Judicial District, Colusa County.

The plaintiff recovered judgment in the Court below, and defendant appealed.

The other facts are stated in the opinion of the Court.

C. D. Semple, for Appellant.

By the Court, SANDERSON, C. J.

The appeal in this case was dismissed during the first week of the term upon motion of the respondent, made pursuant to the third and fourth rules of this Court. Subsequently, and before the adjournment of the term, the appellant, upon notice to the respondent, moved to vacate the order of dismissal and to restore the appeal. Upon this motion both parties presented affidavits, from which we find the following facts: On the 26th of January, 1864, the statement on appeal as settled by the Judge was filed in the Clerk's office. The appeal was perfected by service of notice and filing undertaking on the first day of February following. Within a short time thereafter the attorney for appellant requested the Clerk to make up the transcript for this Court, but, on being asked when he wanted it, he replied, "You can make it up now, or next Fall, or some other time." The title papers, etc., of plaintiff and defendant, used in evidence on the trial, were made a part of the statement, and the transcript could not be made out by the Clerk without the original or agreed copies. Neither has ever been furnished by the appellant.

The only reason alleged by appellant for not furnishing the documents in question is that they were and still are on file in the District Courts of Yuba or Sacramento County, or in this Court, in other suits there pending. No reason is given why they could not have been withdrawn by stipulation or otherwise, or agreed copies obtained for the purpose of making out the transcript; on the contrary, it affirmatively appears that no effort was made by appellant to obtain them in any manner, and there is no pretense that an effort to that end would have proved abortive; on the contrary, it is clear that they could have been readily obtained; for it appears that, about the middle of May last, the respondent by stipulation withdrew his title papers from said Courts, and has had them in his possession ever since, with the full knowledge of appellant's attorney and by virtue of his express stipulation; and it further appears that the respondent has been at all times ready and willing to furnish the appellant with his title papers, but has never been called upon by appellant for that purpose.

The second and third rules of this Court are to the following effect: "In all cases where an appeal has been perfected and the statement filed (if there be one) thirty days before the commencement of the next succeeding term, the transcript of the record shall be filed on or before the first day of such term."

"If the transcript of the record be not filed within the time prescribed, the appeal may be dismissed, on motion, during the first week of the term, without notice. A cause so dismissed may be restored during the same term, upon good cause shown, on notice to the opposite party; and unless so restored the dismissal shall be final and a bar to any other appeal in the same case."

The facts in this case wholly fail to show any "good cause" within the meaning and intent of the rule; on the contrary, they show a want of the most ordinary diligence on the part of the appellant in prosecuting his appeal. Moreover, on motions of this character the affidavits should show that the appeal has been taken in good faith, and that, in the opinion of counsel at least, there are substantial errors in the record which ought to be corrected by this Court. Upon these points the affidavits of the appellant are entirely silent. To hold that, under this showing, an order dismissing an appeal should be vacated and the appeal restored, would be a practical nullification of the rules of this Court, which, for purposes of equal and exact justice and promoting a uniform and established practice, should be regarded and held to be as binding and obligatory upon litigants as any other rule of civil conduct.

THE PEOPLE v. CYRUS A. EASTMAN.

TAXATION — JUDGMENT WHERE AND HOW ASSESSED.—A judgment for a debt and foreclosing a mortgage given to secure it, is only subject to taxation in the county where the owner of the judgment resides, and then the money due on the judgment alone is taxable.

ASSESSMENT OF MORTGAGE.—A mortgage, as such, is not liable to be assessed for taxes, but the assessment should be made of the debt which the mortgage was given to secure, and the debt, where the creditor resides in the State, has no situs for the purposes of taxation apart from the residence of the owner.

APPEAL from the District Court, Thirteenth Judicial District, Mariposa County.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the Court.

J. G. McCullough, Attorney-General, for Appellant.

The property was taxable in the County of Mariposa; the land on which the mortgage and judgment of foreclosure is a lien, is situate in that county; the judgment debt has its existence there; it is an acknowledged, unsatisfied, solvent debt; it ripened into a judgment in that county, and there is a debt of record. And now shall it, the property, pay tax, where it exists, or where its owner lives?

What county property shall be taxed in, is within the province and power of the Legislature to say.

By section thirteen of said Act, page 423 of Stat. of 1861, the Assessor must ascertain "all property, real or personal, subject to taxation," and assess it in that county to the owner or possessor, whether present or absent—known, or if unknown, say so—but assess it he must. (See Secs. 10 and 19.)

By section fourteen the Assessor is to obtain a list of all property which a party may own in another county, which list shall "specify the kind and nature of all other personal property in such other county belonging to the party;" and by section fifteen the Assessor must send copies of such lists to the Assessor of the proper county who is to assess the property, if not already assessed by him, "as other property therein."

These three sections show that where the property is, there it is to pay tax; and the only exception to this rule is, that a party, under section fourteen, may pay taxes on deposits of money or gold dust (not silver dust, or any other species of deposit even (where he lives, and not in the county where are the deposits.

This particular exception only illustrates in a clearer light the rule intended to be laid down by the Legislature. And under these sections the Assessor can only make an assessment from the list given him on the property in his county, with above exception; and further, if the party refuse to furnish the statement, the Assessor, under section thirteen, can only arbitrarily assess him for his property in that county which the "statement required by this section," (not sec. 14,) if furnished, would have shown.

Thus far there seems no foundation for the distinction between tangible and intangible property made in the case of People v. Park, 23 Cal. 138.

The case of People v. Park, 23 Cal., is not a precedent nor authority in this case.

1st. It was decided under the law of 1860, and not the Revenue Act of 1861, under which this case arises.

2d. As a matter of fact, the Act of 1860 had been repealed long before the assessment was made, and in that case considered.

3d. The assessment was made under the Act of 1861.

4th. The debt did exist at and long before the commencement of the year 1861, for which year it was assessed.

5th. It is not law; and I submit it is not authority for any purpose in this case.

Clarke & Carpentier, for Respondent.

By the Court, SAWYER, J.

This is an action to recover a tax levied in the County of Mariposa, under the Revenue Act of 1861, for the fiscal year 1863-4. At the time the tax was levied, the defendant was, and he ever since has been, a resident of the City and County of San Francisco. The property taxed was a judgment of record in Mariposa County, foreclosing a mortgage held by defendant on lands situate in said county. The defendant had judgment and plaintiff appeals.

The question is, as to whether the judgment is properly taxable in Mariposa County. We think not. In the case of The People v. Park, 23 Cal. 138, the property assessed was a mortgage upon lands in Mariposa County, held by a resident of San Francisco. In that case the tax was assessed under the Act of 1860; but the provisions of that Act, in all respects affecting the question under consideration, are substantially the same as in the Act of 1861. It was held—and we think correctly—that the property was not assessable in Mariposa County. The property to be assessed in such cases is money at interest, or debts. The money at interest, debt or obligation, is the principal thing, and the mortgage is only a security—a mere incident to the debt or obligation. The mortgage has no existence independent of the thing secured by it; a payment of the debt discharges the mortgage. The thing secured is intangible, and has no situs distinct and apart from the residence of the holder. It pertains to and follows the person. The same debt may, at the same time, be secured by a mortgage upon land in every county in the State; and if the mere fact that the mortgage exists in a particular county gives the property in the mortgage a situs subjecting it to taxation in that county, a party, without further legislation, might be called upon to pay the tax several times—for the lien for taxes attaches at the same time in every county in the State, and the mortgage in one county may be a different one from that in another, although the debt secured is the same. The fact that the mortgage has been foreclosed, and the lien carried into a judgment does not, in our opinion, change the character of the property with reference to the question under discussion. The principal thing is still a debt, secured by a judgment lien instead of a mere mortgage lien. The twenty-third section does not affect the question. Those provisions operate in cases where the creditor resides in the county in which the mortgaged premises are situated. The Act of 1860 contained the same provision. (See also Faulkner v. Hunt, 16 Cal. 171.)

GEORGE G. GREELY v. JAMES B. TOWNSEND AND JOHN B. POWELSON.

WRIT OF ERROR TO THE SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES.—When a final judgment in a suit has been rendered in the highest Court of law or equity of a State in which a decision in the suit could be had, and a writ of error has been issued by the Clerk of the Circuit Court of the United States, directed to the Judges of the Court in which the judgment was rendered, commanding that the record be sent before the Supreme Court of the United States to be there reviewed, the presiding Judge of the Court in which the judgment was rendered is not compelled, as a matter of right, to award a citation to the respondent to appear before the Supreme Court of the United States to maintain the validity of his judgment, but he may look into the record for the purpose of determining whether in his opinion the judgment is one from which a writ of error lies, and if he determines that it is not, he may refuse the citation.

SAME.—The granting of a citation is not a mere ministerial act, but one of judicial discretion.

POWER OF STATE LEGISLATURE.—It is not within the constitutional power of a State Legislature to confer jurisdiction upon Federal Courts, or prescribe the means or mode of its exercise.

WRIT OF ERROR FROM JUDGMENT CONCERNING PUEBLO LANDS.—A writ of error does not lie to the Supreme Court of the United States from a judgment rendered by the Supreme Court of this State, by which it is decided that the City of San Francisco was, at the date of the conquest and cession of California, and long prior thereto, a pueblo, and that as such pueblo she had a title to the lands within her general limits, and that such lands were held by the city in trust for public uses, and were not, either under the old Government or the new, the subject of seizure and sale under execution issued on a judgment against the city.

WHEN WRIT OF ERROR LIES.—The true test as to whether a writ of error lies to the Supreme Court of the United States from the final judgment of a

Greely v. Townsend et al.

State Court is to be arrived at, not from mere averment in the pleadings, but from the matter decided, as developed in the whole record.

STAY OF EXECUTION.—The presiding Judge of the highest Court in a State has no power to grant a stay of proceedings on a judgment rendered in that Court until an application can be made to some Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States to issue a citation on a writ of error.

APPLICATION for a citation to the respondent, on a writ from the United States Circuit Court for California to this court.

The case of Greely v. Townsend and Powelson has not been reported, as it did not involve any point of law not already passed on. It was an action of ejectment brought to recover possession of the western half of Fifty-vara Lot Number One Thousand One Hundred and Eighty-eight, in the City and County of San Francisco. The defendants, on the trial, offered to deraign a title from an execution sale on a judgment against the city, and offered to show by a decree of confirmation by the United States Land Commission of the city's title, that the title was in the city.

The evidence was excluded by the Court.

Plaintiff recovered judgment in the District Court, Twelfth Judicial District, City and County of San Francisco, and defendants appealed to the Supreme Court. After the affirmance of the judgment by the Supreme Court, appellants obtained a writ of error from the Clerk of the Circuit Court of the United States, directed to the Judges of the Supreme Court of the State of California, and then applied to the Chief Justice of said Court to award a citation to the respondent to appear before the Supreme Court of the United States and maintain the validity of his judgment. This application was made on the 14th day of June, 1864. The Chief Justice fixed the time for hearing the application for the 11th day of July, 1864, and in the meantime stayed all proceedings in the cause.

Vanarman & Townsend, for the motion.

A writ of error from the United States Supreme Court to the Supreme Court of a State is a writ of right, and issues as debito justitiæ, and not as a matter of discretion, and does not depend upon the amount involved in the controversy, nor is any allowance thereof required beyond what takes place by the issue of the writ from the United States Supreme or Circuit Court, and the right to maintain it ought not to be passed upon by a Judge at Chambers. (Conklin's Treat. 3d Ed. pp. 681, 683; Buel v. Van Ness, 8 Wheat. 321, 323.)

Such writ is a supersedeas, and stays execution in cases under the twenty-fifth section of the Judiciary Act as well as when prosecuted from Circuit Courts, when the writ is served by lodging a copy thereof for the adverse party in the Clerk's office where the record remains within ten days, Sundays exclusive, after rendering the judgment or passing the decree complained of. (1 U. S. Stats, at Large, p. 85, §§ 23, 25; Conklin's Treat. 3d Ed. pp. 679, 680, 683, 684; Siocton v. Bishop, 2 How. U. S. 74.)

Unless the writ of error had been regarded and treated generally in the other States of the Union as a writ of right, and the question of jurisdiction under the twenty-fifth section of the Judiciary Act as properly belonging to the United States Supreme Court to determine, it can hardly be imagined how such cases as the following could ever have been taken to that Court under said twenty-fifth section: Houston v. Moore, 3 Wheat. 433; Evans v. Phillips, 4 Wheat. 73; Gibbons v. Ogden, 6 Wheat. 448; Verden v. Coleman, 18 How. 86; Withers v. Buckley, 20 How. 84; White v. Wright, 22 How. 19.

Even if, upon the present application, and notwithstanding the issuance and service of the writ of error, the Chief Justice of this Court were required to look into the record and be satisfied that the plaintiffs in error will, or at least, may, be able in the United States Supreme Court to maintain their writ, still, it is clear that the writ is in this case properly issued and the record is examinable in the United States Supreme Court. (Smith v. State of Maryland, 6 Cranch, 304, 305; Fairfax's Devisee v. Hunter's Lessee, 7 Cranch, 621, 622, 626; Martin v. Hunter's Lessee, 1 Wheat. 355, 361; Miller v. Nicholls, 4 Wheat. 311; Ross v. Doe ex dem. Borland,

SANDERSON, C. J.

At the last term of this Court a judgment was rendered in this case affirming the judgment of the Court below. The defendant, against whom the judgment was rendered, now presents a writ of error, addressed to the Justices of this Court, issued by the Clerk of the Circuit Court of the United States for the Northern District of California, and applies to me as Chief Justice of the Court for a citation to the defendant in error. The application is made under the provisions of the twenty-fifth section of an Act of Congress, passed on the 24th of September, 1789, entitled "An Act to establish the Judicial Courts of the United States." (1 U. S. Statutes at Large, 85.) That section declares:

"A final judgment or decree in any suit in the highest Court of law or equity of a State in which a decision in the suit could be had, where is drawn in question the validity of a treaty or statute of, or an authority exercised under the United States, and the decision is against their validity; or where is drawn in question the validity of a statute of, or an authority exercised under any State on the ground of their being repugnant to the Constitution, treaties or laws of the United States, and the decision is in favor of such validity; or where is drawn in question the construction of any clause of the Constitution, or of a treaty, or statute of, or commission held under the United States, and the decision is against the title, right, privilege or exemption specially set up or claimed by either party under such clause of the said Constitution, treaty, statute or commission, may be re-examined and reversed or affirmed in the Supreme Court of the United States upon a writ of error, the citation being signed by the Chief Justice, or Judge or Chancellor of the Court rendering or passing the judgment or decree complained of, or by a Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States." * * *

In support of the application it is first argued that the writ provided for in the foregoing section is a writ of right, and issues ex debito justitiæ and not as a matter of discretion; and that I cannot look into the record or proceedings for the purpose of determining whether the case falls within either class described in the section above quoted; and that no alternative is allowed, and I have no choice, but must issue the citation upon the presentation of the writ and a sufficient bond, notwithstanding I may be fully satisfied in my own judgment that the case in which the application is made does not come within the purview of the section in question.

To this doctrine I am unable to assent. It finds no color in the Federal Judiciary Act, and the industrious research of counsel has been unable to cite a single case in which the doctrine for which he contends is announced. Conklin's Treatise (pages 81 and 83,) the case of Buel v. Van Ness, 8 Wheaton, 321, and an Act of the Legislature of this State entitled "An Act to provide for certifying and removing certain cases from the Courts of this State to the United States Circuit Courts, and to remove, by writ of error, certain cases from the Supreme Court of this State to the Supreme Court of the United States," passed April 9, 1855; (Statutes of 1855, p. 80,) only are cited by counsel in support of his proposition. Conklin's Treatise and the case of Buel v. Van Ness wholly fail, in my judgment, to sustain the doctrine. On the contrary, so far as they afford any guide to a correct solution of the question, they seem to militate against it.

Mr. Conklin, in his Treatise, (page 683,) says: "When the writ of error is to a State Court, the citation may be signed by the presiding Judge of the Court to which it is directed, or by any Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States. It is usual, in imitation of the English practice, also to have the writ of error allowed by the Judge. But the Act does not in terms require it, nor is there any rule in the Supreme Court requiring it, and no formal allowance beyond what is implied by the approval of the security offered, and the signing of the citation is necessary in any case unless it is made so by rule or established usage in the particular Circuit Court to which it is returnable." This language, although not very satisfactory, certainly favors the idea that there must be an allowance of the writ by the Judge either expressly or by implication. To allow implies an exercise of judgment and will on the part of him by whom the act is done, coupled with the power, in his discretion, to refuse. In Buel v. Van Ness it was objected that the writ of error in that case did not, upon its face, purport to be issued upon a final judgment of the highest Court in the State. In reply to this objection Mr. Justice Johnson, who delivered the opinion of the Court, said: "We see no reason why it should be so expressed. The writ of error is the act of the Court; its object is to cite the parties to this Court, and to bring up the record. How else is this Court to ascertain whether the judgment be final? Nor can there be any danger of its being hastily or erroneously used, since it must be allowed either by the presiding Judge of the State Court or a Judge of the Supreme Court of the United States." Further on, he said: "It is a writ of common right in the cases to which the jurisdiction of an appellate Court extends, and the abuse of it is sufficiently guarded against, as suggested to the first exception," referring to what he had previously said, which was that which I have above quoted. What is the guard against the hasty and erroneous use of the writ to which he refers in the first instance, or its abuse in the second, unless it be the judgment and discretion of the Judge by whom the writ is allowed and the citation issued? The reason assigned by him why it was not material that the judgment need not appear upon the face of the writ to have been a final judgment is, in effect, because the Judge by whom the writ was allowed and the citation signed had the power to determine in advance, and preliminary to his signing the citation, whether the judgment was final, and if not to refuse to sign it. Whether the judgment is final or not is one of the tests of the jurisdiction of the appellate Court, and if I may, as the case of Buel v. Van Ness clearly implies, ascertain the presence or absence of that test, with a view of determining whether I will sign or refuse to sign the citation, then, by parity of reason, I may look into the case for the purpose of ascertaining whether it embraces the other conditions upon which the jurisdiction of the appellate Court is grounded, and may be governed in my final action by the conclusion to which my judgment may come.

This is not the first time that the question under consideration has arisen in this State. The same point was made in Ferris v. Coover, 11 Cal. 179, and in Hart v. Burnett, 20 Cal. 169. In the former case Mr. Justice Baldwin said: "The appellate power of the Supreme Court of the United States is strictly limited to the cases given in the Act. Like any other special power, it is to be strictly pursued, and the record must show upon its face the facts which give the power. In the cases falling within the provisions of the section quoted, we acknowledge the right of appeal. We deny it in all other cases. By the provisions of this section, in such cases the Chief Justice of this Court is authorized to issue the citation. That duty or that power is cast upon him alone. The Associate Justices have nothing to do in the premises. The act is his as a chamber proceeding. But still the power is in its nature in some degree judicial. He must see, when he is required to act or authorized to proceed under the Federal law, that he is within the law. If there is much doubt or question as to the jurisdiction, he might, in his discretion (and perhaps it would be advisable), issue the citation, leaving the fact of jurisdiction to be determined by the Supreme Court of the United States." This language of Mr. Justice Baldwin, and more of like import, was approvingly quoted by Mr. Chief Justice Field in Hart v. Burnett, and that learned Judge who now occupies a seat upon the bench of the Supreme Court of the United States, continued in these words: "In accordance with the views here expressed, I must, when applied to for a citation, judge, in the first instance, whether the case is covered by the Act of Congress." He came to the conclusion that it was not, and denied the application for a citation.

To me it seems clear that Congress foresaw that the provisions of the twenty-fifth section might lead to great abuse unless some check was interposed to the hasty and unauthorized use of the remedy thereby granted in certain cases; and to that end the allowance of the writ, or what is equivalent thereto, the issuing of the citation, was designedly placed in the sound discretion of the presiding Judges of the State Courts and the several Justices of the Supreme Court of the United States. Why place the power in the hands of judicial officers if its exercise is not a judicial act? If the signing of the citation is purely a ministerial act, unaccompanied by the exercise of judicial discretion, the power might, with equal convenience, and with much greater congruity, have been lodged with the Clerk of the State Court, or with the Clerk of the United States Circuit Court, by whom the writ is issued. If it be said that there is danger of defeating the object of the law in placing the power in the discretion of the State Judges, by reason of any supposed jealousy on their part toward the encroachments of Federal jurisdiction, the answer is that against this danger, also, Congress has wisely guarded by providing that a party shall not be ousted of his appeal by the adverse decision of a State Judge, by allowing the application to be made to a Federal Judge without any restriction upon the number of applications. So, as the Courts are at present organized, there are eleven Judges, to either and all of whom the application can be made. Thus, it may be safely affirmed that the abuse of the writ is designedly and amply guarded against upon the one hand, and its rightful use fully secured upon the other.

As a general rule, upon a question of construction, effects and consequences ought not to be consulted. But to this general rule, cases of doubt, where the opposing reasons are nicely balanced and the scales refuse to turn, the light weights of effect and consequence may be superadded. Admitting then, for the sake of argument, that the present is such a case, it is proper to refer to the effects and consequences of the doctrine contended for on behalf of this application; and upon this point I cannot do better than by quoting from the opinion of Mr. Justice Baldwin in Ferris v. Coover. Such a "doctrine would be fraught with enormous and intolerable evils. If an appeal with stay of execution be matter of absolute right, then every case, civil or criminal, decided by the highest Court having jurisdiction in the State, could be taken up to the Federal Capital, and all proceedings suspended until its return. In every criminal case the pretext would be that the law was ex post facto. It would be no answer to say that the record showed plainly the contrary; the reply to this would be, 'The Supreme Court is to decide that question.' And every civil case might be carried thither upon the ground of a supposed asserted repugnance to some provision of the Federal Constitution or law, or of some treaty. That damages might be given for frivolous appeals would be no adequate protection against them, and in criminal cases no protection at all. The Supreme Court of the United States holds but one term in each year, and from the embarrassments and delays attending the taking of cases from this Court to that, especially in criminal cases, the recognition of this principle would produce the worst possible results. If the Chief Justice of this Court should err in deciding the case not to be appealable, the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court of the United States would not thereby be ousted. That Court could, on the inspection of the record, grant the writ or issue the citation, and proceed to hear and determine the case."

As a last resort, counsel appeals to the statute of this State in aid of the doctrine for which he contends. The origin and history of the Act of the 9th of April, 1855, (Statutes of 1855, p. 80,) are well known. Five months prior to its passage the then Supreme Court of this State, in the case of Johnson v. Gordon, 4 Cal. 368, had decided that the twenty-fifth section of the Federal Judiciary Act of 1789 was unconstitutional, and declared that no case could be taken from a State to a Federal Court by writ of error or otherwise. The decision was made upon the authority of the Court of Appeals of Virginia in the case of Martin v. Hunter's Lessee and in harmony with the ultra State rights doctrine of Calhoun and his political followers, the soundness of which is now undergoing its last test upon the bloody battlefields of the republic. Startled by the judicial enunciation of a doctrine which they had previously contemplated only in its political and partisan aspect, and which, in their eyes, may have acquired additional importance by reason of the immediate sanction of the highest Court of the State, the Legislature sought to provide a remedy against its supposed evils by interposing a barrier to its further judicial progress, apparently without pausing to consider whether a remedy was within the constitutional reach of State legislation. The motive was a good one; but, as all must admit the power was wanting. It is not within the constitutional power of a State Legislature to confer jurisdiction upon Federal Courts or prescribe the means or mode of its exercise. That subject belongs exclusively to the Federal Government, and must be regulated solely by the Federal Constitution and the laws of Congress. While, therefore, I appreciate the motive of the Legislature in passing the Act in question, I am compelled to deny its power, and must hold that, so far as the Act attempts to prescribe a rule for judicial conduct in cases like the present, it is wholly inoperative. If constitutional, the occasion for such legislation no longer exists; for the case of Johnson v. Gordon has been long since overthrown and a contrary doctrine firmly established in this State. (Ferris v. Coover, 11 Cal. 175; Hart v. Burnett, 20 Cal. 169.)

It only remains for me to determine whether the facts of this case are covered by the twenty-fifth section of the Act of Congress. The action was brought to recover possession of a certain lot in the City of San Francisco, and the ultimate facts relied on to bring the case within the Act are stated in the defendant's answer as follows: "And for a further and separate answer to said complaint, said defendant, according to his information and belief, says that by virtue and effect of the treaty of peace, friendship, limits and settlements, between the United States and the Mexican Republic, dated at Guadalupe Hidalgo, February 2d, 1848, the ownership and title in fee simple to said lot of ground described in said complaint, passed to and became vested in the said United States, and that the said United States, afterward, by force and effect of the Act of the Congress thereof passed March 3d, 1851, entitled 'an Act to ascertain and settle the private land claims in the State of California,' and by force and effect of the final decision and decree of the Board of Commissioners of said United States, appointed and acting thereunder (upon the petition and claim of the City of San Francisco presented to and filed before said Board), in favor of said city, the said ownership and title in fee so acquired and held by the United States passed to and vested in the said City of San Francisco, and that by divers mesne conveyances, since duly executed and delivered, and by force and effect of divers ordinances of said City of San Francisco, and an Act or Acts of the Legislature of California, duly passed the said ownership and title in fee in and to said lot of ground and premises had, prior to the 28th day of March, 1862, became and then was vested in and held by one James E. Mumford," defendant's lessor, etc. In support of this defense the defendant upon the trial offered evidence of a judgment against the City of San Francisco, execution thereon, and a Sheriff's sale and deed of the lot in suit. This evidence was objected to by the other side, and excluded by the Court upon the authority of Hart v. Burnett, 15 Cal. 530, where it was held that the City of San Francisco was at the date of the conquest and cession of California, and long prior thereto, a pueblo, and that as such pueblo she had a certain right or title to the lands within her general limits, and that such lands were held by the city in trust for public uses, and were not, either under the old Government or the new, the subject of seizure and sale under execution. To this ruling the defendant duly excepted, and on appeal to this Court the judgment of the Court below was affirmed. In rendering this judgment was the validity of the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo, or of the Act of Congress of the 3d of March, 1851, or the authority of the Board of Land Commissioners drawn in question; and if so, is the judgment against the validity of either? Or, was the construction of any clause of the Federal Constitution, or of the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo, or of the Act of Congress of the 3d of March, 1851, or of the Land Commission, drawn in question; and if so, is the judgment against any title, right, privilege or exemption specially set up or claimed by the defendant in good faith? I say in good faith, because such, in my judgment, is the true intent and meaning of the Act.

The first question presented is whether the validity or construction of the treaty, or of the Act of Congress, or the Land Commission, any or all, was directly or necessarily involved in our decision to the effect that the lot in question was not subject to execution sale. The question is narrowed to these three, because (which is worthy of note) it is not pretended that we have violated any clause of the Federal Constitution.

It is first claimed that these several matters were directly and necessarily involved, because they are expressly alleged in the answer, and therefore the title of the defendant thereunder is "set up and claimed" within the meaning of the Act. Counsel admits that the construction of the Federal Constitution is not involved. Suppose, then, that the pleader, instead of commencing with the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo, had gone back to seventeen hundred and eighty-nine, and led off by averring "that, by reason of the force and effect of the Federal Constitution," etc., would the construction of that instrument thereby have become involved in the decision of the case? I hardly think the learned counsel will answer in the affirmative. Matter of averment cannot be regarded, merely because it is averred, as furnishing a certain test. Whether the facts relied on as conferring appellate jurisdiction appear as matter of averment in the pleadings, or are developed by the evidence during the progress of the trial, is wholly immaterial, and the mere fact that they are stated in the pleadings can have no possible effect upon the result. The test is to be found in the facts themselves, and not in the mode or manner of their presentation. The test question in the present case is this: "Is the defendant's title, or rather the title of the City of San Francisco, derived by or through the treaty, or the Act of Congress, or the Land Commission, or is it in any manner dependent upon either for its validity?"

The argument is that the lot in question originally belonged in fee to the Mexican nation, and was ceded in fee to the United States by the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo, and was granted by the latter to the City of San Francisco, by the Act of March 3d, 1851, and confirmed to her by the judgment and decree of the Land Commission; and hence became subject to sale on execution against the city. This Court, on the contrary, has decided, upon the authority of Hart v. Burnett, that the City of San Francisco was a pueblo, or town, under the Mexican Government, long prior to the treaty; and that as such pueblo she held, under the laws of Mexico, the land in question in trust for public uses, also long prior to the treaty, and that under the laws of Mexico such land so held was not subject to forced sale under execution; and that by reason of the character of the city's title the same is true under the laws of this State. Thus the real point of difference between the argument and decision of this Court (and the point upon which the whole case turned) antedates the treaty. The error of the argument lies in the fact that it assumes

(what this Court has decided is not true) that the title to the land was in the Mexican Government at the date of the treaty, and by its force and effect passed to the United States. Having decided that the title to the land was in the Pueblo of San Francisco prior to the date of the treaty, and that it was held in trust, the final judgment which was rendered by this Court followed as a matter of course. The determination of the date and character of the city's title imparted to every subsequent question involved in the decision of the case a like legal complexion, and became conclusive upon the ultimate question of final judgment. It is clear, therefore, that the determination of the leading and controlling question did not involve the validity or construction of the treaty or the Act of Congress, or the authority of the Land Commission, because its solution necessarily depended entirely upon the laws of Mexico as they existed prior to the date of the treaty.

The only further question presented by the case was whether a trust estate was subject to forced sale under execution against the trustee, which, I presume, counsel will admit could hardly depend upon the treaty or Act of Congress, or the decree of the Land Commission. Thus only two legal propositions were involved in the decision of the case, neither of which was founded upon the treaty or Act of Congress, or the decree of the Land Commission, or bore any legal relation whatever to either; but on the contrary the first had its origin in and depended for its solution wholly upon the Mexican law and the latter upon the laws of this State. If the questions upon which this Court necessarily passed in arriving at a final judgment adverse to the alleged title of the defendant bear directly or indirectly any legal relation whatever to the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo, or the Act of Congress of the 3d of March, 1851, or the decrees of the United States Land Commission, I certainly am unable to perceive it. That this Court indirectly decided that San Francisco did not obtain her title from the United States is true, and the same result would have followed had the pleader averred that she obtained her title from the King of the Sandwich Islands, or interposed, under pretense that it was a defense to the action, any other matter wholly foreign to the merits of the controversy. As I have already stated, mere averment cannot make that material which is immaterial, or raise a mere pretext to the level of a controlling fact. A question so made and presented does not draw into the decision of the case the validity or construction of a treaty, or Act of Congress, or of a Commission, within the meaning of the Federal Judiciary Act. To hold that it does would enable the pleader to determine the question of Federal jurisdiction, and there has not been and never will be an action of ejectment tried in this State where such a result could not be readily attained. It would only be necessary to allege Mexican title, and the validity and construction of treaties, Acts of Congress and Commissions are all brought in. In vain the Court may say they have nothing to do with the case. The reply is, "My title, my right, privilege or exemption" (as the case may be,) "depends upon them, and if you decide against me the Federal Judiciary Act takes the case to Washington." The logic is false, and does not rise to the dignity of forensic discussion. It perverts law and ignores good faith, which every rule of civil conduct exacts. It converts form into substance, and accords to pretense the dignity of truth.

In conclusion, I have only to add that in my judgment, after a careful examination of the record, this case does not fall within the Judiciary Act of 1789; and that the facts relied on for that purpose do not immediately or remotely affect any question directly involved in the final judgment. I may be in error, but if I am the defendant is not without remedy. He can make a like application to each and all of the Justices of the Supreme Court of the United States.

While the power and the responsibility of passing upon this question is vested, so far as the action of this Court is concerned, solely in me, by the Act of Congress, I have not failed to take counsel with my associates, and I am authorized to say that they fully concur in the conclusion which I have reached.

I am also asked to grant a stay of proceedings for the purpose of an application to some Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States. This individually I have no power to do. No such power is conferred upon me by the Act of Congress. The Act of the Legislature of this State confers the power in terms, but I have already decided that Act to be inoperative.

The application must be denied, and it is so ordered.

WILEY SNEED v. J. W. OSBORN.

BOUNDARY LINES OF LAND SOLD.—If the description in a deed is uncertain, the grantor and grantee may agree upon and establish the boundary line between the land granted and the remaining lands of the grantor, and such agreement will be binding upon the parties; but to be effectual, it must be done while the parties own the lands on both sides of the lines they thus locate.

DIVISION LINES BETWEEN ADJOINING TRACTS OF LAND.—When the owners of adjoining lands have acquiesced for a length of time, equal at least to the length of time prescribed by the Statute of Limitations to bar a right of entry in the location of a division line between their lands, although it may not be the true line according to the calls of their deeds, they are thereafter precluded from saying it is not the true line.

LEGAL TITLE TO LAND.—A party holding land dependent on a division line established between contiguous owners by their acquiescence for the time prescribed by the Statute of Limitations as a bar to an action for the recovery of real property, holds it by a legal and not an equitable title.

OBJECTION TO EVIDENCE.—Where the objection made to testimony is that it is incompetent and illegal, without a specification of the point of incompetency or illegality, it is the duty of the Court to overrule it if it is admissible for any purpose.

EVIDENCE TO PROVE BOUNDARY LINES.—The declarations of the owner of a tract of land are not admissible in evidence for the purpose of proving its boundary lines, if made when he is not in possession.

APPEAL from the District Court, Seventh Judicial District, Napa County.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the Court.

Williams & Thornton, for Appellant.

The agreed location must control, and should prevail.

The authorities on this point are clear and conclusive. The first case to which we call the attention of the Court is Adams v. Rockwell, 16 Wendell, 285-302, decided by the Sneed v. Osborn.

Court of Errors of the State of New York. In that case Chancellor Walworth thus states the rule, in case there could be no real doubt as to how the land should be located according to the limits described in the deed. He says:

“Where there can be no real doubt as to how the premises should be located, according to certain and known boundaries described in the deed, to establish a practical location different therefrom, which shall deprive the party claiming under the deed of his legal rights, there must be either a location which has been acquiesced in for a sufficient length of time to bar a right of entry under the Statute of Limitations in relation to real estate, or the erroneous line must have been agreed upon between the parties claiming the land on both sides thereof, or the party whose right is to be thus barred must have silently looked on and seen the other party doing acts, or subjecting himself to expenses in relation to the land on the opposite side of the line, which would be an injury to him, and which he would not have done if the line had not been so located; in which case, perhaps, a grant might be presumed within the twenty years.”

The rule we refer to we have given in the above extract, in italics.

In the case of McCormick v. Barnum, 10 Wendell, 104, the Court say:

“Cases of this description” (referring to cases of location) “have been frequently before the Court. The principle upon which they have all been decided is, that where parties agree upon a division line, either expressly, or by long acquiescence, such line shall not be disturbed; buildings and permanent improvements may be made upon the faith of the location of the line; transfers may be made, and to permit such lines to be altered might be productive of incalculable injury.”

In Jackson v. Corlear, 11 Johns. 123, the Court say: “After the parties have deliberately settled a boundary line between them, it would give too much encouragement to the spirit of litigation to look beyond such settlement, and break up the line so established between them.”

Sneed v. Osborn.

In Perkins v. Gay, 3 Serg. & Rawle, 132, the defendant had given evidence of an agreed line of boundary, styled by the Court "a consentable line." The Court, by Gibson, J., thus expressed itself with reference to this line:

"The establishment of this kind of boundary is always a matter of compromise, in which each party supposes he gives up for the sake of peace something to which, in strict justice, he is entitled. There is an express mutual abandonment of their former rights, upon an agreement that whether they be good or whether they be bad, neither is to recur to them on any pretense whatever, or claim anything that he does not derive from the terms of the agreement. Each takes his chance of obtaining an equivalent for everything he relinquishes, and if the event turn out contrary to his expectations, so much the worse for him. If there be no intention of fraud, no unfair dealing, and neither party has more knowledge of the fact misconceived than the other had, the contract will bind."

The ruling is the same in Hagey v. Detweiler, 35 Penn. 412, 413; see, also, 1st Hening and Munford, 177; 4 Id. 125.

But it is said that Harrison was no party to this agreement as to the boundary line, and therefore it is not binding.

In reply to this we say: By reference to the deed of Harrison, it will be seen that its northern boundary is the southern boundary of the Boggs tract. The language used is this: "one square mile, or six hundred and forty acres, bounded on the north by a certain tract of one square mile, which the said Vallejo sold to L. W. Boggs, by deed bearing date the 19th day of March, A. D. 1847." The location of the Harrison tract is then dependent on that of the Boggs tract. The former cannot be ascertained until the location of the latter is ascertained and determined. Until the Boggs tract is located, the Harrison tract cannot be. The title, then, of the Harrison tract remains in the grantor, Vallejo, and does not pass out of him until the location of the Boggs tract. The evidence further shows that Vallejo owned the land surrounding both the Boggs and Harrison tracts. Vallejo is the grantee of the "Rancho de Napa," of which these two tracts formed a part, and D'Hemecourt's map of the said rancho shows that it surrounded the tracts above mentioned. Vallejo was then an adjoining owner with Boggs, and was competent to enter into an agreement fixing the boundary line.

Sneed v. Osborn.

The declarations deposed to are those of an interested party, not in possession; the witness testifies that he was himself in possession.

The authorities go to this extent only, that the declaration of a party in possession as to the character of his possession, whether in his own right, or for another, are admissible as part of the res gestæ. But such declarations cannot be admitted, until a possession has been established of the party whose declarations are offered in evidence.

In this case the declarant was not in possession, the tract was entirely uninclosed, and its virgin soil had never been disturbed by a single furrow.

The following authorities are referred to:

Whitman & Wells, for Respondent.

It will be remembered that the survey of the Boggs tract was made after the execution and delivery of the Harrison deed. By the delivery of that deed Harrison acquired rights which could not be varied or annulled by any agreement between Boggs and Vallejo. His deed called for the Boggs tract as his northern boundary. What Boggs tract? The tract described in the deed; not any other tract which might be agreed upon by way of compromise between Boggs and Vallejo. It will be remarked that Harrison was not present at the survey, nor is it pretended that he ever agreed to or knew of the arrangement between Boggs and Vallejo.

Harrison was entitled to have the survey made according to the calls of the Boggs deed, for thus it became a feasible thing.

Sneed v. Osborn.

We contend in the first place, that the survey was thus practically made on the ground. Second, if not so made, that the starting point being ascertained, the survey therefrom extended shows that the defendant has twenty-four acres of that land in possession; and even admitting that a variety of surveys may be made legitimately from the ascertained starting point, still, where there may be a difference of construction or application, we have the right to the election. (Jackson v. Hudson, 3 J. R. 374; Saun v. Blodgett, 16 J. R. 172; see, also, to the prior points suggested: Luce v. Carley, 24 Wend. 451; Jackson v. Wendell, 5 Wend. 142; Bates v. Tymason, 13 Wend. 300.)

By the Court, RHODES, J.

On the 19th of March, 1847, Salvador Vallejo conveyed to L. W. Boggs one square mile of land in Napa Valley, bounded as follows: "Beginning at a point near the base of the mountain on the west side of Napa Valley, one half a mile in a southerly direction from where a small branch or brook enters the valley from the mountains, usually known as the Old Rhodare; thence running from the said point of beginning along a line parallel with the base of the mountains, in a northerly direction one mile; thence forming a right angle and running in an easterly direction one mile; thence making a right angle and running in a southerly direction one mile; thence making a right angle and running in a westerly direction one mile to the point of beginning."

Vallejo conveyed to Harrison, on the 5th of April, 1847, one square mile of land, the only description of the boundaries being as follows: "Bounded on the north by a certain tract of one square mile, which said Vallejo sold to L. W. Boggs, by deed bearing date the 19th day of March, A. D. 1847." Subsequent to the deed, and about the last of April of the same year, Vallejo and Boggs went on the land, and caused a survey of the same to be made by Surveyor Ida, who set stakes at the southeast, the northeast and northwest corners, and directed the parties where to set the stake at the southwest corner, at a certain distance north of where he had set the stake for the first station; and the southern, eastern and northern lines were marked. The position of the initial point is uncertain. Probably no two men would take the deed, and going on the land separately, fix upon the same place for the initial point, for the place where the creek enters the valley—the line where the hills terminate and the valley begins—is difficult of ascertainment, there being a gradual slope of the hills to the valley; and the “Old Rhodare,” which the parties understood to mean rodeo grounds, is a tract which may include from a few acres to five hundred acres. In view of this uncertainty, the parties went on the land for the purpose of establishing the lines, and in the first place agreed upon a certain tree on the bank of the creek, as the initial point; but on the surveyor measuring thence south half a mile and setting the first station and running from thence the southern line, the parties, after some controversy as to the land to be included, agreed that the first station should be set to the north such a distance, that the southern line should not cross Dry Creek; and the lines were run and marked and corner stakes were set accordingly, the western line not being actually run or marked, but directions being given for setting the stake at its southern extremity, so as to accord with the southern line as run.

At the time of the sale to Boggs, Vallejo owned the land adjoining the Boggs tract and the land adjoining the Harrison tract, and there can be no doubt, upon principle or authority, that under such circumstances, and considering the uncertain description of the deed, it was competent for the parties to locate the land, and establish the boundary lines between the tract conveyed and the remaining lands of the grantor. This could be done by them while the grantor owned the adjoining land, and the lines thus fixed would be regarded as division lines established by the agreement of coterminal proprietors. To be effectual for any purpose, it must be done while the parties own the lands on both sides of the line they thus locate. If the square mile sold to Boggs had contained all the lands that Vallejo owned in that place, Vallejo, after the sale of it, would have had no greater control over the location of the land than a stranger to the title.

Harrison did not participate in the Ide survey, and there is no evidence in the record, showing that he assented to or acquiesced in it in any manner. He owned the land south of the Boggs tract at the time of the survey, and was unaffected by any agreement respecting the lines of the Boggs tract, to which he was not a party.

In 1852, the northwest quarter of the Harrison tract was conveyed to the respondent, and in 1853, there was conveyed to the appellant all of the southwest quarter of the Harrison tract, except ten acres in the northeast corner of the southwest quarter, which had been conveyed in 1852 to McNeil, who conveyed the same to the respondent in 1857. The respondent is in possession of the northwest quarter and the ten acre tract, and the appellant is in possession of the southwest quarter less the ten acre tract, measuring the land from the southern line of the Ide survey as the base.

The respondent now claims that the Ide survey was incorrect; that the southern line was run about six chains too far to the north; that upon the Harrison tract being surveyed and subdivided according to the true southern line of the Boggs tract, the northwest quarter and the ten acre tract will include two parcels of land within the northern part of the southwest quarter, as claimed and occupied by the appellant, of the width of six chains, and both together extending across the southwest quarter, and containing twenty-four acres. He sued to recover the possession of the northwest quarter and the ten acre tract, and the Court found for him, and gave judgment for the possession of the premises sued for.

What we have already said indicates that we agree with the appellant in his first and second propositions, but that his third proposition, viz: that "the agreed location must control, and should prevail," cannot be maintained, because there is no evidence that Harrison or the plaintiff or those through whom he claims, joined in running the line in controversy, or at the time it was run, directly assented to it, as established by the Ide survey.

There is another consideration applicable to a part, at least, of the case, that counsel have not particularly urged, but which is of too much importance to be passed over without notice. In eighteen hundred and fifty-four, while McNiel was the owner of the ten acre tract, and the appellant owned the residue of what he claims as the southwest quarter, the appellant directed a survey to be made of the ten acre tract, so that he might know where to build his fences, and the survey was accordingly made. It does not appear whether or not McNiel was present, but he soon after the survey built his fences on the land as surveyed, and thereafter occupied the land until he sold it to the respondent, who since that time has held it as fenced by McNiel, and the appellant has since the survey held the land adjoining it on the south and west. The record contains no evidence of any objection being made by McNiel or the respondent, to the lines of the ten acre tract as surveyed and fenced, from the time of the survey to the commencement of this action in eighteen hundred and sixty.

The acts of the parties might not amount to an agreement between them, to locate the tract as then surveyed, and it is unnecessary to consider them in that view; but do they not show an acquiescence by the parties in those lines as the division lines between the two tracts of land? If they do show such acquiescence it will make no difference in the result that they acted in ignorance or under a mistake, as to the true northern line of the southwest quarter of the Harrison tract. The authorities are abundant to the point that when the owners of adjoining lands have acquiesced for a considerable time in the location of a division line between their lands, although it may not be the true line according to the calls of their deeds, they are thereafter precluded from saying it is not the true line. The better opinion is that the considerable time mentioned in the cases must at least equal the length of time prescribed by the Statute of Limitations to bar a right of entry. (Jackson v. Ogden, 7 Johns. 238; Jackson v. Freer, 17 Johns. 29; McCormick v. Barnum, 10 Wend. 104; Dibble v. Rogers, 13 Wend. 536; Adams v. Rockwell, 16 Wend. 285; Van Wyck v. Wright, 18 Wend. 157; Boyd's Lessees v. Graves, 4 Wheat. 513.) There was sufficient evidence in the case to have justified the Court in finding that the parties and the respondent's grantor had acquiesced in the practical location of the lines of the ten acre tract in such a manner and for such a time that they cannot now deny that those lines are the true division lines between their respective lands; and there being no conflicting evidence upon this point, the Court should have found for the appellant as to the ten acre tract.

The evidence bearing upon this point, so far as it relates to that portion of the division line extending westerly from the ten acre tract, is very slight and unsatisfactory, arising probably from the reason that the case was not presented in the Court below in view of the proposition that we have been considering. And for the same reason, we do not undertake to say that the respondent has presented all his evidence, or fully made his case on this question, in regard to the ten acre tract.

The appellant makes a further point that the Court erred in admitting the testimony of H. C. Boggs, concerning the declaration of Governor Boggs as to the boundaries of the Boggs tract, and we think it well taken. The objection was general — the ground being that it was incompetent and illegal testimony — and it would be the duty of the Court to overrule an objection thus taken, if the evidence was admissible for any purpose. The party objecting should lay his finger on the point of objection. (Martin v. Travers, 12 Cal. 243, and cases cited.) But here the witness stated that Governor Boggs was not then in possession of any of the land, and for that reason his declarations were not competent as evidence. (1 Phil. Ev. C. H. and E.'s Notes, 194, note 81.)

The respondent contends that the admission of that evidence did not amount to an error, because the Court, in passing on the motion for a new trial, disregarded the evidence as immaterial. Such in fact was the case; but it was done by the Sined F. Osborn.

Court, on the theory that Vallejo and Boggs still adhered to the tree at the creek, as the initial point, and on which the location was made to depend, notwithstanding that on their running the southern line they agreed that the first station, as set for the southwestern corner, should be moved several chains north of where it was set, on measuring southerly the half mile from the tree; and that all the lines were run and marked and the corners established in view of the fact, that the first station had thus been moved to the north. The evidence of the declarations of Governor Boggs might very properly be disregarded as immaterial, if it could be held that the initial point had been permanently fixed as contended for; but the whole survey contradicts the idea that the parties still regarded that as the initial point—and, in fact, the Ide survey could not have been made as it was, by beginning at the marked tree at the creek as the initial point. We cannot say that the Judge who tried the case disregarded this evidence because it was immaterial, or if so, that it was done for the same reason that the Judge who refused the new trial disregarded it; but if the cause was determined at the trial upon the theory announced, in deciding the motion for a new trial, the finding cannot be sustained, for the theory amounted in substance to the doctrine that Harrison, while holding his deed from Vallejo, was bound by the acts of Vallejo and Boggs in assuming and fixing upon the initial point—and a point, too, that was immediately abandoned by them, in running and making the lines and locating the corners.

Judgment reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

By the Court, RHODES, J., on petition for rehearing.

The respondent, in his petition for a rehearing, suggests that we have mistaken the evidence in several points, but we have carefully examined the record, and we think we correctly understand the facts of the case. Facts are stated, in the opinion of the Court, solely that the course of reasoning adopted by the Court, and the principles enunciated, may be the better understood. The Court does not assume to find the facts in a case, for it has no authority to do so, except in case where an ultimate fact results, as a conclusion of law, from the proof of certain prior facts. If this Court states the evidence in a cause, whether correctly or incorrectly, the statement in no manner controls the Court below, and cannot prejudice the parties, where a new trial is had. It is upon questions of law, that the decision of the appellate Court becomes the law of the case, and not upon questions of fact.

We are of the opinion, from the evidence in the record, that the act of Vallejo and Governor Boggs, in the absence of Harrison, in fixing upon the initial point, did not and could not affect the location of the Harrison tract, and we are further of the opinion that, as a fact in the case, the Ide survey, as made and marked on the land, was inconsistent with the first intention of the parties, in taking the tree as the initial point, and, in effect, removed the initial point to a position north of the tree.

But it is immaterial where they fixed the initial point, for the northern line of the Harrison tract coincided with the southern line of the Boggs tract, as it must be ascertained and run, according to the deed, without regard to how Boggs and Vallejo may have run it. After the initial point is established, a line one half mile in length must be run therefrom, south, to find the southwest corner of the Boggs tract, and the southern line must run from that corner, at right angles with the western line, as described in Boggs' deed from Vallejo. If the parties owning the land on both sides of the true line, have established another line, by a valid agreement, or by an acquiescence, such as we have before indicated, that line will govern the parties and their vendees.

The respondent objects that the facts relating to the acquiescence in the lines of the ten acre tract cannot be considered in this case, because those acts, if amounting to anything, create an equitable estoppel, and the appellant has failed to plead the estoppel.

The objection would be well taken, if it is a correct principle of law, that the parcel of land, cut off from the lands of the coterminous proprietor, by the division line established by long acquiescence of the two parties, is held by an equitable title. The Courts often say that it would be inequitable for the parties, after such long acquiescence in a partition line, to set up another, as the true line, according to the calls of their respective deeds — that they are estopped from making such proof; but it is not meant thereby that either party holds by an equitable title, or that title accrued to him by estoppel. It is said in other cases that after a long acquiescence in a division line, varying from the true line, the Court is authorized to presume a grant of the excess, (see Adams v. Rockwell, 16 Wend. 285,) but it is unnecessary to presume anything more than an agreement upon the division line, for the one party does not purport or attempt to sell or convey to the other any land; nor does the other set up any right under a purchase or conveyance of the legal or equitable title, made at the establishment of the division line. The division line when thus established, attaches itself to the deeds of the respective parties, and simply defines, not adds to, the lands described in each deed, in accordance with the understanding of the parties, who are presumed to know best their lands; and if by a mistake of the parties, one deed is in that manner made to include more than the calls of the deed would actually require, the grantee of the deed holds the excess by the same tenure that he holds the main body of his lands. This principle is well expressed by Judge Ryland in Blair v. Smith, 16 Mo. 273. He says: "We consider this case thus: Two owners of contiguous lots or tracts of land, each having his deed for his lot or tract, agree with the other: We fix this mark on the earth's surface as the line called for in my deed; this mark as the line called for in your deed; here is the line between us. My land mentioned in my deed comes up to this mark, or this fence, or this wall, on this side, and your land comes to the same on that side. * * Such boundary thus agreed upon shall be considered the true one, and each one considered as the owner of the land mentioned in his deed, thus marked out to that boundary between them." In Jackson v. Ogden, 4 Johns. 142, Mr. Justice Spencer, in speaking of the acts of one of the lessors of the plaintiff, says: "It is not, however, to be controverted that parties whose rights to real property may be perfect, and the boundaries of which may be susceptible of certain and precise ascertainment, may by their acts conclude themselves by establishing other and different boundaries."

Athearn v. Poppe, and Bours v. Walsh.

The same doctrine is announced in several of the cases cited in the opinion delivered in this case. In Boyd's Lessee v. Graves, 4 Wheat. 413, it is said, in commenting upon the fact that a dividing line had been run by a surveyor, by agreement of the parties, more than twenty years previous to the commencement of the action, that the agreement was not a contract for the sale or conveyance of lands and had no ingredient of such a contract. In the Courts of Pennsylvania it is held that "adjoining owners who adjust their partition line by parol, do not create or convey any estate whatever between themselves; no such thought or intention influences their conduct; after their boundary is fixed by consent, they hold up to it by virtue of their title deeds, and not by virtue of a parol transfer." (Hagey v. Detweiler, 35 Penn. 409; Perkins v. Gay, 3 Serg. and Rawle, 381.)

The party holding land, dependent on a division line established between contiguous owners, by their acquiescence for a space of time equal to the time prescribed by the Statute of Limitations, as a bar to an action for the recovery of the possession of real property, holds it by legal title.

Mr. Justice SAWYER expressed no opinion.

ATHEARN v. POPPE, AND BOURS v. WALSH.

WRIT OF ERROR TO THE SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES.—A writ of error does not lie to the Supreme Court of the United States from the judgment of the Supreme Court of this State, by which judgment it is decided that where a State School land warrant is located upon lands previously occupied and settled upon by another, and pre-empted by him, under the laws of the United States, the patent issued by the State under the location is void, and the patentee cannot maintain an action against the pre-emptioner to recover possession of the same.

SAME.—The construction of an Act of Congress was not necessary in rendering such judgment, but the State law under which the warrant was located afforded a rule for the complete determination of the rights of the party who made the location.

APPLICATION for citation to the appellants on a writ of error from the Supreme Court of the United States issued by the Clerk of the Circuit Court for California to the Judges of the Supreme Court.

Judgments were rendered in the District Court, Fifth Judicial District, San Joaquin County, in favor of the plaintiffs. The defendants appealed, and the judgments were reversed by the Supreme Court at the April Term, eighteen hundred and sixty-four. The cases are not reported, the judgments having been reversed on the authority of Terry v. Megerle, 24 Cal. 609. The facts in these cases were similar to those of Terry v. Megerle.

George Cadwalader, for the citation.

George W. Tyler, against granting citation.

SANDERSON, C. J.

These are actions of ejectment. In the Court below the plaintiffs recovered judgment. The defendants appealed to this Court, and the judgments were reversed and the Court below directed to enter judgments in favor of the defendants. The plaintiffs now present writs of error directed to the Justices of this Court, issued by the Clerk of the Circuit Court of the United States for the Northern District of California, and ask that citations to the defendants in error may be issued. The plaintiffs claim title by virtue of the location of School land warrants and a patent issued by and under the laws of this State. The defendants claim title under the pre-emption laws of the United States. The defendants had occupied and settled upon the lands in controversy as pre-emptioners under the laws of the United States prior to the location by plaintiffs of their School warrants under the laws of this State.

No opinions were delivered by the Court in these cases, but they were decided in general terms upon the authority of Terry v. Megerle, 24 Cal. 609, decided at the same term, the controlling questions in all three being similar in the judgment of the Court. Hence, the precise grounds upon which the decision of these cases was based does not appear, nor has it been specifically determined what questions were necessarily involved therein.

It is claimed that these cases fall within the third class mentioned in the twenty-fifth section of the Federal Judiciary Act of seventeen hundred and eighty-nine, which is described thus: "Or where is drawn in question the construction of any clause of the Constitution, or of a treaty, or statute of, or commission held under the United States, and the decision is against the title, right, privilege or exemption specially set up or claimed by either party, under such clause of the said Constitution, treaty, statute or commission;" and it is argued that we have construed the eighth section of the Act of Congress of the 4th of September, 1841, entitled an Act "to appropriate the proceeds of the sales of the public lands and to grant pre-emption rights;" and also the sixth section of the Act of March 3d, 1853, providing for the survey of public lands in California and the granting of pre-emption rights therein, and other purposes; and that we have decided against the title of the plaintiffs "specially set up or claimed" under those statutes. If this has been done and the same was necessary to a complete determination of these cases, the plaintiffs are undoubtedly respectively entitled to their citations.

In my judgment the construction of those statutes was not directly and necessarily involved in the final determination of these cases, for it may be conceded that the State's title to the land in question, under the Act of September 4th, 1841, was perfect and complete at the time the State land warrants of the plaintiffs were located, and yet their title must fail under the very terms of the State Act by which their location was authorized. The third section of that Act reads as follows: "The parties purchasing such warrants, and their assigns, are hereby authorized, in behalf of this State, to locate the same upon any vacant and unappropriated lands belonging to the United States, within the State of California," etc. * * * By this section the plaintiffs were made the agents of the State for the purpose of locating their warrants, but they were expressly restricted to vacant and unappropriated lands. Hence, by the terms of the Act under which they claim to have obtained the State's title, their title fails, for the land in controversy was not at the time of their location vacant and unappropriated, but on the contrary was settled upon and occupied by the defendants with the right to pre-empt the same under the laws of the United States. The policy of the State, as indicated by the third section of the Act in question, was not to interfere with the rights of actual settlers upon public lands under the pre-emption laws of the United States; but had such been her policy the Act would have been so far inoperative on the ground of repugnancy to the laws of Congress, which, upon all questions touching the public lands of the United States, are paramount. It being conceded that the defendants were in the occupation of the land at the time the plaintiffs' location was made, the State law afforded a rule for the complete determination of their rights in the premises and no resort to Federal laws was necessary.

Athearn v. Poppe, and Bours v. Walsh.

People v. Coon et al.

THE PEOPLE OF THE STATE OF CALIFORNIA ON THE RELATION OF THE CENTRAL PACIFIC RAIL-ROAD Co. OF CALIFORNIA v. HENRY P. COON, MAYOR, HENRY H. HALE, AUDITOR, AND JOSEPH S.
PAXON, TREASURER OF THE CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO.

COMPROMISE OF CENTRAL PACIFIC RAILROAD COMPANY WITH SAN FRAN-CISCO.—The Act of the Legislature, passed April 4th, 1864, authorising the Board of Supervisors of the City and County of San Francisco to compromise and settle all claims upon the part of the Western Pacific Railroad Company and the Central Pacific Railroad Company, for bonds claimed by said companies, of said city and county, under the Act of April 22d, 1863, fully empowered said Board of Supervisors to make a settlement with said Central Pacific Railroad Company, by the terms of which the company released its claim for the six hundred thousand dollars of bonds claimed under the Act of 1863, and accepted in place thereof bonds of said city and county to the amount of four hundred thousand dollars, and the city and county released its right to stock in the company, and withdrew its subscription to the capital stock of the same. Said Act also fully empowered and authorized the said city and county to compromise with the Central Pacific Railroad Company, without compromising with the Western Pacific Railroad Company also.

INDIVIDUAL CORPORATORS OF MUNICIPAL CORPORATION.—The individual corporators of the City and County of San Francisco did not acquire such right in the capital stock of the Central Pacific Railroad Company, separate and distinct from the municipal corporation, as to disable the Legislature from conferring on the Board of Supervisors the authority to settle the claim of said company for six hundred thousand dollars of the bonds of said city and county, by withdrawing the subscription of the city and county to the capital stock of said company, and releasing its right to stock, and executing a less amount of bonds in lieu thereof.

MUNICIPAL CORPORATION.—A municipal corporation is an entity, possessing for many purposes the attributes of individuality, and in the exercise of its legitimate powers can only act by and through its agents appointed in the mode prescribed by the law of its creation. The rights of the individual corporators of a municipal corporation can only be enjoyed by and through the agents appointed by law to exercise the corporate powers.

JUDGMENT IN FRENCH v. TESCHEMAKER, 24 CAL. 518.—The judgment of the Supreme Court in the case of French v. Teschemaker, was, in a qualified sense, a final judgment, compelling the Board of Supervisors of the City and County of San Francisco to execute and deliver to the Central Pacific Railroad Company the six hundred thousand dollars in the bonds of said city and county, as specified in the Act of April 22, 1863.

PRACTICE IN CASES ORIGINALLY COMMENCED IN THE SUPREME COURT.—Where a judgment is rendered in the Supreme Court, as a court of original jurisdiction, on an application for a writ of mandate, an application for a rehearing will not be entertained unless a motion for a new trial is made in the manner prescribed by the Practice Act in cases arising in the District Court.

APPLICATION to the Supreme Court for writ of mandata.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the Court.

Shafter, Gould & Dwinelle, for Relator.

The law of 1863, (Stats. p. 380,) authorizing the Board of Supervisors to make subscriptions to the capital stock of the Pacific Railroad was constitutional. (French v. Teschemaker, 24 Cal. 518.)

The vote of approval by the electors of San Francisco was not necessary to the validity of the law, but only a condition precedent to the exercise of the new franchise granted to the Board of Supervisors. (Bank of Rome v. Village of Rome, 18 N. Y., 4 Smith, 38; Clarke v. City of Rochester, 24 Barb. 446; Corning v. Green, 23 Barb. 33.)

The Legislature had the power to direct the Supervisors of San Francisco to levy six hundred thousand dollars by taxation, and pay it to the Central Pacific Railroad without any vote of the people of that city and county. They might have done so after the people had been authorized to vote upon the question, and on such vote had refused to levy the tax. They might have imposed the tax without any subscription being made, or any stock or other consideration received, except the incidental benefit from the construction of the road, and of the nature and extent of that benefit the Legislature is the exclusive judge.

"The Legislature is not confined in its appropriation of the public moneys, or of the sums to be raised by taxation in favor of individuals, to cases in which a legal demand exists against the State. It can thus recognize claims founded in equity and justice in the largest sense of these terms, or in gratitude or charity. Independently of express constitutional restrictions, it can make appropriations of money whenever the public well being requires or will be promoted by it; and it is the judge of what is for the public good. It can, moreover, under the power to levy taxes, apportion the public burdens among all the tax paying citizens of the State, or among those of a particular section or political division. It is well settled that the authority to raise money by the exercise of the taxing power is not in conflict with the constitutional provisions protecting private property from seizure. The two principles co-exist in the Constitution, and it is not difficult to distinguish between them." (Town of Guilford v. Supervisors of Chenango, 3 Kernan, 13 Smith, 143; Brewster v. City of Syracuse, 19 N. Y., 5 Smith, 116; The People v. Mayor of Brooklyn, 4 N. Y., 4 Const. 419; Providence Bank v. Billings, 4 Peters, 514, 561-563; McCulloch v. Maryland, 4 Wheat. 428; Blanding v. Burr, 13 Cal. 356.)

An eminent instance of a large debt founded upon a merely valuable or meritorious consideration and forced upon a municipal corporation by Act of the Legislature, will be found in Laws 1858, page 183, section 2.

All the corporate franchises of the City and County of San Francisco are repealable by the Legislature, and it can therefore have no vested right under the grant of a franchise which the Legislature cannot divest. (Const. of California, Art. IV, Sec. 31; McLaren v. Pennington, 1 Paige, 102.)

And this power to alter and repeal is not restricted by any legislative limitations existing in the Constitution at the time when the original law is passed, but may be exercised under the fullest power of legislation contained in the Constitution as subsequently amended and existing at the time when the alteration or repeal is made. When the charter of a railroad corporation contained a clause authorizing the Legislature to repeal or alter it, the alteration of the charter, by the Legislature, made on the application of the directors, without consulting the stock subscribers, does not absolve the latter from their subscription. (10 Barb. 261.)

The franchise granted to the Board of Supervisors, authorizing them to hold railroad stock, was an extraordinary franchise; so extraordinary, that it was at first held under our Constitution to be unconstitutional. (Low v. Marysville, 5 Cal. 214.) But, like all corporate franchises, the power of repeal is expressly reserved in the Constitution. (Const. Cal. Art. IV, § 31.)

This franchise could, therefore, be repealed at any time by the Legislature; that is to say—The Legislature might withdraw the power to hold railroad stock, and prescribe the mode in which the city should dispose of it. (Angel & Ames on Corporations, Ch. XXII, § 2, p. 733; McLaren v. Pennington, 1 Paige Ch. R. 102.)

The Legislature could not grant an irrevocable franchise to a municipal corporation. This would be allowing one Legislature to trammel the constitutional powers of all its successors. If a Legislature authorizes a municipal corporation to issue bonds under a limitation that they shall be paid by a tax which is unconstitutional, the result is, not that the bonds are invalid, but that they shall be provided for by a tax which is not subject to any constitutional objection. (Gilman v. City of Sheboygan, 2 Black U. S. R. 510.)

The power to subscribe for stock, or to compromise, includes the power to pay money, or to issue bonds or other securities, and in the form prescribed in the ordinance. (2 Kent Comm. 278, etc. text and notes; Berry v. Merchants' Exchange Company, 1 Sandf. Ch. R. 280, 288; Reinboth v. Mayor of Pittsburg, 41 Penn. 278, 280, 283; Seibert v. Mayor of Pittsburg, Sup. Ct. U. S. Dec. Term, 1863.)

H. H. Haight, for Defendants.

The Act of April, 1864, confers upon a municipal corporation a special power, and, like all municipal charters and special powers, must be strictly construed and closely pursued. (Sedgwick on Stat. Cons. 465–7, 321–3, 338–40; 3 Comstock, 433; 21 Penn. 22; 5 Cal. 214; 13 Cal. 540; 20 Cal. 96; French v. Teschemaker et al., 24 Cal. 518.)

The power to compromise and settle is, under the Act of 1864, a special power, and must be confined within the terms employed.

Restrictions upon the powers of municipal corporations are the settled policy of our laws.

The rules of construction applicable to municipal charters are those always applied to grants of special powers where the State confers or delegates a part of its sovereignty.

Much more strict will be the construction when it is sought, under the power, to donate to a private corporation nearly half a million of dollars of public revenue, without reckoning interest on the bonds to be issued.

Applying these rules to the Act of 1864, we claim that the Act authorizes no more than a reduction of the amount of subscription, and a change of the mode of payment to "cash or other security in place of bonds." It does not authorize a donation of four hundred thousand dollars, or any other amount; in other words, it authorizes a subscription for any amount less than six hundred thousand dollars, payable "in cash, etc., in place of the bonds," etc.

What was the claim to be settled? It was not a claim for damages, for money or bonds without equivalent. It was a claim to exchange certificates of stock for bonds. To settle such a claim is to fix the amount of subscription by reducing it, if possible, not by making a donation.

H. & C. McAllister, also for Defendants.

The decision in French v. Teschemaker adjudicated the constitutionality of the seventeenth section of the statute of April 22, 1863, and went no further.

The previous mandamus, sued out on the relation of "The Central Pacific Railroad of California" against the Board of Supervisors of the City and County of San Francisco, commanded said Supervisors to make the six hundred thousand dollars subscription called for by the Act of April 22d, 1863, and which had been voted at the special election held under the provisions of that statute; but did not dispose of the objections raised to the issuance of the bonds, which was a matter by no means identical with the question of subscription.

The right of the railroad company to demand of the Supervisors the act of subscription, was one thing; but their right to exact the issuance of the bonds was quite another thing.

Besides, the Act of April 4, 1864, excludes from the compromise any such bonds as were contemplated by the statute of April 22, 1863. The language is, "to compromise and settle all claims, etc., for cash or other security, in place of bonds claimed by said companies of said city and county, under an Act, etc."

However large and unlimited the powers given by the Act of April 4, 1864, there is one kind of security clearly interdicted, to wit: Such bonds as the statute of 1863 called for; the compromise is to substitute something in their place and stead. How, then, can this statutory power be construed to authorize the issuance of the original bonds? (Starin v. The Town of Genoa, 23 N. Y. 9 Smith, 454, 455.)

The Act of April 4, 1864, has been misconstrued; it does not relieve San Francisco from her subscription, but simply authorizes its liquidation "in cash or other security," in lieu of the bonds originally proposed.

The statute of April 22, 1863, is neither expressly nor impliedly repealed by the Act of April 4, 1864. Its existence, validity, and operative force, have been recently recognized by this Court in the decision as to the previous mandamus.

"Whenever two Acts can be made to stand together, it is the duty of a Judge to give both of them full effect. Even where they are seemingly repugnant, they must, if possible, have such a construction that one may not be a repeal of the other, unless the latter one contain negative words, or the intention to repeal is made manifest by some intelligible form of expression." (Brown v. County Commissioners, 21 Penn. 43; Bowen v. Lease, 5 Hill, 226.)

The law recognizes interests and rights in the individual corporators of a municipality as beneficiaries, or cestui que trusts, separate and distinct from those of the legal entity, called the corporation, which stands merely as the trustee of these corporators, holding the legal title of the corporate property. (Wetmore v. Story, 3 Abbott Pr. R. 274-276; Wood v. Draper, 4 Abbott Pr. R. 323, 324; Redfield on Railways, 415, note.)

The proposition that the State has no power to divest vested rights, or to impair the obligation of contracts, applies

as well to cases of municipal corporations as to individuals. (Grogan v. San Francisco, 18 Cal. 612, 613.)

By the Court, CURRAN, J.

The Legislature of this State, by an Act passed in 1863, authorized the Board of Supervisors of the City and County of San Francisco to take and subscribe one million dollars in the aggregate to the capital stock of "The Western Pacific Railroad Company" and "The Central Pacific Railroad Company of California," and to provide for the payment of the same. (Laws of 1863, p. 380.) By this Act it was made the duty of the Board of Supervisors to order a special election for the purpose of submitting to the electors of the city and county the proposition for the Board to take and subscribe four hundred thousand dollars to the capital stock of "The Western Pacific Railroad Company," and also the proposition for the same Board to take and subscribe six hundred thousand dollars to the capital stock of "The Central Pacific Railroad Company of California." It was provided by this Act that if a majority of the electors voting was in favor of the proposition to subscribe for the stock of said companies, then it should become the duty of the Board to take and subscribe, in the name of the City and County of San Francisco, for its use, benefit and advantage, to the capital stock of each of said companies in the amounts specified, and therefor to pledge the faith of the city and county for the payment of the same, in the manner provided in the Act. The Act also provided that the subscription should be made conditioned to be paid in the bonds of the city and county, which should be issued in the sum of one thousand dollars each, from time to time, as the work should progress on the railroad, by a Board, consisting of the President of the Board of Supervisors, otherwise called the Mayor of the City and County of San Francisco, and the Auditor and Treasurer of said city and county, and styled the "Pacific Railroad Loan Commissioners." The special election was held, and the result of it was that a majority of the electors was in favor of the proposition submitted.

In April, 1864, an Act was passed by the Legislature by which the same Board of Supervisors was authorized and empowered "To compromise and settle all claims upon the part of the Western Pacific Railroad and the Central Pacific Railroad for cash or other security, in place of bonds claimed by said companies of said city and county, under an Act to authorize the Board of Supervisors of the City and County of San Francisco to take and subscribe one million dollars to the capital stock of the Western Pacific Railroad Company and the Central Pacific Railroad Company of California, and to provide for the payment of the same, and other matters relating thereto, approved April 22d, 1863; provided, that the power to make such compromise shall vest in said Board of Supervisors only after and in case said Board of Supervisors shall be compelled by final judgment of the Supreme Court to execute and deliver the bonds specified in said Act." (Laws 1863-4, p. 388.)

The Board of Supervisors having declined, after request to take and subscribe to the capital stock of the Central Pacific Railroad Company, an application was made to this Court for a peremptory writ of mandamus to compel said Board to proceed to make the subscription and issue the bonds therefor as provided in the Act of 1863. The respective parties to that proceeding appeared by counsel and argued the questions involved therein, after which this Court rendered a judgment granting the writ, which was issued in June, 1864, commanding said Board of Supervisors to take and subscribe in the name of the City and County of San Francisco, for its use, benefit and advantage, to the capital stock of the Central Pacific Railroad Company of California to the amount of six hundred thousand dollars, and for the payment of the same to pledge the faith of said city and county in the manner provided in the Act of 1863; and also commanding the Board of Supervisors to make an order directing the Board of Commissioners, styled "The Pacific Railroad Loan Commissioners," to issue the bonds of the said city and county to the Central Pacific Railroad Company, upon the conditions as required and specified in and by the provisions of the Act. This writ was served on the Board of Supervisors.

Pending the application for a writ of mandamus, the Board of Supervisors, on behalf of the city and county, and the Central Pacific Railroad Company, by its President, were engaged in an effort to effect a compromise of the matter in difference between them, which resulted, after the writ had been issued and served, in an agreement upon the terms thereof; and to carry the compromise agreed upon into effect the Board of Supervisors, on the 20th of June, 1864, duly passed an ordinance entitled "Providing for issuing bonds to Central Pacific Railroad Company." By this ordinance, after reciting the Act of 1863 and the election under that Act, and the judgment of this Court granting the peremptory writ of mandamus, and the Act of 1864, authorizing and empowering the Board of Supervisors to compromise and settle all claims upon the part of the Central Pacific Railroad Company of California, the people of the City and County of San Francisco ordained as follows:

"SECTION 1. Four hundred bonds of said city and county, each for one thousand dollars, with interest coupons attached, dated July 1st, A. D. 1864, in all other respects, in form, substance, and execution, such as are required by said Act first above mentioned, shall be forthwith made, executed, and delivered to said Central Pacific Railroad Company of California.

"SEC. 2. The payment of said bonds and coupons shall be provided for, and made in all respects as is provided in said Act of April 22, 1863, and for such payment the full faith and credit of said city and county are hereby pledged.

"SEC. 3. Said bonds and coupons shall be delivered to said Central Pacific Railroad Company of California upon the condition that the Board of Trustees or Directors of said company, at a regularly called meeting of the same, shall, by a vote duly recorded, accept said bonds and coupons in full discharge of all obligations on the part of said city and county to make any subscription to the capital stock of said company, and for all claims, debts, dues, bonds, and coupons whatsoever. Upon the issuing and acceptance of said bonds and coupons, the same shall be deemed to have been so received and accepted, in place of the bonds and coupons mentioned and provided to be given in the Act of April 22, 1863, before mentioned."

This ordinance was duly approved by the Mayor on the 21st of June, and became a law on that day. Immediately thereafter the Central Pacific Railroad Company accepted the proposition contained in said ordinance, in accordance with the terms and conditions thereof, and signified the same to the Board of Supervisors. But the Mayor, Auditor and Treasurer, constituting the "Pacific Railroad Loan Commissioners," refused to issue the bonds, as provided in said ordinance, after demand duly made therefor on behalf of the Central Pacific Railroad Company.

The relator has applied by petition to this Court for a peremptory writ of mandamus commanding and requiring the respondents to issue to the Central Pacific Railroad Company of California the four hundred bonds specified in said ordinance. To the relator's petition setting forth the facts, in substance, as hereinbefore stated, the respondents have demurred. The grounds of the demurrer are in substance as follows:

First—It does not appear in or by said affidavit and petition that the respondents have any legal authority or power to execute or deliver to said Central Pacific Railroad Company the bonds referred to in said petition or any part thereof.

Second—It does not appear in said affidavit and petition that the Board of Supervisors of said City and County of San Francisco, or any officers of said corporation, had any lawful authority to issue or cause to be issued to said Central Pacific Railroad Company bonds to said amount of four hundred thousand dollars, or any other amount, in the manner or for the causes or considerations alleged in said affidavit and petition.

Third — That said ordinance was passed without any lawful authority, and is wholly illegal and void.

Fourth — That the Act of the Legislature of this State, approved April 4th, 1864, so far as the same authorizes or attempts to authorize, the issuing of bonds by the said city and county to the Central Pacific Railroad Company, or the payment by said Board of Supervisors to said company of cash or other securities, is in conflict with the Constitution of this State, and is null and void.

The respondents for answer to the petition deny that the Board of Supervisors at any time became, or were lawfully bound or obliged, to subscribe six hundred thousand dollars, or any other sum, to the capital stock of the Central Pacific Railroad Company of California, or to make, execute, or deliver to said company bonds to any amount whatever; and they also deny that the judgment of this Court was a final judgment, compelling them to execute or deliver the bonds specified in the Act of eighteen hundred and sixty-three; and they further deny that they ever were or have been bound by law to execute or deliver to the Central Pacific Railroad Company said four hundred bonds; and they insist that said ordinance is wholly illegal and void, on the ground that neither the Board of Supervisors nor the Legislature had any right or power to make the Central Pacific Railroad Company a donation of four hundred thousand dollars, or any other sum of money belonging to the City and County of San Francisco.

The Act of eighteen hundred and sixty-three conferred on the corporate authorities of the City and County of San Francisco certain powers which were not comprehended by the general grant of powers contained in the Act consolidating the government of said city and county, passed by the Legislature in eighteen hundred and fifty-six. By the last section of the Act of eighteen hundred and sixty-three it is declared that this Act shall be in force and take effect from and after its passage. It provided the mode by which the electors, the incorporators of the city and county, might express their will in respect to the privilege granted by the Act to take and subscribe to the capital stock of the railroad companies. The duty to submit the proposition to the electors of the city and county as to whether or not stock of the railroad companies should be taken and subscribed for the use, benefit and advantage of San Francisco was imposed on the Board of Supervisors, and the electors were provided with the opportunity of expressing their choice on the subject. The creation of this law did not depend on the vote of the electors, and therefore the objection that was interposed to the Act considered in Barto v. Himrod, 4 Selden, 483, is without force as authority touching the Act under examination. (Blanding v. Burr, 13 Cal. 356; The Bank of Rome v. The Village of Rome, 18 N. Y. 41; Starin v. The Town of Genoa, 23 N. Y. 446; Corning v. Greene, 23 Barb. 50; Grant v. Courter, 24 Barb. 242; Clarke v. Rochester, 24 Barb. 472; Moers v. City of Reading, 21 Penn. 202.)

By the choice of the electors of San Francisco, an obligation onerous in its character was assumed, for the purpose of prospective benefits, which it was supposed would accrue to the city and county from the construction of the railroads mentioned in the Act, and it has been determined by the judgment of this Court that the Board of Supervisors were in duty bound to take and subscribe, in the name of the City and County of San Francisco, for its use, benefit and advantage, to the capital stock of the Central Pacific Railroad Company, as required by the provisions of the Act of eighteen hundred and sixty-three, and also to proceed to direct the Pacific Railroad Loan Commissioners to issue the bonds of the city and county to the Central Pacific Railroad Company, upon the conditions required and specified in and by the provisions of the same Act. The execution of this judgment has been suspended, if not entirely superseded by the joint action of the Board of Supervisors of San Francisco on the one part, and the Central Pacific Railroad Company on the other, under and in pursuance of the provisions of the Act of April, eighteen hundred and sixty-four. But objections are interposed on the part of the respondents, to the effect, first, that the corporate authorities of San Francisco were not clothed with power to make the compromise agreed upon, and second, that the contingency specified in the proviso of the Act of eighteen hundred and sixty-four, and which stands as a condition precedent to the existence of authority in the Board of Supervisors to effect a compromise with the railroad company, has not transpired.

It is denied on behalf of the respondents that the Act of eighteen hundred and sixty-four conferred upon the Board of Supervisors the authority to compromise and settle the claims which accrued to the Central Pacific Railroad Company in the mode and upon the terms specified in the ordinance set forth. It is said the claim to be compromised and settled was not a claim on the part of the railroad company for money or bonds without a consideration in return, but was a claim to exchange certificates of stock for bonds, and that to settle such a claim is to fix the amount of subscription by reducing it if possible. The Act authorizing a compromise provides for the settlement of the claim of the railroad company for cash or other security in place of bonds claimed by the company, of said city and county, under the previous Act. It can hardly be maintained that a settlement of the claim of the railroad by taking a reduced amount of bonds of the city and county without some corresponding benefit to the company would amount to an adjustment of the difference between the parties by compromise. But be this as it may, the statute is simply a grant of power to the Board of Supervisors to compromise and settle the claim of the company for cash or other security in the place of the bonds to be issued under the first Act, upon the happening of the contingency mentioned in the proviso. No other limitation is placed upon the power whenever it might arise than the words of the Act itself import; that is, that the claim to be compromised and settled should be satisfied by cash or other security, in place of the bonds to which the company might be entitled under the Act authorizing the subscription.

It is insisted that the Act of 1864 does not authorize San Francisco to withdraw her subscription from either of the railroad companies. There is nothing obscure or ambiguous in the language of this Act. It seems to us apparent that the authority granted by the Act was to the Board of Supervisors to compromise and settle the claims of the respective companies on such terms as in the wisdom of the Board would best conduce to the interests of the City and County of San Francisco, provided such settlement could be made for cash or other security in the place of the bonds specified in the Act of 1863. It is a fact judicially known to us that at the time the Act of 1864 was passed, the case of French v. Teschemaker, 24 Cal. 518, was pending in this Court, by which it was sought to overthrow, as unconstitutional, the Act of 1863, and in that case we were advised that the plaintiff was in fact the representative of a considerable portion of the electors of the City and County of San Francisco, who were opposed to subscribing for stock of the railroad companies as authorized by the Act of 1863, and by the election held in pursuance of its provisions; and we may well suppose that the Act of 1864 was passed in deference to the opinions of those opposed, and who, we are not prepared to say, were not reasonably opposed to the corporation of the City and County of San Francisco becoming a member of the railroad companies mentioned in the Act of 1863. So that if the object of the Act authorizing a compromise is to be sought for in the light of concurring circumstances, we might justly conclude it was designed to give the City and County of San Francisco the opportunity to sever its reluctant connection with these railroad companies by a compromise and settlement effecting such object.

It is claimed, however, that the individual corporators of the city and county acquired rights to the capital stock of the railroad companies as beneficiaries, separate and distinct from the municipal corporation as an entity, of which they cannot be deprived, otherwise than by a majority vote therefor by the electors of the city and county; and, as a consequence, it is maintained that the Legislature had no power to pass an Act conferring on the Board of Supervisors the authority to so compromise and settle the claims of the railroad companies as to divest the individual corporators of these vested rights held in trust for them by the corporate authorities. The answer to all this is, that the corporation of the city and county is the creature of legislative enactment, and in legal contemplation is an entity possessing for many purposes the attributes of individuality; and in the exercise of its legitimate powers can only act by and through its agents, appointed in the mode prescribed by the law of its creation. The Act of incorporation may be altered from time to time or repealed as the Legislature may will it. (Const. Art. 4, Sec. 31.) The powers of the corporation may be enlarged or restricted, and the Legislature may determine by law who, as the representatives of the corporation, shall exercise the powers granted. Hence it is that the rights of the individual corporators can only be enjoyed in subordination to the power of the Legislature over the subject. A contrary doctrine carried to its ultimate consequences would require the affirmative consent of each individual corporator to every act done by the corporate authorities affecting his interests before he could become bound by such act; the result of which would be to render entirely useless and nugatory the corporate government of the city and county.

The Legislature conferred the authority on the Board of Supervisors to compromise and settle the claims of each of the railroad companies mentioned, for cash or other securities in place of bonds specified in the previous Act, provided it should first be determined by the final judgment of this Court that the Board were bound to execute and deliver such bonds. By this Act the Board were permitted, in case the conditional contingency transpired, to enter into any compromise and settlement with the Central Pacific Railroad Company coming within the purview of the Act, which in their judgment would best subserve the interests of the city and county. The terms of the compromise and settlement have been agreed to upon the hypothesis that the contingency on which the Board were authorized to act has happened; and the railroad company, as a party to that compromise, has the right to its execution, unless the condition on which the authority of the Board of Supervisors depends remains to arise; and this conducts us to the inquiry as to whether the judgment rendered by this Court in the case of the Central Pacific Railroad Company of California against the Board of Supervisors of the City and County of San Francisco, decided in June last, is a final judgment, compelling the Board to execute and deliver the bonds specified in the Act of 1863.

It is maintained on the part of the relator that the construction given on behalf of the City and County of San Francisco to the judgment rendered by this Court as a final judgment, compelling the Board of Supervisors to execute and deliver the bonds, is conclusive upon the city and county. We think it would be going beyond any just rule of law to so hold, for the reason that the Board of Supervisors have not the power by a construction of the effect of this judgment to assume an authority which depends for its existence upon this precedent condition.

The judgment referred to determined the obligation resting upon the corporation of San Francisco to take and subscribe to the capital stock of the Central Pacific Railroad Company, to be valid and binding, and the Board of Supervisors was required by this judgment to perform the obligation named, and to make an order directing the Pacific Railroad Loan Commissioners to issue the bonds to the Central Pacific Railroad Company upon certain conditions, and in all respects to perform and comply with the provisions and requirements of the Act. The judgment requiring the bonds to be issued was final, though the conditions upon which the duty to issue the same could only arise as the exigencies of the enterprise in contemplation might transpire, rendering the performance of this duty imperative. The judgment of the Supreme Court was a final judgment as to the obligations of the Board of Supervisors as the corporate authorities of the city and county, and as the conditions on which the bonds required to be issued by the Act of 1863 might become consummate, this judgment could be enforced in case of refusal to issue and deliver the bonds, and therefore to all intents and purposes it was, from the time it was pronounced, a final judgment compelling the Board of Supervisors to execute and deliver the bonds specified in the Act.

It is further objected by the respondents that the Act of 1864 does not confer on the Board of Supervisors the power to compromise with one of the railroad companies without a compromise with the other also, and that therefore the ordinance referred to was passed without authority and is void.

The first section of the Act of 1863 provided for an election for the purpose of submitting to the electors "the proposition for the Board of Supervisors to take and subscribe four hundred thousand dollars to the capital stock of the Western Pacific Railroad Company;" and "a proposition to take and subscribe six hundred thousand dollars to the capital stock of the Central Pacific Railroad Company of California." The elector could not vote for or against taking and subscribing to the stock of one of the companies only. He could only vote for or against the twofold proposition as a unit. The third section of the same Act authorized the Board of Supervisors, in case the election authorized the subscription, to take and subscribe in the name of the city and county, to the capital stock of the companies respectively, in the proportions prescribed in the first section, and therefore to pledge the faith of the city and county for the payment of the same in the manner provided in the Act. There is nothing in the Act requiring the Supervisors to deal with the two companies jointly; nor is it provided that the action of one of the companies should at all be dependent upon or be controlled by that of the other. The two companies in their relations to each other sustained an individual independence from the passing of the election and the rights and obligations of each could not be affected by the action or conduct of the other. There is no reason why the Act should be construed to require a compromise and settlement with one of these companies to be made in connection with a like compromise and settlement with the other. Such a construction of the Act might be attended with embarrassments that would entirely defeat its execution, however much it might be to the benefit and advantage of the City and County of San Francisco to adjust and settle the claim of one of such companies. A construction that would most probably, if not necessarily, be attended with such consequences cannot be adopted in consistency with the settled rules of construction of statutes.

We might extend this opinion to the consideration of other questions suggested by counsel, but we deem it unnecessary as the conclusion to which we have come would not be changed thereby. After a careful examination of the whole case we are of the opinion that the application should be granted.

It is therefore ordered and adjudged that a peremptory writ of mandamus be issued to the respondents, commanding and requiring them to execute and deliver without delay to the Central Pacific Railroad Company of California the four hundred bonds of said City and County of San Francisco, described in the ordinance hereinbefore referred to, with the interest coupons attached as in said ordinance provided.

By the Court, CURREY, J., on petition for rehearing.

The decision and judgment in this case was rendered early in September, eighteen hundred and sixty-four. About the tenth of that month, a written notice of such decision, as appears by proof before us, was personally served on the attorney for the respondents. On the thirteenth of the same month a petition was filed by new attorneys and counsel on behalf of respondents for a rehearing. Since then, and during the present term of the Court, the relators' attorneys have appeared and objected to the hearing and entertaining of this petition, on the ground that, as the case was originally commenced, tried and determined in this Court, the judgment rendered cannot be reviewed on petition for a rehearing.

By the amended Constitution, power was granted to the Supreme Court to issue writs of mandamus, certiorari and prohibition, and it was by authority of the constitutional provision referred to that this Court, upon proper proceedings instituted, assumed to act in the premises. Our judgment in the case was that of a Court of original jurisdiction, and for the correction of any error which we may commit in such cases the party aggrieved must pursue the course prescribed by the Practice Act in like cases arising in the District Courts, so far as may be. It is unnecessary to refer to the particular provisions of the Act specifying the course to be pursued in order to obtain a re-examination of a case by the same Court of original jurisdiction, after one decision made therein. The course prescribed by the statute has not been followed by the respondents in this case, and therefore the petition filed cannot be entertained.

It is therefore ordered that the petition for a rehearing be denied.

Mr. Justice Rhoads expressed no opinion.

HENRY GREGORY v. JAMES HAWORTH.

FRAUDULENT ASSIGNOR CANNOT SUE.—One who makes an assignment of property for the sole purpose of hindering, delaying, and defrauding his creditors, cannot maintain an action against the assignee to compel a re-assignment of it or a judgment for its value, if a re-assignment cannot be had, nor can a purchaser from the assignor, who buys with full knowledge of such fraudulent assignment, maintain such action.

SAME.—A party who comes into Court with a fraud upon his lips cannot obtain relief.

ALLEGATIONS OF COMPLAINT AND JUDGMENT.—A recovery, if had, must be grounded upon the facts which are averred in the complaint, and not upon those which are denied.

APPEAL from the District Court, Twelfth Judicial District, City and County of San Francisco.

Gregory v. Haworth.

Plaintiff recovered judgment in the Court below, and defendant appealed. The other facts are stated in the opinion of the Court.

Sol. A. Sharp, and T. B. Beardon, for Appellant.

The general rule is, that equity will not relieve a party against his own voluntary frauds; nor will it relieve his assignee, or a party standing in his shoes.

We think it scarcely necessary to cite authorities upon this point—the doctrine is so well settled. We refer the Court to McClure v. Purcell, 3 A. K. Marshall, 61; Babcock v. Booth, 2 Hill, 183; Osborn v. Moss, 7 Johns. 161; Jackson v. Gurnsey, 16 Johns. 191; Abbe v. Marr, 14 Cal. 211; Valentine v. Stewart, 15 Cal. 389; Barton v. Morris, 15 Ohio, 408.

Bennett, Love & Love, for Respondent.

It is claimed that as the complaint alleges the stock to have been transferred to Haworth to defraud the creditors of Bartol, the plaintiff, claiming by derivation through Bartol, cannot impeach such transfer. We are not aware that the plaintiff has ever sought to impeach the transfer; on the contrary, he, as well as Riddle and Eaton, from whom he claims, have acted throughout on the supposed validity of the transfer, otherwise they would not, probably, have tendered the amount of the notes, with the interest.

This portion of the complaint is not an inference drawn, but the statement of a conclusion of law from facts alleged, and the plaintiff's right to recover must depend on his proving facts, and if the proof of the facts will not warrant the conclusion of fraud, it will sustain any other legal conclusion which is sufficient in law to entitle the plaintiff to recover. If the facts alleged in the complaint and proved at the trial will not sustain the supposition of fraud, but will support any other cause of action, all that is said about fraud may be treated as surplusage. Facts enough are stated in the complaint, which have been proved, to make out a good cause of action. That is all that is required in any case after verdict and judgment. All the rest of the complaint is surplusage, and should be so regarded.

By the Court, SANDERSON, C. J.

This action was brought to compel the defendant to transfer to the plaintiff twelve shares of the capital stock of the California Stage Company, alleged to have formerly belonged to one Bartol and assigned by him to Riddle and Eaton, and by them to the plaintiff, or in case the said Haworth had in any manner disposed of said stock, or any portion thereof, to compel him to account with and pay to the plaintiff the value thereof. The complaint is most singularly drawn, and seems to proceed upon inconsistent theories, and it is not easy to determine upon which theory the pleader expected to recover. It alleges that the stock in question once belonged to Bartol, who, while the owner thereof, made and delivered to Haworth two promissory notes, amounting in the aggregate to the sum of fifteen hundred dollars, and turned the stock over to him as collateral. That Riddle and Eaton were creditors of Bartol to the amount of thirty thousand dollars, and Bartol gave them an order on Haworth for the stock upon the payment by them of the amount for which it was pledged. That Riddle and Eaton tendered the amount due, and demanded the stock of Haworth, who refused to transfer it. Upon this theory the plaintiff was doubtless entitled to recover. But, as if to prevent such a result, the pleader proceeds to characterize so much of the foregoing facts as relate to the question of pledge as pretended on the part of Haworth, and not true in fact, and to allege that the stock was in fact transferred by Bartol to Haworth "for the fraudulent, sole and only purpose of hindering, delaying, and defrauding the creditors of him, the said Bartol." Thus, in view of the doctrine that a pleading must be construed most strictly against the pleader, the complaint, so far as it proceeds upon the theory that Haworth held the stock as collateral security for the payment of the fifteen hundred dollars due from Bartol, becomes felo de se; and the matter thus far alleged only amounts, in logical effect, to an averment that Bartol was the owner of the stock, and while so the owner assigned it to Haworth in fraud of his creditors; yet the case seems to have been tried upon the theory that a pledge was averred and the plaintiff allowed to recover a judgment upon a finding of facts which at the outset he declared to be pretended and false. This cannot be allowed without a gross violation of the rule which requires that the allegations of the complaint, the evidence and the findings should correspond in legal intent. The averment, the proof and the finding should harmonize and proceed upon the same theory, each pointing with logical distinctness to the same result. A recovery, if had, must be secundum allegata, and must be grounded upon the facts which are averred in the complaint, and not upon those which are denied.

There is another theory, perhaps, deducible from this anomalous complaint, upon which the pleader seems to have relied for a recovery. That theory admits that the stock was transferred by Bartol in fraud of his creditors, but seeks to avoid the consequences of the fraud by showing that Riddle and Eaton were his creditors, and that, inasmuch as they could, by compulsory legal measures, reach the stock in the hands of Haworth, and subject it to the payment of their demand against Bartol, they might, by amicable agreement between them all, accomplish the same result, and that this was done. This theory does not seem to be fully sustained by the allegations of the complaint, for it is not alleged in terms that the stock was transferred by Bartol in payment of any demand which Riddle and Eaton held against him, and that such was the case is wholly left to inference. But admitting that the complaint is sufficient to justify the conclusion that Bartol assigned the stock in part payment of his indebtedness, and therefore sufficient to sustain a recovery had upon the theory under consideration, still the judgment cannot stand, for the reason that the theory cannot be extended beyond the complaint, it being wholly unsustained by either the evidence or the finding. The averment that Riddle and Eaton were creditors of Bartol is denied by the answer, and no evidence in support of the averment was offered at the trial, or if so, it is not stated in the record; nor did the referee find the fact either way.

Thus the idea that Haworth held the stock as collateral must be discarded, because the fact is expressly denied in the complaint; and the idea that Riddle and Eaton were the creditors of Bartol must be discarded, because it is wholly unsupported by the evidence or the findings. With these two ideas discarded the matters of fact alleged in the complaint, when stated most favorably for the plaintiff, amount to this: "Bartol was the owner of the stock in question, and while so the owner he fraudulently assigned the same to Haworth for the sole and only purpose of hindering, delaying and defrauding his creditors; that subsequently Bartol assigned for a valuable consideration to Riddle and Eaton, who in turn assigned to the plaintiff, both Riddle and Eaton and the plaintiff taking the assignment with full knowledge of Bartol's fraud; and that upon demand made Haworth refused to transfer the stock." Can an action for the stock or its value be maintained upon these facts? We think not. However it might be otherwise, it is clear that the plaintiff, having taken the assignment (if such it can be called) with the full knowledge, as appears from his own averment, of the previous fraudulent transfer of his assignor, occupies no better position than would Bartol. That Bartol could not maintain this action does not admit of a doubt. A party cannot come into Court with a fraud upon his lips and obtain relief. To such the halls of justice are not open.

The judgment must be reversed and a new trial ordered, with leave to both parties to amend their pleadings, and it is so ordered.
